BRITISH MUSEUM

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS

WILLIAM

DUKE OF CUMBERLAND.

SIR,

THE following hiſtory, collected from authentic memoirs, and moſt humbly dedicated to Your Royal Highneſs, preſents to view the memorable and moſt important ſcenes in the Britiſh annals; the abdication and revolution, the union of the two kingdoms, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion; events hardly to be equalled in the records of time!

A monarch inveſted with more power and a larger revenue than by any of his predeceſſors had been ever enjoyed, chuſes to abdicate his throne rather than be obliged to govern by law, and reſtrained from introducing popery and arbitrary power.

On the other hand, a prince, the buſineſs of whoſe life had been to defend the liberties of Europe againſt the overgrown power of France, being called in by the nation for the preſervation of their religion and laws, is unexpectedly advanced to the throne, and, inſtead of the anarchy and confuſion intended by the abdication, the government is ſettled on more ſolid and laſting foundations.

The ſecret ſprings of action, in theſe and other remarkable events, are clearly diſcovered in hiſtorical diſſertations on the riſe and progreſs of our civil and religious differences, by which ſo many perſons are ſwayed, ſo many things influenced.

Hence may be ſeen the reaſon of the various conduct and ſeemingly inconſiſtent behaviour at the time of the revolution: Why ſome, though they had heartily joined to invite over the prince of Orange, yet afterwards became his oppoſers, and refuſed him for their ſovereign, though they had been amongſt the moſt forward to have him for their deliverer: And why many others, though they had taken the oaths to king William, yet behaved in ſuch a manner, as if they believed their allegiance due to another.

Theſe and the like proceedings are ſhewn to flow from the abſurd principles and notions of government, which after the reſtoration had been eſpouſed and induſtriouſly propagated, and which, in the following reigns, were made uſe of by diſcontent, faction, and diſappointment to heighten the diviſions.

Notwithſtanding all this and the conſtant oppoſition to his meaſures, king William ſurmounted all difficulties, and fixed our civil and religious liberties on their true baſis.

But how great ſoever was our deliverance, the revolution would have been very imperfect and precarious, if by the care and pains of our deliverer the ſucceſſion to the crown had not been limited to the proteſtant line, and ſettled on the illuſtrious houſe of Hanover, the great ſecurity of our religion, laws, and properties.

By virtue of this parliamentary right, the ſtrongeſt and beſt title to empire, your royal grandfather, deſcended from a daughter of Great Britain, became poſſeſſed of the throne, and made a ſteady adherence to the laws of our conſtitution and a ſtrict union with his parliaments, the grand characteriſtics of his reign, whoſe example without any deviation has been conſtantly followed by his preſent Majeſty your royal father.

The proteſtant ſucceſſion had no ſooner taken place but the ſeeds of rebellion, which by the revival of the old notions of government had been ſown in the nation, ſprung up in the North. The union of the two kingdoms, one of the diſtinguiſhing glories of queen Anne's reign, could not prevent the Highlanders of Scotland, in conjunction with ſome Engliſh male-contents, from riſing in arms, and attempting without the leaſt provocation to dethrone their lawful ſovereign: but they were quickly reduced, though the ſpirit of rebellion was far from being quelled.

Of this we have had a late and flagrant inſtance, when the Highlanders, encouraged from abroad openly by France, and at home ſecretly by the enemies of our conſtitution, once more roſe in arms, and with a popiſh pretender at their head penetrated, like a torrent, into the heart of the kingdom.

Then it was that the eyes of all were turned towards your Royal Highneſs for deliverance from the preſent danger, and not in vain! The expectations of the public were anſwered. Terrified at your preſence, the rebels, with a rapidity exceeding that wherewith they had advanced, fled back to their country. Thither, animated by your example our troops purſued them with incredible toil, and totally routed their army in the ever memorable battle of Culloden: A victory by the voice of the public wholly aſcribed to your conduct and valour.

And now that your Royal Highneſs, with the unanimous conſent of the allies, is going to command the confederate armies againſt the common diſturber of Europe, may your efforts be attended with greater ſucceſs than even the duke of Marlborough's glorious campaigns, and may your victories be crowned with a general peace that may repair the defects of the treaty of Utrecht, and eſtabliſh a laſting tranquillity in Europe.

This is the hearty prayer and ſincere wiſh of every true Briton, and particularly of him, who with the moſt profound reſpect ſubſcribes himſelf, moſt humble, moſt dutiful,

SIR,

TO THE READER.

MR. RAPIN dying before he had brought down his hiſtory to the period he intended, the tranſlator has endeavoured to ſupply the defect, by the addition of the reigns of king WILLIAM and Queen Mary, Queen ANN, and King GEORGE I, which are carefully collected from the hiſtories and treatiſes, that from time to time have been publiſhed ſince the revolution, and alſo from the manuſcripts which have been communicated to the continuator; and in all affairs of importance, as well where the authors agree as where they differ, thoſe accounts that appear the beſt and moſt impartial are inſerted in the hiſtory, and the others thrown into the notes; by which means the reader will ſee the different turns given to the ſame fact, according to the principles or party of the ſeveral writers. Nor is it ſcrupled to copy or imitate any part of the ſeveral authors when conducive to the uſefulneſs of the work, or where there is no occaſion to alter or abridge.

That the ſprings and motives of action may be the more clearly diſcerned, an introduction is prefixed, ſhewing the riſe and progreſs of the ſeveral parties at the time of the revolution, in a ſhort review of the reigns of JAMES I, CHARLES I, CHARLES II, and JAMES II, with a true ſtate of our religious differences, by which ſo many perſons and proceedings have been influenced (1). Moreover the ſituation of foreign affairs, which very often caſts great light on domeſtic tranſactions, is on proper occaſions largely deſcribed.

In a word, nothing is omitted to render the work as comprehenſive and uſeful as poſſible, and the continuator hopes, he has ſhewn himſelf unbiaſſed by party, by a ſteady adherence to the truth, which he has endeavoured to follow without diſguiſe or miſrepreſentation. Whether he has ſucceeded in his endeavours, and really acted with the impartiality he intended, is left to the Public to judge.

(1) This diſſertation, which, in the firſt edition, was printed among the notes, is now inſerted in the context at the end of the reign of king William.

THE

ENGLAND.

INTRODUCTION.

The Riſe and Progreſs of the ſeveral Parties at the Time of the REVOLUTION, in a ſhort Review of the Reigns of JAMES I, CHARLES I, CHARLES II, and JAMES II.

AS an introduction to the following reign, it will be requiſite to premiſe a ſhort account of the parties in England at the time of the revolution, and of the principles on which they were ſeverally formed. Without this it will be difficult to diſcover the true ſprings of action, and why the progreſs of a revolution, in which at firſt all parties had readily joined, came on a ſudden to be ſo clogged, that the true ends could not be fully attained, namely, the redreſs of preſent, and prevention of future grievances, by ſettling the conſtitution on firm and laſting foundations.

In the reign of king James I, very different notions of the origin and nature of government, and the extent of the regal power, began to be entertained in the nation. It was by ſome aſſerted, "Monarchy and lineal ſucceſſion are of divine inſtitution, and conſequently ſacred and inviolable. The perſons as well as the authority of kings are ordained by God[a]. The king is the ſole fountain of power. All the liberties and privileges of the people are but ſo many conceſſions or extortions from the crown[b]. The king is not bound to his people by the coronation-oath, but only before God, to whom alone he is accountable[c]. The king's violations of the laws are not to be reſtrained by force, but ſubjects ought either actively to obey his commands, or paſſively ſubmit to his will[d]."

On the other hand, it was more generally maintained, "Though all power may be ſaid to be from God, as government is agreeable to his will, made known as well by nature as revelation, yet no particular form of government is of divine appointment, but every nation is left to ſettle that form which appears moſt ſuitable to their genius, and moſt conducive to the ſole end of all government, the happineſs of the ſociety. Monarchy, very probably, was firſt choſen; but as the living, by one man's will, was ſeen to become the cauſe of all men's miſery, other forms of government were introduced; and laws founded on reaſon, and tending to the public welfare, were framed by communities, as rules of conduct to the governors, and as meaſures of obedience to the people[e]. Thus in England, coæval with the monarchy, there has always been a conſtitution, that is, a ſyſtem of laws, inſtitutions, and cuſtoms, according to which the king is obliged to govern, and the ſubject to obey[f]. The king, in his coronation-oath, as much ſwears to the people, as the people ſwear to the king. When the king acts in conformity to the laws, he ought not to be reſiſted on any pretence; but if he violates the fundamental laws of the realm, and endeavours to ſubvert the conſtitution, he may be not only reſiſted, but even depoſed. Lineal ſucceſſion and hereditary right have no foundation in nature, nor were ever appointed by God, but were firſt introduced by communities, where kingly government prevailed, to

[a] In his ſpeech to his firſt parliament, king James I. ſpeaking of the Engliſh throne, ſays, "Which God by my birth-right and lineal deſcent had in fulneſs of time provided for me." He often talked of his undoubted, hereditary, independent right, inherent in himſelf.

[b] King James I, in one of his ſpeeches aſſerts, that the privileges of parliament are derived from the grace and permiſſion of his anceſtors, and liable to be retrenched at the will of the prince. Upon which the commons drew up a proteſtation, declaring, that the liberties, privileges, and juriſdiction of parliament, are the undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the ſubjects of England. This proteſtation the king, in full council, the judges alſo being preſent, declared to be invalid and of no effect, and with his own hand took it out of the journal-book.

[c] A book was publiſhed, with the royal licence, by Dr. Cowel, in 1609, wherein, among other things, it is ſaid, the king is not bound by the laws, or by his coronation-oath.

[d] It was often declared from the pulpit, eſpecially by the Court-preachers, "The people have no other refuge left under the moſt cruel tyranny, but "Prayers and Tears." This doctrine was endeavoured to be proved by texts of ſcripture, paſſages out of the Homilies, and the practice of the primitive chriſtians.

[e] It is certain, the European kingdoms founded by the Goths, Vandals, &c. as Lombardy, Burgundy, Sweden, Denmark, Hungary, Arragon, France, &c. were originally all limited Monarchies, and had their ſeveral conſtitutions or fundamental laws, by which the regal power was limited. Amongſt theſe limitations were generally the two great articles, That no laws, could be made, nor any money levied, without conſent of the States.

[f] To have a clear notion of the Engliſh conſtitution in general, a man need only conſider how the ſovereign power is divided, and in what perſons the ſeveral branches are veſted. The ſovereign power is compounded of theſe ſix parts. I. Legiſlative power, or authority to make laws. II. Executive power, which conſiſts in creating officers to execute the laws and diſcharge all the functions of the government, according to law. III. A power of making war and peace. IV. A power of raiſing money for ſupport of the government. V. The laſt appeal in all caſes of law. VI. The coinage or power over the Mint. Now there are but three of theſe ſix parts lodged in the perſon of the king; namely, the executive power, the power of making war and peace, and the coinage. And of theſe branches of royal power, the executive (which is the largeſt) is ſo limited, that the king cannot employ in civil or military office, any man but what is qualified by laws of the people's making. And though the power of war be veſted in the king, yet the commons have reſerved to themſelves the power of raiſing money, without which no war can be waged. As for the coinage, it is rather an honourable truſt than a real power. But as to the legiſlature, the greateſt branch of ſovereign power, it is certain no law can be enacted without the authority of the commons, who have alſo the ſole power of levying money. The laſt appeal, in caſes of law, is uſually made to the houſe of lords. The ſovereign power being thus divided in England, it is eaſy to ſee the extent of the regal power, and the nature of the allegiance due to the king. Hence alſo may be perceived the happineſs of the Engliſh in preſerving their antient conſtitution, whilſt the greateſt part of Europe groans under arbitrary power.

[g] By a ſtatute of the 13th year of queen Elizabeth, it was made high-treaſon for any perſon to affirm, that the reigning prince, with the authority of the parliament, is not able to limit and bind the crown, and the deſcent and inheritance thereof. This plainly ſhews the legiſlature's opinion of hereditary right in thoſe days. The oppoſers of the divine right of lineal ſucceſſion thought it ſtrange, that king James I. ſhould ſo ſtrenuouſly aſſert that doctrine, ſince the race of the Stewarts, after Robert II. had no other title to the crown of Scotland, but what they derived from an act of parliament, in preclusion of thoſe of the legitimate and right line. For Robert having had three ſons and a daughter by Elizabeth Mure his concubine, marries her afterwards to one Gifford, himſelf at the ſame time eſpouſing Euſemia, daughter of the earl of Roſs, by whom he had William and David earls of Athol and Strathern, and a daughter, wife of James Douglaſs, ſon to the earl of Douglaſs. Robert, upon the death of his wife Euſemia and of Gifford, not only marries his former concubine, but obtains an act of parliament to ſettle the crown upon the children begotten upon her in concubinate, and to exclude his legitimate children by his wife Euſemia. It prevent confuſion and ſtrife. And therefore the ſucceſſion may be altered and transferred from one branch of a family to another, or to a new family, when the ſupreme law, the ſafety of the people, calls for it[g]."

At the ſame time there were alſo ſome, who, far from thinking regal power and hereditary right of divine appointment, preferred in their minds a republican form of government, even to a limited monarchy. But theſe ſentiments were concealed in this reign under an external zeal for the conſtitution and privileges of the people[h].

The firſt ſet of principles was eſpouſed by the king, the court, and great part of the clergy, and by degrees found reception in the univerſities, inns of court, and even among the judges. The king, agreeably to his principles, in his proclamations and ſpeeches, uſed the language of an abſolute monarch[i], and in his conduct, carried the prerogative to a very great height, while his proceedings were ſupported by the opinions of the judges, and paſſive obedience inculcated on the people from the pulpit and preſs. Whoever diſbelieved the divine, unalienable, hereditary, independent right of kings, or offered to bound the royal prerogative, were branded with the name of Puritan[k]. By which means the puritans, who before were inconſiderable, became a ſtrong party, as including all the friends to the conſtitution, and the oppoſers of arbitrary power. In a word, by theſe means two parties were formed in the kingdom, one of which embracing the principles of the divine right of kings, exalted the prerogative above meaſure, whilſt the other eſpouſing the oppoſite principles, adhered to the conſtitution, and zealouſly aſſerted the national privileges. Thus were laid in king James the firſt's reign, the foundation, not only of the civil wars, but of all the party-diviſions, which have ſince exiſted in the nation.

King Charles I. mounted the throne, poſſeſſed with the ſame principles of government which his father had ſo induſtriouſly propagated, and under the influence of the ſame counſels and miniſtry. Accordingly, in the firſt fifteen years of his reign, continual breaches were made in the conſtitution, and the nation's liberties invaded, whilſt perhaps the king imagined he was only defending his prerogative[l]. Within the ſpace of a year two parliaments are ſummoned and diſſolved in diſpleaſure, for preſuming to meddle with grievances, and call the king's miniſters to account[m]. In the 4th year of this reign another parliament is alſo, for the ſame reaſon, diſmiſſed, with a reproachful and threatning ſpeech[n], and ſuch members as had given offence are impriſoned and fined. After this, the king governs without a parliament twelve years. In which interval the bulwark of the national liberties, the power of raiſing money, is not only aſſumed and rigorouſly exerciſed by the crown[o], but the methods uſed to that end are pronounced legal by the judges[p], and preached as obligatory to the ſubject's conſcience by ſome of of the clergy[q]. During theſe incroachments on the rights of the people, and the king's tacit renunciation of the conſtitution by the diſuſe of parliaments, jealouſy and diſcontent ſpread themſelves in the nation, the puritan party daily in-

[h] It muſt be obſerved, that in the reign of queen Mary, great numbers, on account of religion, fled beyond ſea, and were well received by the reformed ſtates of Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, and allowed churches for their public worſhip. When theſe exiles, upon queen Elizabeth's acceſſion, returned to England, many brought with them not only a diſlike to the worſhip and diſcipline of the eſtabliſhed church, and the deſire of a purer religion, as they termed it, (whence the name Puritan) but alſo favourable ſentiments of the governments they had lived under ſo peaceably, which, in the end, were turned, by the arbitrary proceedings of of the following reigns, into republican principles, and proved, under Charles I, the occaſion of the downfal of the monarchy, by preventing the breach between the king and commons from being healed.

[i] In the proclamation for calling his firſt parliament, he arbitrarily preſcribed as well to the electors as elected, and ſubjected both to ſevere penalties, in caſe any return ſhould be made contrary to his proclamation. See the proclamation, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 389. And in a ſpeech to the parliament expreſly tells them, "As it is blaſphemy to diſpute what God may do, ſo is it ſedition in ſubjects to diſpute what a king may do in the height of his power." So poſſeſſed was the king (ſays Burnet) of a divine right in all kings, that he could not bear that even an elective and limited king ſhould be called in queſtion by his ſubjects, and therefore would never give prince Frederick, his ſon-in-law, the title of king, nor lend him any aſſiſtance for the ſupport of his new dignity. It was alſo uſual with him, from the ſame principle, to call the Dutch, rebels, for endeavouring to ſhake off the tyrannical yoke of Spain.

[k] Hence the diſtinction of ſtate and church puritans. The former were the ſame with thoſe ſince called whigs, and the latter came to be included in the general name of diſſenters, whilſt the aſſerters of the divine right of kings acquired the denomination of tories.

[l] This opinion that king Charles I, in the invaſion of the people's rights, imagined, he was only concerned in the defence of his own, ſeems not very improbable; for as a modern writer obſerves, This prince had ſucked in with his milk his father's abſurd principles of government, to his own and the kingdom's misfortune. He found them eſpouſed as true principles both of religion and policy, by a whole party in the nation, whom he eſteemed friends to church and ſtate. He found them oppoſed by a party, whom he looked upon as enemies to the church and monarchy. Can it be wondered that he grew zealous in a cauſe which he underſtood to concern him ſo nearly, and in which he ſaw ſo many men who had not the ſame intereſt, and might therefore be ſuppoſed to act on a principle of conſcience, equally zealous? Let any man, who has been deeply and long engaged in the conteſts of party, aſk himſelf, on cool reflection, whether prejudices concerning men and things, have not grown up and ſtrengthened with him, and obtained an uncontroulable influence over his conduct. With ſuch an habitual bias upon him, king Charles came to the throne. By this opinion, many difficulties in that prince's conduct may be accounted for, and his public and private character rendered leſs inconſiſtent.

[m] The lord Clarendon obſerves upon this occaſion, that for the king to interpoſe and ſhelter an accuſed ſervant from anſwering, does not only ſeem an obſtruction of juſtice, and lay an imputation upon the prince of being privy to the offence, but leaves ſo great a ſcandal upon the party himſelf, that he is generally concluded guilty of whatſoever he is charged with—He farther obſerves, that theſe unreaſonable, unſkilful, and precipitate (as he calls them) diſſolutions of parliaments, were the moſt probable ſource from whence the civil wars flowed. B. I. p. 4, 5.

[n] In this ſpeech the king declares, "that it was merely the undutiful and ſeditious carriage of the lower-houſe that hath made the diſſolution of the parliament." And concludes, "theſe vipers (ſpeaking of ſome of the members) muſt look for their reward of puniſhment." See the ſpeech, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 507. Such aſperity of language (ſays lord Clarendon) had never before been uſed from the throne to the parliament. And he laments the unhappy effects it had upon the nation. In this parliament the king (though with reluctance) gave the royal aſſent to the petition of right, whereby he bound himſelf among other things, not to raiſe any money by way of loan, gift, benevolence, or tax, without conſent of parliament, nor to impriſon any perſon without certifying the cauſe; both which articles he violated immediately after the diſſolution of this parliament, and continued to do ſo for twelve years together. This breach of his parliamentary word, the moſt ſolemn a king can give, was afterwards uſed as a ſtrong argument that he would break through all his conceſſions to the parliament of 1640, as ſoon as it ſhould be in his power, and thereby proved one occaſion of the civil wars. The moſt natural way to account for this proceeding of king Charles I, muſt be on the ſuppoſition before mentioned, that he imagined he was only purſuing his own rights. Accordingly he ſaid to the parliament, when he paſſed the petition of right, "You neither mean nor can hurt my prerogative." And as his extraordinary methods received the ſanction of the judges opinion, he probably believed them to belong to the prerogative royal.

[o] Five ſubſidies, only mentioned as intended to be granted in the ſecond parliament, were enacted with the ſame rigour throughout the kingdom, as if an act had paſſed to that purpoſe; and divers gentlemen of prime quality were, for refuſing to pay the ſame, committed to priſon. Projects for money of all kinds, many ridiculous, many ſcandalous, all very grievous, were ſet on foot. Supplemental acts of ſtate were made to ſupply defects of laws, and ſo tunnage and poundage, and other duties were collected by order of council, which had been poſitively refuſed to be ſettled by act of parliament, and new and greater impoſitions laid upon trade. For the better ſupport of theſe extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and inſtruments, and to diſcountenance and ſuppreſs all bold inquiries and oppoſers, the council-table and ſtar-chamber enlarge their juriſdictions to a vaſt extent, "holding (as Thucydides ſaid to the Athenians) for honourable, that which pleaſed, and for juſt, that which profited;" and being the ſame perſons in ſeveral rooms, grew both courts of law to determine right, and courts of revenue to bring money into the treaſury; the council-table by proclamations enjoining the people what was not enjoined by the law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited; and the ſtar-chamber cenſuring the breach and diſobedience to thoſe proclamations by very great fines and impriſonment, ſo that any diſreſpect to any acts of ſtate, or to the perſons of ſtateſmen, was in no time more penal, and thoſe foundations of right by which men valued their ſecurity, to the apprehenſion and underſtanding of wiſe men, were never more in danger of being deſtroyed. This paragraph is entirely taken from the lord Clarendon's hiſtory, (B. I. p. 67, 68.) who cannot be ſuſpected of aggravating any thing to the diſadvantage of king Charles I, and is with ſome other paſſages a probable argument againſt the charge of omiſſions and interpolations caſt upon the edition of that hiſtory. For notwithſtanding ſome ſoftening expreſſions with regard to the king, the illegal proceedings in the firſt fifteen years of his reign, are in a few pages as ſtrongly repreſented, as in volumes of the republican writers.

[p] The lord Clarendon obſerves, that the damage and miſchief cannot be expreſſed that the crown and ſtate ſuſtained, by the deſerved reproach and infamy that attended the judges, by being made uſe of in ſhip-money and other acts of power. For (ſays he) men ſubmitted to the preſſures as aſſuring themſelves that that they might, when they pleaſed, reſort to the law for relief. But when they heard ſhip-money demanded in a court of law as a right, and found it, by ſworn judges of the law adjudged ſo, upon ſuch grounds and reaſons as every ſtander-by was able to ſwear was not law, and were required to pay it by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own, they thought themſelves bound, in conſcience to the public juſtice, not to ſubmit to the impoſition. Sir John Finch, lord chief-juſtice of the common-pleas, and a ſtrenuous aſſerter of ſhip-money, being made lord-keeper, upon a demurrer put in to a bill before him, which had no other equity in it than an order of the lords of the council, declared, "Whilſt he was keeper, no man ſhould be ſo fawcy as to diſpute thoſe orders, but the wiſdom of that board ſhould be always ground enough for him to make a decree in chancery." Which, adds the lord Clarendon, was ſo great an aggravation of the exceſs of that table, that it received more prejudice from that act of unreaſonable reſpect, than from all the contempt could poſſibly have been offered to it. Clar. B. I. p. 69, 74.

[q] "It cannot (ſays lord Clarendon) be denied, but there was ſometimes preached at Whitehall matter very unfit for the place, and very ſcandalous for the perſons, who preſumed often to determine things out of the verge of their own profeſſion." Sibthorp, in a ſermon ſaid, "The prince is the head, and makes his court and council, it is his duty to direct and make laws." Dr. Manwaring ſpoke more plainly in one of his ſermons: "The king (ſays he) is not bound to obſerve the laws of the realm concerning the ſubjects' rights, and liberties, but his royal will and command in impoſing taxes and loans, without common conſent in parliament, doth oblige the ſubjects' conſcience upon pain of eternal damnation." This man, after having been fined and impriſoned by the lords, was pardoned by the king and made a biſhop. And archbiſhop Abbot was ſuſpended for refuſing to licenſe Sibthorp's ſermon.

creaſes, and all true lovers of their country earneſtly long for an opportunity to reſcue the conſtitution from entire deſtruction. Perhaps this opportunity would have been expected in vain, had it not been accidentally given by the king himſelf. For in the height of his power, he reſolves to accompliſh the project, begun by his father, of introducing the Engliſh church diſcipline into Scotland. By this attempt ſuch a flame is kindled in the nation, that a war at laſt breaks out between the king and his Scotiſh ſubjects, wherein England is no way concerned. The king, though the occaſions of the government were, by his extraordinary methods of raiſing money, amply ſupplied, could not long maintain an army without being forced to come to a treaty of pacification, and to apply to the parliament, the very mention of which had by a former proclamation been ſtrictly forbid[r]. Accordingly a parliament, after a twelve years intermiſſion, is ſummoned to meet on the 13th of April, 1640. The king opens the ſeſſion with deſiring a ſpeedy ſupply; but the commons are reſolved that the grievances ſhall firſt be redreſſed. Whereupon the king to the ſurpriſe and concern of the whole nation, haſtily diſſolves the parliament[s], but at the ſame time, the convocation, by his ſpecial warrant, is continued, and canons are paſſed, wherein the divine right of kings, and unlimited obedience, are expreſly aſſerted[t]. Immediately after, the war with Scotland is renewed, and by the advice of a junto of ſelect counſellors, all expedients for raiſing men and money are employed[u]. Mean while the Scots, by private encouragement from England, advance to their borders[w], and routing a party of Engliſh, become maſters of Newcaſtle. The king is quickly reduced to great ſtraits, and petitioned to call a parliament and treat with the Scots. Want of money, and a manifeſt averſion in the Engliſh, and particularly in the army, to fight againſt the Scots, oblige the king to comply. Commiſſioners are appointed on both ſides to treat, firſt at Rippon and afterwards at London, and a parliament ſummoned to ſit the 3d of November 1640. So univerſal was the diſlike of the principles and proceedings of the court, that notwithſtanding all their endeavours, few of that party could obtain a ſeat in this parliament[x]. The counties, cities, and boroughs, were almoſt unanimous in chuſing ſtate puritans, or (in the modern phraſe) whigs, that is, men, who without believing the divine right of kings, were attached to the conſtitution as well in church as ſtate, and enemies only to the abuſe of power in both. Of ſuch men the majority of the commons conſiſted, whoſe ſole intention was to redreſs the civil and eccleſiaſtical grievances, and ſeverely puniſh the authors[y]. Had the houſe been entirely filled with theſe and the ſmall number of the court party, the wounds in the conſtitution would doubtleſs have been cloſed, and the liberties of the people ſecured from future invaſion, without the extirpation of the monarchy, or even epiſcopacy. But unhappily there were alſo elected ſome, whoſe views were carried much farther, and who, not content with reforming abuſes, were for removing foundations[z]. Theſe men, more conſiderable for their abilities than number, concealed their intentions at firſt, by pretending to confine their deſires, with the friends of the conſtitution, to the redreſs of grievances.

To the parliament, thus compoſed, the king in his firſt ſpeech declares his reſolution to put himſelf freely upon the [r] The diſſolution of the third parliament was followed with a declaration, that "ſince for ſeveral ill ends the calling again of a parliament was divulged, however, his majeſty had ſhewed, by his frequent meeting his people, his love to the uſe of parliaments, yet the late abuſe having, for the preſent, driven his majeſty unwillingly out of that courſe, he ſhall account it preſumption for any to preſcribe any time to his majeſty for parliaments." Which words (ſays lord Clarendon) were generally interpreted, as if no more aſſemblies of that nature were to be expected, and that all men were prohibited, upon the penalty of cenſure, ſo much as to ſpeak of a parliament. Clar. B. I. p. 4.

[s] After a ſeſſion of three weeks. In all probability, if the king had ſuffered this parliament to ſit, the grievances of the nation had been redreſſed in a regular manner, and the civil wars entirely prevented. For it is univerſally agreed, that the houſe of commons conſiſted in general of ſober and diſpaſſionate men, whoſe ſole aim was to reſtrain the prerogative within due bounds, and ſecure the juſt liberties of the people. Accordingly, the lord Clarendon obſerves, that "there could not a greater damp have ſeized upon the ſpirits of the whole nation than this diſſolution cauſed, and men had much of the miſery in view which ſhortly after fell out." He was himſelf a member of this parliament. The king was quickly ſenſible of his error, and very deſirous to repair it, and the ſame, or the next day, conſulted whether he might by proclamation recall the commons, to meet together again. Clar. B. I. p. 139, 140.

[t] By the firſt canon all pariſh-prieſts were ordered to read in the church one Sunday in every quarter the following explanation of regal power. "That the moſt high and ſacred order of kings is of divine right, being the ordinance of God himſelf, founded in the prime laws of nature and revelation, by which the ſupreme power over all perſons, civil and eccleſiaſtical is given to them.—And for ſubjects to bear arms againſt their king, either offenſive or defenſive, upon any pretence whatſoever, is at leaſt to reſiſt the powers ordained of God; and though they do not invade, but only reſiſt, St. Paul ſays, they ſhall receive damnation." See Nalſon, p. 545. This, and the other canons were by the next parliament condemned "as contrary to the fundamental laws of the realm, the king's prerogative, the property of the ſubject, and the rights of parliament." Whit. Mem. p. 37. The proceedings of this convocation (ſays lord Clarendon) drew the ſame prejudice upon the whole body of the clergy, to which before only ſome few clergymen were expoſed. B. II. p. 148. It is obſervable, that the judges, Finch, Littleton, &c. gave their opinion, that "The convocation called by the king's writ was not to diſſolve but by the king's writ, notwithſtanding the diſſolution of the parliament." Whit. Mem. p. 32.

[u] The king's moſt intimate counſellors at this time were, Laud, Strafford, and Cottington, by whom it ſeems, he was told, that being refuſed by the commons, he might uſe any methods to raiſe money. Accordingly, (ſays Whitlock) all the wheels of the prerogative were ſet in motion to provide money, as loans, knighthood, monopolies, &c. Whit. Mem. p. 33, &c. It is remarkable that, the firſt footſteps we have of a cabinet-council in any European government were in the time of Charles IX. king of France, when reſolving to maſſacre the proteſtants he durſt not truſt his council with it, but choſe a few men whom he called his cabinet-council. Formerly, it ſeems, all matters were debated and reſolved in the privy-council, where every man ſubſcribed his opinion, and was anſwerable for it. This part of the conſtitution was broken by king Charles I, but more notoriouſly by king Charles II, who ſettled a cabal or cabinet-council, where all matters of conſequence were reſolved, and then brought to the privy-council to be confirmed. See Pref. to the Hiſt. of Standing Armies.

[w] As the king (ſays Whitlock) had his private junto, ſo the agents of the Scots-covenanters and their friends in London had their private meeting and counſels, with thoſe who were diſcontented at the preſent management of affairs at court, and who had ſuffered by the late proceedings; and from hence no ſmall encouragement and promiſe of aſſiſtance was given to the covenanters. Whit. Mem. p. 33.

[x] The court (ſays Whitlock) laboured to bring in their friends; but thoſe who were moſt favoured at court, had leaſt reſpect in the country, and it was not a little ſtrange to ſee what a ſpirit of oppoſition to the court-proceedings, was in the hearts and actions of moſt of the people, ſo that very few of that party had the favour to be choſen members of this parliament. Whit. Mem. p. 35.

[y] If the aſſertions of the lord Clarendon and other writers on the king's ſide be impartially conſidered, it can hardly be doubted that the intention of much the greateſt part of the commons, at the time of their aſſembling, was not to alter the conſtitution but reform abuſes. And that even the views of thoſe who were for alterations in church and ſtate, did not extend beyond abridging the temporal power of the biſhops and eccleſiaſtical courts, and bounding the prerogative ſo, as to prevent any future invaſions of the rights of the ſubject. For though there were ſome who privately deſired the abolition of epiſcopacy, and others who ſecretly wiſhed both that and the extirpation of the monarchy, yet it is not poſſible they (eſpecially the republicans) ſhould entertain the leaſt hopes of ſeeing their deſires accompliſhed, contrary to the principles and intentions of both houſes, and the general bent and genius of the nation. The ſubverſion therefore of the civil and eccleſiaſtical conſtitution, which afterwards happened, was not owing to any ſettled deſign at the firſt, but to certain accidents and conjunctures not to be foreſeen by the moſt acute underſtanding. The lord Clarendon, ſpeaking of the temper and conſtitution of both houſes, expreſly ſays, "In the houſe of commons were many perſons of wiſdom and gravity, who being poſſeſſed of great and plentiful fortunes, though they were undevoted enough to the court, had all imaginable duty to the king, and affection to the government, eſtabliſhed by law or antient cuſtom; and without doubt, the major part of that body conſiſted of men who had no mind to break the peace of the kingdom, or to make any conſiderable alteration in the government of church or ſtate." B. I. p. 184. Agreeably to this repreſentation was the order of the commons of Novemb. 20. 1640, ſeventeen days after their firſt meeting, 'That none ſhould ſit in their houſe but ſuch as would receive the communion according to the uſage of the church of England.' As for the peers, the lord Clarendon obſerves, that when the bill for taking away the votes of the biſhops in parliament was brought into the houſe, there were only two lords (Say and Brook) that appeared as enemies to the whole fabric of the church, and to deſire a diſſolution of the epiſcopal Government. He likewiſe deſcribes the principal members of the houſe of commons to be well-affected, or at leaſt not averſe to the government of the church, as Pym, Hollis, Whitlock, Selden, &c. and of Hamden himſelf he ſays, "Moſt people believed, his diſlike was rather to ſome churchmen, than to the eccleſiaſtical government of the church." It ſeems therefore unjuſt to charge in general the members of this Parliament with having from the beginning, deſigns of ſubverting the conſtitution, or to blame their oppoſition to the proceedings of the court, ſince frequency of parliaments, redreſs of grievances, and calling the king's arbitrary miniſters to account, were the ends propoſed by the major part of both houſes, to accompliſh which, it was by ſome judged neceſſary to ſet bounds to the prerogative royal, and diminiſh the power of the biſhops, without the leaſt thought of deſtroying the civil or eccleſiaſtical government. It was not (ſays Welwood) a few of either houſe, but all the great patriots that concurred at firſt to make inquiry into the grievances of this reign. Sir Edward Hide (afterwards lord Clarendon) the lord Digby, the lord Falkland, the lord Capel, Mr. Grimſtone, (ſpeaker of that houſe of commons, that brought in king Charles II.) Mr. Holles, (ſince lord Holles) all which ſuffered afterwards on the king's ſide; and in general moſt of thoſe that took the king's part in the war, were the men that appeared with the greateſt zeal for the redreſs of grievances, and their intentions were certainly noble and juſt, and tended to the equal advantage of king and people. Welw. Mem. p. 43.

[z] It muſt be obſerved, the puritans had ſometime been diſtinguiſhed by the names of doctrinal-puritans, and diſcipline-puritans. The doctrinal-puritans were conformiſts to the church of England, and well pleaſed with epiſcopal government, but underſtood the articles of juſtification, free-will, predeſtination, &c. in the literal or Calviniſtical ſenſe, and therefore were very averſe to the perſons of ſuch biſhops, as eſpouſed and propagated the oppoſite or Arminian interpretation of the ſame points. Moſt of the members of the houſe of commons were, as to religion, doctrinal-puritans. The diſcipline-puritans, equally poſſeſſed with the divine inſtitution of preſbytery, as the rigid churchmen with the divine right of epiſcopacy, were enemies to the whole hierarchy, and wiſhed for the eſtabliſhment of the preſbyterian government. Of theſe there were but few at firſt in the parliament, and ſtill fewer republicans, who afterwards, under the name of independents, oppoſed as well the preſbyterian as epiſcopal diſcipline, and by that means proved one occaſion of the reſtoration of king Charles II.

By

affection of his ſubjects, and heartily to concur in the redreſs of their juſt grievances. According to this declaration, the king conſents to the abolition of ſhip-money [a], knighthood-money, monopolies, the courts of Star-chamber [b], and High commiſſion [c], thoſe great fountains of grievances, and for a future ſecurity of his governing by law, paſſes a bill for triennial parliaments [d]. He alſo, though with reluctance, ſacrifices one of his moſt intimate counſellors, the lord Strafford, to the reſentment of the commons; and as a demonſtration of the ſincerity of his intentions, gives the commons power to ſit till they ſhould diſſolve themſelves.

After receiving the thanks of both houſes for theſe acts, the king takes a journey to Scotland, and the pacification being concluded, the two armies are ordered to be diſbanded. In Scotland the king, who had not long ſince attempted to introduce there the Engliſh church worſhip and diſcipline, reſolves now, if poſſible, to regain the affection of his countrymen, or at leaſt to keep them quiet, and to this end ratifies in parliament all their late proceedings, and gives his conſent to the acts of the Glaſgow aſſembly; by one of which "the government of the church by archbiſhops and biſhops is declared to be againſt the word of God and propagation of religion, and epiſcopacy utterly aboliſhed [e]."

The grievances of both nations being thus redreſſed, and the cauſes in great meaſure removed, the king was in hopes he ſhould be no farther preſſed. But he ſoon found he was miſtaken. For during his abſence in Scotland, the leaders in the houſe of commons had found means to infuſe into many members a belief, that the king's conceſſions were no ſufficient ſecurity againſt future encroachments of the crown, and therefore it was neceſſary to obtain a farther limitation of the prerogative, as well as a retrenchment of the epiſcopal power. When they thought they had gained a majority to their opinion, upon news that the king was coming from Scotland, the famous remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom was brought into the houſe and put to the vote. Hitherto the commons had been unanimous in the reformation of abuſes, but in this affair, after a long and violent debate, the houſe was divided, and the remonſtance carried but by nine voices [f]. Eight days after his return, this remonſtrance, with a petition for removing evil counſellors, and for his concurrence in the farther abridging the temporal power of the clergy, was preſented to the king, after which it was printed and publiſhed to the people.

From thenceforward two parties aroſe, as well in the nation as in the houſes of parliament. The one, ſatisfied with the redreſs of the grievances, thought the remonſtrance needleſs, and the people's rights amply ſecured by the king's ſincerity, and the act for triennial parliaments. The other believed theſe fences too weak, and inſiſted upon ſtronger ſecurities in the abridgment of the royal power.

Agreeably to their petition, and purſuant to their deſign of a farther reformation, the commons brought in a bill to take away the biſhops votes in parliament, and to diſable clergymen from having any temporal juriſdiction. As the biſhops had all along promoted the principles and proceedings of the court, and with great ſeverity to the oppoſers introduced innovations into the church, the bill was paſſed in the lower-houſe, even by thoſe who were no enemies to the epiſcopal order [g]. But it would have found greater oppoſition in the houſe of lords, had not the biſhops unadviſedly given the commons an opportunity of cauſing twelve of their bench to be confined [h]. By this means the bill at length was alſo paſſed by the peers. The royal aſſent would have been ſtill more dif-

[a] By this act, all the proceedings in the buſineſs of ſhip-money were adjudged void, and the judgments, enrolements, and entries thereupon, vacated and cancelled. Beſides, ſome clauſes in the ſtatute aſſert the ſubject's liberty and property beyond what was done by the petition of right, which (ſays the lord Clarendon) needed an additional eſtabliſhment.

[b] The exorbitances (ſays lord Clarendon) of this court had been ſuch, that there were very few perſons of quality who had not ſuffered or been perplexed by the weight or fear of thoſe cenſures and judgments. For having extended their juriſdiction from riots, perjury, and the moſt notorious miſdemeanors, to an aſſerting all proclamations and orders of ſtate; to the vindicating illegal commiſſions and grants of monopolies, (all which were the chief ground-works of their late proceedings) no man could hope to be longer free from the inquiſition of that court, than he reſolved to ſubmit to thoſe and the like extraordinary courſes. B. III. p. 284.

[c] The high-commiſſion court was erected by a ſtatute in the firſt year of queen Elizabeth, inſtead of a juriſdiction which had been exerciſed under the pope's authority, then aboliſhed. Of late (ſays the lord Clarendon) it cannot be denied, that by the great power of ſome biſhops at court, it had much over-flowed the banks which ſhould have contained it. Then, it was grown from an eccleſiaſtical court, for reformation of manners, to a court of revenue; and impoſed great fines upon thoſe who were culpable before them; ſometimes above the degree of the offence, had the juriſdiction of fining been unqueſtionable: which it was not. The act for aboliſhing the high-commiſſion repeals that branch of the ſtatute of the firſt of queen Elizabeth, upon which this court was founded, and then enacts, "That no archbiſhops, biſhops, vicars general, chancellor, or official, nor their commiſſaries, or any other eccleſiaſtical officer, ſhall, by any grant, &c. from the king, after the firſt of Auguſt 1641, award, impoſe, or inflict any pain, penalty, fine, amercement, impriſonment, or other corporal puniſhment, upon any of the king's ſubjects, for any contempt, miſdemeanor, crime, matter, or thing, whatſoever, belonging to eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction; or ſhall, ex officio, adminiſter to any perſon, any corporal oath, to make any preſentment of any crime, or to confeſs or accuſe himſelf of any crime or miſdemeanor, whereby he or ſhe may be liable to any puniſhment, under the penalty of treble charges, and a hundred pound to him who ſhall demand the ſame. Nor ſhall any new court be erected with like power, as the high-commiſſion had or pretended to have, but all ſuch commiſſions from the king and his ſucceſſors, and all acts made by virtue thereof ſhall be utterly void." By this act (as the lord Clarendon obſerves) all coercive power, and in a manner, all eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, were taken from the ſpiritual courts. B. III. p. 284.

[d] Whitlock obſerves, that the committee for this bill took a great deal of pains in framing it, p. 39. There are in it many ſtrong clauſes in favour of the ſubjects, in caſe the crown ſhould omit the ſending out the writs; particularly, "the giving the people authority to aſſemble together, if the king failed to call them." However, (ſays the lord Clarendon) ſince it was evident that great inconveniences had befallen the kingdom by the long intermiſſion of parliaments, and this intermiſſion could not have happened, if there had not been ſome neglect of what had been ſettled by former laws; therefore there was ſome colour of reaſon for theſe clauſes, by which the crown could in no caſe ſuffer, but by its own default. B. III. p. 282. This and the two foregoing notes plainly ſhew, the commons in theſe, as well as in other acts paſſed about the ſame time, againſt monopolies, knighthood-money, incroachments in the Stannery courts, and for the certainty of bounds of foreſts, (all which had been occaſions of great oppreſſions) had juſt reaſons for their proceedings, by the confeſſion even of the lord Clarendon himſelf, who ſays alſo concerning foreſts, That the people had been ſo vexed by the juſtice in Eyre's ſeat, that few men could aſſure themſelves their eſtates and houſes might not be brought within the juriſdiction of ſome foreſt, which if they were, it coſt them great fines. B. III. p. 286. Theſe acts have been the more fully explained, as they are but juſt mentioned by Rapin, at the time of their being paſſed. Vol. II. p. 581.

[e] This condeſcenſion to the Scots (ſays lord Clarendon) gave unſpeakable encouragement to the enemies of the church of England, whoſe number from thenceforth wonderfully encreaſed. They preſumed their work was more than half done, when the king himſelf declared, (as they ſaid, by his aſſent to that act) that epiſcopal government was againſt the word of God, and many concluding the king would at laſt yield to any thing, put themſelves in company of the boldeſt and moſt poſitive aſkers. B. IV. p. 310. The true reaſon, doubtleſs, of theſe condeſcenſions to the Scots, was the king's knowledge how ſubſervient they had been to the deſigns of the Engliſh parliament, and to prevent their interpoſing for the future. But in this he was diſappointed; for when, in the courſe of the war, the parliament was obliged to apply to them for their aſſiſtance, it was readily granted.

[f] When the leading men in the houſe of commons (who ſuſpected the king's ſincerity) ſaw, that many members, and great part of the nation appeared ſatisfied with the redreſs of grievances and the triennial act, and that the king, now in Scotland, in order to pacify the covenanters, readily aſſented to whatever was deſired by the parliament of that kingdom, they renewed their endeavours to make it believed that the king would break through all his conceſſions, as in the caſe of the petition of right, whenever it ſhould be in his power. To this end it was inſinuated, the king ſtill retained his old principles; was under the abſolute influence of the queen; had redreſſed the chief grievances with reluctance, and therefore the triennial act would be but a weak barrier againſt future oppreſſions, if ſtronger bounds were not ſet to the prerogative. Perhaps theſe inſinuations might not ſo eaſily have had the deſired effect, had they not been ſtrengthened by ſeveral accidents during the king's ſtay in Scotland, as the deſign at Edinburgh to murder Hamilton and Argyle, which ſome were perſuaded to believe was intended to reach farther than to thoſe Lords; but more eſpecially the Iriſh rebellion and maſſacre, which happened in this interval, ſerved to increaſe the king's enemies in the parliament and nation. "For (ſays lord Clarendon) all occaſions being taken to inſinuate that this rebellion was contrived and fomented by the king, or at leaſt by the queen; and that the rebels declared, they had the king's authority for all they did: this calumny made more impreſſion upon the minds of ſober and moderate men (who till that time had much diſliked the paſſionate proceedings of the parliament) than could be then imagined, or can be yet believed. So great a prejudice was univerſally contracted againſt the court, eſpecially the queen, whoſe power and activity was thought too great." (B. IV. p. 301.) At this juncture the remonſtrance of the ſtate of the kingdom was ordered to be prepared, wherein are deſcribed all the illegalities and faults in government ſince the king's acceſſion to the crown, with an intimation of the neceſſity of a farther reformation. This remonſtrance not being directed to the king, but the public, was a ſort of appeal to the people for bounding the prerogative, and may juſtly be conſidered as the firſt ſtep towards the breach between king and parliament. See the remonſtrance and the king's anſwer. Rapin, Vol. II. p. 616.

[g] The lord Clarendon ſays, one great cauſe of this bill was the contempt the biſhops had ſhewn of the common law, in a wrong notion, that the ſtraitning and confining that profeſſion, would naturally extend the juriſdiction of the church. Thence aroſe (ſays he) their bold and unwarrantable oppoſing and proteſting againſt prohibitions and other proceedings at law, on the behalf of eccleſiaſtical courts, and procuring ſome privileges from the king on behalf of the civil, even with an excluſion of the common lawyers: as "that half the maſters of chancery ſhould be always civil lawyers." And "that no others, of what condition ſoever, ſhould ſerve as maſters of requeſt." By theſe and many other provocations, the profeſſors of the common law were excited entirely to root up and demoliſh the juriſdiction of the church. Clar. B. III. p. 283. IV. p. 305. This might be one reaſon why the common lawyers joined in this bill; but the true ground of it was, becauſe the commons plainly ſaw the biſhops votes in the houſe of lords would greatly retard, if not wholly prevent, their deſign of a farther reformation. For twenty-ſix votes, when there were not above a hundred members, could almoſt at any time turn the ſcale which way they pleaſed.

[h] The biſhops, on account of ſome inſults from the populace, having abſented themſelves from the houſe, a proteſtation is raſhly ſigned by twelve of them, againſt all acts and votes in their abſence as null and void. This proteſtation the lord-keeper Littleton, by the king's command, read next morning ficult to obtain, had not the king, while the bill was depending, committed the fatal error of accuſing of high-treaſon the lord Kimbolton, with five commoners, and going in perſon to the houſe with a numerous retinue to demand them [i]. This proceeding alarmed not only the parliament but the whole nation. The party which had lately begun to appear in the king's favour were now filled with diſtruſt, and inclined to believe the neceſſity of abridging the prerogative [k]. In the midſt of the tumults, fears, and jealouſies raiſed on this occaſion, the king, to his farther diſadvantage, retired from the parliament, firſt to Hampton-Court, and from thence to Windſor.

Mean while the leaders in the houſe of commons, convinced by the king's late conduct, that there was no ſafety for them without retrenching his power, fail not in this time of univerſal diſtruſt to puſh their deſign. For their own, therefore, as well as the nation's ſecurity againſt all future attempts of the crown, petitions are ſent to the king, firſt by the commons alone, and then by both houſes, to put the power of the militia, and command of the Tower, and other fortreſſes into the hands of the parliament, as the only means to remove their jealouſies and fears [l]. The king being determined to diveſt himſelf of no power he could legally claim [m], rejects theſe petitions, but by the queen's perſuaſions, paſſes the bill for depriving the biſhops of their votes, and clergymen of all temporal juriſdiction, in hopes of ſoftning the houſes [n].

Not ſatisfied with this, the parliament finding their petitions ineffectual, ſettle the militia by an ordinance, which is offered to the king for the royal aſſent. The king refuſes it, and by degrees retires to York. Here a bill, after paſſing both houſes, is preſented to him for ſettling the militia in the parliament for a limited time, which is alſo rejected [o]. Whereupon the parliament nominate lieutenants for the ſeveral counties, and require them to put the ordinance of the militia in execution. To this the king forbids obedience, ſummons the gentry of the northern counties to York, and raiſes a guard of horſe and foot. About the ſame time ſeveral members of both houſes withdraw, and particularly nine peers reſort to the king. Mean time, the parliament, according to a former deſire of the king, ſend him all their demands, digeſted into nineteen propoſitions, which are rejected by the king, as inconſiſtent with his rights [p]. Soon after, the king ſends forth his commiſſions of array, the parliament vote the raiſing an army, and the king, at laſt, erects his ſtandard at Nottingham. Thus, the civil war was kindled; and now aroſe the diſtinctions of Royaliſts and Parliamentarians, Cavaliers and Roundheads.

It muſt not be thought that the members of each of theſe parties were united in principles and opinions. The royaliſts, morning in the houſe of lords. It was immediately communicated to the commons, who, within half an hour, accuſe the twelve biſhops of high-treaſon, for endeavouring to ſubvert the being of parliaments. Whereupon ten are committed to the Tower, and two, by reaſon of their age, to the black-rod.

[i] This ſudden action (ſays Whitlock) was the firſt viſible and apparent ground of the following miſeries, p. 51. And therefore (ſays Welwood) the adviſers of it are juſtly chargeable with all the blood that was afterwards ſpilt, p. 58. It was believed, if the king had found the members in the houſe, and called in his guards to ſeize them, the houſe would have endeavoured their defence, which might have proved a very unhappy buſineſs. Whit. p. 51. The lord Clarendon aſcribes it to Lord Digby; others to the queen. However this be, ſo notorious a breach could not but be of infinite diſadvantage to the king in the preſent juncture, being looked upon as equal to a diſſolution of the parliament, ſince he might, they ſaid, upon the ſame grounds, as well ſeize five hundred as five members. Wherefore it not only produced an union in both houſes, but was a plain indication that the king would aſſuredly be revenged of ſuch members as had given him offence, whenever it ſhould be in his power; which conſideration determined the leading men to tie up his hands for the future, by abridging the prerogative.

[k] The minds of men (ſays lord Clarendon) throughout the kingdom, were now prepared to receive all the dictates of the commons with reverence, to obey all their orders, and to believe all their ſafety depended upon their authority; and there were few in the houſe who had courage to oppoſe and contradict them. B. IV. p. 385.

[l] When this bill (according to the lord Clarendon) was firſt brought into the houſe, few imagined it would ever be countenanced beyond the firſt reading: but now (adds he) "there were few who did not believe it to be a very neceſſary proviſion for the peace and ſafety of the kingdom. So great an impreſſion had the late proceedings made upon them." B. IV. p. 388.

[m] The truth is, I ſpeak it knowingly (ſays lord Clarendon) at that time the king's reſolution was to ſhelter himſelf wholly under the law: to grant any thing that by the law he was obliged to grant: and to deny what by the law was in his own power; and which he found inconvenient to aſſent to B. V. p. 466. This reſolution was doubtleſs the cauſe of his ruin, for by a too-long continuance in it, he gave the enemies of the conſtitution an opportunity of ſubverting it, by preventing an accommodation between him and the parliament.

[n] The king was perſuaded to paſs this bill even by ſome cordial friends to the church of England, who told him, that the paſſing this bill was the only way to preſerve the church; for by it many perſons in both houſes would be fully ſatisfied, and not join in any further alteration, who otherwiſe would violently endeavour an extirpation of biſhops; and beſides, by granting this, perhaps he would not be preſſed in the militia bill. However, theſe arguments did not prevail with him ſo much as the queen's perſuations, who was afraid her voyage to Holland woud be croſſed by the parliament. It had been, it ſeems, concerted at Windſor, that the queen ſhould go with the princeſs her daughter (betrothed to the prince of Orange) into Holland, and carry with her the crown-jewels to be pawned for the king's uſe, if there ſhould be occaſion. The lord Clarendon inſinuates here, that in this and ſome other acts of no leſs moment, "an opinion that the violence and force uſed in procuring them, rendered them abſolutely void, influenced the king to confirm them." Clar. B. IV. p. 427, 429. Whit. p. 52. This inſinuation ſeems to give ſtrength to the ſuſpicions of the leading men in the houſe of commons, that the king, if not prevented, would revoke his conceſſions, whenever it ſhould be in his power.

[o] The king had deſired that the ordinance might be digeſted into an act of parliament, and the powers to be granted not left to an indefinite time. Whereupon the commons prepared a bill, and limited the time to leſs than than two years. The affair of the militia was the immediate cauſe of the rupture between the king and parliament. This point had never before been maturely conſidered, and therefore it is no wonder the lawyers were divided in opinion about it. Palmer, Hyde, Bridgeman, with ſome other eminent lawyers and gentlemen, affirmed, the power of the militia to be wholly in the king, and on the paſſing of the ordinance withdrew from the houſe. Sollicitor St. John, Maynard, Glyn, Seldon, with divers gentlemen of great parts and intereſt, believed it to be in the parliament, and if the king refuſed to order the ſame according to the advice of both houſes, they by law might do it without him: and purſuant to this opinion, accepted commiſſions of deputy-lieutenancy. Whit. p. 56.

In a debate, it was ſaid by a member (Whitlock) to this effect: "This great power which commands all men and all things, is by ſome affirmed to be in the king, by others, in the parliament: I differ from theſe opinions, and apprehend, it is neither in the king only, nor in the parliament. This power is not in the king only, becauſe the power of money, without which the other will be of little force, is not in the king but in the commons. The king indeed may require forty days ſervice in war of his military tenants, but beyond that they will not ſtay without pay. The king can compel no man to go out of the kingdom, and therefore foreign wars are not to be undertaken without the advice of the parliament; otherwiſe the king muſt pay his army himſelf, for no man can be preſſed by law to ſerve in war but by act of parliament. The power of the militia is exerciſed againſt inſurrections at home, or invaſions from abroad. Againſt inſurrections, the ſheriff has this power in him; againſt invaſions, every man will be ready to give his aſſiſtance. It is my opinion, therefore, that this power, which the law has not expreſly ſettled any where, is in the king and parliament both conſenting together, and I think it beſt it ſhould be there ſtill; and the king petitioned that the militia may be ſettled in ſuch hands as you may truſt." Whit. p. 53.

The many debates and papers publiſhed on this occaſion, ſeem to have been deſigned for the ſatisfaction of thoſe who were for laying only legal reſtraints on the king. For the main point was, not where this power was placed by the law, but whether it was neceſſary for the public welfare in the preſent juncture, to ſettle it for a time in ſuch hands as the parliament ſhould approve. This was abſolutely refuſed by the king. For when the earl of Pembroke aſked him, whether he would grant the militia, as deſigned by the parliament, for a time? No, replies the king, by God, not for an hour. Theſe haſty words did the king great injury, they being ſpoken juſt after he had in a manner promiſed to comply, when he ſhould know how long it was to be thus ſettled. Ruſh. IV. p. 533.

[p] The king by meſſage to the parliament, Jan. 20, 1641, adviſed them "to digeſt into one body all the grievances of the kingdom and ſend them to him, promiſing his favourable aſſent to thoſe means which ſhould be found moſt effectual for redreſs." Whit. p. 52. Accordingly, the following June, the nineteen propoſitions were preſented to him, wherein it was deſired, (I.) That the privy-councillors, foreign miniſters, (III.) great officers of ſtate, and (XV.) commanders of forts and caſtles, may be appointed with the approbation of the parliament. (II.) That affairs of public concern may be tranſacted only in parliament, and other matters of ſtate by the privy-council, (whoſe number ſhall not exceed twenty-five, nor be leſs than fifteen) and all their public acts atteſted under their hands. (XI.) That the privy-councillors and judges ſwear to maintain the petition of right, and certain ſtatutes made by this parliament. (XII.) That the judges and other officers appointed with the approbation of both houſes, hold their places quam diu bene ſe geſſerint. (IV.) That the governors of the king's children may be approved by both houſes, and, in the intervals of parliament, by the major part of the council; and (V.) no marriage concluded for them without conſent of parliament. (VI.) That the laws againſt jeſuits, prieſts, and popiſh recuſants, may be ſtrictly executed. (VII.) That the votes of popiſh lords may be taken away, and an act paſſed for educating their children in the proteſtant religion. (VIII.) That ſuch a reformation may be made of the church government and liturgy, as both houſes aſſiſted by an aſſembly of divines, ſhall adviſe. (IX.) That the ordinance for the militia may remain, till the ſame be ſettled by a bill. (X.) That the members of this parliament may be reſtored to the places they have been removed from. (XIII.) That the juſtice of parliament may paſs upon delinquents. (XIV.) That the general pardon may be granted, with ſuch exceptions as ſhall be adviſed by the parliament. (XV.) That all forces about his majeſty may be diſmiſſed, (XVI.) and a more ſtrict alliance made with the proteſtant ſtates. (XVII.) That the accuſed members may be cleared by act of parliament. (XIX.) That peers made hereafter may be reſtrained from ſitting in parliament, unleſs admitted with the conſent of both houſes. Theſe reſtrictions, though they ſeemed to intrench upon the royal prerogative, were, however, agreeable to the nature of the Engliſh conſtitution, and ſuch as a king, who ſincerely intends the welfare and happineſs of his people, would chuſe to make the rule of his conduct. But however this be, they were infinitely preferable to the calamities of a civil war, which the refuſal of them was ſure to produce. Nevertheleſs, theſe propoſitions were rejected by the king, purſuant to his reſolution of not diveſting himſelf of any power which he thought legal, and, in a belief, that greater limitations would not be offered him, though he ſhould happen to be vanquiſhed in the war. This reſolution, and this belief, proved fatal not only to himſelf, but alſo to the ſtate, in the utter ſubverſion of the conſtitution.

or thoſe that declared for the king, liſted in his ſervice upon different motives. Whilſt the parliament confined themſelves to the redreſs of grievances, their proceedings were oppoſed by very few members, and approved by the bulk of the nation. At that time therefore, the king could not be ſaid to have any party, either in the two houſes, or in the nation, except the biſhops, good part of the clergy, the univerſities; in a word, ſuch as had embraced the principle of the divine right of kings, and the conſequent doctrine of paſſive obedience, whoſe number was not very great. The reſt of the nation, however diſagreeing in other reſpects, were unanimous in their approbation of reforming what was amiſs, as as well in the church as in the ſtate. But when the acts to this end, paſſed by the king, were not deemed a ſufficient ſecurity for the future, and farther limitations were deſigned, then it was that the king began to have a conſiderable party both in the parliament and nation, by the union of all who being ſatisfied with the king's conceſſions, oppoſed the abridging of the prerogative. Many members of parliament, who had approved themſelves patriots in zealouſly promoting the legal redreſs of abuſes, when they ſaw a farther reformation not only intended but begun in the militia bill, withdrew to the king, and by theſe he was chiefly enabled to carry on the war [q].

The royaliſts therefore partly conſiſted of ſuch as profeſſed to believe all aſſiſtance unlawful, but principally of thoſe who thought the perogative ought to be reſtrained within the bounds preſcribed by the law; but relying on the king's ſincerity and the triennial act, were utterly againſt any farther alterations in the civil or eccleſiaſtical ſtate. To theſe may be added the catholics, who, in return for the indulgence they enjoyed, aſſiſted the king with their perſons and purſes.

The parliamentarians, in like manner, ~~were~~ far from being all in the ſame ſentiments. The chief branch conſiſted of thoſe who really believed, from the king's late proceedings, that he had not altered his principles, but would, if left in poſſeſſion of his full power, revoke his conceſſions, and be revenged of his oppoſers. To limit the prerogative, therefore, was the profeſſ d deſign of the parliamentarians, and what properly at this time diſtinguiſhed them from the royaliſts [r]. With this branch were mixed all the enemies of epiſcopacy, and friends of preſbytery: all the republicans and independents, whoſe ſeveral wiſhes and views outwardly ſeemed at preſent to extend only to a farther limitation of the prerogative. In a word,

The royaliſts, on a ſuppoſition of the king's ſincerity, drew their ſwords for the church, the laws, and the legal rights of the crown; and the parliamentarians took arms in defence of the fountain of all ſocial happineſs, the liberties of the people, in a belief, that as they had, contrary to the moſt ſolemn declarations from the throne, been trampled upon many years, they would again be invaded, unleſs ſecured by a temporary limitation of the prerogative. Theſe were the real grounds of the civil war; for if either the parliament had ſeen cauſe to rely on the royal word, or the king been willing to part with the militia but for a few years, it would have been out of the power of faction, private views and reſentments, to introduce the confuſion which followed, or to hinder, in caſe the king had firſt relaxed, the ſettling of the conſtitution on laſting foundations. But,

Both ſides appealing to the ſword, the war is, in the beginning, waged with equal ſucceſs, but afterwards with diſadvantage to the parliament. Wherefore, as the king had reſolved to call in the Iriſh to his aſſiſtance, the parliament treat with the Scots for their aid. The Scots, believing their religion and liberties depended on the ſucceſs of the parliamentarians, readily arm in their defence, on condition that uniformity in worſhip and diſcipline be endeavoured in the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. To this end a covenant [s] is ſubſcribed by both houſes, with the aſſembly of divines [t], and afterwards enjoined to be taken by the people, though it is far from appearing that the preſbyterians were the majority in the parliament [u]. By the aſſiſtance of the Scots and change of the general [w], the ſcale is ſo turned to the parliament's ſide, that the king daily loſes ground.

Mean time, a great and ſudden change is wrought by the republicans, who ſtill lay concealed. It is ſo managed by Cromwell and ſome others, that the army is entirely new modelled, and by an ordinance of both houſes, all members of parliament are rendered incapable of civil or military office. Fairfax is made general; and Cromwell, who had a great influence over him, is, notwithſtanding the ordinance, [q] It is a miſtaken notion that king Charle's party were moſtly induced to eſpouſe his quarrel, from a belief of the divine right of kings, and the doctrine of unlimited obedience. Moſt of the great men who engaged and ſuffered on his ſide, had been zealous aſſerters of the national liberties, and had ſtrenuouſly reſiſted the incroachments of the crown, as far as was warrantable by law. Beſides, it was not till after the reſtoration that theſe notions ſpread much beyond the court, the clergy, the univerſities, and ſuch as were under their influence. The alterations in the conſtitution beyond what was thought legal, was properly what firſt raiſed king Charles an army.

[r] It has been warmly diſputed, on which ſide the war was firſt begun? Whether the king or the parliament was the aggreſſor? But this ſeems not to be the point that ought chiefly to be conſidered. All but thoſe who profeſs the doctrine of paſſive obedience, muſt, at this day, be determined for, or againſt the king, in the ſame manner as the ſeveral parties were formed at the time of the rupture. He that believes, the king's conceſſions were a ſufficient guard againſt any invaſions of the national liberties, and that his majeſty really intended for the future to govern by law, muſt condemn the parliament for requiring a farther ſecurity, and deem the two houſes authors of the war. On the other hand, he that thinks, the king had unwillingly conſented to theſe acts, and would have revoked them, if ever it had been in his power, muſt throw the blame of the war on the king, for not agreeing to a farther limitation of his prerogative, at leaſt for a time.

[s] The covenant conſiſted of ſix articles; the chief of which were, I. To endeavour to bring the churches of the three kingdoms to the neareſt uniformity in worſhip and diſcipline; and II. To endeavour the extirpation of the hierarchy.

[t] The ordinance for convening this aſſembly was to this effect: "Whereas it has been declared by both houſes, that the preſent church-government by archbiſhops, biſhops, &c. is prejudicial to the ſtate, they are reſolved it ſhall be taken away, and ſuch a government ſettled in the church, as may be moſt agreeable to God's holy word, and of near agreement with the church of Scotland, and other reformed churches abroad. For the better effecting whereof, and for vindicating and clearing the doctrine of the church of England from all falſe calumnies, it is thought fit to call an aſſembly of learned divines to conſult about the premiſes, and give their advice to both or either of the houſes when they ſhall be required." This aſſembly was to meet in Henry VII's chapel, and conſiſted of three ſorts of clergy, epiſcopal, independent, but moſtly preſbyterians, to the number of one hundred and twenty. With theſe were joined many members of both houſes, with power of debating and voting; the chief were, the earls of Northumberland, Bedford, Pembroke, Salisbury, Holland, Mancheſter; the lord Say, Conway, Wharton, Howard of Eſcrick; with Selden, Rous, Prideaux, both the Vanes, Pym, Maynard, Whitlock, and ſeveral other commons.

[u] It muſt be obſerved, that not only above a hundred members had deſerted or been excluded the houſe, but alſo ſome of the moſt eminent were dead ſince the beginning of the war, particularly Hamden and Pym, which cauſed a great alteration in the parliament. By the firſt, the votes againſt the hierarchy, and for the taking of the covenant, met with the leſs oppoſition; and by the latter, the deſigns of Cromwell and the army were the more eaſily executed. It is indeed the general opinion of the hiſtorians, and amongſt the reſt, of Rapin himſelf, that at this time the majority of the commons was preſbyterian, but there ſeem to be very ſtrong arguments to the contrary. It is true, preſbytery had gained ground in the nation, becauſe the parochial clergy (who will always have a great influence over the people's religion) were moſtly preſbyterians. But it was far from being the ſame in the houſe of commons, for the following reaſons. When they voted the abolition of epiſcopacy, (which was done to pleaſe the Scots) the bill was not to take place till above a year after, in which time it was hoped the breach with the king would be made up. Again, had they really intended it, what hindered them from eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government and diſcipline, when they were ſupported by a Scotch army which was come for that very end? In almoſt every page of Whitlock's Memorials we find petitions from the aſſembly of divines, from the Scots, from the city of London, for the eſtabliſhment of preſbytery, and yet the thing was continually deferred. And even at laſt, when both houſes paſſed an ordinance for ſettling the preſbyterian government, the ſettlement was to laſt but three years, with a reſerve of all eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction to themſelves, which they would never part with. Wherefore the king, in his letter to the Scots, ſaid very rightly, "We are confident (ſays his majeſty) the moſt conſiderable perſons (in the parliament) and thoſe who make the faireſt pretenſions to you of uniformity, will not ſooner embrace a preſbyterial, than you an epiſcopal government." Mem. of Ham. B. IV. p. 197. Of the ſame opinion was the lord Clarendon; "Very much the major part of the members that continued in the parliament houſe, were (ſays he) cordially affected to the eſtabliſhed government, at leaſt not affected to any other." Vol. ii. p. 117. The caſe ſeems to be this. The commons ſhewed, upon all occaſions, that they did not believe any church-government in particular to be jure divino, but that either the epiſcopal or preſbyterial might be eſtabliſhed, according as the peace and welfare of the public required it. And as they had a lively ſenſe of what the nation had ſuffered from the abuſes of eccleſiaſtical power, and had before their eyes an inſtance of the intolerable yoke of the preſbyterian diſcipline in Scotland, they were reſolved never to lodge any coercive power in the hands of the clergy. Hence their early bill, paſſed by the king, to take away the temporal juriſdiction of all clergymen. Hence their expreſs prohibition to the aſſembly of divines, to exerciſe any authority. In vain did the aſſembly offer frequent petitions to have the power of the keys, of excommunication, &c. the commons declare they can never conſent to be ſubject to near ten thouſand judicatories. Nor did the ſame aſſembly ſucceed any better in their aſſertion of the divine right of preſbytery; the houſe would not come into their notion: on the contrary, being informed of an intended petition for eſtabliſhing preſbytery as the diſcipline of Jeſus Chriſt, they voted it ſcandalous. Whit. p. 159. In ſhort, the opinion of the houſe, in theſe reſpects, ſeems to be expreſſed in three ſpeeches made by Mr. Selden, and two other members, to the aſſembly of divines, which the reader will find in Whitlock's Memorials, p. 94, 163. From hence alſo appears the reaſon why the army and independents came to have ſo ſtrong a party in the houſe. For toleration, and a renouncing of all coercive power, were two profeſſed principles of the independents, to which the commons had all along been inclined, and to which the preſbyterians were utterly averſe.

[w] The earl of Eſſex's ſcruples to fight againſt the king's perſon were of great diſſervice to the parliament, and occaſioned his removal.

The

continued lieutenant-general of the horſe. Thus the independents, without diſcovering themſelves, or their deſigns, become at once almoſt maſters of the army. Three months after this ordinance, the king, by the loſs of the battle of Naſeby, is unable to keep the field, and ſhifting ſome time from place to place, throws himſelf at laſt into the Scotiſh army before Newark.

The Scots upon this retire to Newcaſtle, and by their ſolicitations, the parliament ſends propoſitions to the king. Confirmation of the covenant, abolition of epiſcopacy, and ſettlement of the militia in both houſes for twenty years, are the principal articles. The king abſolutely rejecting the two firſt, the Scots deliver him up to the parliament, and march into their own country.

At this time conteſts ariſe between the army and parliament. The army refuſe to diſband, and reſolve to have a ſhare in ſettling the government. They begin with ſeizing the king's perſon whom they conduct to Hampton Court. Here the king privately treats with the Scotiſh commiſſioners, and afterwards ſigns an agreement with them, by which, on certain conditions, they engage ſpeedily to bring an army into the field, and in conjunction with the Engliſh preſbyterians and royaliſts, free him from the independents, and reſtore him to his juſt rights[x]. The king's reliance on this army and the inſurrections of his party, prevents his cloſing with the parliament's terms[y] and finiſhes his ruin. For the Scots are routed, and the royaliſts diſperſed; after which the army ſuddenly reſolve to bring the king to a public trial as the author of the war. The members that oppoſe this reſolution are by violence kept from the houſe; and the reſt, either agreeing in ſentiments with the army, or for other private ends, erect a high court of juſtice, by which the king is condemned and beheaded. Preſently after, the ſame commons vote the houſe of peers uſeleſs, aboliſh the monarchy, and, though in perfect ſubjection to the army, declare themſelves the ſupreme authority.

Thus inſtead of purſuing the ends propoſed at firſt by the majority of both houſes, inſtead of reforming the exceſſes of the civil and eccleſiaſtical powers, and preventing the like grievances for the future, the conſtitution both in church and ſtate was by a ſmall part of the houſe of commons, in conjunction with a ſtanding army, entirely deſtroyed. During the courſe of the war, both king and parliament had continually expreſſed an inclination to peace; but as the one would not make the leaſt conceſſion with regard to the militia, and the other would not be ſatisfied without having it in their hands, at leaſt for a time, it is too plain, the negotiations were intended only for the amuſement of the people, and the caſe ſtill remained the ſame as in the beginning of the war; namely, the blame was thrown on the king or the parliament, according as a farther ſecurity was, or was not, thought neceſſary. But when the king, by the chance of war, was fallen into the hands of the parliament, and offered not only to ſettle the militia in both houſes for ſeven, ten, nay twenty years, but alſo to appoint the privy-councillors and great officers of ſtate with their approbation, the fear of future invaſions of the people's rights, or the apprehenſions of danger to particular perſons from the crown, could no longer be pleaded as lawful obſtacles to a peace, and conſequently the king, from that time, ſtood clear of all blame that the government was not ſettled in a regular manner, on the foot of the antient conſtitution. The preſbyterians, grown numerous in the nation, and encouraged by the Scots, would not be content with the ſecurity of their civil and religious rights, but poſſeſſed with their jus divinum, inſiſted on the total abolition of epiſcopacy, and abſurdly claimed a more tyrannical power over conſcience, than what had ever been complained of in the biſhops. This, and this alone proved the occaſion (though contrary to their intention) of the king's death, in giving the independent army time to purge the houſe (as they called it) of ſuch members as refuſed to come into their meaſures[z].

By this means not only the conſtitution is entirely ſubverted, but the preſbyterians themſelves are alſo diſappointed of their aim. Cromwell having gained the battle of Worceſter, reduced Scotland and reſtored the Iriſh affairs, puts an end at once to the common-wealth and the remains of the parliament, by turning the commons out of their houſe. Then under the title of protector he aſſumes the government; and though preſbytery is continued in the church, he allows, to the great mortification of the preſbyterians, toleration in matters of religion. After Cromwell's death, and his ſon's reſignation, the republican members (called in deriſion the rump) are reſtored by the army, and again prevented from ſitting. Upon which there ariſes a diviſion in the army; Monk, with his forces in Scotland, declares againſt theſe proceedings, and for the parliament, which is not only re-aſſembled, but the ſecluded members reſtored to their ſeats. After which, paſſing an order for ſummoning a new parliament of lords and commons to meet the 25th of April 1660, they at laſt diſſolve themſelves. The new parliament, without other terms than the promiſe of a general pardon and liberty of conſcience, unanimouſly call king Charles II. to the throne.

Thus were loſt two ſignal opportunities of ſettling the conſtitution on laſting foundations; namely, at the end of the civil wars, when the king was ready to comply with any methods for ſecuring the national liberties; and at the reſtoration, when king Charles II. would have gladly ſubmitted to ſuch limitations, as ſhould have been thought neceſſary for the prevention of future abuſes of power. But the preſbyterians, out of hatred to the independents, by whom they had been kept in ſubjection almoſt twelve years, ſo haſtily joined with the royaliſts, in the reſtoration of the king, that the ſober and conſiderate perſons of the ſeveral parties could not be heard amidſt the general tranſport.

Inſtead therefore of improving the juncture, and ſettling the government on the foundations of liberty; inſtead of fixing the bounds of the prerogative, and ſecuring the rights of the people agreeable to the antient conſtitution, the ſame principles of civil and eccleſiaſtical power which had been maintained by king James, and purſued by king Charles I. and which had thrown the nation into wars and confuſion, not only revived with more ſtrength than ever, but received the ſanction of a legal eſtabliſhment. The very parliament or convention by which the monarchy was reſtored led the way, and even before the king's arrival, aſſerted that the crown, on his father's deceaſe, did immediately deſcend to him by [x] The king promiſed to confirm the covenant by act of parliament, for the ſecurity of thoſe by whom it had been or ſhould be taken, with this proviſo, that none ſhould be conſtrained to take it. He alſo engaged to confirm, in the ſame manner, preſbyterian government, &c. for three years, with an exception of himſelf and houſhold. And that courſe ſhould be taken for the ſuppreſſion of all ſectaries, as anabaptiſts, independents, &c. As the king, by this treaty, was to be reſtored to the power of the militia, choice of officers and privy-councillors, which the parliament refuſed him, he was doubtleſs the more eaſily induced to conſent to it. It is obſervable, on this occaſion, that the Scotiſh as well as Engliſh preſbyterians were irreconcilable enemies to toleration, the ſuppreſſion of all other perſuaſions being a point they conſtantly inſiſted upon, though they had loudly complained of the epiſcopal clergy for perſecution, during the firſt fifteen years of this reign. The pretended, though not real, ground of this averſion to toleration, wherever it prevails, is the ſame; namely, the claim of divine inſtitution. Thus the rigid preſbyterian looks with the ſame eye upon other ſects, as the rigid epiſcopalian looks upon diſſenters, and as the papiſt upon heretics, becauſe all three equally claim an authority jure divino.

[y] Both houſes, notwithſtanding the diſſent of the Scotiſh commiſſioners, had agreed upon a perſonal treaty with the king, provided he would paſs four bills, for ſettling the militia; for recalling declarations, &c. for diſabling the lords, made after the great ſeal was carried to Oxford, to ſit in the houſe of peers; and for empowering both houſes to adjourn as they ſhould think fit. Probably the king would have paſſed theſe bills, had it not been for his treaty with the Scotch commiſſioners, who coming the next day, after the bills were preſented to the king, prevailed with him privately to ſign their agreement, and refuſe the four bills. The bills were brought to him, Nov. 22, 1647. The Scots commiſſioners came the 25th, with the agreement ready drawn, which the king ſigned the 26th, and ſent the ſame day an unſatisfactory anſwer to the four bills, with deſign to have made his eſcape preſently after from the Iſle of Wight, where, by Cromwell's ſecret management (as it is ſaid) he had withdrawn himſelf, but was prevented by a cloſer confinement. Ludlow and others inſinuate, the king whilſt at Hampton-Court, and in treaty with the Scots, received ſome private overtures from the army, but that Cromwell diſcovering the king's ſecret negotiation with the Scots, and intercepting a letter to the queen of the king's intention to deſtroy him, when it ſhould be in his power, inſtantly reſolved to bring the king to the ſcaffold. He found the army very ready to ſecond him, ſince they would have been caſhiered without fail, had the king and parliament agreed upon any terms.

[z] The king, in the laſt treaty at Newport, not only offered to ſettle the militia in both houſes, but alſo that preſbytery ſhould be confirmed by act of parliament for three years, and a free conſultation be had with the aſſembly of divines (increaſed with twenty of the king's nomination) how church government after that time might be ſettled by his majeſty and both houſes. It is true, the parliament ſoon after voted the king's conceſſions ſufficient grounds for ſettling the peace of the kingdom. But in condeſcenſion to the preſbyterians, by whom London was then governed, they had ſo long inſiſted on the abolition of epiſcopacy, that two days after this vote, above a hundred members were ſeized by the army, and the king ſuddenly brought to a trial. It may here be obſerved, that the king's conceſſions were never in ſeaſon but generally too late. He that declared he would not to pleaſure the parliament, diſmiſs the meaneſt of his ſervants, paſſed afterwards the earl of Strafford's attainder, and offered to chuſe his counſellors, miniſters, and officers of ſtate, with the approbation of both houſes. He that declared he would not part with the militia for an hour, offered to ſettle it in the parliament for twenty years; whereas his conſent for two years, at firſt, would have prevented the civil wars. The ſame may be ſaid of his other conceſſions. So that Burnet had reaſon to ſay, "The truth was, the king did not come into his conceſſions ſeaſonably, nor with a good grace; All appeared to be extorted from him." Vol. I. 31.

In

inherent birth-right[a]. And in their act for an attainder of the regicides, they declare, that neither the parliament nor the whole nation together have any coercive power over the king[b]. These foundations being laid, a superstructure was raised to a great height by the next parliament, which met May 8, 1660, and continued almost eighteen years. Not content with declaring, that the king ought in no case to be resisted, both houses enjoined all orders of men to swear to a belief of the unlawfulness of taking arms, not only against the king, but even against those that are commissioned by him[c]. In vain was it moved by a member of each house, that the word lawfully might be added to commissioned; the oath was enacted without any limitation and left in general terms, though the word lawfully was owned to be implied[d]. The command and disposition of the militia, one of the immediate causes of the civil wars, was also declared to be solely in the king, and his undoubted prerogative. In fine, to remove all restraints upon the crown, the act for triennial parliaments, which had been deemed the nation's security, was repealed, and another of much less force substituted in its room[e].

Thus the king, according to the tenor of these acts, was invested with absolute power, accountable to none but God alone, and exalted above all resistance. These proceedings so destructive of the public liberties, so repugnant to the old English constitution, flowed chiefly from the present temper of the royal party, of which the parliament mostly consisted, and which now prevailed in the nation. The remembrance of their late misfortunes, and the dread of falling again into the like situation, so fully possessed them, that they wholly imputed the civil wars to the principles on which king Charles I. had been opposed, and zealously espoused the contrary maxims, without perceiving the impossibility of reducing them to practice, and without imagining they should themselves, in a few years, be forced to retract them[f]. For

The king, with his brother the duke of York, encouraged by the establishment of the monarchy, on principles so subversive of liberty, form the project of introducing arbitrary power, and by that means the popish religion. To this end, the administration of affairs is lodged in the hands of a cabal of five persons, who were thought fit instruments for such purposes[g]. A private treaty is made with France for the destruction of the Dutch, in order to pave the way for the extirpation of the protestant religion, and the ruin of the English privileges[h]. Pursuant to this secret agreement, the triple-alliance is dissolved[i], war proclaimed against Holland in conjunction with France; and as this was done during a long recess of the parliament, money is raised by shutting up the Exchequer and by a supply from France[k].

[a] In the form of proclaiming the king, May 8, 1660, are these words: "We the lords and commons assembled in parliament, together with the lord mayor, &c. unanimously acknowledge and proclaim that immediately upon the decease of our late sovereign king Charles I, the imperial crown of the realm of England, &c. did by inherent birth-right, and lawful and undoubted succession, descend to his most excellent majesty king Charles II, as being lineally the next heir, &c." See the proclamation in Compl. Hist. Vol. III. p. 241. By the words Imperial Crown, used here and in acts of parliaments, is meant an independent crown not held of any other, as the princes of Germany are said to hold of the empire.

[b] The words of the act are as follows: "Be it hereby declared, that by the undoubted and fundamental laws of this kingdom, neither the peers, nor the commons, nor both together, in parliament or out of parliament, nor the people collectively or representatively, nor any other persons whatsoever, ever had, hath, or ought to have any coercive power over the persons of the kings of this realm." The parliaments that deposed Edward II, and Richard II, seem to have been of a contrary opinion.

[c] The oath is thus worded: "I A. B. do declare and believe, that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the king. And I do abhor that traiterous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those who are commissioned by him." This oath was imposed; first, on all officers in corporations, by the act called the Corporation Act, the intent of which was declared to be, "That the succession in corporations may be most probably perpetuated in the hands of persons well-affected to his majesty and the established government, &c." The same oath was, in the next place, imposed on lord-lieutenants, deputy-lieutenants, officers and soldiers, by the Militia Act, which begins with asserting, "that the sole and supreme power, government, command, and disposition of the militia, and of all forces by sea and land, &c. is, and by the laws of England, ever was, the undoubted right of his majesty and his predecessors, and that the parliament cannot pretend to the same, nor can lawfully raise or levy war, offensive or defensive, against his majesty, his heirs, or lawful successors, &c." Lastly, the whole body of the clergy enjoying any benefice, or salary, were enjoined to take the same oath by the Uniformity-Act, chiefly levelled against the presbyterian clergy, two thousand of whom were ejected out of their livings, for refusing to declare their assent to every thing contained in the book of Common Prayer. The author of the Detection of the Court and State of England, observes, This is one of the first laws that ever was made to swear to opinions and belief, and seems to doubt whether there can be any such thing as a negative assertory oath as this is. However that be, "such an oath, says he, can never extend farther than to him who swears he does not know what he is required to swear: but he can never swear that another does not know it. This sort of swearing destroys the religion and end of an assertory oath, which is only to what a man knows certainly to be true, but no man knows that an opinion or belief is certainly true—In justice therefore an assertory oath, that I believe or am of opinion, is not admitted, unless the testifier swears the ground or cause of his belief to be true of his own knowledge. Now what were the grounds or reason of the corporation-oath, which every one ought to swear to be true of his own certain knowledge, before he believe it not to be lawful, on any pretence, to take up arms against the king? Or admit there might be reason for this belief, yet if the causes of this belief were not known to the taker of this oath, so as he knows them to be true of his certain knowledge, this oath, if any, is perjury." See Coke's Detection, Vol. II. p. 116.

[d] Sir John Vaughan, in the debate on the words commissioned by him, produced many instances to shew, "That the people of England not only might, but in some cases were bound to take arms against persons commissioned by the king; and that the sheriffs were bound, if it could be no otherwise done, to raise the posse comitatus, to oppose and suppress all such as should put any such illegal commissions in execution." He therefore pressed that the word lawfully might be added. But attorney-general Finch, a promoter of the bill, replied, "That it was not necessary, since the very word commission did import it: for if it was not lawfully issued out to lawful persons, and for lawful reasons, it was no commission." And to this interpretation the whole house assented. The earl of Southampton moved also, in the house of peers, for the addition of the same word, but was answered in the like manner by the earl of Anglesey. Upon Southampton's urging it farther, "Because it would clear all difficulties with many, who not having heard the particular sense of both houses, might imagine, that if any sort of commission was granted, it would be unlawful to resist it:" As a satisfactory answer it was alledged, "That this explanation being the very sense of both houses, it would soon spread and be known, so as to become the sense of the nation." But unfortunately this was not the case, for the doctrine of absolute non-resistance was every where inculcated by the clergy and others, without the least intimation of the sense of both houses. By which means, many persons were induced to believe, that they were bound to an unlimited obedience, and that it was unlawful to relieve themselves in the most threatning danger. Whereas if lawfully had been inserted in the act, no man could have been misled, and the proposition would have been strictly true, namely, that the king's legal commissions are no more to be resisted than the king himself, in the due execution of the laws. But by the omission of the word lawfully, the act literally ascribed greater power to the king than ever was, or ever can be exercised by the most absolute tyrant. Well therefore might Mr. Locke say, that the corporations were made to swear to a declaration and belief of such propositions as the parliament themselves afterwards, upon debate, were forced to alter, and could not justify. Letter to a person of quality, p. 60.

[e] By the new act the king was left at liberty to continue the present parliament as long as he pleased, which was accordingly continued near eighteen years.

[f] The anonymous author of the Dissertations on Parties conjectures on this occasion, That in such a temper of mind and situation of circumstances, even those, who saw how groundless and dangerous were such extravagant notions about the right, power, and prerogative of kings, might imagine, however, it was a part of prudence to give way to them, and to countenance them in the present conjuncture; to suffer the opinions of the nation to be bent too far on one side, as they had been bent too far on the other; not that they might remain crooked, but that they might become straight, p. 17, 18.

[h] The account of this private treaty was published in Italian at Paris in 1682, by Abbot Primi, who was employed by Colbert de Croissy the French embassador in England, but soon after suppressed, and almost all the copies seized and destroyed, at the instance of the lord Preston the English embassador. It was published under the name of count Maiolo, with the royal privilege. In this treaty are the following passages: "These things engaged the king of England to sign a secret treaty with France; and to make it more firm, Henrietta duchess of Orleans, sister to the king of England, went over into England in 1670, and proposed a treaty to her brother in the name of the most Christian king, wherein she offered to secure to him an absolute authority over his parliament, and the re-establishment of the Roman catholic religion in his three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. But she said, that before this could be effected, there was an absolute necessity of abating the haughtiness and power of the Hollanders, who only studied to foment divisions amongst their neighbours; and to reduce them to the single province of Holland, of which the prince of Orange should be sovereign, or at least perpetual governor, which would not be difficult for these two mighty kings, when once well united, to accomplish: so that by this means the king of England might have Zealand to retire to, if there should be occasion; and that the rest of the low-countries should remain to the king of France, whenever he shall be able to conquer them." State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 34.

[i] The triple alliance made in 1668, between the kings of England, and Sweden, and the Dutch, to prevent the progress of the French king's arms, was entirely destroyed by the private treaty with France. Moreover Coventry was sent to the court of Sweden to dissolve it, which was so effectually done, that the king of Sweden first stood neuter, and afterwards joined with the French. For this, which put all Christendom in a flame, Coventry was made (says Coke) secretary of state, and it may be, presented with the Ranger's palace of Enfield-Chase; whereas sir William Temple, principal instrument in the piece of Nimeguen, lost 2200l. by it; and his only recompence was to be secretary of state in Coventry's place, if sir William would give him 10,000l. for it. Detect. Vol. II. p. 167.

[k] In Abbot Primi's account of the secret treaty, it is said: "As for the king of England he was exceedingly perplexed: There was need of money to carry on the design, and that secretly too: He could raise none at home without assembling his parliament, and that could not be done without acquainting all Europe with his designs: there was also great fear of opposition, both from the misunderstandings which in that tumultuous assembly do for the most part arise between the two houses; and from the intrigues of the Hollanders. For which reasons the king of France furnished him with such sums of money as were sufficient to send out a considerable fleet; and he advised the king of England (the better to conceal their agreements) to keep a fair correspondence outwardly with the Dutch; to appear firm to the triple league: and to declare that he set out a fleet for no other reasons, but because his neighbours, and especially the French, who made great preparations in all their ports upon the ocean, strengthened themselves so very

At the ſame time the penal laws againſt diſſenters are ſuſpended, and a toleration publiſhed by the king, with the ſole view of including the papiſts[l].

Hitherto, it may be ſaid, there had been but one party in the parliament; the majority of both houſes, full of zeal for the prerogative, and of reſentment againſt the maxims, which, in their opinion, had cauſed the late civil wars, ſeemed to have made it their whole care to exalt the crown above any future attempts, by fencing it with unlimited obedience, and by excluding from offices of truſt, all perſons of contrary principles, by ſubſcriptions and oaths. No other party dared to appear in the nation, and all oppoſition to the court vaniſhed. But when the king's deſigns began to be ſuſpected, when the conſtitution was thought to be in danger, the ſcene was immediately changed, and the old Engliſh ſpirit of liberty rouzed itſelf. The very parliament by which the doctrine of non-reſiſtance had been in appearance ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, reſiſted to the utmoſt in a parliamentary way, and, very probably, would have proceeded to a reſiſtance of another kind, had not the king given up his miniſters, departed from his claims, and in great meaſure complied with their demands. At their meeting, after a long interval, they reſolve, in the firſt place, to cruſh the deſign for popery. They begin with the king's declaration for liberty of conſcience, as knowing it was intended in favour of the catholics, and after ſome ſtruggles oblige the king to recall it, as illegal, though he told them in his ſpeech, he had reſolved to ſtick to it. Then, as an effectual means to remove all papiſts from places and poſts, the Teſt-Act is paſſed, in conſequence of which the duke of York himſelf, high-admiral of England, with the lord-treaſurer Clifford, reſign their commiſſions[m]. Whereupon the cabal is broke, and three of the members called to account[n]. Moreover, the parliament force the king, notwithſtanding his reluctance and private engagements with France, to put an end to the Dutch war, and conclude a league with the States. The zeal againſt popery is inflamed, as well in the nation as the parliament, upon the diſcovery of the popiſh plot. A bill is immediately paſſed for diſabling papiſts to ſit in parliament, or come near the king, with an exception, however, for the duke of York. Another bill is prepared for raiſing part of the militia for a time, to which indeed the king denied his aſſent. It was alſo voted, that no more money ſhould be granted, till ſatisfaction was given in matters of religion. Not ſatisfied with all this, the commons, after having endeavoured, but in vain, to prevent the duke of York's marriage with a papiſt, project his excluſion from the crown, in defiance of the doctrine of the divine right of lineal ſucceſſion. In a word, their reſiſtance reaches even the king himſelf, in the impeachment of the earl of Danby. Neither his majeſty's declaration that the earl had done nothing but by his order, nor a pardon under the great ſeal could ſcreen him from their proſecution[o]. To put a ſtop to theſe proceedings, the parliament, after a continuance of above ſeventeen years, is at laſt diſſolved.

From the latter years of this parliament may be dated the beginnings of the tory and whig parties, though they were not yet diſtinguiſhed by theſe names. That party which in the parliament and nation had appeared on the ſide of the court, acquired the appellation of tories, and was formed upon principles grounded on a literal interpretation of the acts eſtabliſhed ſoon after the reſtoration, in favour of the crown. They profeſſed to believe all reſiſtance unlawful, and lineal ſucceſſion unalterable; and therefore conſidered thoſe who differed from them in theſe points, as enemies of the monarchy and church. The other party which had oppoſed the deſigns of the court, received the name of whigs, and was formed upon a limited interpretation of the non-reſiſtance acts, which they underſtood with ſuch reſtrictions, as rendered them, in their opinion, conſiſtent with the antient conſtitution[p]. Theſe parties were now chiefly diſtinguiſhed by their adherence or oppoſition to the excluſion of a popiſh ſucceſſor. The tories, purſuant to their notion of hereditary right, eſpouſed the duke of York's cauſe; whilſt the whigs, in conſequence of their principles, were for altering the ſucceſſion. The tories, in this reſpect, were the majority in the houſe of peers, and the whigs, in the houſe of commons.

The nation having been alarmed with apprehenſions of popery, the elections for a new parliament ran in favour of the country-party or whigs. Accordingly the impeachment of the lord Danby is immediately reſumed, and a bill for the excluſion of the duke of York brought in by the commons. In vain did the king offer limitations on a popiſh ſucceſſor, they were not received, and therefore this parliament was alſo diſſolved.

But ſuch was the temper of the people in the preſent ſtate of jealouſies and fears, that the next parliament was not more favourable to the court. The king, in a dread of their treading in the ſteps of the former parliament, deferred their firſt ſeſſion above a year after their ſummons. In this interval petitions were preſented to him for the ſitting of the new parliament, the promoters of which were termed Petitioners. Theſe were followed by counter-petitions, wherein the ſubſcribers, expreſſed an abhorrence of dictating to the king the time of a parliament's meeting, and from thence were called Abhorrers. But theſe party-names were ſoon loſt, in the more general diſtinctions of tory and whig[q].

conſiderably by ſea." State Tracts, Vol. I. p. 35. Accordingly king Charles received between ſix and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, which, for fear of ſuſpicion, were not returned into the exchequer, but into the hands of Mr. Chaffinch, (page of the back-ſtairs) who, for his pains, was to have two-pence in the pound. Coke's Detect. Vol. II. p. 166.

[l] It muſt be obſerved, that the opportunity at the reſtoration, of cloſing the diviſion in the church, was loſt, and inſtead of a comprehenſion, the terms of communion were made harder, and ſevere laws againſt all non-conformiſts were enacted, which will be remembered hereafter in the account of our religious differences. The court's deſign in thus widening the breach, and excluding great numbers from the communion of the church, was, to have room for granting a liberty of conſcience in matters of religion, in order to procure ſome indulgence for the catholics. Accordingly the king, in defiance of ſeveral acts of parliament, publiſhed a declaration for toleration, in which the papiſts were ſo far included, as to be exempted from the penal laws, and permitted the exerciſe of their religion in their houſes. See the declaration, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 994.

[m] The Teſt Act runs: " or preventing dangers which may happen from popiſh recuſants, and quieting the minds of his majeſty's good ſubjects, all and every perſon or perſons, that ſhall bear office civil or military, or ſhall receive any pay, ſalary, fee or wages, by reaſon of any patent or grant from his majeſty, or ſhall have command, or place of truſt under his majeſty, or by authority derived from him, ſhall receive the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the uſage of the church of England, within three months after his or their admittance in or receiving their ſaid authority or employment; and every of the ſaid perſons, in the reſpective court where he takes the oaths, ſhall deliver a certificate of ſuch his receiving the ſaid ſacrament, under the hands of the reſpective miniſter and churchwarden, and ſhall make proof of the truth thereof, by two credible witneſſes upon oath: all which ſhall be inquired of, and put upon record in the reſpective courts." With the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, the following declaration was alſo enjoined: " I A. B. do declare, that I do believe, that there is not any tranſubſtantiation in the ſacrament of the Lord's Supper, or in the elements of the bread and wine, at or after the conſecration thereof by any perſon whatſoever." This Teſt, though deſigned againſt the papiſts, as appears from the tenor of it, and the diſpoſition of the parliament at the time of enacting, affected the proteſtant diſſenters, and therefore a vote paſſed to bring in a bill in their favour, which was prevented from being finiſhed by a prorogation. By which it was evident, the king in his declaration for liberty of conſcience, did not intend the eaſe of the proteſtant non-conformiſts. Of this the diſſenters were ſo well ſatisfied, that Love, a city member, and a diſſenter, ſpoke againſt the king's declaration. It is farther obſervable, that notwithſtanding the ſevere laws againſt the diſſenters, they remained unmoleſted, during the continuance of this and the three following parliaments. The reaſon was, becauſe the deſigns of the court were now fully diſcovered.

[n] Aſhley, made earl of Shafteſbury, turned againſt the court, and Clifford was lately dead.

[o] Though it appeared to the commons, by the letters produced by Montague, that in the private negotiations with France, particularly concerning the penſion of ſix millions of livres for three years to the king, the earl of Danby had acted entirely by his majeſty's direction, they would not deſiſt, but were reſolved to lay open, if poſſible, the whole proceedings, and therefore may be ſaid to attack the king himſelf, though indirectly, in their impeachment of the earl. So far did this prerogative-parliament carry their reſiſtance, when they thought their liberties in danger.

[p] Though this long parliament ſeemed at firſt to be entirely tory, and to be wholly engroſſed with the thoughts of guarding the crown and the church with non-reſiſtance acts and penal laws, yet a whig or country party may be traced from the moment the ill effects of theſe things began to be perceived. Hence the commons, upon any remarkable occaſion, took care to explain their own acts, by aſſerting, " That they never deſigned to make any real alteration in the Engliſh conſtitution, or any direct incroachment upon the antient liberties of the people, ſecured to them by Magna Charta, and many ſubſequent acts." But the firſt noted inſtance of the whig or country party in the houſe of peers, was in the ſeventeen days debate in the year 1675, when the oath and declaration of non-reſiſtance on any pretence was attempted to be impoſed on privy-councillors and members of parliament. In the debate on the words, 'againſt thoſe commiſſioned by him,' it is ſaid, " That ſuch words, without diſtinctions and limitations, would effectually change a civil and regulated government into one military and arbitrary, ſo that there could be no difference between the Engliſh and the Turkiſh government." Echard's Review, p. 19. To the former oath it was now added: " And I ſwear that I will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the government in church or ſtate." See Rapin, vol. II. p. 911. The court lords, (ſays Coke) with all the biſhops to a man, were for it: yet (continues he) the country lords, when they debated it in paragraphs, made it inconſiſtent with the preſent conſtitution of the nation. Detect. p. 194.

[q] Burnet obſerves, that were not ſuch members that joined in the petition for the parliament as had been expected: ſo this ſhewed rather the weakneſs than the ſtrength of the party: and many well-meaning men began to diſlike thoſe practices, and to apprehend that a change of government was deſigned, p. 487. As this, very probably, with the factions which now aroſe in the council and parliament, concerning the manner of the excluſion, confirmed the king in his reſolution to adhere to his brother and lineal ſucceſſion, in the proſpect of dividing the nation: ſo it ſhould have warned the country party or whigs of the danger of puſhing things too far, and induced

The parliament was no ſooner aſſembled, but the commons warmly reſumed the affair of excluſion, and a bill to diſable the duke of York to inherit the crown paſſed by a great majority, though, during the debate, the king ſent and offered them any other ſecurity. Upon the bill's being thrown out by the peers, the commons voted all other means not only inſufficient but dangerous. As nothing leſs than a total excluſion would ſatisfy the commons, and as the king was determined not to conſent to it, this parliament was likewiſe diſſolved.

The next parliament ſummoned to meet at Oxford, was opened by the king with declaring his reſolution not to alter the ſucceſſion, and his readineſs to agree that the adminiſtration of the government, in caſe of a popiſh ſucceſſor, ſhould be lodged in proteſtant hands. Accordingly it was propoſed to the commons, that the duke of York ſhould be baniſhed during life, five hundred miles from England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the whole government, eccleſiaſtical and civil, veſted, upon the king's death, in the princeſs of Orange as regent. But ſo averſe were the commons to all expedients, that theſe propoſals were rejected, and the excluſion purſued with as much warmth as ever. For which reaſon the king, after a ſeven days ſeſſion, ſuddenly diſſolved this his laſt parliament, to the great joy of the duke of York, who dreaded limitations even more than a total excluſion [r].

Thus by the king's reſolution to maintain hereditary right, and by the commons adherence to an abſolute excluſion, in a confidence of the king's yielding at laſt, the deſign not only proved abortive, but occaſioned ſuch a change in affairs, as brought both religion and liberty to the brink of deſtruction [s]. The proceedings of the three laſt parliaments gave the court an opportunity to revive the fears and reſentments which had prevailed juſt after the reſtoration, and by that means to divide the nation into tory and whig, which were now become the general names of diſtinction. As by the indulgence ſhewn to proteſtant diſſenters by the late parliament, and their conſequent behaviour, the court artfully rouzed the jealouſy of the church and alarmed the clergy [t]; ſo by the indiſcreet zeal of others, a ſuſpicion was infuſed of a deſign to alter the government, and matter furniſhed for the proteſtant plot, by which ſome of the beſt blood in the nation was ſpilt.

The king, upon the abrupt diſſolution of the laſt parliament, publiſhed a declaration by way of apology, which being read in all the churches of England, produced, by the management of the court, addreſſes of thanks to the king, with aſſurances of adhering to the unalterable right of lineal ſucceſſion. The clergy were extremely zealous on this occaſion. Divine hereditary right, paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, were every where preached in the higheſt terms, and without any reſtrictions. The two univerſities, the judges, with many profeſſors of the law, promoted the ſame doctrines in the ſtricteſt ſenſe, and gave the crown an unlimited power [u]. The king, however, in the midſt of his triumphs, did not yet think himſelf entirely ſecure. Notwithſtanding the flattering addreſſes from all parts, he was ſtill afraid of a parliament, and durſt not venture to meet the repreſentative of the nation, before he was abſolute maſter of the elections. Effectual methods were taken to that end. Not only ſuch ſheriffs, juſtices of the peace, officers of the militia, were appointed as favoured the court, but the king reſolves to new model the corporations by annulling their charters, and granting others under ſuch limitations and conditions, as he ſhould think fit. Almoſt five parts in ſix of the houſe of commons would by that means be in his diſpoſal. He begins with the city of London, and purſuant to a ſentence in the King's Bench, ſeizes the liberties of the metropolis into his hands. Upon this, many corporations, unable to contend with the crown, are prevailed with to ſurrender their charters. The court was vigouroufly purſuing this project when the king was ſuddenly and unexpectedly ſnatched out of the world.

At the acceſſion of king James II. to the throne, the tories and whigs were the principal parties in the nation, and at open defiance with one another. Among the tories were all the high-church men, and the clergy, by whom the divine right of kings, unalterableneſs of lineal ſucceſſion, paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance had been zealouſly preached above twenty years to the people. It is no wonder therefore, theſe doctrines had ſpread themſelves in the kingdom and being embraced by many very learned profeſſors of the law, and members of the univerſities, eſpecially as they ſeemed to be a part of the legal eſtabliſhment. As the tories by their principles thought themſelves bound to adhere to a popiſh ſucceſſor, and happened to be under the influence of popiſh counſels, they were reproached by their adverſaries as favourers of popery as well as arbitrary power. But this imputation appeared afterwards entirely groundleſs. The whigs, chiefly conſiſting of moderate churchmen with ſome few of the clergy, avowed the principles of reſiſtance in ſome caſes, and aſſerted the power of the parliament to limit the ſucceſſion to the crown. As the whigs were declared enemies to every degree of perſecution, and conſequently tolerators in matters of religion, they were ſupported by the proteſtant diſſenters of all denominations. Hence they were repreſented as preſbyterians, enemies of the church, men of anti-monarchial principles. But this was with as little reaſon as the tories were charged with a popiſh inclination. The whigs as to religion, were no more preſbyterians than the tories were papiſts; and though the ſmall remains of the republicans took ſhelter in their party, the whigs were far from being anti-monarchical, as their conduct afterwards fully demonſtrated.

King James began his reign with a ſtrong declaration in council, that as he would never depart from his prerogative, ſo he would preſerve the eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate, and maintain the rights of the people without invading any man's property. The tories who were now predominant in the induced them, when they ſaw the king utterly averſe to the excluſion, to content themſelves with the moſt proper expedients. And doubtleſs they would have taken this method, had not faction and private views mixed with the national intereſts. That this was the caſe, too plainly appears from the hiſtory of thoſe times. Hence an eminent perſon of the country party (who loſt his life afterwards for the cauſe) ſays, in a letter ſtill extant: "I muſt confeſs, I do not know three men of a mind, and that a ſpirit of giddineſs reigns among us, far beyond any I have ever obſerved in my life. Some look who is fitteſt to ſucceed———They are for the moſt part divided between the prince of Orange and the duke of Monmouth———Others are only upon negatives, &c."

[r] The duke of York (ſays Burnet) declared openly againſt the limitations. He was very ſenſible the limitations would be almoſt univerſally agreed to, but knew that many in the nation thought the excluſion unlawful. By whoſe means he might poſſibly recover the throne, but to break through the limitations he was afraid would not be ſo practicable. Hence it was, that the next day after the lord Finch had propoſed the limitations to the parliament, the ducheſs of York ſaid in a letter, "That as for all the high things which were ſaid by their enemies they looked for them; but the ſpeech of the lord chancellor was a ſurprize and a great mortification to them." Burnet, Vol. I.

[s] The author of the Diſſertation on Parties obſerves: Men were made to believe that the king, who had yielded on ſo many occaſions, would yield on this; that he, who had given up ſo many miniſters, would give up his brother at laſt; and that if the parliament would accept nothing leſs than the excluſion, in their own way, it would be extorted from him. Now in this they were fatally deceived.———The king, who had not uſed to ſhew firmneſs, on other occaſions, was firm on this; and the conſequence of puſhing the excluſion, in this manner, was giving him an opportunity of breaking the country party; of dividing the nation into whig and tory; of governing without parliaments; and of leaving the throne open to his brother, not only without limitations or conditions, but with a more abſolute power eſtabliſhed, than any prince of his family had enjoyed, p. 42.

[t] The country or whig party no ſooner prevailed in the houſe of commons, but they eſpouſed the cauſe of the proteſtant diſſenters ſo far, as to endeavour to free them from the penal laws, particularly ſuch as were primarily intended againſt the papiſts. Hence it is that they had been unmoleſted, from the time that the deſign for popery had begun to be diſcovered. In the fourth parliament a bill paſſed both houſes to repeal the ſevere act made in the 35th of queen Elizabeth, by which thoſe who did not conform to the church were required to abjure the kingdom on pain of death; and for ſome degrees of non-conformity, they were adjudged to die without the favour of baniſhment. Burnet obſerves, this bill went heavily in the houſe of lords; for many of the biſhops, though they were not for putting it in execution, thought the terror of it of ſome uſe. But this bill, on the day of prorogation, when it ſhould have been offered to the king, was, by his particular order withdrawn by the clerk of the crown. The houſe of commons of the ſame parliament, the laſt day of their ſitting, voted, "That the acts of parliament made in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James, againſt popiſh recuſants, out not to be extended againſt proteſtant diſſenters." And, "That the proſecution of proteſtant diſſenters upon the penal laws, is at this time grievous to the ſubject, a weakning the proteſtant intereſt, an encouragement to popery, and dangerous to the ſtate of the kingdom." It was alſo given to the members of the laſt parliament of this reign, as an inſtruction from their electors, to repeal the 35th of Elizabeth and the Corporation act. By the favour thus ſhewn them, the non-conformiſts (ſays Burnet) behaved themſelves very indecently, and fell very ſeverely upon the body of the clergy, which made the biſhops and clergy apprehend, that a rebellion, and with it the pulling the church to pieces, was deſigned. It was eaſy therefore for the court to inflame the clergy, and cauſe them to turn their apprehenſions of popery into a dread of falling again under a preſbyterian government.

[u] Dr. Gower, vice-chancellor of Cambridge, told the king in the name of the Univerſity, "We will ſtill believe and maintain, that our kings derive not their titles from the people but from God; that to him only they are accountable; that it belongs not to ſubjects either to create or cenſure, but to honour and obey their ſoverein, who comes to be ſo by a fundamental hereditary right of ſucceſſion, which no religion, no law, no fault or forfeiture can alter or diminiſh."———The univerſity of Oxford paſſed a decree, wherein legal power, hereditary right, paſſive-obedience and non-reſiſtance, are carried to the utmoſt height, and a copy of the decree was ordered to be hung up in every college. Little did the univerſity think that within five years they ſhould conform their practice to propoſitions, which they now declared, falſe, ſeditious, and impious!

The

nation, whilſt the whigs with their adherents were oppreſſed, too readily believed the king's promiſes. The clergy every where extolled the royal word, and it was magnified as a ſecurity beyond any law [w]. Addreſſes were preſented from all parts full of the higheſt expreſſions of fidelity, truſt, and obedience [x]. Though the King in a few days after his declaration in council, ordered the cuſtoms to be levied contrary to law, ſo far were the prevailing party from being alarmed, that he was publicly thanked by a learned ſociety, for this firſt violation of his word [y].

The corporations for the moſt part being modelled according to the project begun in the late reign, a parliament was called, and the elections by that and other irregular methods, were almoſt univerſally carried in favour of the tories [z]. The king opens the firſt ſeſſion with repeating his former declaration of ſupporting the church of England, preſerving the eſtabliſhed government, and never departing from his juſt prerogatives, aſſuring them, they might firmly rely upon a promiſe ſo ſolemnly made. Accordingly the commons, ſo great is their confidence in the king, grant him for life an annual revenue of two millions and a half, without any conditions or appropriations; voting withal that they entirely rely and reſt ſatisfied on his majeſty's word to ſupport the religion of the church of England, dearer to them than their lives [a].

In this diſpoſition was the parliament when the duke of Monmouth's invaſion put an end to the firſt ſeſſion, after an act of attainder againſt the duke, and a farther grant of four hundred thouſand pounds to the king on this extraordinary occaſion.

The ill-concerted expeditions of Argyle into Scotland, and of Monmouth in England, being defeated and the leaders put to death, the king thought himſelf ſo firmly eſtabliſhed in his throne, that he was eaſily induced to pull off the maſk and more openly avow his deſigns [b]. Theſe invaſions furniſhed him with the pretence of raiſing and keeping up an army which he took care to fill with popiſh officers though unqualified by law. Supported thus by a ſtrong force and a large revenue, he reſolves to haſten the introduction of popery and arbitrary power. He begins with plainly telling the parliament at the opening of the ſecond ſeſſion, "that a ſtanding army was neceſſary, and therefore he had increaſed the number of forces, and demanded a ſupply for their maintainance. He owned ſome officers had not taken the teſts, and declared he would not diſmiſs them [c]."

The parliament, and more eſpecially the commons, though chiefly conſiſting of men who profeſſed to believe the doctrines of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, were alarmed at this ſpeech, as manifeſtly intimating a power in the king to diſpenſe with the laws. However to act as conſiſtently with their principles as poſſible, they offered not only to paſs a bill for indemnifying the popiſh officers from the penalties they had incurred, but alſo to capacitate ſuch others as ſhould be named by the king, and withal voted a ſupply of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, though they would not expreſly declare that it was for the ſupport of the additional forces. Notwithſtanding theſe complaiſant offers, as they inſiſted on the king's removal of all jealouſies from his people by maintaining the laws, and eſpecially the teſts, he choſe rather to loſe the ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, than ſuffer them to ſit any longer, and accordingly put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſudden prorogation, which after many but fruitleſs attempts to gain the majority, was at laſt followed by a diſſolution.

From this time may be dated the firſt deviation from the principles which had for many years been profeſſed by the prerogative-party. The king had been often declared to be above law, accountable only to God, and his commands to be received with an active or paſſive obedience. And yet the king's firſt attempt to diſpenſe with the laws is ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the very men who had eſpouſed the higheſt notions of regal power, and been elected as it were with the king's approbation. This naturally ſhould have deterred him from purſuing (at leaſt ſo openly) his deſigns, and taught him how little he could rely on the profeſſors of paſſive obedience, who, as it plainly appeared, when their religion and liberty were in danger, would interpret the doctrine of non-reſiſtance in a limited ſenſe. But,

Inſtead of being diſcouraged, the king, ſince he could not prevail with the parliament to come into his meaſures, reſolves to fill Weſtminſter-Hall with judges that ſhould anſwer his purpoſes. Accordingly at a ſham trial, the new judges declare it to be, "an inſeparable prerogative of the crown to diſpenſe with all penal laws [d]."

This important point being gained, the king, contrary to an expreſs act of parliament, erects a court of Inquiſition under the name of 'a commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical cauſes.' The clergy are forbid to preach on controverted points, that is, to defend their religion againſt the open attacks of [w] The pulpits (ſays Burnet) were full of it, and of thankſgivings for it. ——The common phraſe was, 'we have now the word of a king, and a word never yet broken,' p. 620.

[x] The univerſity of Oxford in their addreſs promiſed to obey the king without limitations or reſtrictions. The king's promiſe paſſed for a thing ſo ſacred, that they were looked upon as ill-bred that put in their addreſs, 'our religion eſtabliſhed by law,' which looked like a tie on the king to maintain it: whereas the ſtile of the more courtly was, to put all our ſecurity upon the king's promiſe. The clergy of London added a word to this in their addreſs, 'our religion dearer to us than our lives.' This had ſuch an inſinuation in it, as made it very unacceptable. Some followed that pattern: But this was marked to be remembered againſt thoſe that uſed ſo menacing a form. Burnet, p. 620.

[y] The ſociety of the Middle-temple in their addreſs ſaid, "That with the deepeſt ſenſe of gratitude they acknowledged his majeſty's great goodneſs, in extending his royal care of the government, to the preſervation of the cuſtoms which had been continually received by his royal predeceſſors for ſome hundreds of years, and never queſtioned by any parliament, unleſs in that wherein were ſown the ſeeds of rebellion againſt the king his father.—May there never want millions as loyal as we are, to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of your ſacred perſon and prerogative in its full extent." Thus a manifeſt breach of the law was vindicated and applauded by a body of lawyers themſelves. The legal method (ſays Burnet, p. 622.) was to have made entries, and to have taken bonds for thoſe duties to be paid, when the parliament ſhould meet and renew the grant which expired with the late king. As this ſeizing of the cuſtoms (ſays Welwood, p. 138.) was contrary to law, ſo was it altogether needleſs at that time, ſince a parliament was to meet within a few days, which nobody doubted would in a parliamentary way continue them for life. So that he openly violated the conſtitution, to obtain what he was certain would be granted him in a legal manner, and with the good-will of his people.

[z] The methods for ſecuring the elections were ſo ſucceſsful, that the king ſaid, there were not above forty members but ſuch as he himſelf wiſhed for. They were neither men of parts nor eſtates, ſo there was no hope left, either of working on their underſtandings, or of making them ſee their intereſt in not giving the king all at once. Moſt of them were furious and violent, and ſeemed reſolved to recommend themſelves to the king, by putting every thing in his power, and by ruining all thoſe who had been for the excluſion. Some few had deſigned to give the king the revenue only from three years to three years. But there was no proſpect of any ſtrength in oppoſing any thing that the king ſhould aſk of them. This gave all thinking men a melancholy proſpect. Burnet, p. 626.

[a] This reliance on a popiſh king for the ſupport of a proteſtant church, appears ſo extravagant to the author of the Diſſertations on Parties, that he ſays, "It is impoſſible to believe that their confidence in the king's word was ſuch as they affected. But like drowning men who ſaw nothing elſe to catch at, they caught at a ſtraw." p. 76. And indeed the concluſion of this complaiſant vote, viz. 'dearer to us than our lives,' ſeems to intimate to the king the danger of breaking his word, and is alſo an evidence that the tories even when moſt triumphant were far from being popiſhly inclined.

[b] It is obſerved, that theſe invaſions were ſo far from affording the nation any opportunity of mending their condition, that Monmouth's declaration might draw ſome of the diſſenters to his ſtandard, as it did; but was calculated to drive the tory-party, moſt of the whigs, and in ſhort the bulk of the people from him. Argyle's declaration was founded in the ſolemn league and covenant, and gave ſo much reaſon to apprehend that a revival of the ſame principles and a renewal of the ſame tyranny was intended, that we cannot wonder it had no better effect, though we lament the fate of a worthy and gallant man, whoſe crime was refuſing a teſt, that ſhould never have been impoſed on proteſtants and freemen, and who had been driven into theſe extreme reſolutions by a ſeries of unjuſt and tyrannical uſage. Thus were theſe invaſions, favourable in ſome reſpects to the deſigns of king James.—But, in the event, they forwarded our deliverance from all the dangers to which we were expoſed, under his government, by precipitating his attempts againſt our religion and liberty. Diſſert. on Parties, p. 77.

[c] Welwood remarks, that as king James's former ſpeeches to his council and parliament had put the French court to a ſtand what to think of him, this laſt ſpeech put them out of pain, and convinced them he was entirely theirs.—Accordingly the revocation of the edict of Nantes, which probably had been ſome time under conſideration before, was now put in execution, to the aſtoniſhment of all Europe. Wel. Mem. p. 156. Burnet makes the ſame obſervation. As far as I could judge, (ſays he) the affairs of England gave the laſt ſtroke to the recalling the edict of Nantes, and then adds, this year (1685) muſt ever be remembered, as the moſt fatal to the proteſtant religion. In February, a king of England declared himſelf a papiſt. In June, Charles, the elector Palatine, dying without iſſue, the electoral dignity went to the houſe of Newburgh, a moſt bigotted popiſh family. In October, the king of France recalled the edict of Nantes. And in December, the duke of Savoy, by the perſuaſions and even threatnings of the court of France, recalled the edict that his father had granted to the Vaudois. So it muſt be confeſſed, that this was a very critical year. p. 656.

[d] A ſham information was brought againſt ſir Edward Hales, a papiſt, for acting in a military office without qualifying himſelf according to law, which produced the declared opinion of the new judges in favour of the diſpenſing power. Echard's Review, p. 71. When king James (ſays Welwood) came to aſſume to himſelf this power, as his prerogative and right, he unhinged the conſtitution all at once; for to diſpenſe with laws already made, is as much a part of the legiſlature, as the making of new ones. And therefore in arrogating to himſelf ſuch a diſpenſing power, he invaded the very eſſence of the Engliſh conſtitution, by which "the legiſlature is lodged in king, lords, and commons, and every one of them has a negative upon the other two." Welwood's Memoirs, p. 169. It was not enough (continues the ſame author) for king James to aſſume a diſpenſing power and to act by it, but ſuch was the miſery and hard fate of England, that the party about the king would have had us believe, that a power in the king to diſpenſe with laws, was law. To maintain this monſtrous poſition, there were not only mercenary pens ſet a-work, but a ſet of judges found out, that, to their eternal reproach, did all that was poſſible for them to compliment the king with the liberties of their country.—Thus were we fallen under the greateſt misfortune that could poſſibly happen to a nation, to have our laws and conſtitutions trampled upon, under colour of law: And thoſe very men, whoſe office it was to ſupport them, became now the betrayers of them to the will of the prince. Ibid. p. 171.

The

the Romiſh prieſts; and the biſhop of London, for not obeying an illegal command of the king, is ſummoned before the new court, and arbitrarily ſuſpended from his office [e]. Mean time a ſolemn embaſſy is ſent to Rome to reconcile the Britiſh dominions to the Holy See, whilſt the catholic religion is publicly propagated in jeſuit ſchools and ſeminaries in London, and other conſiderable towns, and ſuch miniſters at court as would not conſent to the repeal of the teſts, are, notwithſtanding paſt ſervices, diſmiſſed, and their poſts filled with others of greater compliance.

Things being thus prepared, a proclamation for liberty of conſcience is publiſhed, the diſpenſing power is claimed, and all ſubjects allowed to hold places without the uſual oaths or teſts. The diſſenters dazzled with this indulgence, as freeing them from the oppreſſions they endured, preſent addreſſes of thanks, full of high ſtrains of gratitude and loyalty, not conſidering that by approving an illegal toleration they became encouragers of the diſpenſing power aſſumed by the king [f].

As the jeſuits were very impatient to get footing in the univerſities, in a belief it would greatly advance the propagation of their religion, the king's next ſtep was to order, by a royal mandate, the fellows of Magdalen college in Oxford, to elect a preſident contrary to their ſtatutes and oaths. Upon their refuſal, they are ſummoned before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, deprived (except two that complied) of their fellowſhips, and with their new elected preſident, declared incapable of any eccleſiaſtical preferment.

During the conteſt with the college, all methods were practiſed to procure a new parliament that ſhould ratify the king's meaſures, repeal the teſts, and give a parliamentary ſanction to his diſpenſing power. To this end he took a progreſs into ſeveral counties, purſued the affair of new-modelling the corporations, diſmiſſed from poſts and employments all ſuch as ſhewed the leaſt diſlike of his proceedings. With theſe, and many other artifices, the king could not however ſo far carry his point as to be ſure of a parliament to his mind; and therefore would not venture to call one, but choſe rather to rely on his army, which he reſolved to fill with Iriſh papiſts. To convince the nation ſtill more plainly of his deſigns, he not only made father Petre a privy-councillor, but ſolemnly received a nuncio from the pope, who made his public entry at Windſor [g].

In this ſituation were affairs in the beginning of the famous year 1688; the king inveſted by the judges with the diſpenſing power; the privy-council under the direction of a jeſuit; the counties and militia in the hands of papiſts or other unqualified perſons; an army of fifteen thouſand men incamped ten miles from London; and to crown all, the king's proceedings approved by addreſſes not only from diſſenters but from corporations and other ſocieties [h], with promiſes of electing ſuch members of parliament as ſhould confirm his meaſures. In theſe favourable circumſtances, it is not ſtrange the king ſhould puſh his deſigns with openneſs and vigour. Accordingly after a proclamation of the queen's pregnancy, and ſome fruitleſs attempts to perſuade the prince and princeſs of Orange to approve the repeal of the penal laws and teſts, comes forth (what quickly brought things to a criſis) a ſecond declaration for liberty of conſcience, more full and expreſs in favour of the catholics, which was ſoon followed with an order of council to the biſhops, to cauſe the declaration to be read by the clergy in all the churches of their ſeveral dioceſes.

This order immediately produced a petition from the archbiſhop of Canterbury and ſix other biſhops [i] againſt reading the declaration, as "being founded upon a diſpenſing power often declared illegal in parliament." Whereupon they were all ſent to the Tower, and not long after, brought to a trial for framing and publiſhing a ſeditious libel; for ſo was termed their petition, though delivered in the humbleſt and moſt private manner to the king alone. After a long trial, wherein the diſpenſing power was not only boldly argued againſt, but demonſtrated to be a violation of the conſtitution, the biſhops were acquitted with loud acclamations, not only of the people, but even of the army itſelf, to the king's great mortification, who was then in the camp [k].

During the confinement of the biſhops it was that the queen's delivery of a ſon was publiſhed, to the great joy of the catholics, (who were now leſs anxious about the uncertainty of the king's life) but to the grief and aſtoniſhment of the conſiderate part of the nation, who had placed all their hopes on a proteſtant ſucceſſor, which now ſeemed entirely defeated. Their comfort was, the queen's delivery by many circumſtances was rendered ſuſpicious, and the people in general inclined to believe it an impoſture of the papiſts to finiſh their ruin [l].

Notwithſtanding the public rejoicings in the city, country and army, for the acquittal of the biſhops, which ſufficiently diſcovered the general diſlike of the king's meaſures, he reſolved to purſue his deſigns. Two of the judges were diſmiſſed for not vindicating his pretended prerogative in the late trial, and the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners were ordered to proceed againſt the clergy for not reading the declaration. The inclinations of the land and ſea forces were ſounded, and though ſeveral diſcouraging circumſtances occurred, the king was not deterred from his purpoſes, nor would he be perſuaded to uſe gentler methods, according to the advice of ſome of his friends, and particularly one of his miniſters who had ſuddenly changed his religion [m]. It was thought that all oppoſition would vaniſh before the army, when ſtrengthened with Iriſh ſupplies.

During the tranſactions of the foregoing years the ſtate of parties had undergone great alterations. The tories and churchmen who had ſo zealouſly eſpouſed and aſſerted the doctrine of non-reſiſtance in all caſes, whilſt the king exerted

[e] The king ſent an order to the biſhop of London to ſuſpend Dr. Sharp (afterwards archbiſhop of York) for a pretended contempt of the order againſt preaching on controverted points: and the biſhop refuſing to execute it, as being illegal, was himſelf ſuſpended by the new court. Welwood obſerves on this occaſion, that notwithſtanding the king's inſnaring letter to the clergy about preaching, they were not wanting in their duty; for to their immortal honour, they did more to vindicate the doctrine of their own church, and expoſe the errors of the church of Rome, both in their ſermons and writings, than ever had been done either at home or abroad ſince the reformation; and in ſuch a ſtile, and with ſuch inimitable force of reaſoning, as will be a ſtandard of writing to ſucceeding ages. Wel. Mem. p. 174. The chief of theſe writers were, Tillotſon, Sharp, Patrick, Stillingfleet, Williams, Tenniſon, Sherlock, Clagget, Gee, Whitby, and Dr. Wake late archbiſhop of Canterbury.

[f] The obſervations of the anonymous author on Parties, concerning the proceedings of the diſſenters, ſeem but too juſtly grounded. The king's deſigns (ſay he) were openly avowed, and deſperately puſhed. The church of England oppoſed them with the utmoſt vigour. The diſſenters were cajoled by the court, and they, who had been ready to take arms againſt king Charles, becauſe he was unwilling to exclude his brother, and who had taken arms againſt this prince, ſince he was on the throne, became abettors of his uſurpations. It were eaſy to prove this, even by biſhop Burnet's account, as much as that is ſoftened; and if the excuſes which have been made for their ſilence againſt popery in this critical moment, or for their approving and encouraging the exerciſe of a diſpenſing power, are to be received, one may undertake to excuſe, on the ſame principles of reaſoning, all thoſe inſtances of miſ-conduct in the church-party, which I have preſumed to cenſure ſo freely. But the truth is, theſe excuſes are frivolous. I could quote ſome, that are even burleſque. Let us reverence truth therefore, and condemn the diſſenters as frankly on this occaſion, as we have condemned the members of the church of England on others. Diſſert. on Parties, p. 78.

[g] This was ſeignor Dadda. The duke of Somerſet, then lord of the bedchamber in waiting, was expected to aſſiſt in the ceremony; but he told the king, "He could not ſerve him upon this occaſion, being aſſured it was contrary to law." The king aſked him, "If he did not know that he was above the law?" The other replied, "If the king was, he himſelf was not above the law;" for which he was diſmiſſed from all employments. Echard's Review, p. 84.

[h] In the addreſs from the Middle-Temple, it is ſaid,——"As thanks (for the toleration) ought to be paid your majeſty by all your ſubjects, ſo we eſpecially, of the profeſſion of the law, have moſt reaſon to be thankful for the honour you have done us, by aſſerting your own royal prerogatives, which is the very life of the law and our profeſſion. Which prerogatives, as they were given by God himſelf, ſo we declare, That no power upon earth can diminiſh them, but they muſt always remain entire and inſeparable to your royal perſon. Which prerogatives, as we have ſtudied to know them, ſo we are reſolved to defend them, by aſſerting with our lives that divine maxim, A Deo Rex, a Rege Lex, &c." Hiſt. of Addreſſes, p. 113.

[i] The ſix biſhops were St. Aſaph, Ely, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chicheſter and Briſtol, five of whom were afterwards Non-jurors.

[k] It was alſo obſervable upon their trial, that the tables were ſo far turned, that ſome that had largely contributed to the enſlaving their country with falſe notions of law, were now of another opinion; while at the ſame time, others, that had ſtood up for the liberties of their country in two ſucceſſive parliaments, and had ſuffered upon that account, did now as much endeavour to ſtretch the prerogative beyond its juſt limits, as they had oppoſed it before. So hard it is (ſays Welwood, p. 186.) for mankind to be in all times, and upon all turns, conſtant to themſelves. The proceedings againſt the biſhops were chiefly managed by ſolicitor Williams, a zealous promoter of the excluſion in the reign of king Charles, ſpeaker in his two laſt parliaments, and a bold pleader in all cauſes againſt the crown. On the biſhops ſide appeared, amongſt others, Finch and Sawyer, who had been, whilſt in power, great ſticklers for the prerogative.

[l] It muſt be owned, that in caſe the queen was really delivered of a ſon, both ſhe and the king acted as if it had not been ſo, and by their proceedings not only rendered it ſuſpected, but put it out of the king's power to prove the birth in a ſatisfactory manner when he thought proper to endeavour it.

[m] This was the lord Sunderland, who in ſeveral long audiences with the queen, repreſented, "That ſince ſhe had got a ſon, the ſtate of her affairs was quite changed, and that there was no occaſion for making ſuch haſte now the ſucceſſion was ſure. He told her, time would bring all about, if ſoft methods were uſed; and adviſed her to appear the author of gentle counſels, which by another adminiſtration might lay the flame ſo lately kindled, and gain the hearts of the nation both to herſelf and her ſon, ſo that ſhe might be declared regent if the king ſhould die during the minority of the prince." Echard's Review, 103. Burnet, Vol. I. 755. In order (ſays Burnet) to have the more credit in preſſing theſe advices, he reſolved to declare himſelf a papiſt. Ibid. p. 756.

his prerogative in their favour, and ſuffered them to trample upon their oppoſers the whigs and diſſenters, when they diſcovered that this doctrine was going to be turned upon them, and made an inſtrument of deſtroying the eſtabliſhed religion and introducing popery and arbitrary power, their zeal began to abate, and neither pulpit nor preſs any longer ſo ſtrenuouſly inculcated the doctrine of paſſive obedience. It was now generally thought that the king, as well as thoſe commiſſioned by him, were not to be obeyed without limitation, and that their power was circumſcribed by the law. In a word, the tories were ſo far become whigs that they believed when a prince viſibly endeavours the ſubverſion of the religion and liberties, he may be lawfully reſtrained and kept within bounds. In this ſituation were the tories, when the whigs were ſuddenly deprived of a great ſupport. The diſſenters, who had all along adhered to that party, fell for ſome time into a ſnare laid for them by the court. Liberty of conſcience, and exemption from penal laws, were ſo grateful, that overlooking the deſtructive and illegal means by which they were obtained, they exalted the prerogative in their addreſſes of thanks to as great a height as ever the tories had done, and ſo became indirectly abettors of the diſpenſing power, which at once unhinged the conſtitution. But quickly perceiving their error, they returned to their former friends, and joined with the whigs in oppoſing arbitrary power. At length, the tories being convinced that their religion and liberties were in manifeſt danger, and popery and ſlavery advancing with large ſteps, believed it time to provide for the ſafety of the church and ſtate[n]. Thus perſuaded, they alſo co-operate with the whigs, and by this means the whole nation, as to the point of reſiſtance in ſo deſperate a caſe, ſeemed to be all of one party.

Accordingly, ſoon after the queen's delivery, the prince of Orange was earneſtly invited, as well by tories as whigs, to come and ſave the nation from falling into the moſt deplorable of ſtates, popery and ſlavery. As the ſafety, not only of the United Provinces, but of the proteſtant religion in general, depended on the fate of England, the invitation was gladly accepted by the prince of Orange, and heartily eſpouſed by the Dutch, who readily furniſhed an army and fleet.

Whilſt the warlike preparations were with great ſecrecy carried on in Holland, king James had intimation from France of an expedition intended againſt England, with the offer of a French army to aſſiſt him. This offer, to the great ſurpriſe of the king of France, was rejected as unneceſſary, though a private treaty was ſaid to be then made between the two monarchs[o].

But at length receiving certain advice of the prince of Orange's deſign, king James was extremely alarmed. He inſtantly ſaw the neceſſity of requiring the confidence of the clergy, ſtill vainly imagining they would practice that paſſive obedience they had ſo long and ſo ſtrenuouſly aſſerted. But to his great mortification the biſhops, to whom he applied for the aſſiſtance of their counſels, plainly adviſed him in ten articles, "to redreſs all his illegal proceedings, and ſpeedily call a Free Parliament, in which the church of England, a due liberty of conſcience, and the properties of the ſubject might be ſecured."

Whilſt the biſhops were preparing this addreſs, the king publiſhes a proclamation, intimating, "that no leſs than an abſolute conqueſt of his kingdoms was propoſed by this invaſion; that nevertheleſs, he declined all foreign aid, and wholly relied upon his own ſubjects." Concluding, "that though he intended to have met his parliament the 17th of November, he found it neceſſary to recall the writs that had been iſſued for that purpoſe."

About the ſame time the king, as his fears increaſed, thought proper to redreſs ſome of the grievances complained of. He begins with taking off the biſhop of London's ſuſpenſion, and publiſhing a general pardon of all criminals; a few only excepted. Soon after this, the commiſſion for cauſes eccleſiaſtical was diſſolved: the charter of London reſtored: the fellows of Magdalen college were ordered to be re-inſtated: corporations were reſtored to their antient charters: popiſh lord-lieutenants, juſtices of the peace, mayors, and other magiſtrates were diſplaced, and proteſtants put in their room. In a word, the whole popiſh fabric, the work of near four years, was in a few days almoſt entirely demoliſhed. But with how little ſincerity this was done, the king took care to ſhew preſently after.

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting in England, the prince of Orange, to juſtify his undertaking, publiſhed a ſolemn declaration, that "the expedition was intended only for redreſs of the grievances, by a free and lawful parliament, to which ſhould be referred the inquiry into the birth of the pretended prince of Wales, and of all things relating to the right of ſucceſſion."

Upon news that the king, purſuant to the advice of the biſhops, had retracted ſome of his arbitrary proceedings, an addition was made to the declaration importing, "that theſe redreſſes were imperfect, and a plain confeſſion of the violences complained of, that the root of oppreſſion, the claim of a deſpotic power, was reſerved entire, and conſequently no remedy could be offered but in parliament, by a declaration of the rights of the ſubject which had been invaded, and therefore all ſhould be referred to a free aſſembly of the nation in a lawful parliament."

The king ſoon verified that part of the declaration concerning the defectiveneſs of the redreſs of grievances; for hearing the Dutch fleet had ſo greatly ſuffered by a ſtorm, that they were forced to put back, and would not be able to proceed till the ſpring, he returned to his former conduct, recalled ſeveral of his late acts of favour, particularly the reſtoration of Magdalen college, and thereby demonſtrated, that all his redreſſes were owing entirely to neceſſity, and not to inclination, which loſt him many friends that might otherwiſe have been induced to ſtand by him.

Mention being made in the prince's declaration of his being invited by divers of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, the king in great haſte ſent for the archbiſhop, and ſuch biſhops as were in London, and required them to juſtify themſelves to the world, by declaring under their hands their abhorence of the Prince's intended invaſion. But inſtead of complying with his requeſt, they renewed their petition with great earneſtneſs to call a free parliament.

The damage ſuſtained by the Dutch fleet having been purpoſely magnified to increaſe the king's ſecurity, it was ſoon repaired, and the prince ſailed again on the firſt of November, and on the fifth, landed his forces at Torbay. He marched directly to Exeter, where he was at firſt but coldly received by the clergy and magiſtrates. But ſoon after an aſſociation by the advice of Sir Edward Seymour was drawn up, to ſtand by the prince of Orange, till religion, the laws and liberties were ſecured by a free Parliament. This aſſociation was ſigned and ſent to other places, particularly to Oxford, where it was ſubſcribed by almoſt all the heads and chief men of the univerſity, and the prince was earneſtly invited thither, with a promiſe

[n] Echard, in his Review, expreſſes this very fully. And now (ſays he) the breaches into the Engliſh conſtitution, which many were unwilling to ſee before, became apparent to almoſt all men's eyes. The king had plainly and openly aſſumed to himſelf a power to make laws void and to qualify ſuch for employments, who were ſo incapacitated by law, as to render all their actings void. All unqualified perſons, ſheriffs, and even judges, were now now no legal officers, inſomuch that the government and the lawful adminiſtration of it was quite broken and confounded. All this was brought about by the magic of diſpenſing power, which changed the whole frame of the legiſlature, and reduced all laws to the pleaſure of the crown. For by virtue of the ſame power, every diſagreeable ſtatute was made liable to be vacated, eſpecially ſince no laws were fortified with ſtronger clauſes to force their execution, than thoſe which the late declaration had made uſeleſs. And when this was declared ſuch a ſacred point of government, that a petition doubting of it and delivered in the moſt modeſt and private manner, was made a high crime, and inflexibly carried on againſt the moſt eminent of the church. This convinced the moſt doubtful, that the breach into the conſtitution was general, deſtructive, and inconſiſtent with the nature of it. The matter was ſo open and avowed, and continued with ſuch regular ſteps and repeated acts, that many of thoſe that had taught the higheſt notions of obedience, were ſenſible that there were ſuch a total ſubverſion, as might warrant the nation to guard its conſtitution, and to look out for its own preſervation. Echard's Review, p. 104.

[o] All the prieſts and popiſh lords were for having the French forces; it was oppoſed by the earl of Sunderland only, who ſaid, that an army of forty thouſand men might perhaps maſter England, but they would become the king's maſters too, and render him only a viceroy to the king of France. A leſs army would loſe the king the affections of his people, and drive his own to deſertion, if not to mutiny. The king did not think matters were yet ſo near a criſis; ſo he neither entertained the propoſition, nor let it fall to the ground. There was a treaty on foot, and the king was to have a hundred tranſport-ſhips ready for ſuch forces as he ſhould deſire. It is certain, the French embaſſador then at London did believe, that the king would have been able to have made a greater diviſion of the nation, than it proved afterwards he was able to do, and that then the king would have been forced to take aſſiſtance from France on any terms, and ſo he encouraged the king of France to go on with his deſign, in the winter, and he believed he might come in good time, next year, to the king's aſſiſtance. This advice proved fatal to the king. The firſt diſcovery of the alliance with France was by a memorial given to the States by the French embaſſador, wherein he told them, that there was ſuch a ſtrict alliance between his maſter and the king of England, that he would look upon every thing done againſt England as an invaſion of his crown. This put the king and his miniſters out of countenance, for they had poſitively denied there was any ſuch thing. But the memorial was a full proof of it. Burnet, Vol. I. p. 767. Skelton, the king's envoy at Paris, had the blame caſt on him of putting it in the memorial, and when he came over was ſent to the Tower on that account; but this ſhow of a diſgrace was but ſhort, for he was ſoon after made lieutenant of the Tower. The French embaſſador about this time ſhewed ſir William Trumball, embaſſador at Conſtantinople, a letter from M. de Croiſſy, importing, than an alliance was concluded between the two kings. Ibid.

The

that their plate if wanted, ſhould be at his ſervice. From that time, as every day brought ſome perſons of diſtinction to the prince, ſo the king was daily forſaken, not only by thoſe he had moſt truſted, but even by his own children, the prince and princeſs of Denmark.

The king was now under ſuch a conſternation that he neither knew what to reſolve on, nor whom to truſt. He ſent for all the lords in London, that were known to be firm proteſtants, by ſome of whom he was privately adviſed to call a general meeting of all the privy-councillors and peers to aſk their opinion. They unanimouſly agreed, that it was neceſſary to call a free parliament, and ſend commiſſioners to treat with the prince. How much ſoever this went againſt the king's inclinations, he next day declared in council, that he reſolved to have a free parliament on the fifteenth of January, and ordered writs to be iſſued out accordingly. At the ſame time, the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Nottingham, and the lord Godolphin, were appointed to go and aſk the prince what it was he demanded. The removal of papiſts, and calling a free parliament, were the chief articles propoſed by the prince, which with the reſt of the prince's demands, were deemed ſo reaſonable that they were immediately ſent away to the king, who owned he did not expect ſo good terms. During this treaty, ſtrange counſels were ſuggeſted to the king and queen. The prieſts and violent papiſts knew that they muſt be the ſacrifice, and the whole deſign of popery given up without hope of revival. They told the queen, ſhe would be impeached and witneſſes ſet up againſt herſelf and ſon. Whereupon ſhe reſolved to go to France with the child; and the midwife, with all that aſſiſted at the birth, were alſo carried over, or ſo diſpoſed of, that it was never known what became of them afterwards. The queen prevailed with the king to promiſe to follow her very ſoon. Accordingly, having called an extraordinary council on account of the prince's propoſals, he acquainted them with the queen's departure the night before, but ſtill promiſed them 'that he would ſtay with them.' He was unanimouſly adviſed to comply with the prince's demands, and all things appeared as if he deſigned it, and the council was ordered to attend him next morning. But having privately ſent for the great ſeal, on the eleventh of December, about three in the morning, he went away in diſguiſe with ſir Edward Hales, whoſe ſervant he ſeemed to be. They paſſed the Thames, and threw the great ſeal into the river; which was found ſome months after by a fiſherman near Vauxhall. The king went down to a fiſher-boat that Hales had provided for carrying him over.

Thus king James, when there was no apparent cauſe to fear the ſafety of his perſon, choſe rather to abandon all, than to ſtay and ſee the iſſue of a free parliament; which he had been ſo often petitioned and adviſed to call, and which he had ſo often promiſed to ſummon. With this his reign may be ſaid to end. For if ever there was a real deſertion of a kingdom, and ever a people left to take care of themſelves, this was certainly the time. He expoſed the nation to the pillage of an army which he had ordered to be diſbanded without money, he deſtroyed the parliament writs, threw the broad ſeal into the Thames, and left the people without a governor.

Upon this deſertion the privy-councillors and peers with the archbiſhop of Canterbury met at Guildhall, and agreed to invite the prince to come and take upon him the government of the nation, till matters were ſettled by a parliament. This invitation was ſigned by all, and ſent to the prince, who upon receiving the ſurpriſing news of the king's ſudden departure, thought it neceſſary to make all poſſible haſte to London. When he was advanced as far as Windſor, two gentlemen of Kent brought him notice, that the king was taken by ſome fiſhermen and carried to Feverſham[P]. The prince inſtantly

[P] The following account is a manuſcript letter from one of the gentlemen that came to the king, when he was taken, to his friend in London.

"It was the fatal Tueſday, December 11, 1688, when the mobile were all in arms; on which day were taken the lord Saliſbury, and ſir Charles Hales at Aſhford, the lord Peterborough, &c. in the iſle of Thanet, and near us baron Jenner, Burter, Graham, Obadiah Walker, Gifford, Leybourn, Kingley, and two ſuppoſed to be their titular biſhops, with ſeveral papiſt gentlemen, viz. the lord Arundel of Wardour's ſon, Hardwick, a merchant, Sing, adjutant to ſir Edward Hales, &c. This was the great work of the day, beſides rifling of popiſh houſes: but the night was attended with ſomething more extraordinary; for the ſeamen, armed with a ſort of emulation at the ſucceſs of the landmen, were reſolved to have a frolick in their way; and about ſeven at night under the conduct of William Ames and John Hunt, with about fifty more, chiefly ſeamen, put off in queſt of a prize, and about eleven at night they took a cuſtom-houſe boat, in which proved to be the king, ſir Edward Hales, and Ralph Sheldon. The king was in a particular diſguiſe, and ſo not known that night: but as if his deſtiny deſigned to be ſevere upon him, the ſeamen treated him very roughly above the reſt, though incognito. One cried out, 'twas father Petre; they knew it to be ſo by his lean jaws:' A ſecond called him 'old hatchet-faced jeſuit:' a third ſwore, 'twas a cunning old rogue, they would warrant him.' And all night long they welcomed him with theſe rough ſalutations, and perfuming the room with tobacco, the ſmell whereof the king hates. His majeſty was taken at the weſt point, not above a quarter of an hour before the flood would have carried him off; and it was his own fault, that they ſtopt there for ballaſt, which the pilot was againſt: but the roughneſs of the ſea made his majeſty fear they were not ſafe in ſo ſmall a boat without ballaſt; whereby they loſt ſix or eight hours, and ſo were providentially taken. He was detained at ſea all night, and brought up from Owſe, where he landed, to Feverſham about twelve, Wedneſday the 12th. Then he was ſuſpected, as he came up the town, and within a quarter of an hour after he was in the inn, fully diſcovered. He was willing by all arts at firſt to conceal himſelf; and at his firſt coming in he called for bacon and eggs, as if he were ſome ordinary man in his diet; whereas he taſtes no meat that is in the leaſt ſalted, as it afterwards appeared. He ſeemed caſt down ſomewhat at the noiſe of the rabble; but after ſome recollection, called for ſome ink and paper to write to the earl of Winchelſea: but was ſo diſcompoſed, that he wrote, and tore, and begun again, as if he were overcome with diſorder or fear. Inaſmuch as I was with him before he was diſcovered, he entered into ſome diſcourſe with me. He thanked me, and commended my prudence for not diſcovering him with the firſt, though I knew him as ſoon as any one. He told me, that the rage of the people was up; and now that of the pſalmiſt was true; 'I, who ſtill the raging of the ſea, muſt ſtill the rage and madneſs of the people;' for he could not, therefore he———He complained heavily of fears and jealouſies blown about by ill men; and too many of the black coats had done him that ill office they could never make him amends for. He inſiſted on his integrity; ſaid, he had a good conſcience, and could ſuffer and die. He told me, he read ſcripture much, and found great comfort in it. He declared, he never deſigned to oppreſs conſcience, alter the government, or deſtroy the ſubjects liberties: and at laſt aſked me plainly, 'What have I done? What are the errors of my reign? Tell me freely.' To which, you may be ſure, I made no anſwer. He inſiſted much upon going off, after he was taken; and I believe he put the queſtion to every layman and churchman in the room, to get him a boat, and let him eſcape. He ſaid, the prince of Orange ſought his crown and life; and if he were delivered up, his blood would lie at our doors, for he ſeemed perſuaded they would murder him. 'Now, (ſaid he,) the opportunity is in your hand; but if you miſs this, it will not be in your power to help me.' He argued much upon theſe words, 'He that is not with me, is againſt me;' and ſermonized half an hour, making reflections on men's coldneſs to ſerve him in that extremity. Whilſt he inſiſted upon going off, and uſed all motives proper, as he thought, in begging, praying, tempting, arguing, perſuading, reproving, &c. which was for above three hours, the rage of the ſeamen took fire, apprehending he would prevail with ſome to let him eſcape ſecretly; and thereupon aroſe ſome contemptuous words, and no ſmall inſolencies offered; which I almoſt think had not happened, if the fear of his eſcape had not run ſo much in their minds, or if his majeſty would have waved diſcourſing ſo much thereof. For the ſeamen much valued themſelves on their charge, and did apprehend their own lives in danger, if he went off; imagining, they had done a ſingular piece of ſervice to the nation, and reſolving there to keep him till order from the prince, or the lords at Guildhall. And the king himſelf undertook to diſcourſe them, and aſked the ſeamen, 'By what authority do you land here? Am not I your king? And ſure you will not hurt my life. Will you ſtand by me? I'll reward you. If you be my good ſubjects, you muſt obey me. Come and ſerve me, and get me a boat, and I'll go off.' Afterward, he went ſo far as to regulate their way of keeping guards; bid them ſtand further off: 'Go, down, and keep your diſtance:' which ſo enraged them, that ſome of them forgot all decency and reverence to him; inſomuch that ſir Edward Hales was deſired to take the king off from that diſcourſe, which made him cheap, and proved ſo unpolitic and unſucceſsful. But ſtill the rage of the ſeamen increaſed, and they ſhook hands and cried out one and all, 'We'll die rather than he ſhall go off;' got together in a full body, broke out into ſo ſcornful huzzas, and for a while doubled their guard, ſuffered none to go to him, but whom they well knew, loaded their muſkets, and made ready as if they reſolved to fire upon any that oppoſed their meaſures. This indeed intimidated the king, and his ſpirits ſeemed much down; which made him keep his eye upon the door, and watch all their motions narrowly, and deſire not to be much alone, but the gentlemen to ſtay with him. Towards night, the earl of Winchelſea came, and then it was reſolved to remove the king to a private houſe; which the ſeamen ſtill oppoſed for fear of eſcape. But my lord pawning his honour for the king's ſtay, the better ſort of them conſented, but the mobile ſtill refuſed; and as the king came down ſtairs, I believe more than twenty ſwords were drawn over his head, and ſome threats paſſed; and at the bottom of the ſtairs they ſtopt him near a quarter of an hour. At length, the matter was compounded, upon condition they only ſhould be the king's guards, whilſt he ſtayed. So at length the king was ſuffered to walk down the dirty ſtreet to his private apartments, with the irregular diſorderly crew at his heels.

"When the king had been ſome while in the private houſe, his ſpirits revived, and he was full of diſcourſe, which was chiefly in his own vindication; for he undertook to juſtify himſelf even to Magdalen college buſineſs. Only I muſt not forget that he pleaſantly entertained us with a long diſcourſe about St. Winefrid and the virtue of her well, and the whole legend of it; as alſo having loſt a wooden croſs, he told us how much it was to be prized, for it was St. Edward the Confeſſor's, and had a piece of the true real croſs in it, on which our Saviour ſuffered; which ſort of diſcourſe was to us, you muſt imagine, very agreeable. He then wiſhed himſelf with the queen; and bleſſed God, ſhe and his ſon were ſafely arrived abroad. And he was farther heard more than once to thank God, that father Petre was ſafely arrived alſo, and ſeemed to expreſs a mighty eſteem for him. As to ſir Edward Hales, he did confeſs, it was by his means he came this way; but ſeemed not much to blame him for his ill ſucceſs. And when he was told, the country hated him, and none ſpake well of him, he ſaid, that then he was the likelier to be an honeſt man. And being told, that Mr. William Pen was ſeized alſo, he pitied him much, and ſaid, 'he was a good man, and he was ſure no ill could be charged on him.'

"Next day being Thurſday the 13th, came in two hundred gentlemen from Canterbury and Eaſt-Kent, and in the ſight of him declared their concurrence with the prince of Orange; which much afflicted him, for that he then ſaid, he was not ſafe where he was. And towards night captain Crayford and another captain came from Sheerneſs, declaring the reſolution to deliver up to the prince the fort and the ſhips in the Swale, which is a road under the protection of the fort. Upon the hearing of which he ſaid, he would conſent to any thing to prevent bloodſhed; but ſeemed extremely afflicted thereat. He was really very melancholy at times, and often ſhed tears. His guards were ſo ſevere upon him, and purſued him from one room ordered Zuyleſtein to go and deſire him to ſtay at Rocheſter; but Zuyleſtein miſſing his way, the king, at the invitation of the ſame peers and privy council, that had juſt before ſent to the prince to take upon him the government, came to London; where he was received with expreſſions of joy by great numbers [q].

When the prince at Windſor had notice of the king's return to London, he thought himſelf ill uſed by the privy-council, who had invited the king without conſulting him. The ſcene was now altered, and new counſels were to be taken. So it was reſolved to ſtick to the point of the king's deſerting his people, and not to give it up, by entering into any treaty with him. Purſuant to this reſolution, the king was ſent to and deſired to remove out of London, and Ham being propoſed to him, it was aſked whether he might not go to Rocheſter. As this was viſibly deſired in order to a ſecond eſcape, the prince readily conſented to it, and came to St. James's, the ſame day the king departed from White-Hall.

The king remained a week at Rocheſter, and both himſelf and every one elſe ſaw he was at full liberty, and under no ſort of reſtraint. Many that were zealous for his intereſt, went to him and preſſed him to ſtay and ſee the iſſue of a free parliament. But a vehement letter from the queen (which was intercepted and afterwards conveyed to the king) claiming his promiſe to come over to her, determined him contrary to the ſolicitations of his friends: ſo he left Rocheſter very ſecretly, on the laſt day of that memorable year, and in a veſſel prepared for him, got ſafe into France.

The prince at his coming to London, called together all the peers and the members of the three laſt parliaments that were in town, with the aldermen, and ſome other citizens of London. By theſe he was deſired to take upon him the adminiſtration of affairs, and to write miſſive letters to the ſame effect, and for the ſame perſons to whom writs were iſſued out for calling a parliament, that ſo there might be an aſſembly of men in the form of a parliament though without writs under the great ſeal; ſuch as that was which had called home king Charles the ſecond [r].

Purſuant to this advice, the prince ſummoned a convention in the manner deſired, and the elections of the members were managed with all poſſible freedom. Every man voting for whom he pleaſed, without any interpoſition or recommendation from the prince [s].

The convention being met and the ſpeakers choſen, the marquis of Hallifax, for the peers (in oppoſition to the earl of Darby) and Mr. Henry Powle for the commons, it was voted in the lower houſe, "that king James having endeavoured to ſubvert the conſtitution, by breaking the original contract between king and people, and having violated the fundamental laws and withdrawn himſelf out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government; and the throne is thereby become vacant." The next day it was farther reſolved, "That it has been found by experience, to be inconſiſtent with this proteſtant kingdom to be governed by a popiſh prince." When theſe important votes were ſent up to the lords for their concurrence, a motion was made not to agree with the commons, that the throne was vacant but only to ſuppoſe it for the preſent, and determine firſt, whether the throne being vacant, it ought to be filled by a regent or a king? This queſtion was debated with great warmth. The earls of Nottingham, Clarendon and Rocheſter, were the chief managers in favour of a regent; in oppoſition to the marquis of Hallifax, and the earl of Danby, who ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the neceſſity of filling the throne with a king. The debate being ended, fifty-one voted for a king, and forty-nine for a regent. It was next debated, whether or no there was an original contract between king and people? The houſe being divided upon the queſtion, fifty-three were for the original contract, and forty-ſix againſt it. After this, it was ſoon carried in the affirmative, that king James had broke the original contract. Then they took into conſideration the word abdicated, and concluded, that the word deſerted was more proper. They examined alſo the word vacant, and the queſtion was put, whether king James, having broke the original contract, and deſerted the government, the throne was thereby vacant? Upon a diviſion in the houſe, thoſe who maintained the king never dies, and conſequently, that the throne is immediately full of the next heir, carried it againſt the vacancy, by eleven voices. Whereupon a motion being made, that the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould be declared king and queen; this was alſo carried in the negative by five voices, though proteſted againſt by forty lords. Having thus gone through the grand vote of the commons, the peers acquainted them, that inſtead of abdicated, they would have deſerted put in, and that the throne is thereby vacant to be left out. But the commons adhering to their vote, rejected theſe amendments, and after a very famous free conference, the lords at laſt agreed, that king James had abdicated the government, and that the throne was thereby become vacant [t]. This done, it was voted in both houſes, that the prince and princeſs of Orange, ſhould be declared king and queen, but that the adminiſtration ſhould be ſingly in the prince. There was drawn up and agreed to, a ſolemn declaration of rights, containing the ſeveral facts and reaſons, for king's James's forfeiture of the crown; aſſerting the undoubted rights and liberties of the ſubject [u], ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown and appointing the new oaths of allegiance. This declaration and the tender room to another; and preſſed upon in his privacies, ſo that he had ſcarce the civilities from the ſeamen, that was due to a gentleman in reſtraint; ſcarce leiſure to be devout or retire to the calls of nature; ſo over officiouſly did they guard him. Freſh rumours oft were raiſed of his going off, which fetched the ſcattered ſeamen together, and were the occaſion of freſh heats and inſolencies. In this tumultuous manner was the poor king guarded; neither would they ſuffer the gentlemen to take their turns.

"When Friday night came, and the guards, that were ſent from the lords that were then at Guildhall, were within two hours march of Feverſham, the rage of the ſeamen increaſed, becauſe the earl of Feverſham was with them, and ſome others they diſliked; that they ſwore bloodily, no guards ſhould come in there, and ſo ran all to arms. Upon ſight of which the gentlemen were forced to diſpatch expreſſes away to ſtop the guards, and pray them to lodge at Sittingbourn; for doubtleſs if the guards had come that night into town, there had been bloody work; for by what I heard and ſaw, I verily believe the ſeamen would have reſiſted them.

"At length, Saturday morning came, when the king was guarded out by the ſeamen and gentlemen, and ſo received near Sittingbourn, by thoſe that were ſent for him," Thus you have a long account of this affair.

[q] It is obſerved, by Burnet, that though this accident of the king's return, ſeemed of no great conſequence, yet all the ſtrugglings afterward made by the Jacobite party, did flow from thence. For if he had got clear away, by all that could be judged, he would not have had a party left. All would have agreed, that here was a deſertion, and therefore that the nation was free and at liberty to ſecure itſelf. But what followed, gave them a colour to ſay that he was forced away. Till now he had ſcarce any party but among the papiſts; but from this incident a party grew up, that were long very active for his intereſts.

[r] The lawyers were generally of opinion, that the prince ought to declare himſelf king like Henry VII. This they ſaid, would put an end to all diſputes, which might otherwiſe grow very perplexing and tedious. And, they ſaid, he might call a parliament, which would be a legal aſſembly, if ſummoned by a king in fact, though his title was not yet recognized. This was plainly contrary to his declaration, by which the ſettlement of the nation was referred to a parliament; ſuch a ſtep would make all the prince had hitherto done, paſs for an aſpiring ambition only to raiſe himſelf, diſguſt thoſe who had been beſt affected to his deſigns, and make them leſs concerned in the quarrel, if inſtead of ſtaying till the crown ſhould be offered him, he would aſſume it as a conqueſt. Theſe reaſons determined the prince againſt that propoſition, and to call the peers, &c. together. Burnet I. 803.

[s] As there had been writs for a parliament twice before this, in a few months, moſt places had fixed their members, ſo that the difference was not conſiderable, between the members that were, and thoſe that would have been choſen, if king James had ſuffered the firſt or ſecond parliament he had called to meet, which is a plain proof of the temper and diſpoſition of the nation at this juncture. Echard's Rev. p. 222.

[t] The diſputes about the words abdicate, or deſert, and the vacancy of the throne, were fitter for a ſchool than a houſe of parliament; and might have been expected in ſome aſſembly of pedants, where young ſtudents exerciſed themſelves in diſputation, but not in ſuch an auguſt aſſembly, as that of lords and commons met in ſolemn conference, upon the moſt important occaſion. The truth is, that they who formed the oppoſition, were reduced to maintain ſtrange paradoxes.—Thus for inſtance, they were forced to admit, that an oppreſſed people might ſeek their remedy in reſiſtance, for they had fought it there themſelves, and yet they oppoſed making uſe of the only remedy, which could effectually ſecure them againſt returns of the ſame oppreſſions, when reſiſtance had put it in their power, as oppreſſion had given them a right, to uſe this remedy. This muſt appear a very abſurd paradox, if we conſider that reſiſtance, in all ſuch caſes, is the mean, and future ſecurity the end; and that the one is wicked in the higheſt degree, if it be not employed to obtain the other. Thus again, the ſame men declared themſelves willing to ſecure the nation againſt the return of king James, to that throne he had abdicated, or according to them, deſerted; and yet they could not prevail on their ſcrupulous conſciences to declare the throne vacant. They had concurred in the vote, that it was inconſiſtent with the laws, liberties and religion of England, to have a papiſt rule over the kingdom—— and yet they maintained, though they did not expreſly name him, that if the throne was then, or ſhould be at any time vacant of the father, it muſt be reputed inſtantaneouſly full of the ſon, upon the foundation of this ſilly axiom that the king never dies. According to this law, king James and his ſucceſſors, to the twentieth generation, might have continued abroad a race of royal exiles, preſerving their indefeaſible right to govern, but debarred from the exerciſe of it, whilſt the nation continued, from century to century, under the dominion of regents with regal authority, but without any regal right. Thus they who maintained the hereditary right of our kings, reduced themſelves, and would have reduced their country, to the abſurd neceſſity of altering the conſtitution, under pretence of preſerving it. No king, except a Stewart, was to reign over us, but we might eſtabliſh a Doge or Regent; and by this means theſe warm aſſertors of monarchy, refuſing to be ſlaves, concluded to be republicans. Many more paradoxes of equal extravagance might be cited, which were advanced directly, or which reſulted plainly, from the arguments employed on one ſide of the queſtion in theſe diſputes. But theſe inſtances may ſuffice to ſhew, that although difficulties hard to ſolve in ſpeculation, or to remove in practice, will ariſe in the purſuit of the moſt rational principles; yet ſuch abſurdities as theſe can never ariſe, except from the moſt irrational, and always muſt ariſe from ſuch. Differ. on Par. p. 83.

[u] In ſtating the grievances and rights, the diſpenſing power came to be diſcuſſed.

of the crown being offered to their royal highneſſes, they were proclaimed the ſame day, to the great joy of the nation.

By all theſe proceedings of the convention, it plainly appears, that the ſtate of parties was very much altered. Till king James's abdication the whole nation ſeemed to be of one mind, tories and whigs unanimouſly carried on the great work. But when king James, rather than wait the iſſue of a free parliament, and be bound to govern by law, (which was all that was required of him) choſe to abdicate the government, and withdraw into France; ſeveral parties aroſe both in the nation, and in the parliament; according to the different principles they had eſpouſed. Though the tories, when their religion and liberties were at ſtake, had laid aſide paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, they ſtill firmly adhered to the principle on which thoſe doctrines were founded, namely, the divine, unalienable, indefeaſible, hereditary right of kings. And therefore, though they had heartily concurred with the whigs in inviting over the prince of Orange, their only view was to oblige king James to alter his meaſures and make the laws the ſole rule of his conduct. In a word, they wanted the prince to be their deliverer, but not their ſovereign. In theſe ſentiments were almoſt one half of the lords, about one third of the commons, and the clergy in general. All theſe declared for a regent; for according to their principles, the king never dies, nor can the throne ever be vacant, being, upon death, ceſſion, or abdication, inſtantly full of the next heir. If therefore a king, by his miſconduct ſhould ſhew that he was as incapable as an infant or lunatic of governing his people, the remedy provided for infancy or lunacy might in their opinion be applied, but the right muſt remain and go on in a lineal ſucceſſion [w].

Of thoſe who were thus for continuing the right of ſovereignty in king James, and veſting a regent with the exerciſe of the power, there were viſibly two different parties. Some adhering to the old principles (tranſmitted down from king James I.) in their literal ſenſe and full extent, went into the expedient of a regency, as the moſt probable way for laying the nation aſleep, and for overcoming the preſent general averſion to king James. After which they imagined it would not be difficult in ſome time, to compaſs his reſtoration. This was their intention, and therefore, when the prince of Orange was declared king, they could not comply with the ſettlement, nor ſwear allegiance to the new king, but formed what was properly called the non-juring party, whoſe number indeed was not very great, though headed however by Dr. Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury; and ſeveral other ſpiritual and temporal lords.

The reſt of thoſe that were for hereditary right and a regent, though they could not, conſiſtently with their principles, promote the advancement of the prince of Orange to the throne, yet when he was declared king, they thought they might ſwear allegiance to him, by means of the diſtinction of a king de jure, and a king de facto; a diſtinction authoriſed by the famous ſtatute of Henry VII. [x]. But though the whole tory party came into the new ſettlement upon this diſtinction, they were however divided into two very different branches, by the different conſequences they drew from it. Some ſincerely thought that a king de facto, had a right to their obedience, and that they were bound to adhere to him and defend him, even in oppoſition to him, with whom they believed the right did ſtill remain. Hence it was, that though they could not reſolve to vote or act themſelves, againſt the principles they had profeſſed as maxims of law, yet they could reſolve to adhere to a new ſettlement, when it was made. This was the caſe of the earl of Nottingham, and many others who were employed in eminent poſts in the reign of king William [y].

But the other branch of the tories, drew from the ſame diſtinction of a king de jure and a king de facto a very different concluſion. They acknowledged one king, and held their allegiance ſtill due to another. They bound themſelves by oath to preſerve a ſettlement, which they pretended themſelves in conſcience obliged to ſubvert [z]. According to them, the meaning of the oath of allegiance was, that they were only to obey the new king as an uſurper, during his uſurpation; and therefore, as long as he continued in poſſeſſion, they were bound to ſubmit to him, but that it was ſtill lawful for them to aſſiſt king James, if he ſhould come to recover his crown; and that they might act all they could in his favour, as being ſtill their king de jure. The proceedings of this branch of the tory party, in the courſe of king William's reign, make it but too viſible, that they took the oaths in this ſenſe, contrary to the plain meaning of the words faith and true allegiance, and contrary to the expreſs declaration of the act that enjoined them. This branch of the tory party were ſtiled the rigid tories, or highfliers.

On the other hand, as the tories were divided into two branches, ſo the whigs were not all of one mind. For though they had all, purſuant to their principles, declared themſelves for the abdication of king James, and the vacancy of the throne, and unanimouſly concurred in making the new ſettlement, yet ſome few among them had very different views and ends from the reſt. Thoſe intended to take advantage from the preſent conjuncture to depreſs the crown, to render it as precarious and elective as they could, and to raiſe the power of the people upon the ruin of the monarchy. Hence it was dangerouſly aſſerted by ſome, that the whole government was diſſolved, from which a diſſolution of all men's properties, honours and rights, might have been inferred. And when it was propoſed to examine into the birth of the pretended prince [a], the ſame perſons thought it policy diſcuſſed. And then the power of the crown to grant a non-obſtante to ſome ſtatutes was objected to. Upon opening this, the debate was found ſo intricate, that it was let fall at that time only for diſpatch. But afterwards an act paſſed condemning it ſingly, and the power of a non-obſtante was taken away. Yet king James's party took great advantage from this; they ſaid, though the main clamour of the nation was againſt the diſpenſing power, yet when the convention brought things to a ſettlement, that did not appear to be ſo clear a point as had been pretended: and it was not ſo much as mentioned in this inſtrument of government. So that by the confeſſion of his enemies, it appeared to be no unlawful power; nor was it declared contrary to the laws of England. Whereas its not being mentioned then, was only upon the oppoſition that was made, that ſo no more time might be loſt, nor this inſtrument be clogged with diſputable points. Burnet, p. 822.

[w] If the perſons who maintained the divine hereditary indefeaſible right of our kings, had thought fit to drop theſe principles when they laid aſide thoſe of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, and no tolerable reaſon can be given why they did not, their conduct would have been conſiſtent and uniform on this great occaſion, and this uniformity would have been productive of great good, by taking away at once, even the appearances of all political diviſion in the bulk of the nation. But whilſt they laboured to reconcile their preſent conduct to their antient ſyſtem, they were true to neither. They had gone much farther lengths than their antient ſyſtem would allow, and then they refuſed to go as far as the other required in order to be ſafe; and therefore in order to be juſtified, they loſt every kind of merit, the chimerical merit of adhering to a ſet of ſilly principles; and the real merit of ſacrificing their prejudice to the complete deliverance of their country, from the recent danger of popery and arbitrary power. Diſſert. on Part. p. 85. It may be obſerved on this occaſion, that there is a diſtinction which ſhould be conſtantly made in caſes of this nature, aud which thoſe who eſpouſe the principle of hereditary right, never make in their diſcourſes or writings, or never make exactly enough. They compare the proceedings, without comparing the ſituation. Neceſſity and ſelf-preſervation are great laws of nature, and may well diſpenſe with the ſtrict obſervation of the common forms of any particular conſtitution. Either the convention muſt have fallen into the abſurdities mentioned in a former note, or have called back king James, the greateſt abſurdity of all, or have left their country in abſolute anarchy, or have done what they did. What they did, was done as near as poſſible to the ſpirit of our conſtitution, the forms of our laws, and the examples of former times.

[x] This ſtatute did ordain, that no perſon, that did aſſiſt in arms or otherwiſe, the king 'for the time being,' ſhould after be impeached therefore or attainted. For that it was agreeable to reaſon of ſtate, that the ſubject ſhould not inquire of the juſtneſs of the king's title, or quarrel; and it was agreeable to good conſcience (that whatſoever the fortune of war were) the ſubject ſhould not ſuffer for his obedience. Bacon's Hiſt. of Hen. VII. p. 144. This ſtatute was principally made (ſays a certain author) that the ſubjects might be ſafe which ever ſide prevailed, in an age, when the epidemical folly of fighting for different pretenders, had ſpilt oceans of blood on the ſcaffold, as well as in the field. He obſerves, of this law, that it confounds in effect the very diſtinction it ſeems to make, ſince it ſecures alike, and, by ſecuring alike, authorizes alike thoſe who adhere to the king de jure, and thoſe who adhere to the king in poſſeſſion. Differt. on Part. p. 91.

[y] The principle (ſays the anonymous author ſo often mentioned) of this branch of the tories was wrong, but it could not be reputed dangerous, whilſt it laſted; and it ſeems to have been built on ſo narrow and ſlippery a foundation, that it did not continue long in force.——Since we find among thoſe who voted for a regent, not a king, ſome illuſtrious perſons, who ſerved king William faithfully, adhered inviolably to the new eſtabliſhment, and have been diſtinguiſhed friends to the ſucceſſion that hath now taken place. Diſſert. on Parties, p. 92.

[z] This was (ſays the forementioned author) to juſtify perfidy, to ſanctify perjury, to remove the boundaries of right and wrong, and as far as in them lay, to teach mankind to call good evil, and evil good.——— That there have been perſons who deſerved to be ranked under this head, is too notorious to be denied; but I perſuade myſelf, that this diviſion hath always conſiſted of a flux body. On one hand, it is ſcarce poſſible to believe, that any number of men ſhould be ſo hardened as to avow to themſelves, and to one another, the acting, and perſiſting to act, on a principle ſo repugnant to every notion and ſentiment, that harbour in the breaſts of ſocial creatures. On the other, we know how the ſallies and tranſports of party on ſome occaſions can hurry even reaſonable men to act on the moſt abſurd, and honeſt men to act on the moſt unjuſtifiable principles, or both one and the other on no principle at all, according as the object which the prevailing paſſion preſents to them, directs. Diſſert. on Parties, p. 92.

[a] When this debate was propoſed in the houſe of lords, it was rejected with indignation. He was now ſent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the eſtabliſhed religion. It was impoſſible for the people of England to know, whether he was the ſame perſon that had been carried over or not: if he ſhould die, another might be put in his room, ſo as the nation could not be aſſured concerning him. —— It was known that all the perſons, who had been the confidents in that matter, were conveyed away: ſo it was impoſſible to come at them, by whoſe means only the truth of the birth could be found out. This to let it lie in the dark undecided, and believed it no ill precedent that they ſhould ſo neglect the right of ſucceſſion, as not ſo much as to inquire into the matter. They alſo thought, it would be a good ſecurity for the nation, to have a dormant title to the crown lie as it were neglected, to oblige the kings to govern well, while they would apprehend the danger of a revolt to a pretender ſtill in their eye. From theſe and other proceedings they are called republican whigs. But the far greater part of the whigs, without going into new ſchemes of government, thought it ſufficient to ſay, that in extreme caſes all obligations did ceaſe; and that in the preſent circumſtances the extremity of affairs, by reaſon of the late ill government, and by king James's flying over to the enemy of England rather than ſubmit to reaſonable terms, had put the nation on the neceſſity of ſecuring themſelves upon a legal bottom. Extreme dangers would juſtify extreme remedies, though there was no ſpecial proviſion that directed to them, or allowed of them. Nor was there any need to fear ill conſequences from this, ſince houſes were pulled down or blown up in a fire, and yet a town in general was not thereby deſtroyed. So a nation's ſecuring itſelf againſt a king, who was ſubverting the government, did not expoſe monarchy, nor raiſe a popular authority. In a word, they were for keeping, as near as they could with ſafety to the lineal ſucceſſion, and not to deſtroy but rather improve the conſtitution, by marking out the bounds of the prerogative, and declaring the rights and liberties of the people.

As for the clergy, when they ſaw the church in imminent danger, they had, with the reſt of the tories, ſo far given up paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, as to co-operate with the laity in promoting the revolution, till king James's abdication. Some of the prelates had joined to invite over the prince of Orange, and their brethren refuſed to ſign an abhorrence of this invitation. Nay, the univerſity of Oxford had aſſociated for him againſt the king; and the biſhops and London clergy had welcomed him to St. James's, even after the king had withdrawn himſelf into France. But as they ſtill firmly adhered to the divine right of monarchy and lineal ſucceſſion, (which they had ſo often and ſo publicly aſſerted) upon the king's abdication they were at a loſs how to diſengage themſelves with honour or conſcience. Conſiſtently with their profeſſed principles they could not vote nor act in favour of the new ſettlement, and therefore they had recourſe to the diſtinction above-mentioned, of a king de jure and a king de facto; and too many of them drew the ſame conſequence from that diſtinction, as the rigid tories, that is, they acknowledged one king, and held their allegiance due to another. But others, and eſpecially ſuch as came in more ſincerely to the new government, were influenced by a notion which ſeemed to agree with their principles, and which was thus expreſſed: "The prince of Orange had juſt cauſe to make war on king James. In a juſt war, ſucceſs is conſidered as the deciſion of heaven. Conſequently, the prince's ſucceſs gave him a right of conqueſt over king James, and a title to all that was before veſted in him." This is ſaid to have had the moſt univerſal effect on the greateſt part of the clergy. Some few who were more ſcrupulous, refuſed to ſubmit to the new ſettlement, and remained among the non-jurors.

Such was the ſtate of parties at the time of the revolution; and ſuch the political diviſions in the nation and parliament, when king William was advanced to the throne: which being remembered, will plainly account for the early and ſtrong oppoſition to the new ſettlement, even from thoſe who had heartily eſpouſed the prince of Orange's cauſe till the flight of king James; and alſo for the many difficulties, obſtructions, plots, and conſpiracies, which king William encountered in the courſe of his reign; and which made him ſo uneaſy, that he will be ſeen more than once reſolving to quit his throne, and retire to Holland.

matter, it ſeems, had been privately debated before it was brought to the houſe: and it was by ſome obſerved, that as king James, by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and yet doing it imperfectly, had really made it more ſuſpicious than it was before; ſo, if there was no clear or poſitive proof made of an impoſture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out beyond the poſſibility of contradiction, would really give more credit to the thing than it had, and inſtead of weakening it, would ſtrengthen the pretenſion of the birth. Upon all theſe conſiderations, no farther inquiry was made into it. It is true, this put a plauſible objection in the mouth of all king James's party. Here, ſaid they, an infant was condemned, and denied his right, without either proof or inquiry. Burnet, p. 817.

ENGLAND.

BOOK XXV. SECT. I.

From the REVOLUTION, to the Death of Queen MARY, in 1694.

28. WILLIAM III. and MARY II.

AMONG the various revolutions in kingdoms and ſtates mentioned in hiſtory, that in England in the year 1688, is hardly to be parallelled. The manner in which it was accompliſhed, and the circumſtances attending the courſe of it, were as extraordinary as the importance of it was great, not only to the Britiſh dominions, but alſo to the beſt part of Europe, and to the proteſtant intereſt in general. The progreſs of the French in their deſign of an univerſal monarchy was ſuch, that catholic no leſs than proteſtant ſtates rejoiced, at a revolution that ſeemed to be the only means to check the overgrown power of France, and free them from the approaching ſtate of a ſlaviſh dependency. But to England this revolution was in a more particular manner the fountain of many invaluable bleſſings, not only as the nation was delivered by it from popery and arbitrary power, which were advancing very ſwiftly, but the like danger for the future was by the new eſtabliſhment entirely removed. The authority of the prince, which by ſuch principles as compoſed an avowed ſyſtem of tyranny, had been raiſed to a degree inconſiſtent with a free ſtate, was reduced within the bounds of the laws. The prerogative of the crown, which by various arts had been ſtretched, and the many precedents, deſtructive of liberty, that had been ſet, were no longer to be feared; all hidden reſerves of authority to be let out on occaſion, and to overflow the privileges of the people, being removed, and the laws of the land made the ſole ſprings of the Sovereign's pretenſions and the nation's rights. In a word, the conſtitution of England, which for almoſt a century had been ſeen in two very different lights, was by the revolution and ſubſequent ſettlement not only renewed and brought back to the firſt principles, and nearer the primitive inſtitution, but moreover was fixed upon ſurer and more laſting foundations.

William III. prince of Orange, chief author of this famous revolution, was deſcended from the antient houſe of Naſſau.[a] He was great grandſon of William I. prince of Orange, who, upon the revolt of the Netherlands, occaſioned by the tyrannical proceedings of their ſovereign Philip II, king of Spain, took up arms in defence of the Belgic liberties, and by his prudence and conduct, founded the republic of the united

GENEALOGY of the PRINCES of ORANGE.

[a] The houſe of Naſſau is very ancient, and divided into numerous branches, which have their titles from the ſeveral counties belonging to Naſſau, as Naſſau-Dittenburg, Naſſau-Dietz, Naſſau-Seigen, Naſſau-Hadamar, &c.—Naſſau was made a principality by Ferdinand II, in 1653. This family has given not only a king to Great-Britain in the perſon of William III, but alſo an emperor to Germany in the perſon of Adolphus, count of Naſſau, in 1292, ſlain ſix years after in a battle with his rival Albert of Auſtria. From Otho count of Naſſau, general of the imperial army againſt the Hungarians under Henry I, in 926, to John III, in 1494, are fourteen deſcents. In which time the counts of Naſſau by marriages acquired large poſſeſſions in the Netherlands, Burgundy, &c. as Vianden, Breda, Loek, &c. John III. count of Naſſau-Dittenburg, had (by Elizabeth daughter of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and in right of her mother counteſs of Catzenellobogen) two ſons Henry and William, between whom his territories were divided; Henry had the poſſeſſions in the Netherlands, and William thoſe in Germany. Henry (to whom Charles V. owed in a great meaſure his advancement to the imperial throne) being ſent by the emperor as ſovereign of the Netherlands into France to do homage for Flanders and Artois, was, (1515) with the conſent of Francis I, married to Claude de Chalons, only ſiſter of Philibert de Chalons prince of Orange, by whom he had a ſon called Renè or Renatus. Philibert dying without iſſue, left, by will, the principality of Orange to his ſiſter's ſon Renatus, who alſo dying without heirs, (1544) bequeathed his poſſeſſion to his couſin, ſon of his uncle William; namely, provinces, the moſt powerful in Europe[b]. This republic formed by the father, was eſtabliſhed by his ſecond ſon Maurice, and by his youngeſt ſon Henry-Frederic brought to perfection, being acknowledged and treated with by Spain, as free and independent ſtates; and their ambaſſadors ranked with the Venetian by the treaty of Munſter. William II, ſon of

WILLIAM firnamed the Great. { Count of Naſſau, and by his couſin Renatus's will, prince of Orange, born 1533. He was ſon of William the Elder, who having embraced the reformed religion, and introduced it into his territories, the emperor Charles V. took from him this his ſon William, and educated him in the popiſh religion, which he profeſſed till the revolt of the Netherlands. He was many years about the emperor's perſon, and by him made, at the age of twenty-two, generaliſſimo of his armies. When Philip II. would have ſubverted the conſtitution of the Netherlands, he, being then governor of Holland, Zealand, &c. eſpouſed the cauſe of liberty, and became the founder of the republic of the United Provinces. In this he was greatly aſſiſted by his brothers Lodowic, Adolphius, Henry, (all three ſlain in battle without heirs) but eſpecially by John his ſecond brother, (b. 1535) to whom he gave part of his German dominions, with the title of count of Naſſau-Dietz. [This John count of Naſſau, and ſtadtholder of Friezland, was anceſtor of ſeveral branches of Naſſau, viz. by his ſon John, of the line of Seigen: by his ſon George, of the line of Dittenburg; by his ſon Lewis of the line of Hadamar; and by his third ſon Erneſt-Caſimir, of the line of Dietz, ſtadtholders of Friezland. This Erneſt-Caſimir (b. 1573) count of Naſſau-Dietz, was father of William-Frederic, (b. 1613) father of Henry-Caſimir, (b. 1657) father of John-William-Frizo, (b. 1687, who being appointed heir of the houſe of Orange by king William III, aſſumed that title, and was drowned 1711), father of William-Charles-Henry-Frizo, the preſent prince of Naſſau-Dietz and Orange, hereditary ſtadtholder of Friezland, and choſen ſtadtholder of Guelderland, Zutphen and Groningen, (1722) married (1733) to Anne, princeſs of Great-Britain.] William I. prince of Orange was at laſt aſſaſſinated at Delft, (1584) in the 57th year of his age. He had by his firſt wife, Ann of Egmont, (counteſs of Buren and Leerdam) Mary, and Philip-William prince of Orange, who being ſeized at the univerſity of Louvain by the duke of Alva, was carried to Spain, and confined there thirty years, before he was ſuffered to come back to the Netherlands, where he died without heirs, 1618. By his ſecond wife, Anne, daughter of Maurice elector of Saxony, he had Emilia (married to Emanuel, nominal king of Portugal) and Maurice. By his third wife, Charlotte de Bourbon, daughter to the duke of Monpenſier, who had been a nun, he had ſix daughters; Juliana, (married to Frederic IV. elector palatine) Iſabella, Catharina-Belgica, Charlotta-Brabantina, Charlotta-Flandrina, Emilia. By his fourth wife, Louiſa de Coligni, he had Henry-Frederic. After his death, Philip, his eldeſt ſon, being in Spain, he was ſucceeded in the ſtadtholderſhip of Holland and Zealand, by his ſecond ſon,

* MAURICE. { Count of Naſſau, and, after his brother Philip's death, prince of Orange, (b. 1567.) He was called into action at ſeventeen years of age, and remained at the head of affairs above forty years, from 1584 to 1625, when he died. He was never married, but was ſucceeded in his eſtates and dignities by † HENRY-FREDERIC. { Prince of Orange, ſon of William I. by Louiſa de Coligni, widow of Monſieur de Taligni, b. 1584. The republic founded by his father, and eſtabliſhed by his brother, was by him brought to perfection, being after ſixty years wars acknowledged a Free State by the Spaniards. He died May 14, 1647. By Emilia de Solms, daughter to John Albert count of Solms, (who came into Holland with the queen of Bohemia, and whom he married (1625.) by advice of his brother prince Maurice) he had four daughters; Louiſa, (married 1646, to Frederick-William elector of Brandenburg); Henrietta-Emilia, (married 1648 to William-Frederick Count of Naſſau-Dietz, ſtadtholder of Frieſland); Henrica-Katherina, (married 1658, to George II. prince of Anhalt); Maria, (married 1666, to Lewis-Herman, palatine of Simeren); and one ſon, namely,

WILLIAM II. { Prince of Orange, (b. 1626.) on whom the ſurvivorſhip of all his father's dignities and employments was conferred by the ſtate. In 1641, he married Mary Stuart, eldeſt daughter to Charles I. king of Great-Britain. He died at the age of twenty-four, 1650, of the ſmall-pox, ſoon after his attempt upon Amſterdam, leaving only a poſthumous ſon, viz.

WILLIAM III. { Prince of Orange, and king of Great-Britain, (b. 1650.) who leaving no iſſue by his wife Mary, daughter of James II. King of England, bequeathed the Principality of Orange, &c. to his couſin and next heir-male John-William-Frizo, Prince of Naſſau-Dietz, as was ſaid above. He died March 8, 1702.

It may not be improper to inſert here, a brief account of the nature and conſtitution of a republic, ſo different from all others; and which is to bear ſo large a part in the affairs of Europe, throughout the following hiſtory.

The Netherlands, or Low-countries, have been for many ages, divided into ſeventeen diſtinct provinces; and were governed by ſo many ſovereigns, under the various titles of prince, duke, or count. The ſeveral conſtitutions of theſe provinces, were much the ſame, being originally formed by part of thoſe northern ſwarms which over-ran Europe, and every where introduced a conſtitution, now generally called the ſtates; under a ſingle perſon now limited by law. As by the aſſembly of the ſtates, the ſucceſſion when doubtful or conteſted was ſettled, laws made, taxes impoſed, peace or war declared; the uſe of this aſſembly was the principal privilege of the inhabitants of the Low-countries, and conſequently, they were always very jealous of any incroachment upon it. In proceſs of time, theſe provinces by marriages, ſucceſſions, or conqueſts were united in the houſe of Burgundy, under Philip the good. Afterwards upon a marriage with the heireſs of Burgundy, they came to the houſe of Auſtria, and in the perſon of the emperor Charles V, were incorporated with his dominions of Germany, Spain, Italy and the Indies.

In the height of his glory Charles V, not only reſigned the imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand, but alſo the kingdom of Spain with the Netherlands, to his ſon Philip, whom he had two years before married to Mary, queen of England. Philip II, ſworn enemy of the reformed religion, which now began to ſpread in the Low-countries, reſolved to extirpate hereſy in all his dominions, and to that end, introduced by violence the inquiſition into the Netherlands; to which the inhabitants had always refuſed to ſubmit. Provoked at this, and many other incroachments of their liberties, the provinces riſe in arms, and headed by the prince of Orange, waged war with their ſovereign; which at length produced in 1580, the famous union of Utrecht, the foundation of the preſent republic of the united provinces, the nature of whoſe government is briefly this.

The ſovereign authority of the united provinces reſides in the ſtates-general, or the ſtates of each province aſſembled in one place. But as this aſſembly (conſiſting of above eight hundred perſons) cannot meet without great expence and trouble, each province deputes a ſmall number of plenipotentiaries, (uſually in all about thirty) who with the greffier or ſecretary, conſtantly ſit at the Hague, and are commonly called the ſtates-general. Each province preſides their week in turns. Neither ſtadtholder, or governor, or any military perſon, can be a member of this aſſembly. Matters are here decided by the majority, except in caſes of peace and war, foreign alliances, raiſing or coining money, and particularly the ſovereignty and privileges of each province or member of the union. In all theſe the provinces muſt all concur: Nor can they chuſe ambaſſadors, or anſwer foreign miniſters, (though ſent and received in their name) without conſulting the ſtates of each province, by their deputies, and receiving their orders; which indeed is alſo done in all affairs of great importance. Each province may ſend what number of deputies they pleaſe, as two, three or more; ſince the deputies of a province have but one vote. The ſovereignty of the territories and places, conquered by the common arms, is likewiſe embodied in the ſtates-general, as Boiſleduc, Breda, Bergenopſoon, &c. and the places belonging to the Eaſt and Weſt-India companies, in Aſia, America and Africa.

The reſolves of the States-general are executed by the council of ſtate, conſiſting of three deputies from Holland, two from Guelderland, two from Friezland, one from Groningen, one from Utrecht, and one from Overyſſel, in all twelve. The deputies preſide by turns, and may always decide by plurality of voices. This council propoſes to the States the ways and means of raiſing forces and money, ſuperintends the troops, fortifications, contributions upon the enemy's country, paſſports, and the affairs, revenues, and government of the places conquered ſince the union. Eſtimates of the expences of the enſuing year, are alſo drawn up by the treaſurer-general, (who has a ſeat here for life, with a deliberative voice) under the authority of the council, and a petition preſented to the ſtates to demand the ſame of the provinces in the proportion above-mentioned. Each province raiſes what money they pleaſe, ſend in their quota to the receiver-general (who alſo has a ſeat in the council of ſtate) and convert the reſt to preſent uſes, or reſerve it for future occaſions. In a word, the council of ſtate diſpoſes of all money deſigned for extraordinary affairs, and gives orders (ſigned by at leaſt three deputies of ſeveral provinces and the treaſurer-general, and regiſtered in the chamber of accounts) for the whole expence of the ſtate, according to the reſolves of the ſtates-general. It muſt be obſerved, the council of ſtate, formerly repreſented the authority of the ſtates-general in their abſence, and were judges of the proper time to convene them. But this power being abuſed under the earl of Leiceſter, the provincial ſtates deſired of the general, that they might by deputies, continue their aſſemblies under the name of ſtates-general, which has been done ever ſince Leiceſter's leaving the government.

The chamber of accounts erected for the care of the council of ſtate, to examine and ſtate all the accounts of the ſeveral receivers, to controul, and regiſter the orders of the council of ſtate. This chamber is compoſed of two

* Maurice prince of Orange had by Madame de Mechlin his miſtreſs, 1. William, (Vice-Admiral of Holland, ſlain at Groll, 1627.) 2. Lewis de Naſſau lord of Lecke, Odyke, Auverquerque and Beverwert, who dying 1668, left by his wife, counteſs of Horne, five daughters and three ſons. The daughters were Emilia, wife of Thomas Butler earl of Oſſory; Iſabella, wife of Henry Bennet earl of Arlington; Mauritia, wife of Colin Lindſey earl of Balcarras; Charlotte, lady of the bed-chamber to queen Ann, (1702.); Ann-Elizabeth, wife of baron Rutenburg, whoſe daughter married George earl of Cholmondely. The three ſons were, Maurice (created count of Naſſau, by the emperor Leopold 1679, whoſe deſcendents are nobles of Holland); William Adrian, (lord of Odyke, Zeiſt, &c. firſt nobleman of Zealand, famous for his embaſſies); d. 1705, and Henry de Naſſau, who being lord of Auverquerque, had that ſirname. He was king William's captain of the guard when prince of Orange, and maſter of the horſe when king of England, d. 1708. By Iſabel van Arſens, daughter of Cornelius lord of Somerdyke, (who d. 1719-20.) this Henry had five ſons; Lewis, (d. 1687.); Cornelius, lieutenant-general of the Dutch infantry, lord of Woudenberg Maurice, (captain of the Dutch life-guards); Francis, (colonel of an Engliſh regiment of dragoons, killed at Almenara in Spain); and Henry, the eldeſt ſurviving ſon, created 24 Dec. 1698, baron of Alford, viſcount Boſton, and earl of Grantham, lord-chamberlain to her late majeſty queen Caroline.

† Henry Frederick prince of Orange, had by a concubine Frederick of Naſſau lord of Zuleſtein, killed at the battle of Voordam (1672.) refuſing quarter. He left by his wife Mary, daughter of ſir William Killigrew bart. of Cornwall; William-Henry, lord of Zuleſtein, created May 10. 1695. Baron of Enfield, viſcount Tunbridge, and earl of Rochford, whoſe ſon William II. earl of Rochford died without heirs at Almenara, 1710, and was ſucceeded by his other Frederick, who dying in June 1737, was ſucceeded by his ſon William-Henry.

Henry Frederick (who had married the Princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter of Charles I. king of England, and been inveſted with the ſurvivorſhip of his father's dignities of Stadtholder and captain-general), being diſguſted at the reſolution of Holland to diſmiſs great part of the army, ſuffered himſelf to be ſwayed by violent counſels, and under colour of a power from the States-General to preſerve the union, and oppoſe whatever might diſturb it, not only impriſoned ſix provincial ſtates in the caſtle of Louveſtein, but raſhly marched an army againſt Amſterdam, in order to ſeize and change the magiſtrates of that city, by whom his meaſures were chiefly oppoſed. This deſign being diſcovered by the Hamburgh poſt, who happened to ride through the army in the night, the prince's mortification at his diſappointment was ſo great, that he retired from the Hague to his ſeat in the country, on pretence of taking the diverſion of hunting, where being ſeized by a fever, which was followed by the ſmall-pox, he died in the 25th year of his age. The princeſs his wife was ſo ſtruck with this unexpected accident, that in eight days after ſhe was delivered of a ſon when ſhe was but ſeven months gone with child.

This ſon was William Henry third prince of Orange of that name, and afterwards king of Great Britain. The diſadvantages under which he came into the world were ſo many and ſo great, that there was no poſſibility of foreſeeing that he was born for the preſervation of the liberties not only of Holland and England, but of all Europe. His conſtitution, by reaſon of his untimely birth, was infirm. His private affairs were in a bad condition; two great jointures to his mother and grandmother, beſides a large debt contracted by his father for the aſſiſtance of his brother-in-law King Charles II, then in exile with the reſt of the royal family of England. As to his public affairs, his condition was ſtill worſe. His father's late attempt upon Amſterdam, had raiſed great jealouſies of his family. A ſtrong party, with the grand Penſionary De Wit at their head, was formed againſt him and two deputies from each province, who are changed every three years, and reſide at the Hague.

The Admiralty (divided into five colleges; one in Amſterdam, a ſecond at Rotterdam, a third at Horn, a fourth at Middleburg, a fifth at Harlingen,) has the management of the ſea-affairs; and when a fleet is ordered, each college, (conſiſting of ſeven deputies, four from the province where the college reſides, and three named by other provinces) furniſhes their own proportion in all moneys that are to be raiſed.

Each province, being ſovereign and independent, is governed by its own laws and cuſtoms, under the authority of the provincial ſtates; for inſtance the ſovereignty of Holland is lodged in the ſtates of that province repreſented by deputies from the nobles and towns, compoſing nineteen voices, of which the nobles have only the firſt, and the cities eighteen, ſo many ſending deputies to the ſtates. Theſe were originally but ſix, till William I, prince of Orange, to ſtrengthen his authority, added twelve more. The former are ſtill diſtinguiſhed from the latter, by being called the ſix great cities, namely, Dort, Harlem, Delft, Leiden, Amſterdam and Gouda. The nobles are repreſented by eight or nine of their body, and each town may ſend what number of deputies they pleaſe, ſince they are maintained at their charge and have but one vote. The Provincial ſtates of Holland ſeverally meet four times a year at the Hague, in February, June, September and November, to order the affairs of the province. The Penſioner of Holland has a place in all the aſſemblies of the province, and in the ſtates propoſes all affairs, gathers the votes, and concludes. This office is of great importance, for the penſioner is as the preſident of the aſſembly, and generally for life, though he ought to be choſen or renewed every fifth year. He is always one of their deputies, in the States-General. When there is a ſtadtholder, and differences ariſe between him and the ſtates, the penſioner is in a dangerous ſituation, of which Barnevelt and De Wit, are terrible inſtances. There is likewiſe a provincial council of ſtate compoſed of ſeveral deputies, one from the nobles, and one from each of the principal towns; and but one, from three of the ſmaller towns; who chuſe him by turns. This council ſits conſtantly at the Hague, propoſes the matters of deliberation to, and executes the reſolves of, the provincial ſtates, who are convened by this council upon extraordinary occaſions. There are alſo two chambers of accounts, one for the ancient demean of the old courts of Holland, (but as the demean is begun to be ſold, this chamber will in the end be ſuppreſſed) the other manages the revenues of the province. Theſe charges are given as an honourable retreat to perſons who are grown old, in the more laborious employments.

Holland and Zealand, having but one Stadtholder or governor, under the houſes of Burgundy and Auſtria, ſtill continue to have but one common judicature, exerciſed by two courts of juſtice, common to both provinces. The firſt conſiſts of a preſident, eight counſellors of Holland, and three of Zealand, with a greffier, and ſix ſecretaries. The other, called the high-council, (to which there is an appeal from the firſt in civil, though not in criminal caſes) is compoſed of ſix counſellors of Holland, and three of Zealand, a greffier and ſubſtitute.

As the Provinces are governed by their States, ſo are the Cities by their ſenators. For example, the ſovereign authority of Amſterdam reſides in a Senate of thirty-ſix, who, (by a former reſolution of the Burghers in a general aſſembly) chuſe a new Senator when one happens to die. And this cuſtom has prevailed in all the towns of the Province, though with ſome difference in the number of ſenators. By the ſenate are elected the four burgomaſters, of whom three are choſen every year, and one ſtays in office two years. The burgomaſter of the year before, preſides the firſt three months, after which the other three preſide by turns. Though this office is of great authority, the ſalary is but 500 guilders a year. The eſchevins (who are the court of juſtice, in every town) are alſo annually choſen by the ſenate in this manner: The ſenate names eighteen, out of which the burgomaſters chuſe nine, for ſo many are there at Amſterdam. They are ſovereign judges in criminal cauſes, but in civil, above ſuch a value, there lies an appeal to the provincial court of juſtice. In a ſentence of death they adviſe with the burgomaſters, but are not bound to follow their advice. Under theſe magiſtrates, are the treaſurer of the city; the ſcout who ſeizes all criminals, and ſees the ſentences of juſtice executed; the penſioner, who is a civil lawyer, verſed in the cuſtoms, records and privileges of the town, of which he informs the magiſtracy upon occaſion: He is a ſervant of the ſenate and burgomaſters, delivers their meſſages, and makes their public harangues. Thus the burgomaſters and eſchevins may be likened to our lord mayor and aldermen, the ſcout to the ſheriff, and the penſioner to the recorder. The deputies to the provincial ſtates are choſen by the ſenate, among whom one of the burgomaſters and the penſioners are commonly ſent.

As to the office of Stadtholder it muſt be obſerved, whilſt the united Provinces were under the dominion of Spain, there was a Stadtholder or lieutenant-general, over the ſeventeen provinces, with inferior governors or Stadtholders, over particular provinces. After the revolt, the ſupreme power which before reſided in Philip II, as ſovereign of the Netherlands, devolved upon the States-General, namely the power of making war and peace, raiſing money and the like, whilſt the rights of the governors or Stadtholders, ſeemed to have been preſerved. For inſtance, William I, prince of Orange, being at the time of the revolt, Stadtholder of Holland and Zealand, under the Spaniard, had his power and authority confirmed to him by the ſtates of thoſe provinces, now become ſovereigns, and was alſo made Stadtholder-general, as well as captain-general of the United Provinces after the union of Utrecht. After his aſſaſſination, prince Maurice was choſen ſtadtholder of Holland and Zealand, and after Leiceſter's return to England, was alſo made ſtadtholder of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overyſſel, whilſt his couſin prince William Lewis of Naſſau-Deitz, was choſen ſtadtholder of Frieſland, and Groningen. The power and rights of the ſtadtholder were, the command of the land and ſea-forces as captain-general and admiral, the diſpoſition of military poſts, the pardon of penalties and crimes, the election of magiſtrates, upon the nomination of the towns, who preſented three, and he choſe one of them. But with all this he could neither raiſe nor diſband forces, and for governors of frontier towns, he was to chuſe them out of perſons nominated by the ſtates. In a word, he could not take the field, form a camp or ſiege, without the expreſs order of the ſtates; when the ſtadtholder or general of the union had any view which he thought to be advantageous to the republic, and which ought to be kept ſecret, he deſired the ſtates to appoint two or three perſons to whom he imparted his deſign, which being approved of, the ſtates without knowing the particulars, made the neceſſary preparations and always ſent with him three or four deputies, to repreſent the ſtates and ſerve him for counſellors. But as for the council of war, he formed it as he pleaſed, and was maſter of the military diſcipline.

From the time of Prince Maurice and his brother Frederick-Henry, there were two Stadtholders and generals in the ſeven Provinces, the Princes of Orange of five, and the Counts of Naſſau-dietz of two, but the command in chief of the army belonged to the Princes of Orange.

The Stadtholder in the aſſemblies of the States-General or Provincial, could only give his opinion, not vote. He was arbitrator of differences between Provinces, a power founded upon an article of the union, which gave that right to the Stadtholders of the Provinces. They had a large patrimonial revenue in lands, lordſhips, &c. in the Provinces which enabled them to live with ſplendor and increaſed their authority, though in Holland, they were not maſters of any town that ſent deputies to the States. In Zealand they had moſt power, where, of the ſeven votes of the Provincial States, they were maſters of three; one as firſt noblemen, (the nobility being extinct in that Province, they had ſome perſon to repreſent them in the aſſemblies) the other two as Marquiſſes of Vere and Fluſhing. But never was the authority of Stadtholder greater than under William III, Prince of Orange, and king of England.

The inhabitants of Holland, may be divided into Boors, or countrymen who cultivate the land, mariners, merchants or traders, who fill their towns, Renteeners, or ſuch as live in their cities upon eſtates formerly acquired, nobles and officers of the army. The Renteeners have a liberal education, with a view chiefly to render them fit for the ſervice of their country, for out of theſe the magiſtracy of their towns, their provinces, and their ſtate is generally compoſed; being deſcended from families, who have many times been conſtantly magiſtrates in their native towns, for many years and ſome for ſeveral ages. Their eſtates conſiſt in their ſalaries (which are ſmall) rents of lands, or intereſt of money. The nobles in Holland are very few, moſt of the families having been extinguiſhed in the long wars with Spain. Thoſe that remain, are in a manner all employed in the military or civil charges of the Province or State. They value themſelves more upon their nobility, than in countries where it is more common, and would not upon any conſideration marry below their rank. The officers of the army live after the cuſtoms of the nobles, as do many of the ſons of rich merchants, who returning from their travels purſue their pleaſures more than the ſervice of their country, or if they pretend to that, it is rather by the army than the ſtate. All theſe are generally deſirous to ſee a court, and wiſh for the re-eſtabliſhment of a Stadtholder. Temp. Le Clere.

From this account it appears the Republic of Holland, is rather an Oligarchy or Ariſtocracy, than a Democracy; for the Senates of the towns are filled up by themſelves, the Provincial-States are choſen by the Senate, and the deputies to the States-General are elected by the Provincial. Thus the people have little or no ſhare in the government. The caſe is much the ſame in all the ſeven Provinces.

About four year after the Union of Utrecht, Prince William was aſſaſſinated at Delft, July 10th, 1584. The murderer was one Balthaſer Gerards, who in hopes of the reward, or of meriting heaven by killing the Prince, had inſinuated himſelf into his family, under the name of Francis Guyer, ſon to a martyr for the reformed religion. He had always the Huguenot pſalms in his hands, and was a conſtant frequenter of ſermons, in order to conceal his deſigns. By this means he was truſted by the Prince and ſent upon ſeveral diſpatches. At the time of the murder, he was come for a paſſport to go where the Prince had ordered him, and finding a fit opportunity ſhot him with a piſtol loaded with three balls, of which he inſtantly died, with theſe words in his mouth, 'Lord have mercy on my ſoul, and the poor people.' Thus died the founder of the Republic of the united Provinces, who (ſays Maurier) made more noiſe in Europe, than all the Kings of his time put together. Count Maurice his ſon erected for him at Delft, a marble monument, not inferior to the moſt ſtately tombs in Italy. His murderer who is ranked among the martyrs by the Catholics, ſuffered in the 27th year of his age his puniſhment with incredible conſtancy, his right arm was burnt to the ſtump, and the fleſh of the muſculous parts of his body torn off with hot-irons, without his expreſſing the leaſt ſign of pain. An inſtance of the ſtrange effects of enthuſiaſm and ſuperſtition!

the States of Holland, at the inſtigation of Cromwel, who dreaded the advancement of a prince ſo nearly related to the Stuarts, excluded him and his deſcendants from the dignities enjoyed by his anceſtors; and afterwards to bar him from all hopes of ever being Stadtholder, that office, by the perpetual edict, was entirely aboliſhed, and the perſon choſen admiral or captain-general was to renounce it by a ſolemn oath, though offered him by the provinces themſelves. The French king, mortal enemy of his family, ſeized the principality of Orange, and demoliſhed the ſtrong citadel built by prince Maurice at a great expence. Such were the diſadvantages the young prince had to ſtruggle with, and which, contrary to all appearance, he lived to ſurmount. Though his education, among his other misfortunes, had been much neglected, the governor impoſed upon him ſcarce affording him a tutor of any tolerable learning or knowledge of the world, yet he ſoon became maſter of thoſe parts of mathematics which related to the military art; and learnt to ſpeak Engliſh, French, and High Dutch, almoſt as fluently as his own tongue. As he advanced in years, notwithſtanding the ſtrong oppoſition of the contrary party, his friends increaſed, and particularly among the clergy and populace. The firſt turn in his favour was his being choſen chief nobleman of Zealand, after which he was introduced into the council of ſtate. He paid a viſit to his uncle king Charles II, in hopes of recovering the money which his father had ſupplied him with in his diſtreſs, and to ſee what offices the king would do towards his advancement to the ſtadtholderſhip, but inſtead of receiving any ſatisfaction in theſe points, he only diſcovered the king's inclination to popery [c]. However, what his uncle would not aſſiſt him in, was obtained by his friends at home. It was propoſed in ſo many places, that he ſhould have the ſupreme command of the fleet and armies, that de Wit, who dreaded the name of ſtadtholder, and had been author of the perpetual edict, was no longer able to oppoſe the torrent. And the prince was declared admiral and captain-general, though by de Wit's management, it was done with ſuch limitations as were not eaſy to digeſt. The hardeſt condition was, that he ſhould bind himſelf by oath never to aſpire to the office of ſtadtholder, nor accept it even though it ſhould be offered. But when the war broke out with France in conjunction with England, and the French like a flood over-ran the United Provinces, all theſe limitations quickly vaniſhed, the oath was diſpenſed with, the perpetual edict revoked, de Wit and his brother torn in pieces by the mob, and the prince reſtored to the dignity of ſtadtholder with full power, for the time, of peace and war, and not long after, the ſame dignity, from which he and his heirs had been excluded for ever, was made hereditary in his family, and ſettled upon him and his iſſue-male. This turn, however great, was no more than what he had deſerved. He had made a ſtand againſt France, when his country was on the brink of deſtruction; and in leſs than two years, had entirely changed the face of affairs. He had not only retaken Narden, but boldly marched up the Rhine, and ſeized Bonne, by which means he had cut off the ſupplies ſent down by the French to their garriſons on the Rhine and the Iſſel, and opened a paſſage for the Germans into Flanders, which gave ſuch a diverſion to the progreſs of the French, that they abandoned the three provinces they were poſſeſſed of, in leſs time than they had conquered them. An alliance was alſo made with the emperor, and a peace with the elector of Cologn and the biſhop of Munſter; after which a ſeparate treaty was concluded with the king of England, whoſe mediation was accepted by France. But as that mediation was run out to a great length, the prince, whoſe governing paſſion was the depreſſion of France, attacked the whole French army, commanded by the prince of Condé, and fought the famous battle of Seneffe, wherein he juſtly gained the eſteem of all the world, and of Condé in particular, for his conduct and courage [d]. This change of the affairs of the ſtates had acquired the prince of Orange the affections of the people, to ſuch a degree, that he could have obtained whatever he deſired, and even the loſs of ſo important a place as Maeſtricht was not at all charged to him [e]. Indeed, it appears in the whole courſe of this war, that the prince of Orange, even while ſo young and ſo little practiſed in affairs, had ſo clear and ſo juſt a view of them, that nothing could miſguide him, and that the bad proſpect he had from the ill condition of affairs, did not frighten him to accept of any mean or baſe conditions of peace. His fidelity to his country and the public intereſt, was ſo firm that no private conſideration of his own could bias him, or indeed be much conſidered by him [f].

During the negotiations of Nimeguen, under the mediation of England, the prince came over, and by the management of the earl of Danby, and ſir William Temple, his marriage with the princeſs Mary, eldeſt daughter of his uncle the duke of York, was concluded to the univerſal ſatisfaction of the proteſtant party, both at home and abroad; but to the great ſurpriſe and concern of the French king, who declared the duke had given his daughter to the "greateſt enemy he had in the world [g]." From this time the prince of Orange was looked upon as the head of the proteſtant intereſt in Europe, and the greateſt check to the overgrowing power of France, which he deſired to ſee well bounded, but not deſtroyed. Having married the preſumptive heir to the crown of England, the eyes of the Engliſh were continually upon his proceedings, as were his upon their affairs, and upon the various ſteps of his two royal uncles. Though little application was made to him, during the reſt of king Charles's reign, yet he found that neither he nor his princeſs were forgot by the parliament, in the great ſtruggle about the ex-

[c] The king (ſays Burnet) gave him good words only, and tried him in point of religion. 'He ſpoke of all the Proteſtants, as of a factious body broken among themſelves, ever ſince they had broken off from the main body, and wiſhed the Prince would take more pains, and look into thoſe things better, and not be led by his Dutch blockheads.' The prince told this to Zuyleſtein, his natural uncle, but never ſpoke of it to any other perſon till after the king's death, though he carried it always in his own mind, and could not hinder himſelf from judging of all the king's intentions after that, from the diſcovery he had then made of his ſentiments. Nor did he, upon his not complying with that propoſition, expect any real aſſiſtance from the king, but general interceſſions, which ſignified nothing, and which indeed was all he obtained. The prince was about twenty at the time of this viſit.

[d] Condé's teſtimony of the prince was, that he had acted like an old captain in all, but only in venturing himſelf too much like a young man. For which very thing that old general himſelf was remarkable in that day's action. In the beginning of the battle the French had the advantage; but Condé puſhed it too far, and the prince of Orange engaged the whole army with ſo much bravery, that it appeared, the Dutch army was now brought to another ſtate than he had found it in. He charged himſelf in ſo many places with too great a neglect of his perſon, conſidering how much depended upon it. He was once engaged among a body of French, thinking them his own men, and bid them charge: They told him they had no more powder. He, perceiving his miſtake, with great preſence of mind, got out of their hands, and brought up a body of his army to charge them, who quickly routed them. The action in the afternoon recovered the loſs that was made in the morning, and poſſeſſed every one with a high eſteem of the prince of Orange. The emperor's general Zoüch, behaved ſo ill, that the prince told his ſon at night, that his father had acted ſo baſely, that, if it had not been for the reſpect he bore the emperor, he would have ſhot him through the head. By this and ſome other accidents, the battle was not deciſive, the loſſes being equal, between ſix and ſeven thouſand on each ſide.

[e] After the battle of Seneffe, the prince in two enterprizes was unſucceſsful. He beſieged Maeſtricht, the only town of the Dutch provinces, then remaining in the hands of the French, but after two months endeavours to take it, Schomberg, (who in the mean time had beſieged and taken Aire) marched an army through the heart of the Spaniſh Netherlands, and unexpectedly came to the relief of the town. At his approach, the prince, whoſe army was weakened by ſickneſs and duty, was forced to retire. For this, it is ſaid, he never heartily forgave Schomberg, though he made uſe of his counſels and experience afterwards in the expedition into England, and the reduction of Ireland. At the battle of Montcaſſel againſt the duke of Orleans, reinforced by Luxemburg, after a ſharp diſpute, the firſt regiment of Dutch infantry began to break. The prince rallied them ſeveral times, but at laſt was borne down by the flight of his men, whom he was forced to reſiſt like enemies. He fell in among them with ſword in hand, and cutting the firſt croſs the face, cried aloud, "Raſcal! I'll ſet a mark on thee at leaſt, that I may hang thee afterwards." The prince was carried by the torrent of the run-aways, to the reſt of his troops, which yet made a ſtand; and with theſe he made a retreat that came little ſhort of a victory. He alſo offered battle to the king of France when before Bouchain, which was refuſed.

[f] Of this there are many inſtances. When, to allure him to a dependence on France and England, all the offers were made him, that could be of honour and advantage to his perſon and family, (particularly the propoſal of making him ſovereign of the united provinces, under the protection of England and France, at a time too, when ſo little of the provinces was left, and what remained in ſo imminent danger) he always anſwered with great firmneſs, "He would never betray a truſt repoſed in him, nor ever ſell the liberty of that country, which his anceſtors had ſo long defended." And when the duke of Buckingham preſſed him much on the ſame head, and often ſaid to him; "Do not you ſee your country is loſt?" He replied, I do ſee indeed it is in great danger; but there is a ſure way never to ſee it loſt, and that is, to die in the laſt ditch." Temple's Memoirs. Burnet.

[g] Letters were ſent to the king of France, from the king, the duke, and alſo from the prince; who had no mind to this piece of courtſhip, but was obliged to it by his uncle. The king aſſured Lewis, that he had made the match on deſign to engage the prince, to be more tractable in the treaty, that was now on foot at Nimeguen. Montague, the Engliſh embaſſador being called over ſoon after this for new inſtructions, Danby aſked him, "how the king of France, received the news of the marriage?" He anſwered "as he would have done the loſs of an army, and ſpoke very hardly to the duke, for not acquainting him with it." Danby anſwered, "he wronged him, for he did not know it an hour before it was publiſhed, and the king himſelf not above two hours." This was a maſter-piece in the earl of Danby, who ſince he was duke of Leeds, has declared in print "That he will not ſuffer that part of his ſervice to be buried in oblivion." For this the duke never forgave him. It muſt be obſerved, that notwithſtanding all this, ſir William Temple, makes himſelf the ſole agent in the ſucceſs of this affair, though according to the account, which the duke of Montague told biſhop Burnet, ſir William Temple was not preſent, when the king was perſuaded to conſent to it, when the duke was ſent for by the king, when the prince came to them and the lord treaſurer, and when the princeſs was given to him. What makes this the more probable, is, that Montague, was known to be no friend to the lord Danby, and yet does this juſtice to him. See Burnet, I. p. 409.

After

cluſion of the duke of York, his father-in-law; upon whoſe death it was intended, that they ſhould fill the throne.

Though neither this marriage, nor any other motive could prevail with the prince to abandon the allies, and make a ſeparate peace with France; yet at length the French found means to accompliſh their ends. They ſuddenly attacked the Spaniſh Netherlands, and taking Ghent and Ypres, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Dutch, that the ſtates reſolved on a peace at any rate, and the treaty at Nimeguen, after ſeveral years negotiations, was at laſt finiſhed, according to the terms preſcribed by France; though ſtrongly proteſted againſt by Denmark, Brandenberg and Munſter [h]. This was followed by a treaty between France and Spain, and another between the emperor and France, and thus the peace became general, though not at all agreeable to the prince of Orange's plan, who had all along inſiſted upon the enlargement of a frontier on both ſides of Flanders; without which, France, he affirmed would end this war only with a proſpect of beginning another with greater advantage, after breaking the preſent confederacy. What the prince foretold was ſoon verified. For the French quickly began their encroachments, and claimed whole provinces, by way of dependencies upon their new conqueſts, granted them by the late treaty [i]. Not content with this, they ſurpriſe Courtray and Dixmude, and lay ſiege to Luxemburg. The prince of Orange, ever ready to aſſert the liberties of Europe, came forth from his retirement where he had lived ſince the concluſion of the peace, and projected an alliance againſt France. Accordingly the league of Auſtria was formed, wherein were engaged the emperor, Sweden, the States of Holland, circle of Franconia, and ſome of the Imperial Cities. But the French, after the taking of Luxemburg, (which the prince of Orange, with a ſmall army in vain endeavoured to relieve) having obtained their ends, propoſed a truce for twenty years; which was agreed upon by a treaty ſigned at the Hague.

The king of France now at peace with all his neighbours, and in ſtrict alliance with king James, (who had ſucceeded his brother king Charles II,) reſolved to extirpate the reformed religion in his dominions. He began with letting looſe his dragoons, to live upon the huguenots at diſcretion. They were under no reſtraint, but from rapes and murder. This was followed by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, which proſcribed two millions of reformed, and drove above two hundred thouſand into foreign countries, for refuge, leaving thoſe that remained to the mercy of an enraged clergy, to the barbarity of the intendants, and other officers (who on this occaſion ſeemed to have thrown off the common impreſſions of humanity) and to the cruelty of the dragoons. The principality of Orange, (then in poſſeſſion of the prince of Orange by the treaty of Nimeguen) was not only dragooned, but out of enmity to the owner, ſeized by the king of France, and united to the reſt of Provence; and all its rights, as a diſtinct principality, were ſuppreſſed. Whilſt hereſy was thus extirpating at home, the French king declares war againſt the pope, ſeizes Avignon, and ſends Lavardin to Rome, to brave his holineſs at his ſee. The regale [k] gave the firſt riſe to this quarrel, the Franchiſes [l] inflamed it, and the pope's inclination for the emperor carried his moſt chriſtian majeſty's indignation to extremity. By being thus employed, the king of France, except in the affair of Orange, had not yet openly violated the peace of Nimeguen, or the twenty years truce. But at length he pulls off the maſk, and whilſt the emperor, relying on the late truce, was carrying on his wars in Hungary, privately aſſiſts Tekely and his party with money, and by his agents encourages the grand ſeignor to continue the war, with the promiſe of a powerful diverſion. This diverſion was accordingly made by the ſudden irruption of the French into Germany. Philipſburg, Spires and Worms were taken, and theſe conqueſts were followed by thoſe of Frankendal and Manheim, and with the deſolation of the Palatinate. They drained, plundered, deſtroyed ſeveral cities of the empire, burnt the palaces of the princes, pillaged the churches and committed a thouſand inſtances of an inhumanity more than barbarian. A manifeſto was publiſhed by France againſt the emperor, which, by all who had conſidered the rights of peace and laws of war, was looked upon as one of the moſt avowed and ſolemn declarations, that ever was made of the perfidiouſneſs of the French king, who ſeemed plainly to intimate, that he thought himſelf tied by no peace, but might, upon any ſuſpicion of his neighbours, begin a war when he pleaſed. Hence may be dated the beginning of the great war, which laſted till the peace of Ryſwick.

To this height of power and inſolence was the French monarchy grown, and Lewis le Grand [m] ſeemed as it were reſolved to give law to all Europe. He had uſurped an abſolute power over the eſtates, perſons, and conſciences of his ſubjects, and had a mind to extend it alſo over his neighbours and enemies. And indeed, what but the revolution in England could poſſibly have ſtopped the progreſs of his deſigns, ſupported as he was by his alliance with England? Whether this invaſion of Germany, in open violation of the treaty of Nimeguen, was to break the meaſures of the prince of Orange, and hinder his expedition into England, or to perform his promiſe to the Turk, or to oblige the empire and eſpecially the emperor to convert the twenty years truce into a treaty of peace, which might hinder Germany from leaguing with Holland, and the prince of Orange, or whatever other deſign the French king might have, it ſerved only to render him more odious to the empire and haſten the alliance againſt him; and was ſo far from retarding, that it promoted, the prince of Orange's expedition. Since by marching his troops towards the upper Rhine, the French king had made it impracticable to tranſport an army into England, or to ſend a ſufficient force into Cologn, to alarm the Dutch. It is true, he never imagined, that an expedition which ſeemed almoſt deſperate, could have ſucceeded in ſo ſudden and ſurprizing a manner. He expected, and in all appearance very juſtly, that king James would have been able to make a great diviſion in the nation, and that the kingdom would have been deeply involved in a civil war. And therefore, he was [h] After the orders for ſigning the treaty were ſent, the prince of Orange, by whom the peace was by no means approved, marched and attacked the duke of Luxemburg, before Mons; and notwithſtanding his advantageous ſituation, beat him from ſeveral poſts. This action happened four days after the treaty was ſigned, but the prince having no intimation of it, nor orders to ſtop, thought he might take all advantages; as wiſhing rather than fearing to embroil matters. But the French were ſo tired of the war, that no notice was taken of this buſineſs, which an officer in the French army eſteemed 'the only heroic action that had been done in the whole courſe of the war.' The prince having the next day, received an account of the peace, communicated the ſame to Luxemburg, who deſired an interview with the prince; which being agreed to, they met in the field at the head of their chief officers. Many civilities paſſed, and there was great curioſity in the French, to ſee a young prince, who had made ſuch a noiſe in the world, and who the day before, had given life and vigour to ſo deſperate an action as this battle of St. Dennis was univerſally deemed. It was believed by many, that the marquis De Grana, the Spaniſh general intercepted the pacquets from Nimeguen, till the action was over; for Spain did not like the peace. During the battle, as the prince was engaged among the thickeſt of the enemies, a French captain was juſt going to fire a piſtol at him, when M. D'Auverquerque interpoſed and ſhot the Frenchman dead. The earl of Oſſory ſignalized himſelf in this battle, with the Engliſh and Scots under his command.

[i] It was pretended that in time of old, Alſatia, Lorain, the counties of Chiney, Arlon, Vierton, St. Armond, all Luxemburg (except the city of that name) divers villages and ſeignories in Germany, Flanders, Brabant, Hagueneau and the country of Liege, did of juſt right belong to the king of France, as dependencies upon the Biſhopries of Metz, Toul and Verdun, or upon the places yielded to him by the treaty of Nimeguen. In purſuance whereof, were erected in France, two tribunals of juſtice, one at Metz, and the other at Briſac, by the names of the Chambers of Re-unions, where the inhabitants and lords of all the forementioned places were cited to appear, and make their ſubmiſſion to the king of France, and in caſe of refuſal were condemned for contumacy. Under ſuch pretenſions it was, that Straſburgh was ſeized and Luxemburg beſieged, becauſe the Spaniards would not yield up ſeveral places in Flanders, which were thus claimed. The king of Spain, upon this occaſion, proclaimed war againſt France; but as the prince of Orange could not prevail with the States to give him timely aſſiſtance, he was forced to ſubmit.

[k] The regale is a right, which the king of France has to enjoy the revenues of biſhoprics and archbiſhoprics, and vacant ſees; till the biſhop and archbiſhop has taken the oath of fidelity to the king, and the oath be regiſtred in the Chamber of accounts at Paris. The king alſo during the vacancy of a ſee, nominates to all the prebendaries and other dignities, and to whatever benefices are in the gift of the biſhops and archbiſhops, except cures of pariſhes.

[l] In Rome, all thoſe of a nation put themſelves under the protection of the embaſſador, and were uſually lodged in his neighbourhood; pretending that they belonged to him. So they exempted themſelves from the orders and juſtice of Rome, as part of the embaſſador's family. The extent of houſes or ſtreets in which they lodged was called the Franchiſes, which were become ſo great a part of the city, that the privileges of thoſe, that lived in them, were daily giving diſturbances to the courſe of juſtice, and were the common ſanctuaries of criminals. The pope reſolved to reduce the privileges of embaſſadors, to their own families within their own palaces. He began with the emperor's and the king of Spain's embaſſadors, who quitted their pretenſions to the Franchiſes, provided the French did the ſame. So the pope ſaid, as his nuntio at Paris had no privilege but for his family, he was reſolved the French ſhould have no more at Rome. This was rejected by the French, with great ſcorn; and the quarrel roſe ſo high, that France and Rome ſeemed to be in a ſtate of war. Laverdin was ſent embaſſador to Rome, and the pope refuſing to ſee him unleſs he would renounce the Franchiſes, he entered Rome in a hoſtile manner with ſome troops of horſe, though not in the form of troops, kept guard in the Franchiſes, and affronted the pope's authority on all occaſions. The pope in revenge, not only refuſed to confirm the election of a coadjutor to Cologn, by which means it became void by the death of the elector; but afterwards he got prince Clement's election to Cologn judged in his favour, againſt cardinal Furſtenberg ſet up by France. Thus by affronting the pope the French king's deſign which he had been long purſuing was defeated, otherwiſe the expedition to England would not have been ſo ſafe for Holland, nor could it have been propoſed eaſily to the States.

[m] After the king of France's return from his expedition in 1672, a ſolemn debate was held at Paris, what title ſhould be given him. Le Grand was thought too common. Some were for Invincible. Others for Le Conquerant. Some, in imitation of Charlemagne, for Lewis le Magne; others for Maximus: but as Tres-Grand or Maxime did not ſound ſo well, Le Grand was pitched upon at laſt.

the leſs concerned that his offer of troops was refuſed by king James, and the more eaſily induced to proſecute his deſigns that winter in Germany, not at all doubting but he ſhould come in good time the next ſummer to king James's aſſiſtance, who would then, he thought, be forced to receive aid from France on any terms. But to his great diſappointment as well as mortification, he ſaw the revolution compleated, without any effuſion of blood, and a prince advanced to the throne of England, that was reſolutely bent to check, to the utmoſt of his power, the progreſs of his ambitious deſigns.

In proportion as France grew every day more powerful, Spain on the contrary daily declined; and under the reign of an infirm king ſeemed like him, to be without ſtrength or life. The council of Madrid uſed their utmoſt endeavours to ſupport the ſinking ſtate, but when the head is dying, the reſt of the members ſtrive in vain to uphold the body. It was to no purpoſe, that able miniſters were employed in foreign courts, and able governors in the provinces; France had always the aſcendant. The marquiſſes of Grana and Caſtanaga, ſucceſſive governors of the Spaniſh Netherlands, were good generals, as well as good politicians. They had their agents at king James's court, and themſelves negotiated in Flanders, with all poſſible zeal and capacity. Ronquillo, his catholic majeſty's embaſſador at London, who is ſaid to know the Engliſh genius and conſtitution, ſtrenuouſly backed their endeavours and uſed all poſſible arguments to draw off king James from France; and, if that king's hiſtorian is to be credited, he went ſo far, as to offer to aſſiſt him, in obliging the parliament to approve of his meaſures, provided he would but accede to the league of Auſtria, which ſhews at leaſt, the ſincere deſire of Spain, to engage him to break with the French king. But as troops were wanted and there was no money to raiſe new levies, or to pay thoſe already on foot, France, well acquainted with the wants and weakneſs of Spain, and ſecure of England, during the reign of James II, was preparing in concert with him for the invaſion of Holland, and the Spaniſh Netherlands. Nothing therefore could happen more fortunately for Spain, than the revolution in England; without which in all appearance the loſs of the Netherlands would have been unavoidable.

The United Provinces ſaw with terror the progreſs of the French arms, and their encroachments on the Netherlands, ſince the concluſion of the peace of Nimeguen. They were greatly alarmed when they found that the taking of Luxemburg by the French king was connived at by king James, but when they diſcovered the private alliance between the two monarchs, they plainly perceived their deſtruction was inevitable, unleſs timely prevented. Wherefore, as ſoon as their Stadtholder had ſecured the elector of Brandenburgh in his intereſt, and concerted meaſures with Cologn, Heſſe and Luxemburg, for a ſupply of troops if required, in the room of thoſe he ſhould take with him, they readily furniſhed an army and fleet for an expedition, on the ſucceſs whereof their ſafety ſo viſibly depended, and which, however dangerous it appeared, was the only means to ſave them from ruin. So great reaſon had the United Provinces to rejoice at a revolution which freed them from ſuch dreadful apprehenſions, and would be a ſtrong bulwark for the future againſt the common enemy of Europe.

King William, was thirty-eight years of age, when the revolution took place, ſeventeen of which had been ſpent in a conſtant oppoſition of the pernicious ſcheme, (formed by Richlieu and purſued by Mazarin) of making France the ſeat of univerſal empire, and of enſlaving all Europe. Lewis le Grand had made ſuch a progreſs in this ſcheme, that it would probably have ſucceeded had it not been for the great checks it received from king William, while prince of Orange. As that prince had made the humbling of France, the great buſineſs of his life before the revolution, ſo after his advancement to the Britiſh throne, we ſhall ſee him ſtill vigorouſly proſecuting the ſame deſign, in a thorough belief that it was the ſole means of preſerving the Proteſtant religion, and the liberties of Chriſtendom. But firſt we ſhall ſee him earneſtly endeavouring to finiſh and complete the new ſettlement in church and ſtate in the beſt manner he could, amidſt the oppoſition of thoſe who thro' principle, prejudice, party, or diſappointment clogged all his meaſures. We ſhall ſee him purſue the abdicated king into Ireland, and oblige him to retire once more into France, and that kingdom to return to the obedience of the crown of England. We ſhall ſee him eſcape from the plots and conſpiracies of his enemies at home, and abroad. We ſhall ſee him declared generaliſſimo of the confederate armies, expoſing himſelf to great perils, in voyages and battles; and croſſing the ſeas whenever his preſence was neceſſary at the head of the armies, or at the public aſſemblies in Holland and Germany. We ſhall ſee him exerting all his courage and ſtrength, to humble the pride of France, under the greateſt difficulties. Spain quite exhauſted will aſſiſt him but feebly, whilſt the forces of Holland are employed in defence of the Spaniſh Netherlands. The emperor attacked by the Turks, and the Hungarian malecontents will ſend but weak armies on the Rhine, and the princes of the empire, will be either ſo ſlow, or ſo disjointed, that their aſſiſtance will be inconſiderable. We ſhall ſee king William by his ability, conſtancy and reſolution, ſurmount all theſe difficulties, and make head againſt an enemy ſuperior to him in the number of his troops, and more ſo, in the union of his generals; till Lewis, apprehenſive of being obſtructed in his grand, tho' as yet ſecret deſign upon Spain, gladly conſents to a peace, concluded at Ryſwick in 1697.

Theſe in general are the events of the firſt nine years of king William's reign; throughout which his moderation and clemency, his wiſdom and valour, were equally conſpicuous. And what is very uncommon, he brought with all his virtues, not one vice to the throne [n]. He was addicted neither to wine, nor women; nor did irreligion or pride, make any part of his character. It is true, he had ſome failings which were an allay to his virtues. He was ſo intent upon the war, and the humbling of France, which he thought abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety of Europe, that he was not ſo careful of his government as he ſhould have been. The diſguſt this raiſed, being improved by men of ill deſigns, ſo perplexed his affairs, that he could hardly ſupport himſelf at home; whilſt he was the admiration of all abroad. He was alſo of ſo reſerved and ſilent a temper, (which had been heightened by his education, when all his words and actions were narrowly watched,) that it made him averſe to talking and company, and very hard of acceſs. This was by no means agreeable to the Engliſh nation, and therefore many endeavoured to purſuade him to be more viſible, open and communicative. He ſeemed reſolved to follow their advice, but his ill ſtate of health, increaſed by his long ſtay at St. James's, without his uſual exerciſe of hunting, of which he was very fond, made him give way to his natural diſpoſition; and he became rather more retired and leſs acceſſible than before. In a few days after he was placed on the throne, he went to Hampton-Court, from whence he came to town only on council-days. So that the face, gaiety and diverſions of a court diſappeared, which gave great diſcontent. The queen, who was affable and lively, endeavoured by a great vivacity and chearfulneſs to ſupply what was wanting in the king, but when ſhe was found not to meddle in buſineſs, though all were pleaſed with her, yet few came to make their court to her, as but few found their account in it.

King William's firſt care after his advancement to the throne, was to ſettle a privy-council [o], and appoint a miniſtry. The earl of Danby, created marquis of Carmarthen, was made preſident of the council. He had, by his accompliſhing the king's marriage with the queen, and heartily concurring in the revolution from the very beginning, atoned in ſome meaſure for his proceedings under Charles II. He is ſaid to have puſhed for the treaſurer's ſtaff, a poſt he had formerly enjoyed, but was refuſed by the king, who was reſolved the treaſury ſhould be in the hands of commiſſioners [p].

[n] Biſhop Burnet ſays indeed, he had no vice but of one ſort, in which he was very cautious and ſecret. What this vice was, he has left the world to gueſs, by which means, the worſt ſort of vice is, at leaſt by his enemies, fixed upon him, though in expreſs contradiction to the religious character given of him by the ſame biſhop after his death, and which the reader may ſee at the end of his reign.

[o] The names of the privy-councillors were as follows; his royal highneſs George prince of Denmark, William Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, Henry Compton biſhop of London, Henry duke of Norfolk, Charles marquis of Wincheſter, George marquis of Halifax, Thomas earl of Danby, Robert earl of Lindſey, Aubery earl of Oxford, Charles earl of Shrewsbury, Charles earl of Dorſet and Middleſex, William earl of Bedford, John earl of Bath, Charles earl of Macclesfield, Daniel earl of Nottingham, Thomas viſcount Falconberg, Charles viſcount Mordaunt, Francis viſcount Newport, Richard viſcount Lumly, Philip lord Wharton, Ralph lord Montagu, Henry lord Delamere, John lord Churchill, Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Henry Sidney, ſir Robert Howard, knt. ſir Henry Capel, knt. Mr. Henry Powle, Mr. Edward Ruſſel, Mr. Hugh Boſcawen, and Mr. Richard Hampden, to whom were added on the twentieth of February, Thomas Wharton, eſq; and ſir John Lowther, of Lowther-hall, bart.

[p] Sir John Rereſby, bart. ſays, that he certainly had been in hopes of being advanced to the office of lord treaſurer; but being diſappointed in this, he was obliged to take up with the poſt of preſident of the council, which was of great honour and credit, though very ſmall profit. However, his lordſhip had not been above a fortnight in his poſt, "before I found him, (ſays ſir John) extremely cooled with regard to affairs, as then managed. He ſaid, that being embarked with his all, he was ſorry ſo ſee things no better conducted: That Ireland was in a manner become invincible, by our neglect of ſending forces thither before now. That with regard to this, and other material points, equally unheeded, he had been preſſing the king to a degree even of incivility. That he had told his majeſty, he plainly ſaw, he did all he could to encourage the preſbyterians, and to diſhearten the church,

DANIEL EARL OF NOTTINGHAM.

G. Kneller Pinx.t Gelder Sculp.t

In the possession of the Countess Dowager of Nottingham.

Published as the Act directs Nov.r 27. 1784.

The privy ſeal was given to lord Halifax, who for zealouſly promoting all the ſteps that were lately made for the king, was hated by the tories, and for his oppoſition to the bill of excluſion, was not beloved by the whigs. The affair of ſurrendering up the charters, and the remiſſneſs in relieving of Ireland, were alſo charged on him. He had for ſome time great credit with the king, but lord Carmarthen not being able to bear the equality, or rather preference that ſeemed to be given him, brought on a ſtorm that quickly fell on him. The earl of Devonſhire was made lord ſteward of the houſhold, and the earl of Dorſet, lord chamberlain. As they were both whigs, the houſhold was made up of ſuch, except where there were buyers for places, which were ſet to ſale. And though the king ſeemed to diſcourage ſuch practices, yet he did not encourage propoſals for detecting them. Mr. Bentinck, afterwards earl of Portland, was made groom of the ſtole and privy purſe. He continued for ten years, to be entirely truſted by the king, and ſerved him with great fidelity and obſequiouſneſs, but never could bring himſelf to be acceptable to the Engliſh nation [q]. Mr. Sidney, made firſt lord Sidney, and then earl of Rumney, was made one of the gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber, and afterwards ſecretary of ſtate, lord lieutenant of Ireland, and in other great poſts. The king's chief perſonal favour lay between Bentinck and him. He was brother to the earl of Leiceſter, and to Algernon Sidney, beheaded by king James. He was the man who had the ſecret of all the correſpondence, that was before the revolution, between the prince of Orange and his party in England, and the conduct of that whole affair was, by the prince's own order, chiefly depoſited in his hands. He was a graceful man, and had lived long at court, where he had ſome adventures that became very public. He was a perſon of a ſweet and careſſing temper, had no malice in his heart, but too great a love of pleaſure. He had been ſent envoy to Holland in the year 1679, where he entered into ſuch particular confidences with the prince, that he had the higheſt meaſure of his truſt and favour, that any Engliſhman ever had. Marſhal Schomberg was made maſter of the ordnance. He had been of great ſervice to the king in his expedition into England, and the king had been very earneſtly preſſed to bring him over with him, both becauſe of the great reputation he was in, and becauſe it was thought to be a ſecurity for the king's perſon, and to the whole deſign, to have another general with him, to whom all would ſubmit in caſe of any accident [r].

The earl of Shrewſbury was declared ſecretary of ſtate, and had the greateſt ſhare of the king's confidence. He had been educated a papiſt, but had renounced that religion upon a very critical and anxious inquiry into matters of controverſy. Some thought, that though he had forſaken popery, he was too ſceptical, and too little fixed in the principles of religion. However, he ſeemed to be a man of great probity, and to have a high ſenſe of honour. He had no ordinary meaſure of learning, a correct judgment, with a ſweetneſs of temper, that charmed all who knew him. He had ſo great a command of himſelf, that during all the time he continued in the miniſtry, no perſon was heard to complain of him, except for his ſilent and reſerved anſwers, with which his friends were not always well pleaſed. His modeſt deportment gave him ſuch an intereſt in the king, that ne never ſeemed ſo fond of any of his miniſters as he was of him. His method was only to lay in general the ſtate of affairs before his majeſty, without preſſing too much.

It was for ſome time under conſideration who ſhould be the other ſecretary; at laſt the earl of Nottingham was pitched upon for that poſt. He had ſtood at a great diſtance from the court all king James's reign, and though a privy-councillor, never went to the board. When the prince of Orange's coming over was propoſed to him, he firſt agreed to it, but afterwards refuſed to proceed any farther. However he declared, that though his principles reſtrained him ſo that he could not go on, his affection would make him wiſh well to the cauſe, and would be ſo far a criminal as concealment could make him. Accordingly he oppoſed the ſettlement with great earneſtneſs; but always ſaid, that though he would not make a king, yet, upon his principles, he could obey him when made, better than thoſe, who were ſo much for making one. The tories apprehended, that the oppoſition which they had given to the king's advancement, and the zeal, that the whigs had ſhewn for it, would alienate him from them, and throw him into the others hands, from whom they could expect no favour, but ſevere returns for the hardſhips they had put on the whigs, the latter end of king Charles II's reign. Theſe apprehenſions grew daily amongſt that party, and made them begin to look back towards king James. It was therefore thought adviſable, in order to avoid exaſperating ſo large a body, to employ the earl of Nottingham. The great increaſe of buſineſs in chancery having led many to apprehend that it was too much to be truſted with one perſon, it was reſolved to put that court into commiſſion, and the earl was propoſed to be the firſt in the commiſſion, but he refuſed it, and accepted of the place of ſecretary of ſtate. This gave as much ſatisfaction to the tories, as it begot diſtruſt in the whigs. The tories hoped for protection and favour by his means; they reckoned that he would infuſe all the prerogative notions into the king, and give him ſuch a jealouſy of every ſtep, that the whigs ſhould make in their prejudice, that from thence his majeſty would ſee cauſe to ſuſpect all the ſhew of kindneſs, that they might put on towards him, when at the ſame time they were undermining ſome of thoſe prerogatives, for which the earl ſeemed to be ſo zealous. This had a great effect on the king, who being ignorant of the conſtitution, and naturally cautious, ſaw reaſon enough to diſlike the heat he found among thoſe who expreſſed much zeal for him, but who appeared, at the ſame time, to have it with a great mixture of republican principles. They on the other hand, were much offended at the employing the earl; "and he gave them daily cauſe to be more diſpleaſed at it; for he ſet himſelf with a moſt eager partiality againſt the whole party, and againſt all the motions made by them; and he ſtudied to poſſeſs the king with a very bad opinion of them. And whereas ſecreta-church, which could not but be abſolutely prejudicial both to himſelf and the government; though he, at the ſame time, obſerved, that his majeſty intertered but little in councils, being prevented therefrom, partly by inclination, and partly by want of health. Indeed the king looked but ill, and the difficulty he laboured under in ſwallowing, ſeemed to foretel him a man of ſhort continuance in the world. His lordſhip further told me, that he had been appointed preſident of the council quite againſt his will, after the king had declared he could not give him the ſtaff of treaſurer, determined, as he was, that the treaſury ſhould be in the hands of commiſſioners. That he had been offered to be ſecretary of ſtate and preſident both at the ſame time; and that he had declined the firſt. That all he aſked of the king for himſelf was a patent, to which he had a right by a former grant; and that he would alſo be pleaſed to gratify ſome gentlemen, who had, upon the revolution, joined him in the north. In fine, that the king had told him, it would be by no means for his intereſt to be out of all buſineſs; and that he had, in a manner, forced the preſidentſhip upon him. His lordſhip expreſſed himſelf doubtful of the continuance of affairs, as they now ſtood; and informed me, that king James had ſent down to him in the north, offering to throw himſelf into his hands before he went away. To this, he ſaid, his anſwer was by Charles Bertie, who brought the meſſage, that his own force, which he depended upon in the north, was not ſufficient to truſt to; but that if his majeſty would bring a conſiderable party with him, and come without his papiſts, he would ſooner loſe his life than he ſhould ſuffer the leaſt injury. But that the king having no mind to part with his Romans, would not come. His lordſhip then ſaid, that if the king would but quit his papiſts, it might poſſibly not be too late yet for him. He then obſerved, that the duke of Gordon, a papiſt, and governor of Edinburgh caſtle, the only magazine in Scotland, who was lately ready and willing to ſurrender it to any body, now held it out obſtinately for king James; and that the diſcontents in England grew daily greater and greater. He then reflected on lord Halifax, the king, and all about him, as moſt ſtrangely infatuated with notions of their own ſecurity; and particularly animadverted on the laſt mentioned lord, for inſiſting with ſuch violence in a ſpeech of his, that the prince ſhould be intitled legal and rightful king of this realm, (which I ſuppoſe, the lord Halifax did with a view of continuing the old oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and to obviate all ſcruple about taking the new,) ſaying, it was mere nonſenſe; for that had the prince of Wales been made king, he could never have been deemed our lawful ſovereign, while his father lived.——But his lordſhip nevertheleſs appeared very ſerious and urgent about the legality of taking the new oaths, and condemned the biſhops for their ſqueamiſhneſs in that reſpect, though they themſelves had ſo large a hand in bringing about this great and extraordinary change; and thereupon quoted lord Nottingham's ſpeech, who, in the houſe of lords, had obſerved, that though he had never in the leaſt conſented to this revolution, but had with all his might oppoſed the prince's acceſſion, as contrary to law; yet ſince his highneſs was here, and we muſt owe our protection to him as king de facto, he thought it but juſt and legal to ſwear allegiance to him. I have been the more exact in the particulars of this converſation, to give the better inſight into the thoughts of the greateſt men upon this occaſion; though I wondered his lordſhip would venture to be ſo very undiſguiſed with me; but he was ſure I would not betray him, though even to lord Halifax." See memoirs of ſir John Reresby, laſt governor of York, containing ſeveral remarkable tranſactions from the reſtoration to the revolution, p. 321, &c.

[q] The king's affection to Mr. Bentinck, may be dated from the time of his having the ſmall pox, 1675. Bentinck, then gentleman of his bed-chamber, though he had never had that diſtemper, attended his maſter during the whole courſe of his illneſs, both night and day, for ſixteen days. After which having leave to go home he immediately fell ſick of the ſmall pox, and was in great danger of his life.

[r] The reſt of the houſhold were lord viſcount Newport, treaſurer of the houſhold; Mr. Wharton, comptroller of the houſhold; ſir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain of the houſhold; monſieur D'Auverquerque, maſter of the horſe; the lord Montagu, maſter of the great wardrobe; monſieur Zuyleſtein, maſter of the robes; the biſhop of London, dean of the chapel; the lord Lovelace, captain of the gentlemen penſioners; the duke of Ormond, the earl of Oxford, the lords Mordaunt, Lumley and Churchill, gentlemen of the king's bed-chamber; the earl of Wiltſhire ſon to the marquis of Wincheſter, lord chamberlain to the queen; John Howe eſq; vice-chamberlain; Mr. Villiers, great maſter of the horſe, and the counteſs of Darby, ſiſter to the duke of Ormond, firſt lady of the bed-chamber, and groom of the ſtole to her majeſty.

ries of ſtate have a particular allowance for ſuch ſpies as they employ to procure intelligence, how exact ſoever he might be in procuring foreign intelligence, he ſpared no coſt nor pains to have an account of all that paſſed in the city and in other angry cabals: and he furniſhed the king very copiouſly that way, which made a deep impreſſion on him, and had very bad effects."

The marquis of Halifax having alſo refuſed the offer made to the earl of Nottingham, with reſpect to the chancery, ſir John Maynard was made firſt commiſſioner, and Anthony Keck and William Rawlinſon were knighted, and joined with him.

The treaſury being alſo put in commiſſion, lord Mondaunt afterwards earl of Monmouth, was made firſt commiſſioner. He was the firſt of all the Engliſh nobility that came over to ſee the king when prince of Orange. He was a man of much heat, many notions, and full of diſcourſe. He was brave and generous, but had not true judgment. His thoughts were indigeſted, and his ſecrets were ſoon known. Lord De la Mere, afterwards earl of Warrington, was chancellor of the exchequer. The lord Godolphin[s] was likewiſe brought into the treaſury, to the great grief of the other two, who ſoon ſaw that the king conſidered him more than them both. For as he underſtood the treaſury-buſineſs well, ſo his calm and cold way ſuited the king's temper. Mr. Richard Hampden and ſir Henry Capel were the other commiſſioners. The earls of Monmouth and Warrington, though both ſtaunch whigs, became great enemies. Monmouth generouſly gave the inferior places, but ſought out men of republican principles: and Warrington is ſaid to fell every thing that was in his power[t].

The admiralty was alſo committed to the care of commiſſioners; and admiral Herbert, afterwards earl of Torrington, was firſt in the commiſſion. He was brother to chief juſtice Herbert. Being preſſed by king James, to vote for the repeal of the teſt, he abſolutely refuſed, and choſe rather than comply, to loſe places to the value of four thouſand a year; though his circumſtances were very indifferent[u]. He was a man of great pride, as well as great humour, and ſet a high value on himſelf, and expected the ſame from others. With all this, he had a good underſtanding, and a great reputation for his conduct in ſea affairs. He quitted king James and went over to Holland, and was made lieutenant general and admiral of the Dutch fleet, that brought over the king. There were ſix other commiſſioners named with him[w].

Nothing gave a more general ſatisfaction than the naming of the judges, the king ordered every privy councillor to bring a liſt of twelve, and out of theſe, were choſen twelve very learned and worthy judges. This nomination was generally well received over the nation. The firſt of theſe was ſir John Holt, made lord chief juſtice of England, then a young man for ſo high a poſt, who maintained it during his whole life, with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, courage and great d ſpatch. So that ſince ſir Matthew Hale's time, the king's bench has not been ſo well filled as it was by him[x].

All theſe employments were diſpoſed of at ſeveral times within the ſpace of two months. And as dr. Burnet had been one of the chief promoters of the revolution, ſo he was the firſt eccleſiaſtic, who reaped the fruits of it, having been elected biſhop of Sarum, purſuant to his majeſty's congé d'elire, on the ninth of March, and conſecrated on the thirty-firſt of the ſame month at Fulham, by the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Lincoln, Landaffe, St. Aſaph, and Carliſle, by virtue of a commiſſion from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who refuſed to perform the ceremony himſelf; and three days after the new biſhop was ſworn and admitted chancellor of the order of the garter[y].

In this manner were ſettled the court, the council and the miniſtry. As they chiefly conſiſted of whigs, the tories could not but be diſguſted as well as ſome others who had expected a ſhare in the promotions. Theſe laſt, improving the diſaffection and prejudices of the others, a faction was ſoon formed, which embraced all occaſions to oppoſe and diſtreſs the adminiſtration. How early this oppoſition began, will appear in the proceedings of the convention, which are now going to be related.

The firſt thing that was judged neceſſary to be done was to turn the convention into a parliament. For it had been already ſaid in the houſe of commons; that the convention, not having been called by the king's writs, their acts were not valid. To obviate this objection which might be infuſed into men's minds, and to avoid the uſual delays, occaſioned by the calling of a new parliament, and to preſerve a great number of members that were entirely ſatisfied with the preſent ſettlement, the king, the firſt time he adviſed with his privy-council, propoſed the queſtion to them "whether the convention might be legally turned into a parliament?" As there were ſome in the council, who ſtill adhered to forms, without conſidering the ſtate of things, the council was divided upon the queſtion, but the majority agreeing in the affirmative, the king went to the houſe of lords, in great ſolemnity, and taking poſſeſſion of the throne, made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and Gentlemen,

"I have lately told you, how ſenſible I am of your kindneſs, and how much I value the confidence you have repoſed in me; and I am come hither to aſſure you, that I ſhall never do any thing, that may juſtly leſſen your good opinion of me.

"I think it neceſſary to acquaint you, that the condition of our allies abroad, and particularly that of Holland, is ſuch, that unleſs ſome ſpeedy care be taken of them, they run a greater hazard than you would have them expoſed to.

"You yourſelves muſt be ſenſible, that the poſture of affairs here, requires your ſerious conſideration; and that a good ſettlement at home is neceſſary, not only for your own peace, but for the ſupport of the proteſtant intereſt both here, and abroad. And particularly the ſtate of Ireland is ſuch, that the dangers are grown too great to be obviated by any ſlow methods.

"I muſt leave it to you to conſider of the moſt effectual ways of preventing the inconveniences, which may ariſe by delays, and to judge, what terms may be moſt proper to bring thoſe things to paſs for the good of the nation, which, I am confident, are in all your minds, and which I on my part, ſhall be always ready to promote."

This ſpeech was received with a general applauſe; and purſuant to the laſt clauſe of it, the lords immediately brought in 'a bill to remove and prevent all queſtions and diſputes concerning the aſſembling and ſitting of the preſent parliament:' which was read twice that afternoon, paſſed the [s] He was a younger brother of an antient family in Cornwal, that had been bred about king Charles II. from a page, and was conſidered at the time that the earl of Sunderland, lord Hide, and he managed affairs, as one of the ableſt men belonging to the court. He was the moſt ſilent and modeſt man that was perhaps ever bred in a court. He had a clear apprehenſion, and diſpatched buſineſs with great method, and with ſo much temper, that he had no perſonal enemies. He loved gaming beyond what men of buſineſs uſually do, and gave one reaſon for it, becauſe it delivered him from much talking. He had true principles of religion and virtue, and was free from all vanity, and never heaped up wealth. He had much of the confidence of four ſucceeding kings. He was ſecretary of ſtate in 1684, which he quitted, and was made a baron the ſame year. He was concerned in the ſcheme laid at lady Portſmouth's, by Barillon and lord Sunderland; and was ſent by king James to the prince of Orange at Hungerford.

[u] When king James aſked him to vote for the repeal of the teſt, he anſwered, he could not do it, in honour or conſcience. The king ſaid, he knew he was a man of honour, but the reſt of his life did not look like a man, that had great regard for conſcience; (for he was indeed abandoned to luxury and vice.) He boldly replied, he had his faults, but they were ſuch that other people who talked more of conſcience, were guilty of the like.

[w] Theſe were the earl of Carbury, ſir Michael Wharton, ſir Thomas Lee, ſir John Chicheley, ſir John Lowther of Whitehaven, and Mr. William Sacheverel. This laſt, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by ſeveral ſpeeches for the bill of excluſion, being little acquainted with maritime affairs, deſired the king to excuſe him from acting at the admiralty board, on account of his inſufficiency. The king replied, "There are enough who do underſtand the buſineſs, which a man of ſenſe would ſoon be maſter of, and he could depend upon his integrity." Sacheverel perſiſted in excuſing himſelf ſaying, "ſince he was not qualified for the ſervice, he could not in conſcience accept the ſalary." Oldm. III. p. 2.

[x] The reſt of the judges were ſir William Dolben, ſir William Gregory, and Giles Eyre, juſtices of the king's bench; ſir Henry Pollexfen, lord chief juſtice, and ſir John Powel, ſir Thomas Rokeby, and Peyton Ventris, juſtices of the common pleas; ſir Robert Atkins, lord chief baron, and ſir Edward Nevil, Nicholas Lechmere,, and John Turton, barons of the exchequer; and John Trenchard, chief juſtice of Cheſter, ſir George Treby, attorney general, John Sommers, ſolicitor general, and Henry Powle, maſter of the rolls.

[y] Archbiſhop Sancroft refuſed to conſecrate him, but to avoid a premunire, he granted a commiſſion to any three of the biſhops of his province, in conjunction with the biſhop of London, to exerciſe his metropolitan authority during pleaſure. Thus he authorized others to do, what he ſeemed to think an unlawful act. He was afterwards aſhamed of it himſelf and ſent for the original warrant out of the office, and got it into his own hands. next day, and ſent to the commons for their concurrence. Upon which, the commons went into a committee of the whole houſe, and Mr. Hampden, their chairman, put the queſtion, 'Whether a king elected and declared by the lords ſpiritual, and temporal, and commons, aſſembled at Weſtminſter the twenty ſecond of January 1688-9, coming to, and conſulting with the ſaid lords and commons, did not make as complete a parliament, and legiſlative power and authority, to all intents and purpoſes, as if the ſaid king ſhould cauſe new ſummons to be given, and new elections to be made by writs?' This occaſioned a long and warm debate; the party, who were for the negative, headed by ſir Edward Seymour, maintaining, "that, according to ſir Edward Coke, a parliament conſiſts of the king's majeſty ſitting there as in his politic capacity, and of the three eſtates of the realm; that is to ſay, 1. the lords ſpiritual: 2. the lords temporal; and 3. the commons. That as to the lords ſpiritual and temporal, every one of them being of full age, when a parliament is to be held, ought, of right, to have a writ of ſummons to come to that parliament. And that as to the commons, the ſame author ſays, they are reſpectively elected by the ſhires or counties, cities and boroughs, by force of the king's writs. That the lords and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter the twenty ſecond of January, were not ſummoned thither by the king's writs; and therefore though the king afterwards came to them, yet ſuch king, lords, and commons, could not be a parliament. And that though the like was done at the reſtoration, yet the convention was then called, when there was no king nor great ſeal in England; and it was called by the conſent of the lawful king, and was done upon a true and viſible, and not on a pretended neceſſity. And after all, even the convention was not looked upon as a legal parliament; its acts were ratified in a ſubſequent parliament, and from thence they had their authority." To this it was anſwered, "that it was generally admitted, that in an hereditary kingdom,, if the king ſhould die without an heir, either lineal or collateral, the crown in that caſe would devolve, or, as it were, eſcheat to the whole people and nation; and that hereupon the eſtates and repreſentatives of ſuch a nation might diſpoſe of the crown, to whom they pleaſed, or quite alter and change the government into what form they thought fit; examples of which were brought out of Germany, Italy, France, and Portugal. That in like manner, where a king abandoned, forſook, or deſerted his government, by going or flying out of the kingdom, without appointing any guardian to protect and take care of his people during his abſence, whereby the throne became vacant, the eſtates of ſuch a people might appoint another king or governor. That king James II. having abandoned his people, unguarded and undefended, at the mercy of a foreign army, even in the heart of the country, without ſo much as leaving a guardian or great ſeal behind him, his great officers and miniſters of ſtate flying ſome one way and ſome another, what could the nation do but what they had done? Several of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, many of the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes, of a former parliament, the aldermen and divers common council men of the city of London, addreſſed themſelves to the prince of Orange, deſiring him to take upon him the adminiſtration of public affairs, until the meeting of the intended convention of the three eſtates or great council of the realm; and to ſend letters ſubſcribed by himſelf both to the lords ſpiritual and temporal, who were proteſtants, to meet on the ſaid twenty-ſecond of January at Weſtminſter, and to ſeveral ſhires, counties, univerſities, cities, &c. for electing of ſuch number of perſons to repreſent them, as of right were to be ſent to parliament. That accordingly ſuch letters were ſent, and elections made; and the convention thus aſſembled, after mature deliberations, reſolved, 'That the prince and princeſs of Orange ſhould be king and queen of England.' That after they were proclaimed king and queen, and his majeſty came and conſulted with the three eſtates ſo aſſembled, what could be wanting in that aſſembly to make them a full and complete parliament? or what could be had more than was in this convention of king, lords, and commons, if the ſaid king ſhould iſſue out writs for calling a new parliament? That if, as was agreed by all, the ſubſtantial parts of a parliament be, and conſiſt of an aſſembly or convention, or meeting together of the king and three eſtates, the difference of the lords and commons being called by writ or by letter was nothing material, ſince both writ and letter were to the ſame effect; and ſince in ſome antient records it is mentioned, that parliaments ſhould be ſummoned by letters, particularly in king John's great charter in the ſeventeenth year of his reign, he promiſes to ſummon the biſhops, abbots, earls, &c. by his letter. That the prince of Orange's not being king at the time of his ſending forth his letters, was of no importance, ſince he was the perſon, to whom the adminiſtration of the government was then committed. That it was evident, that in many parliaments it was not ſo material, how the king, lords and commons came together, as that they were together. That the manner of calling together the three eſtates of the realm by the prince of Orange's letters was a much fairer proceeding, conſidering the ſtate of affairs, as to the calling of them together, than was in ſeveral caſes, wherein they were never doubted to be a parliament, when joined with a king. That Edward II. being impriſoned by his queen, ſon, and nobles, they iſſued out writs in the impriſoned king's name, to ſummon the lords, and to chooſe knights,, citizens, and burgeſſes to meet at Weſtminſter, the ſixteenth of January 1325. That this, one would think, was pretty hard, and an abſolute force upon the king, by making uſe of his name againſt his will, ſo that it could not be ſaid to be his act; yet the lords and commons being met, they depoſed Edward II, and declared his ſon Edward III, king; and this new king, and the lords, and commons, ſo (one might ſay) irregularly convened, made ſeveral acts of parliament, and have ever ſince been adjudged a good parliament to all intents and purpoſes, without any ſubſequent act of confirmation. That in like manner Richard II, being taken priſoner by Henry duke of Lancaſter, the duke iſſued out writs in the king's name (the king being then in priſon) to ſummon the lords, and to elect repreſentatives for the people, to meet at Weſtminſter the thirteenth of September 1399. That thoſe being met, by this irregular ſummons, they depoſed Richard II, and declared the duke of Lancaſter king; and that new king, and the lords and commons, ſo irregularly convened, being joined together, were alſo, and are to this day, adjudged a good parliament to all intents and purpoſes. Laſtly, that the lords and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter, the 15th of April 1660, were convened by writs in the name of the keepers of the liberties of England, who were uſurpers; yet when king Charles II, came to them, and they received him as king, he and they together were adjudged a parliament, and enacted, that they ſhould be ſo eſteemed, and made many laws, which were put in execution; and they continued as a parliament until the twenty-ninth of December following; and though moſt or all thoſe acts were afterwards confirmed by a ſubſequent parliament convened by the king's writs in May 1661; yet that confirmation, according to many good judgments, was rather to ſatisfy ſome ſcrupuloſity than out of neceſſity, moſt of the ſaid acts having in a great meaſure had their effects, before the ſubſequent parliament began. That if therefore upon the prince of Orange's being declared and proclaimed king, he came to the convention of lords and commons aſſembled at Weſtminſter; if the ſame number of lords was ſummoned, that of right ought to be ſummoned to parliament, and the ſame number of knights, citizens, and burgeſſes duly choſen, that ought to be choſen, to repreſent the commons in parliament; then conſequently there were all the ſubſtantial and eſſential parts of a parliament met together, and being ſo, where was the neceſſity, advantage, or prudence to diſſolve theſe, and thereby give new trouble of new ſummons and new elections, loſe a great deal of time, ſuffer irrecoverable loſs and damage to Ireland, and the allies abroad, and after all, at the next meeting, be but where they now were, as to the eſſential parts of a parliament, there being nothing more to be had at any other time, but what they had already."

Upon theſe reaſons the commons agreeing to the bill, it received the royal aſſent, and the convention was from that time called the parliament. This act was to commence from the 13th of February, the day on which the royal dignity was accepted by the king and queen, and inſtead of the old oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, the new oaths were enjoined to be taken by all the members of each houſe, from and after the firſt day of March next enſuing. Accordingly a day was ſet for the call of both houſes, and for requiring the members to take the oaths. Upon the paſſing this act, ſeveral members who had before proteſted, that they would neither ſubmit to the deciſions of ſuch a parliament, nor ſit in it, abſented themſelves, and retired into the country on frivolous pretences. And when the time came for the members to take the oaths, though they were refuſed by few or none of the commons, ſeveral of the lords, both ſpiritual and temporal, would not take them, as the duke of Newcaſtle, the earls of Clarendon, Lichfield, Exeter, Yarmouth, and Stafford, and the lords Griffin, Stawel, and one or two more: theſe were all, at ſeveral times, ſummoned to attend the the houſe, but moſt of them continued abſent. The ſpiritual lords that abſented themſelves were Sancroft archbiſhop of Canterbury, Turner biſhop of Ely, Lake of Chicheſter, Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, (theſe were five of the ſeven biſhops ſent to the tower by king James) Lloyd of Norwich, Thomas of Worceſter, and Frampton of Gloceſter [z]. Sancroft had been archbiſhop ever ſince the year 1676. He was a man of ſolemn deportment, and conſiderably learned. He lived abſtracted from company, and was fixed in the old maxims of high loyalty. He was named in the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion by king James, but would never go to that court, nor declare againſt it, though he thought it illegal. He joined in the petition againſt reading king James's declaration for liberty of conſcience. He met the privy-councillors at Guildhall, and invited the prince of Orange to take the government upon him, but refuſed to go with the reſt of the biſhops to welcome him to St. James's, though he had once agreed to it. When the convention met the 29th of January, he came not to take his place among them. He reſolved neither to act for nor againſt king James's intereſt, which was thought very unbecoming in one of his high ſtation. For ſince he believed, as afterwards appeared, that the nation was running into treaſon, rebellion and perjury, it was ſtrange to ſee him, who was at the head of the church, ſit ſilent all the while, and not ſo much as declare his opinion by ſpeaking, voting, or proteſting. But he was a poor ſpirited and fearful man, and acted a mean part in the whole affair of the revolution. He went on afterwards in the ſame unactive ſtate, ſtill refuſing the oaths, but neither acting nor ſpeaking, except in great confidence, to any againſt their taking them. Thomas and Lake, who both died ſoon after, like the archbiſhop, never came to the houſe of lords. When the other five withdrew from the parliament, that they might recommend themſelves by a ſhow of moderation, ſome of them moved for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehenſion, whereby all moderate-preſbyterians might be reconciled to the church of England, and admitted to eccleſiaſtical benefices. Theſe bills were drawn and offered by the earl of Nottingham, for which he received the thanks of the houſe [a]. From this time may be dated the riſe of the non-jurors, who rejecting the notion of a king de jure and a king de facto, as well as all other diſtinctions, and limitations, ſtrictly adhered to the principle of the divine right of kings, and were the authors of all the plots and conſpiracies againſt the new ſettlement, which they refuſed to acknowledge.

How early they began their deſigns againſt the government was quickly diſcovered. For the king, by ſome intercepted letters, had reaſon to ſuſpect that the earl of Arran, ſir Robert Hamilton, and others, were endeavouring the reſtoration of king James. Upon which, they were all ſent to the Tower. But as this proceeding was not ſtrictly legal, the king ſent a meſſage to acquaint the lords with what he had done, who immediately voted an addreſs of thanks for his care of their liberties, and deſired him to ſecure all diſturbers of the peace till the firſt day of next term. But the commons thinking this addreſs allowed the king a power of diſpenſing with the habeas corpus-act, thought it more proper to proceed by a bill, to impower the king to apprehend and detain all ſuſpected perſons, which in a few days paſſed both houſes. A bill was alſo brought in at the ſame time for removing papiſts from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, which having paſſed the lords, the commons added a proviſo to it, by which the queen dowager's articles of marriage were conſiderably reduced. To this proviſo the lords diſagreed, which occaſioned ſeveral conferences, and warm debates; but at laſt it was ſettled, that the queen dowager ſhould have thirty ſervants of the king's Engliſh ſubjects, provided none of them were prieſts, monks or fryars [b]. There were alſo in cuſtody at this time the lord Jefferies, the lord Montgomery, the earl of Saliſbury, the earl of Caſtlemaine, the earl of Peterborough, and the lord Clifford, who were all admitted to bail not long after, except Jefferies. The revolt of a body of troops about the ſame time, gave alſo ſome hopes to the enemies of the government. The royal regiment of Scotch horſe, that were quartered at Abingdon, almoſt totally deſerted; as did alſo five hundred of Dunbarton's regiment, headed by five captains. They all took their rout to Scotland, and are ſuppoſed to have acted in concert with the earl of Arran, who was confined in the Tower. General Ginkle was ordered to purſue them with a ſufficient force of horſe and dragoons, who ſoon obliged them to ſubmit to the king's mercy; and the only puniſhment he inflicted on them, was to ſend them over to ſerve in Holland.

The oaths to be taken by the preſent and all future parliaments being ſettled, the coronation-oath was next to be eſtabliſhed, as the day for that ceremony drew near. Accordingly, an act was paſſed for that purpoſe, in the courſe of which a proviſo was offered in the houſe of commons, that no clauſe in the act ſhould ſo bind the kings and queens as to prevent their aſſenting to any bill, offered by both houſes, for taking away, or altering any form or ceremony, in the eſtabliſhed church; ſo as the doctrines, liturgy and epiſcopal government be preſerved. But this proviſo was thrown out.

The coronation oath (as is obſerved in the preamble of the act) which had by ancient uſage, been ſolemnly taken by the kings and queens, to maintain the laws and cuſtoms of the realm, and the rights and liberties of the people, having been hitherto framed in doubtful expreſſions, with relation to conſtitutions now unknown, was worded in a more plain and comprehenſive manner [c], and by directions from the court was to be adminiſtered, either by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, or the biſhop of London. The choice of one of theſe two prelates being left to the king, he, fearing to be refuſed by the archbiſhop, who ſtill continued diſcontented, thought fit to appoint the biſhop of London; who accordingly officiated at the coronation, which was performed with all the magnificence and ſplendor uſual on ſuch occaſions. The next day the commons waited in a full body on the king and queen at the banqueting houſe, to congratulate them on their coronation, which Mr. Powle, their ſpeaker, performed in an elegant ſpeech [d].

The next thing to be conſidered in relation to the new go-

[z] As there were eight biſhops that refuſed the oaths, ſo there were the ſame number that took them; Lamplugh, archbiſhop of York; Compton, biſhop of London; Barlow, of Lincoln; Mew, of Wincheſter; Sprat, of Rocheſter; Lloyd, of St. Aſaph's; Trelawney, of Briſtol; and Beaw, of Landaff; whoſe example was afterwards followed by Smith, of Carliſle; and Watſon, of St. David's.

[a] Theſe bills were the ſame that the earl of Nottingham had prepared for the houſe of commons, in king Charles's time, during the debates of the exclution. But then things of that kind, were looked on as artifices to lay the heat of that time, and to render the church party more popular. Burnet, II. p. 6.

[b] In the debate upon this act for removing of papiſts, there happened a pleaſing incident, which was an addreſs to the king, to order the ducheſs of Mazarin to depart the kingdom. Colonel Birch, who was one of the oldeſt parliament-men in the houſe, preſented this addreſs; to which his majeſty anſwered, 'He would take it into conſideration.' However, this buſineſs did not paſs without oppoſition. Several members ſpoke in favour of the ducheſs: monſieur Odyck, one of the Dutch embaſſadors, made uſe of all his intereſts in her behalf, at the deſire of monſieur de St. Evremond, who was a great friend of that lady. Monſieur Odyck engaged his brother monſieur d'Auverquerque to intercede for her; and theſe gentlemen repreſented the aſſemblies at her houſe, which were thought by ſome to be ſo many popiſh cabals, to be only meetings for gaming, and other diverſions, by the former of which ſhe was thought chiefly to ſubſiſt. The marquis de Seignelay ſpoke for her to the king, alledging, that 'ſhe would ſtarve in any other country.' The biſhop of Saliſbury made a motion in the houſe of lords for ſuch an addreſs as that of the commons; but it not being carried, the ducheſs was permitted to continue her diverſions; and his majeſty, out of regard to her unfortunate circumſtances, allowed her a penſion of two thouſand pounds a year. Des Maizeaux's life of St. Evremond, p. 132.

[c] The form is thus:

"Will you ſolemnly promiſe and ſwear to govern the people of this kingdom and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the ſtatutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and cuſtoms of the ſame?"

"I ſolemnly promiſe ſo to do."

"Will you, to your power, cauſe law and juſtice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?"

"I will."

"Will you, to the utmoſt of your power, maintain the laws of God, the true profeſſion of the goſpel, and the proteſtant reformed religion, as by law eſtabliſhed? And will you preſerve unto the biſhops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all ſuch rights and privileges, as by law do or ſhall appertain unto them or any of them?"

"All this I promiſe to do."

Then the king, or queen, laying his, or her, hand upon the goſpels, ſhall ſay,

"The things which I have here before promiſed, I will perform and keep. So help me God."

The coronation oath, it ſeems, had been altered for the uſe of king James, and the care that was taken, in the original oath, of the people's liberties was left out, and inſtead of it great regard had to the rights of the clergy, and prerogatives of the crown. See State Trials, Vol. II. p. 49.

[d] The titles and honours conferred juſt before, or after the coronation, were theſe: prince George of Denmark, now naturalized, was created baron of Oakingham, earl of Kendal, and duke of Cumberland; the marquiſs of Wincheſter was made duke of Bolton; William Bentinck, eſq. groom of the ſtole to his majeſty, baron of Cirenceſter, viſcount Woodſtock, and earl of Portland; Thomas, lord viſcount Falconberg, earl of Falconberg; Charles, lord viſcount Mordaunt, earl of Monmouth; Ralph, lord Montagu, viſcount Mount-Hermer, and earl of Montagu; John, lord Churchill, earl of Marlborough; Henry Sidney, eſq. baron of Milton, and viſcount Sidney of Shepey in the county of Kent; Richard, lord viſcount Lumley of Waterford in Ireland, viſcount Lumley of Lumley caſtle in the county vernment was, to ſettle the oaths to be taken by all perſons enjoying any office, place, or benefice. As the proteſtant diſſenters had zealouſly promoted the revolution, and were hearty friends to the new eſtabliſhment; the king was very deſirous, that thoſe among them who were willing and able to ſerve him, ſhould be admitted to offices and employments. It muſt be obſerved, the diſſenters at the time of the revolution were divided into four ſects, preſbyterians and independents, anabaptiſts and quakers. The preſbyterians and independents had not the viſible diſtinction of different rites, and their depreſſed condition had put an end to the diſpute about the conſtitution and ſubordination of churches, which had ſet them at ſo great variance, when the power was in their hands. They were now looked upon as one ſect, and were three parts in four of all the diſſenters. The main difference between them was, that the preſbyterians ſeemed reconcilable to the church; for they were ſo far inclined to epiſcopal ordination and a liturgy, that upon ſome amendments they appeared diſpoſed to come into the church, and they liked the civil government and a limited monarchy. But the independents were generally for a commonwealth in the ſtate, and therefore, they put all the power of the church in the people, whoſe choice they deemed a ſufficient ordination: Nor did they approve of ſet forms of worſhip. The anabaptiſts were generally men of virtue, and of univerſal charity; and as they were far from being in any treating terms with the church of England, ſo nothing but a univerſal toleration, could make them capable of favour and employments. The quakers had made themſelves ſo particular in the matter of the hat, and ſaying thou and thee, that it became to them a badge of diſtinction, by which they were eaſily known. Theſe were in the ſame ſtate with the anabaptiſts, and a toleration was all they could expect.

From hence it appears, that of all the diſſenters the moderate preſbyterians alone, could upon eaſy terms, be incorporated with the church, and placed on a level with thoſe of the eſtabliſhed religion: That the reſt were at too great a diſtance to be reconciled to the church, and therefore as to religion, could be made eaſy only by a toleration; and as to employments, could not be admitted into them, unleſs their conformity to the church was diſpenſed with. This being the caſe, the king had formed three deſigns; 1. By a comprehenſion to unite the moderate preſbyterians with the church: 2. By a toleration to give eaſe to ſcrupulous conſciences: And 3. By removing the obſtacle ariſing from non-conformity, to admit indifferently, all his proteſtant ſubjects into civil employments. How he ſucceeded in theſe deſigns will quickly appear.

As a proper method to execute his third deſign, was by the inſertion of a clauſe to that effect, in the bill for ſettling the oaths, the king not only ſignified in council his deſire for the admiſſion of the proteſtants to offices and employments, but moreover, two days after the bill had been brought into the houſe of lords under the title of, "a bill for the abrogating of the oaths of ſupremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths," he took the opportunity when he went to give the royal aſſent to a bill for ſuſpending the habeas corpus act, to make the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"NOW I have the occaſion of coming hither to paſs this bill, which, I hope, will be for all our ſafeties, I ſhall put you in mind of one thing, which will conduce much to our ſettlement, as a ſettlement will to the diſappointment of all our enemies.

"I am, with all the expedition I can, filling up the vacancies, that are in offices and places of truſt, by this late revolution. I hope you are ſenſible, there is a neceſſity of ſome law to ſettle the oaths to be taken by all perſons to be admitted to ſuch places, I recommend it to your care, to make a ſpeedy proviſion for it. And as I doubt not but you will ſufficiently provide againſt papiſts, ſo I hope you will leave room for the admiſſion of all proteſtants, that are willing and able to ſerve.

"This conjunction in my ſervice will tend to the better uniting you amongſt yourſelves, and the ſtrengthening you againſt your common adverſaries."

Purſuant to this ſpeech, two clauſes were ordered to be drawn up, one to explain the abrogating of the oaths, and the other "to take away the neceſſity of receiving the ſacrament, to make a man capable of enjoying any office, employment, or place of truſt.". But this laſt clauſe was rejected by a great majority. However ſeven lords, Delamere, Stamford, North and Grey, Cheſterfield, Wharton, Lovelace and Vaughan, proteſted againſt limiting officers by the ſacramental teſt, and diſſented for theſe reaſons; "that a hearty union among proteſtants was a greater ſecurity to the church and ſtate, than any teſt, that could be invented: That this obligation to receive the ſacrament was now a teſt on the proteſtants, rather than on the papiſts; and as long as it was ſo continued, there could not be that hearty and perfect union among proteſtants, as had always been wiſhed, and was at this time indiſpenſably neceſſary. And, laſtly, that a greater caution ought not to be required from ſuch as were admitted into offices, than from the members of the two houſes of parliament, who were not obliged to receive the ſacrament, to enable them to ſit in either houſe."

Though this attempt failed, the king was reſolved to purſue his deſign, and accordingly, another clauſe was propoſed to be inſerted in the ſame bill, namely, "to prevent the receiving the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper upon any other account, than in obedience to the holy inſtitution thereof; and to provide that any man ſhould be ſufficiently qualified for any office, employment, or place of truſt, who within a year before or after his admiſſion or entrance thereunto, did receive the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, either according to the uſage of the church of England, or in any other proteſtant congregation, and could produce a certificate under the hands of the miniſter and two other credible perſons." But this clauſe was alſo rejected by a great majority, though ſix lords, Oxford, Mordaunt, Lovelace, Montagu, Wharton, and Paget, entered their diſſent for theſe reaſons: "becauſe it gives a great part of the proteſtant freemen of England reaſon to complain of inequality and hard uſage, when they are excluded from public employments by a law; and alſo that it deprived the king and kingdom of divers men, fit and capable to ſerve the public in ſeveral ſtations; and that for a mere ſcruple of conſcience, which could by no means render them ſuſpected, much leſs diſaffected to the government. 2. Becauſe his majeſty, as the common and indulgent father of his people, having expreſſed an earneſt deſire of liberty for tender conſciences to his proteſtant ſubjects; and the biſhops having divers of them, on ſeveral occaſions, profeſſed an inclination to, and owned the reaſonableneſs of ſuch a chriſtian temper, we apprehend it will raiſe ſuſpicion in ſome men's minds of ſomething elſe than the care of religion or the public, and different from a deſign to heal our breaches, when they find, that by confining ſecular employments to eccleſiaſtical conformity, thoſe are ſhut out from civil affairs, whoſe doctrine and worſhip may be tolerated by authority of parliament; there being a bill before, by order of the houſe, to that purpoſe; eſpecially when, (without this excluſive rigour,) the church is ſecured in all her privileges and preferments, no body being hereby let into them, who is not ſtrictly conformable. 3. Becauſe to ſet marks of diſtinction and humiliation on any ſort of men, who have not rendered themſelves juſtly ſuſpected to the government, as it is at all times to be avoided by the makers of juſt and equitable laws, ſo it may be particularly of ill effect to the reformed intereſt at home and abroad in this preſent conjuncture, which ſtands in need of the united hands and hearts of all proteſtants againſt the open attempts and ſecret endeavours of a reſtleſs party and a potent neighbour, who is more zealous than Rome itſelf, to plant popery in theſe kingdoms; and labours with the utmoſt force to ſettle his tyranny upon the ruins of the reformation through all Europe. 4. Becauſe it turns the edge of a law (we know not by what fate) upon proteſtants and friends to the government, which was intended againſt papiſts, to exclude them from places of truſt, as men avowedly dangerous to our government and religion; and thus the taking the ſacrament, which was enjoined only as a means to diſcover papiſts, is now made a diſtinguiſhing duty amongſt proteſtants, to weaken the whole by caſting off a part of them. 5. Becauſe myſteries of religion, and divine worſhip, are of divine original, and of a nature ſo wholly diſtinct from the ſecular county palatine of Durham; Hugh, lord viſcount Cholmondeley, of Kells in Ireland, baron Cholmondeley, of Wichmalbank, alias Namptwich, in Cheſhire. On the 27th of March, the lord Coote was ſworn and admitted into the place of treaſurer, and receiver-general to her majeſty; on the 3d of April, Frederick Mareſchal de Schomberg, general of his majeſty's forces, and maſter-general of the ordnance, and William, earl of Devonſhire, lord ſteward of his Majeſty's houſhold, in a chapter held at Whitehall, were elected knights companions of the moſt noble order of the garter; into which order likewiſe, on the 5th of the ſame month, the duke of Ormond was inſtalled at Windſor; and on the 10th, his majeſty conferred the honour of knighthood on Thomas Pilkington, lord mayor of London.

affairs of politic ſociety, that they cannot be applied to thoſe ends; and therefore the church, by the law of the goſpel, as well as common prudence ought to take care, neither to offend tender conſciences within itſelf, nor give offence to thoſe without, by mixing their ſacred myſteries with ſecular intereſts. 6. Becauſe we cannot ſee, how it can conſiſt with the law of God, common equity, or the right of any free-born ſubject, that any one be puniſhed without crime. If it be a crime not to take the ſacrament according to the uſage of the church of England, every one ought to be puniſhed for it; which nobody affirms. If it be no crime, thoſe, who are capable, and judged fit for employments by the king, ought not to be puniſhed with a law of excluſion for not doing that, which it is no crime to forbear. If it be urged ſtill, as an effectual teſt to diſcover and keep out papiſts; the taking the ſacrament in thoſe proteſtant congregations, where they are members, and known, will be at leaſt as effectual to that purpoſe."

Thus the king's deſign for the admiſſion of all his proteſtant ſubjects to offices and places of truſt, not only miſcarried, but it very much heightened the prejudices of the churchmen againſt him, as bearing no great affection to the church of England, when he propoſed the opening ſuch a door which they believed would be fatal to them.

The rejecting theſe clauſes, made the bill for ſettling the oaths to be puſhed on with more zeal. The clergy, as has been obſerved, had ſo far entangled themſelves, by preaching up for ſo many years the doctrines of the divine right of kings, and the lineal ſucceſſion; that it was imagined great numbers would follow the example of thoſe biſhops, who had refuſed to acknowledge the government. And therefore as the clergy were known to lie under theſe difficulties, it had been propoſed, in order to make way for the clauſe about the ſacramental teſt, that the clergy ſhould be excuſed from the oaths provided the diſſenters might be excuſed from the ſacrament. But this propoſal did not take effect, the ſacramental teſt being deemed by the clergy the chief ſupport of the church. However that be, it was long inſiſted upon in the houſe of lords, that inſtead of the clauſe, poſitively enacting that the clergy ſhould be obliged to take the oaths, the king ſhould be empowered to tender them; and then the refuſal was to be puniſhed according to the clauſe as it ſtood in the act. It was thought, that ſuch a power would oblige them to their good behaviour, and be an effectual reſtraint upon them. They would, at leaſt, be kept quiet by it. Whereas, if they came under deprivation, or the apprehenſions of it, that would make them deſperate, and ſet them on to undermine the government. It was urged, that the clergy by the offices of the church did ſolemnly own to God their allegiance in the ſight of all their people; that no oath could lay deeper engagements on them, than thoſe acts of religious worſhip did; and if they ſhould either paſs over thoſe offices, or perform them otherwiſe than as the law required, there was a clear method, purſuant to the act of uniformity, to proceed ſeverely againſt them. It was alſo ſaid that in many different changes of government, oaths had not proved ſo effectual a ſecurity as was imagined; diſtinctions were found out, and ſenſes were put on words, by which they were interpreted ſo as to ſignify but little, when a government came to need ſtrength from them; and it ill became thoſe who had formerly complained of theſe impoſitions, to urge this with ſo much vehemence.

The commons would by no means agree to the excuſing the clergy from the oaths, alledging, "That it hath been the policy of the common law and ſtatute law to oblige men to ſwear allegiance to the king. That allegiance is the common and neceſſary duty of all the ſubjects, and is moſt ſtrictly to be required of archbiſhops, and thoſe who have eccleſiaſtical dignities, benefices, or promotions, in regard they are highly intereſted in the adminiſtration of the government, draw great dependencies, and are exemplary to the reſt of the people: and ſeveral of them are by law to adminiſter the oath of allegiance to other perſons. That allegiance is alſo ſtrictly to be required of all governors, profeſſors, and fellows in univerſities; and ſchoolmaſters, becauſe to them the education of the youth of the kingdom is committed; and therefore they ought to be perſons of known loyalty to the government. That the taking the oaths publicly in open court would better manifeſt allegiance, than the taking them privately before perſons appointed by order in council, and would be much more ſafe to the perſons who are obliged to take the oaths. That the beſt and moſt certain means to have the oaths taken was, to impoſe it upon the perſons concerned to tender themſelves to take the oaths under penalties: but if the oaths were not required to be taken unleſs tendered, the ſaid perſons might, by abſence or otherwiſe, avoid them with impunity. That the clauſe which the commons ſent to their lordſhips, allowed more favour to the archbiſhops, biſhops, and thoſe that have eccleſiaſtical dignities and promotions, than to any lay-peer or other perſons having offices or employments, and was more gentle in the penalty than the ſtatutes heretofore made in the like caſe. That it was unreaſonable and unſafe to diſtinguiſh the archbiſhops, biſhops, and perſons having eccleſiaſtical dignities, benefices, or promotions, and ſuch as are intruſted with the education of youth, from the reſt of the ſubjects, in the declaration of their allegiance, and might tend to make a diviſion in the kingdom, expoſe the king's perſon and government to hatred and danger, and occaſion a general diſcontent."

To theſe reaſons it was replied by the lords, "That indeed the policy of the law requires men to ſwear allegiance; and that it is the common and neceſſary duty of all ſubjects, and eſpecially of the clergy; and therefore the lords did not exempt them from taking theſe oaths, but only differed with the houſe of commons about the method, by which they ſhould be tendered. That if the lords ſhould agree that it was better to tender the oaths in open court than privately, yet that was not a ſufficient reaſon againſt tendering them by perſons appointed by the king in council, becauſe the officers and judges of the court might be ſo appointed by virtue of the clauſe offered by the lords. That the clergy would be required to take the oaths by ſuch order in council, as was propoſed by the lords; and their not appearing when ſo ſummoned, would amount to a refuſal; or, if it ſhould not, the lords would agree to any ſuch addition, as would make it ſo. That the clergy and other members of the univerſities were not diſtinguiſhed from the laity, becauſe upon the preſenting to any degree or preferment they would be, equally with all others, obliged to take the oaths, when required by order of council. That it ſeemed more to the ſettlement and ſafety of the government, that the king ſhould be impowered to put the fidelity of the clergy to a trial immediately, than leave any, who were ill affected to government, ſo much time, as to the firſt of Auguſt, to undermine it. That the clergy were obliged by the prayers, which they muſt uſe in the daily ſervice, to make ſuch expreſs and ſolemn declarations of fidelity to the king and queen by name, that the putting them to the taking of the oaths was not ſo neceſſary to the public ſafety, as in other perſons, who are not bound to make ſuch frequent declarations of their fidelity. That in ſo critical a time as the preſent, it was not to be doubted, but upon any cauſe of apprehending their ill affections to the government, the tendering the oaths by order in council, would not only take all imputations of hardſhip from his majeſty, but juſtify, and even require a more rigorous way of proceeding againſt thoſe, that ſhould give any cauſe of offence. And laſtly, that ſince during queen Elizabeth's long and glorious reign, in which ſhe had both the pretended title of the queen of Scots, and the depoſing power aſſumed by the popes, to apprehend; this was found to be the ſafeſt way for the public quiet; and the ill effects of leaving the tendering the oaths to the queen's diſcretion, not having appeared in all that time of ſo much danger, the following a pattern taken from the beſt part of our hiſtory, ſeemed more ſuitable to the preſent time, than the falling into other hands."

This anſwer being communicated to the commons, they inſiſted that according to the ſtatute of the 7th of James I, all perſons ſhould be enjoined to take the oaths; and that there ſhould be no difference between the clergy and laity as to that point. Then an exception of twelve was propoſed, who ſhould be ſubject to the law, upon refuſing the oaths when required by the king; but neither was that allowed: and after a long debate, all the mitigation that could be obtained, was a power to the king to grant to any twelve clergymen, who ſhould be deprived by this act, a third part of their benefices during his pleaſure. This clauſe being approved by the commons, the bill for ſettling the oaths paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

By this act the oath of ſupremacy, eſtabliſhed in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and that of allegiance in the reign of king James I, were abrogated, and others appointed. In the oath eſtabliſhed in the time of king James I. a previous title ſeemed to be aſſerted, when the king was ſworn to, as rightful and lawful king. And therefore, as theſe words could not be ſaid of a king that had no precedent right, but was ſet up by the nation, the new oaths were reduced to the ancient ſimplicity of ſwearing, to bear faith and true allegiance to the king and queen. The declaration in the act of uniformity, that 'it is not lawful upon any pretence whatſoever to take arms againſt the king, or thoſe that are commiſſioned by him', was alſo repealed, and another enjoined in its room[e]. The clergy were obliged to take the oaths before the firſt day of Auguſt, and in caſe of refuſal or neglect, they were to be ſuſpended from their office for ſix months; and if they took them not before the expiration of that time, they were to be actually deprived of all their eccleſiaſtical promotions. This indulgence to the clergy of ſix months after ſuſpenſion, was, that they might have ſufficient time to ſtudy the point; and if in that time they could not ſatisfy themſelves as to the lawfulneſs of acknowledging the government, it was ſaid, it was not fit they ſhould continue in the higheſt poſts of the church. However, the clergy, before the time was expired, generally took the oaths, though with too many reſervations and diſtinctions, which laid them open to ſevere cenſures, as if they had taken them againſt their conſcience.

Though the king had failed in his deſign for the admiſſion of the proteſtant diſſenters into offices and employments, by the removal of the ſacramental teſt, he ſucceeded however in that of toleration, by the ſuſpenſion of all penal laws for not coming to church. The king, when prince of Orange, having been applied to by king James for his opinion concerning the repeal of the penal laws and teſt, his anſwer was, that no chriſtian, in his opinion, ought to be perſecuted for his conſcience, or be ill uſed becauſe he differed from the eſtabliſhed religion; and therefore he heartily approved that the diſſenters ſhould have entire liberty for the exerciſe of their religion, and that the penal laws ſhould be repealed, provided thoſe remained in force by which the Roman catholics were excluded from parliament, and public employments; but that as to their religion, they ſhould be allowed the ſame liberty as in Holland. Theſe were the king's ſentiments at that time, and therefore it is not ſtrange he ſhould, now that it was in his power, endeavour to procure a toleration for all his proteſtant ſubjects, eſpecially as it was not only agreeable to his principles, but what they had deſerved by their ſteady adherence to the new ſettlement. Beſides, his experience in Holland had made him look upon liberty of conſcience as one of the wiſeſt meaſures of government; as tending to the encouragement of induſtry, and to the encreaſe of the people; and as affording a ſanctuary to all who are oppreſſed.

The toleration-bill was brought into the houſe of lords the 28th of February, and read the firſt time by the earl of Nottingham, by whom it had been prepared. Some propoſed that the act ſhould be only for a time, as a neceſſary reſtraint upon the diſſenters, that they might demean themſelves ſo as to merit the continuance of it, when the term of years now offered ſhould expire. But this was rejected, and it was urged, that there was now an univerſal inclination to paſs the act, but it could not be expected that the nation would be in the ſame good diſpoſition towards the diſſenters at another time. So the bill found an eaſy paſſage through both houſes, and received the royal aſſent on the 24th of May, under the title of 'An act for exempting their majeſties proteſtant ſubjects, diſſenting from the church of England, from the penalties of certain laws.'

The reaſon of this act is thus given in the preamble; 'foraſmuch as ſome eaſe to ſcrupulous conſciences in the exerciſe of religion may be an effectual means to unite their majeſties proteſtant ſubjects in intereſts and affections;' it was therefore enacted, "That none of the penal laws ſhall be conſtrued to extend to any perſon or perſons diſſenting from the church of England, that ſhall take the oaths, to the preſent government, and ſubſcribe the declaration of 30 Car. II. provided that no aſſembly of perſons ſo diſſenting ſhould be in any place for religious worſhip with the doors locked, barred, or bolted, during the time of ſuch meeting together; and provided, that nothing ſhould be conſtrued to exempt any of the perſons aforeſaid from paying of tythes or other parochial duties. If any diſſenter ſhould be choſen or appointed to bear the office of conſtable, church-warden, overſeer, &c. and ſhould ſcruple the oaths required by law to be taken in reſpect of ſuch office, he ſhall or may execute ſuch office or employment by a ſufficient deputy. That all preachers or teachers of any congregation of diſſenting proteſtants, who ſhall take the oaths, and ſubſcribe the declaration aforeſaid, and alſo ſubſcribe the articles of religion except the thirty fourth, thirty fifth and thirty ſixth, and theſe words in the twentieth article, viz. [The church hath power to decree rights and ceremonies, and authority in controverſies of faith,] ſhall not be liable to any of the pains or penalties mentioned in Stat. 17. Car. II. 2. 22 Car. II. 13 and 14. Car. II. cap. 4. Every ſuch teacher ſhall be exempted from ſerving upon any jury, or from being choſen and appointed to bear the office of church-warden, overſeer of the poor, &c. But any juſtice of the peace may require any perſon, that goes to any meeting for exerciſe of religion, to ſubſcribe the declaration and to take the oaths; and, in caſe of refuſal, is required to commit ſuch perſon to priſon without bail or main-priſe, &c." The like liberty was given to anabaptiſts, but no papiſt or any that denied the trinity, were to have the benefit of this act. The quakers were alſo admitted to it on condition of promiſing before God, inſtead of ſwearing, to be true and faithful to the king and queen, and ſolemnly profeſſing and declaring, that they abhorred and renounced, &c. They were alſo to ſubſcribe a profeſſion of their chriſtian belief in theſe words. I A. B. profeſs faith in God the father, and in Jeſus Chriſt his eternal ſon the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God bleſſed for evermore; and do acknowledge the holy ſcriptures of the old and new teſtament to be given by divine inſpiration: "provided that all the laws made for the frequenting divine ſervice on the Lord's day ſhall be ſtill in force, and executed againſt all perſons that offend againſt the ſaid laws, except ſuch perſons come to ſome congregation permitted by this act. Provided that if any perſon ſhall maliciouſly or contemptuouſly come into any cathedral or pariſh church, or other congregation, and diſquiet or diſturb the ſame, or miſuſe any preacher or teacher, he ſhall, upon conviction, ſuffer the penalty of twenty pounds. And finally, provided, that no congregation or aſſembly for religious worſhip ſhall be permitted or allowed by this act, until the place of ſuch meeting ſhall be certified to the biſhop of the dioceſe, or to the archdeacon of that archdeaconry, or to the juſtices of the peace at the general or quarter ſeſſions, and regiſtered in the ſaid biſhop's or archdeacon's court, or recorded at the ſaid general or quarter ſeſſions"

The clergy had begun already to ſhew great hatred to the diſſenters, and ſeemed to wiſh for an occaſion, to renew old ſeverities againſt them, and therefore, the quieting the nation by the act of toleration, was much applauded by men of moderation and goodneſs. It gave the king great content, who was very uneaſy to ſee ſo much ill humour ſpreading among the clergy, and by their means, over a great part of the nation. He was ſo true to his principle of liberty of conſcience, that he reſtrained the heat of ſome, who were propoſing ſeveral acts againſt the papiſts. He made them apprehend the advantage, which that would give the French, to alienate all the papiſts of Europe from us, who from thence might hope to ſet on foot a new catholic league, and make the war a quarrel of religion, which might have very bad effects: nor could he pretend to protect the proteſtants in many places of Germany and Hungary, unleſs he could cover the papiſts in England, from all the ſeverities on the account of their religion. This was ſo careſully infuſed into many, and ſo well underſtood by them, that the papiſts have enjoyed the real effects of the toleration, though they were not comprehended within the act.

Of the king's three deſigns in favour of the diſſenters; that of their admiſſion into employments had miſcarried, but that of toleration had ſucceeded. The other of comprehenſion, for receiving the moderate preſbyterians into the church and admitting them to eccleſiaſtical benefices, met with the ſame fate, as that for their admiſſion to offices. The king was extremely deſirous of uniting all his proteſtant ſubjects, and had promiſed them to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for ſuch an union, but all his efforts towards it proved ineffectual.

Purſuant to the motion made by the biſhops when they withdrew from the parliament, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, under the title of "a bill for uniting their majeſties proteſtant ſubjects." In the progreſs of this bill, two things were warmly debated. The firſt was, whether kneeling at the ſacrament ſhould be diſpenſed with to ſuch, as, after conference upon it, ſhould ſolemnly proteſt they were not ſatisfied as to the lawfulneſs of it. This occaſioned a vehement debate, for the poſture being the chief exception the diſſenters had to the receiving the ſacrament, the giving that up, was thought to be the opening a way for their coming into employments. However, it was carried, that kneeling ſhould be diſpenſed with[f]. The other debate was, whether the laity ſhould be added in the commiſſion, to be given by the king to biſhops and others of the clergy?

[e] The oaths and declaration are the ſame as were inſerted in the declaration of rights.

[f] The queſtion was put, 'Whether the clauſe about the indifferency of the poſture at receiving the ſacrament ſhould be left out?' The votes being equal,

A proviſo was offered, that in imitation of the acts paſſed in king Henry VIII's, and Edward VI's reigns, a number of perſons both of the clergy and laity, might be impowered to prepare ſuch a reformation of things relating to the church, as might be offered to king and parliament; in order to the healing the diviſions, and correcting what might be amiſs or defective in the conſtitution. This was preſſed with great earneſtneſs by many of the temporal lords, but it was carried for the excluſion of the laity[g]. During the debates, biſhop Burnet himſelf warmly oppoſed adding the laity to the commiſſion, imagining that the clergy would have come with zeal and unanimity into ſuch a deſign, and being apprehenſive, that this addition of the laity would be looked upon by them as taking the affair out of their hands. But he was convinced ſoon after, that he had taken wrong meaſures; and that the method propoſed of joining the laity in the commiſſion was the only one like to prove effectual. But this conduct of his did not ſo recommend him to the clergy, as to balance the cenſure, which he fell under, for moving, in another proviſo of that bill, that the ſubſcription inſtead of aſſent and conſent, ſhould only be to ſubmit with a promiſe of conformity. He declared himſelf likewiſe zealous for diſpenſing with kneeling at the ſacrament; for ſince it was acknowledged that the poſture was not eſſential in itſelf, and that ſcruples, how ill grounded ſoever, were raiſed upon it, it ſeemed reaſonable to leave the matter as indifferent in its practice, as it was in its nature. When the bill, after paſſing the lords, was ſent to the commons, it was let lie on the table, and inſtead of proceeding in it, they made an addreſs to the king for ſummoning a convocation, wherein "they rendered to his majeſty their moſt humble and hearty thanks for his gracious declaration and repeated aſſurances, that he would maintain the church of England eſtabliſhed by law, which his majeſty had been pleaſed to recover from the dangerous conſpiracy, that was laid for its deſtruction, with the hazard of his royal perſon." They added, "That the doctrine and practice of the church of England had evinced their loyalty beyond the contradiction of the moſt malicious enemies; and that the misfortunes of former princes could be attributed to nothing more than their endeavours to ſubvert and diſable the members thereof from contributing to their ſupport and defence. They therefore prayed his majeſty to continue his care for the preſervation of the ſame, whereby he would effectually eſtabliſh his throne, by ſecuring the hearts of his majeſty's ſubjects within theſe his realms, who could no way better ſhew their zeal for his ſervice, than by a firm adherence to that church, whoſe conſtitution is beſt ſuited to the ſupport of this monarchy." They likewiſe humbly prayed, "that, according to the antient practice and uſage of the kingdom in time of parliament, his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to iſſue forth his writs for calling a convocation of the clergy of this kingdom, to be adviſed with in eccleſiaſtical matters; aſſuring his majeſty, that it was their intention forthwith to proceed to the conſideration of giving eaſe to proteſtant diſſenters."

By this addreſs it appears, that a party was now beginning to be formed, that pretended great zeal for the church and expreſſed their apprehenſions, that it was in danger. This they plainly inſinuated, by their praying the king to continue his care for the preſervation of the church, hinting at the ſame time, how dangerous it would be for him to do otherwiſe. Theſe men, as they went heavily into the toleration, which was the eaſe they here promiſed to give the diſſenters, ſo they were much offended with the bill of comprehenſion, as containing matters relating to the church, in which the repreſentative body of the clergy had not been ſo much as adviſed with; and therefore it was, that they ſo haſtily petitioned for a convocation, under a notion that the buſineſs would be accompliſhed without one.

The king, who was not pleaſed with this addreſs, as perceiving the tendency of it, did not forbear intimating in his anſwer, that he thought he had already given them ſufficient aſſurances of his intentions to ſupport the church. The anſwer was not returned immediately, but ſent the next day by the earl of Nottingham, who acquainted both houſes (for the lords had concurred in the addreſs) "That though his majeſty had had many occaſions of aſſuring them, he would maintain the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed; yet he was well pleaſed with repeating theſe promiſes, which he was reſolved to perform, by ſupporting this church, whoſe loyalty, he doubted not, would enable him to anſwer their juſt expectations. That as his deſign of coming hither was to reſcue them from the miſeries they laboured under; ſo it was a great ſatisfaction to him, that by the ſucceſs god had given him, he was in a ſtation of defending this church, which had effectually ſhewn her zeal againſt popery, and ſhould always be his peculiar care. And he hoped the eaſe, they deſigned to diſſenters, would contribute very much to the eſtabliſhment of this church; which therefore he earneſtly recommended to them, that the occaſions of differences and mutual animoſities might be removed; and that as ſoon as might be, he would ſummon a convocation."

Notwithſtanding this anſwer, no further progreſs was made in the bill. Thoſe who had moved for this bill, and afterwards brought it into the houſe, acted a very diſingenuous part. For while they ſtudied to recommend themſelves by this ſhew of moderation, they ſet on their friends to oppoſe it; and ſuch as were very ſincerely and cordially for it, were repreſented as the enemies of the church, who intended to ſubvert it. Nor was this bill ſupported by thoſe who ſeemed moſt favourable to the diſſenters. They advanced it as a maxim, that it was fit to keep up a ſtrong faction both in church and ſtate; and they thought it was not agreeable to that, to ſuffer ſo great a body as the preſbyterians to be made more eaſy, and more inclinable to unite to the church. They alſo thought, that the toleration would be beſt maintained, when great numbers ſhould need it, and be concerned to preſerve it. So the deſign of a comprehenſion being zealouſly oppoſed and but faintly promoted, fell to the ground. However, the king was ſo deſirous this affair ſhould ſucceed, that it was brought on again the next ſeſſion in a more formal manner, though with no better ſucceſs.

The oath to be uſed at the coronation of the king, and thoſe to be taken by the members of both houſes of parliament, as well as by all perſons enjoying office, employment or benefice being ſettled, and the toleration for the proteſtant diſſenters being eſtabliſhed, the next thing to be conſidered was a revenue for the ſupport of the government. It muſt be obſerved, that before the revolution the whole ſtanding income of the ſtate was in the power and diſpoſal of the crown, and was called the revenue of the crown. There was then no diſtinction of what was to be allotted for the king's uſe, and what for the ſervice of the public. By which means the king might reſerve what part he thought fit for his own deſigns, and employ no more than he pleaſed for the purpoſes of the nation. Accordingly it was found, that after the reſtoration, the public revenue had been conſtantly embezzled, and immenſe ſums very often ſunk, without being equal, (content 28, proxy 1, in all 29; not content 27, proxy 2, in all 29;) and therefore according to the antient rule in like caſes, it was carried in the negative.

[g] In the ſame manner as the other queſtion by the votes being equal. The marquis of Wincheſter, and the lords Mordaunt, Lovelace, and Stamford, entered their diſſents in the following reaſons: "1. Becauſe the act itſelf being deſigned for the peace of the ſtate, the putting the clergy into commiſſion, with a total excluſion of the laity, laid the humiliation on the laity, as if the clergy of the church of England were alone friends to the peace of the ſtate, and the laity leſs able or leſs concerned to provide for it. 2. Becauſe the matters to be conſidered being barely of human conſtitution, viz. the liturgy and ceremonies of the church, belong to both; for in what is of divine inſtitution, neither clergy nor laity can make any alteration at all. 3. Becauſe the pretending, that differences and delays may ariſe, by mixing laymen with the eccleſiaſtics, to the fruſtrating the deſign of the commiſſions, is vain and out of doors, unleſs thoſe, that made uſe of this pretence, ſuppoſed, that the clergy-part of the church had diſtinct intereſts from the laity-part of the ſame church, and would be a reaſon as good, why one or other of them ſhould quit the houſe of lords, for fear of obſtructing the buſineſs of it. 4. Becauſe the commiſſion being intended for the ſatisfaction of diſſenters, it would be convenient that laymen of different ranks, nay, perhaps of different opinions too, ſhould be united in it, the better to find expedients for that end, rather than clergymen alone of the eſtabliſhed church, who are generally obſerved to have all very much the ſame way of reaſoning and thinking. 5. Becauſe it is the much readier way to facilitate the paſſing the alterations into a law, that lay-lords and commoners ſhould be joined in the commiſſion, who might be able to ſatisfy both houſes of the reaſons, upon which they were made, and thereby remove all fears and jealouſies, ill men might raiſe againſt the clergy, of their endeavouring to keep up without ground, a diſtinct intereſt from that of the laity, whom they ſo carefully excluded from being joined with them in conſtitutions of common concernment, that they would not have any part in the deliberation, who muſt have the greateſt in determining. 6. Becauſe ſuch a reſtrained commiſſion lay liable to this great objection, that it might be made uſe of to elude repeated promiſes, and the preſent general expectation of compliance with tender conſciences, when the providing of it was taken out of the ordinary courſe of parliament, to be put into the hands of thoſe alone, who were lateſt in admitting any need of it, and who might be thought to be the more unfit to be the ſole compoſers of differences, when they were looked upon by ſome as parties. 7. Becauſe, after all, this carried a dangerous ſuſpicion along with it, as if the laity were not a part of the church, nor had any power to meddle in matters of religion; a ſuſpicion directly oppoſite to the conſtitution both of church and ſtate, which would make all alterations utterly impoſſible, unleſs the clergy alone were allowed to have power to make laws in matters of religion; ſince what was eſtabliſhed by law could not be taken away, or changed but by conſent of laymen in parliament, the clergy themſelves having no authority to meddle in this very caſe, in which the laity was excluded by this very vote, but what they derived from lay-hands. Laſtly, becauſe it was contrary to three ſtatutes made in the reign of Henry VIII, and one in Edward VI, which empowers thirty-two commiſſioners to alter the common and eccleſiaſtical laws, &c. whereof ſixteen to be of the laity, and ſixteen of the clergy."

Of

applied to the uſes for which they were granted[h]. It was therefore wiſely concerted, after the revolution, for the ſecurity of the nation from perpetual miſapplications of the public money, to allot a ſeparate income for the maintenance of the king's houſhold, and the ſupport of his dignity, (which is now called the civil liſt) and to put the reſt of the public revenues entirely under the command of the parliament. So that from the time of the revolution, the public money has been no more left to the diſcretionary management of the court, but the commons, after examining the current ſervices of each year, have appropriated the ſupplies to thoſe ſervices only, and the king's buſineſs has been to ſee the money applied according to their appropriation, of which an account at the next meeting of the parliament has been conſtantly ſubmitted to both houſes, before any further ſupplies have been granted[i]. In order therefore to introduce this great change in the public income, the commons, in the firſt place, voted that the revenue was expired by the vacancy of the throne, and not devolved on their majeſties; and though by a long courſe, and the practice of ſome ages, the cuſtoms had been granted to the kings for life, it was now laid down as a maxim, not to grant any revenue but from year to year, or at leaſt for a ſhort term of years[k]. This the whigs thought, would oblige the kings to ſuch a popular method of government, as ſhould merit the conſtant renewal of the grant. The king, who expected the ſame regard ſhould be ſhewn for him as for his predeceſſors, was not pleaſed with ſo precarious a revenue, which the tories obſerving, they took the occaſion to beget in him jealouſies of his friends, and with too great ſucceſs. They reſolved to reconcile themſelves to the king, by granting a revenue for life; but at preſent only to look on, till the whigs, who carried every thing they pleaſed, ſhould have refuſed it.

Purſuant to the maxim before-mentioned, when the king's revenue was brought into conſideration, it was pretended, that, as there were anticipations and charges upon it, in which many perſons were concerned, they had not time to examine that matter with due care; and therefore, by a proviſional act, they granted the king the revenue but for one year. This touched the king ſenſibly, and was ſo repreſented to him by the earl of Nottingham, that he concluded he was in the hands of perſons that did not intend to uſe him well. Nor indeed was it till the year 1698, that he could prevail to have the revenue ſettled for life.

The civil liſt for this year was ſettled at ſix hundred thouſand pounds, to be paid out of the public revenue, in which was included what was to be allowed to the queen regent, the queen dowager, the prince and princeſs of Denmark, the judges, and marſhal Schomberg, to whom the parliament had given a hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervices he had done[l]. A revenue of one million two hundred thouſand pounds a year was alſo voted to be ſettled for the conſtant neceſſary charge of ſupporting the crown in the time of peace. But before this was done, and two days after the vote of the expiration of the revenue, four hundred and twenty thouſand pounds had been granted for a preſent aid to be levied by ſix monthly aſſeſſments.

The princeſs of Denmark, depending entirely on the king for her allowance, was uneaſy that no propoſitions had been made to her of a ſettlement, nor any advance of money, ſince the king was on the throne; and therefore while the revenue was under debate, ſome of her friends moved, that a proviſion might be made for her, but being put off for that time, it was propoſed again juſt after the birth of the duke of Glouceſter, that her revenue might be advanced from thirty thouſand (which was what the king allowed her) to ſeventy thouſand pounds, which occaſioned ſome warm expoſtulations from the queen to the princeſs[m]; and as this ſum was to be paid out of the civil liſt, the motion was defeated by the king's prorogation of the parliament; nor was it, as will be ſeen, till the next year, that an act paſſed, allowing her a ſettlement of fifty thouſand a year, which occaſioned a great coldneſs between not only the king, but even the queen and the princeſs.

Whilſt the revenue was ſettling, there was one branch of it which the king had a mind ſhould be diſcharged. In his march through the weſtern counties, from his firſt landing, he had been moved to aboliſh the chimney-money, and he had promiſed to recommend it to the parliament. To this end he ſent a meſſage to the commons, acquainting them, 'that being ſenſible what a grievous burden hearth-money was to the people, eſpecially the poorer ſort, he was willing to agree either to a regulation of it, or the taking it away, not doubting but they would take care of his revenue ſome other way.' This proved to be an act of great prudence and popularity, for which the commons preſented an addreſs of thanks, expreſſed in very grateful terms, 'for this unprecedented offer for the eaſe of his people, aſſuring him, that they would make ſuch returns and be ſo careful of the ſupport of the crown, that the world might ſee, to the diſcouraging of his enemies, and ſatisfaction of all good men, that his majeſty reigned in the hearts of his people.'

But as popular as this act was, it met with ſuch oppoſition from the tories, that it ran a great hazard in the houſe of lords. They alledged, That it was the only ſure fund, which could never fail in war; ſo that money would be freely advanced upon it; and that a few regulations would take away any grievance, which might ariſe from it. But it was thought, they were not willing, that ſuch an act ſhould paſs, as would render the king acceptable to the body of the nation. It was alſo imagined, that the proſpect they then had of a ſpeedy revolution in favour of king James, made ſome of them unwilling to paſs an act, which ſeemed to lay an obligation on him, either to maintain it, or by reſuming his revenue to raiſe the hatred of the nation higher againſt him[n]. However, the act was paſſed at laſt, and this badge of ſla-

[h] Of this the preceding reigns were one continued inſtance. A gentleman, who lived in the latter end of king Charles II's reign, thus recapitulates ſome circumſtances in the houſe of commons: "I remember when eleven hundred thouſand pounds was given for building of ſhips, and not one built; and above two millions given to ſupport the triple league, and then it was preſently employed for the breaking of it; when twelve hundred thouſand pounds was given for an actual war with France, when at the ſame time we were under all the obligations for peace, and ſo continued."

[i] This appropriation of the public revenues (one of the improvements of our conſtitution at the revolution) is the great fence of our liberties, as it deprives the crown of the power of diſpoſing of theſe revenues at pleaſure, as it neceſſarily occaſions the having every article of the public ſervice diſcuſſed and approved by the parliament, and as it is made only from year to year with regard to the ſupplies of the current ſervices; ſo that without the annual meeting of the parliament, the navy, army, ordnance, and all the other wheels of the government are entirely ſtopped. By which means the meaſures of the court are continually examined, and any grievances laid open with ſuch freedom and weight, as will never ſuffer them to be long unredreſſed.

[k] The annual revenue, clear of all charges in the collection, at the time of king James II's abdication, was as follows:

1. Tunnage and poundage, with the wood-farm, coal-farm, and ſalt-farm	600,000
2. The hereditary and temporary exciſe, with the additional nine-pence for the year, ending June 24, 1689.	666,383
3. Hearth-money	245,000
4. Poſt-office	65,000
5. Wine licenſes	10,000
6. Impoſition on wines and vinegar, granted for eight years, ending June 24, 1693.	172,901
7. The impoſition on tobacco and ſugar	148,861
8. The impoſition on French linen, brandy, and ſilk	93,710
9. The ſmall branches (which before the crown-lands were ſold, amounted to 130,000l.)	60,000
Total neat revenue of the crown	2,061,855

1. Maintenance of ſeamen, and proviſion of naval ſtores	300,000
2. Ordinary of the navy and ordnance	50,000
3. Guards and other diſciplined troops	200,000
4. Garriſons, contingencies, &c.	50,000
Total	600,000

This being deducted out of the whole revenue, there remained for his civil liſt 1,461,885l. by which he was enabled, without any other aid, to ſupport a large army, and maintain great numbers of jeſuits and prieſts of all orders. How eaſy would it have been for him to have ſucceeded in his deſigns, with a revenue that placed him above the neceſſity of applying to the parliament, had he taken proper methods, or had not the revolution intervened? Hence appears the expediency of fixing boundaries to the expences of the civil liſt, and the importance of appropriating the reſt of the public revenue to the particular ſervices of each year, and of ſubmitting an account of the application of the ſupplies for theſe ſervices, to the diſcuſſion of the parliament.

[l] The queen dowager was to have 18,209l. 15s. 4d. 1-half per annum. The judges, maſters in chancery, and judges of Wales, 13,800l. per annum. The perpetuities out of the cuſtoms, (except 100l. a year to the heirs of colonel Fairfax) amounting to 358l. per annum, were alſo to be paid.

[m] Queen Mary, it ſeems, expreſſed a great deal of diſpleaſure at this attempt, to ſettle a revenue on the prince and princeſs. Taking her ſiſter one night to talk for it, ſhe aſked her, 'What was the meaning of thoſe proceedings?' To which the princeſs anſwered, 'She heard her friends had a mind to make her ſome ſettlement.' The queen haſtily replied, 'Pray what friends have you but the king and me?' This the princeſs herſelf told the ducheſs of Marlborough with great concern and reſentment. Conduct of D. of Marlb. p. 30.

[n] By the hearth-books it appeared, that the number of houſes, in England and Wales, ſoon after the reſtoration was about 1,230,000, and reckoning ſix perſons, at a medium, to each houſe, it fixes the number of the people, at that time, to be 7,380,000.

very (as it is expreſſed in the preamble) upon the whole people was removed, which expoſed every man's houſe to be entered into, and ſearched at pleaſure by perſons unknown to him.

The friends of king James had indeed ſome reaſon to expect a revolution in his favour at this time; for now it was that the king received intelligence of his having ſailed from Breſt with a conſiderable number of French troops, in order to land in Ireland, which being communicated to the commons, the following addreſs from both houſes was preſented to the king.

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and faithful ſubjects, the lord's ſpiritual and temporal, and commons aſſembled in parliament, being highly ſenſible of our late great and ſignal deliverance from popery and arbitrary power, whereof it has pleaſed Almighty God to make you the glorious inſtrument; and deſiring, to the utmoſt of our abilities, to expreſs our gratitude to your majeſty for ſo great and generous an undertaking, no leſs neceſſary to ſupport the proteſtant intereſt in Europe, than for recovering and maintaining the civil rights and liberties of theſe nations, ſo notoriouſly invaded and undermined by popiſh counſels and counſellors; and being likewiſe fully convinced of the reſtleſs ſpirits and continual endeavours of your majeſty's and the nation's enemies for the extirpation of the proteſtant religion, and the ſubverſion of our laws and liberties, do unanimouſly declare, that we will ſtand by and aſſiſt your majeſty with our lives and fortunes, in ſupporting the alliances abroad, in reducing of Ireland, and in defence of the proteſtant religion and laws of the kingdom."

To this addreſs the king returned a remarkable anſwer, ſaid to be drawn up in concert with Mr. Powle, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons.

My lords and gentlemen:

"IF any thing could add to the eſteem and affection I have for parliaments, and particularly for this, they would be much increaſed by the kindneſs you ſhew to me, and the zeal you expreſs for the public good, in the addreſs you have made, which in the manner as well as the matter has every thing in it, that ought to recommend it to me.

"I will aſſure you, that I will never abuſe the confidence you have put in me, being fully perſuaded, that there is no ſure foundation of a good agreement between a king and his people, but a mutual truſt; when that is once broken, a government is half diſſolved.

"It ſhall be therefore my chief care never to give any parliament cauſe to diſtruſt me; and the beſt method I can uſe for that purpoſe, is never to expect any thing from them, but what ſhall be their own intereſt to grant.

"I came hither for the good of the kingdom; and ſince it is your deſire that I am in this ſtation, I ſhall purſue the ſame ends that brought me.

"God has been pleaſed to make me inſtrumental to redeem you from the ills you feared; and it is ſtill my deſire, as well as my duty, to ſerve you in your religion, laws, and liberties; which was the only inducement, that brought me into England; and to theſe I aſcribe the bleſſings, that have attended this undertaking.

"When I ſpoke laſt to you, I told you of the neceſſity of aſſiſting our allies, and more eſpecially the ſtates of Holland, whoſe readineſs to relieve you, at ſo great a hazard and expence, from the extremities you lay under, needs no other argument to move you to the conſideration of it.

"As I was then a witneſs of their zeal and affection to promote the expedition, and to ſecond my endeavours, even with the neglect of their own ſafety; ſo I am now ſenſible of the inevitable ruin, they have drawn upon themſelves in giving you their aſſiſtance, if you ſhould not return it to them.

"They have really exhauſted themſelves to ſuch a degree, both as to men and money, that it is not eaſily to be imagined; and I am confident your generoſity will have as little bounds towards them, as theirs had towards you; and that you will not only enable me to make good the treaty with them, and repay what they have actually laid out upon this occaſion, (of which an account ſhall be given you) but that you will further ſupport them, to the utmoſt of your ability, againſt the power of their enemies, who muſt be yours too by their intereſt, and their religion, and do certainly deſign the ruin of Holland to be a ſtep to your deſtruction.

"I need not take pains to tell you the deplorable condition of Ireland, which, by the zeal and violence of the popiſh party there, and by the aſſiſtance and encouragement they have from France, is brought to that paſs, that it is not adviſable to attempt the reducing of it but by a conſiderable force; which, I think, ought not to be leſs than twenty-thouſand horſe and foot, which, by the bleſſing of God, will make the work ſhorter, and in conſequence the charge eaſier, though the firſt expence muſt of neceſſity be very great.

"You are to conſider, that towards the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſucceſs in relation to Ireland, as well as with regard to France, there muſt be ſuch a fleet, as may, in conjunction with the ſtates, make us ſo entirely maſters of that ſea, that nothing may be ſent from France to Ireland, or any where elſe, that may give diſturbance to us or our allies.

"I muſt alſo recommend to you the conſideration of the revenue to me, that it may be ſo ſettled, as that it may be collected without diſpute.

My lords and gentlemen,

"These things will amount to a great ſum, and muſt of conſequence be a preſent weight upon the people: but conſidering neither your religion nor your ſafety can probably be ſecured without theſe means, I conclude, nothing can be too great a price for their preſervation. And I will engage my ſolemn word to you, that whatever you ſhall give to theſe public ends, ſhall be ſtrictly applied to them; and that as you ſo freely offer to hazard all that is dear to you, ſo I ſhall as freely expoſe myſelf for the ſupport of the proteſtant religion, and the ſafety and honour of the nation."

The king had a juſt ſenſe of what the ſtates of the United Provinces had done towards the preſervation of the religion and liberties of England. He had, the very day of his advancement to the throne, ſent them a letter to aſſure them, "that his new dignity, inſtead of diminiſhing the affections he ever had, and the care he ever took, for the preſervation and proſperity of their republic, would only ſerve to enable him to diſcharge his office of ſtadtholder, with more weight and ſucceſs, towards the good and advantage of their ſtate; and that during his reign, he would make it his conſtant buſineſs and endeavour, to eſtabliſh and maintain a perfect intelligence, alliance and inviolable friendſhip, between his kingdoms and the united provinces, for the ſafety, welfare, and repoſe, of both eſtates; and the ſupport of the proteſtant religion." As the king therefore thought it highly reaſonable, that the ſtates ſhould be repaid, as ſoon as poſſible, what they had laid out in his expedition; he took all occaſions to put the commons in mind of it, and particularly in this ſpeech; purſuant to which, an account of the charges of the expedition was indeed taken, and the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds voted for that purpoſe, but it was not till the end of the ſeſſion, that a fund was ſettled for raiſing the money [o].

After the revenue, an attempt was made concerning the militia. A bill was prepared for ſettling it in ſuch a manner, that the management of it would, in a great meaſure, be taken both from the king, and from the lord lieutenants. Theſe

[o] The account of the charges laid out by the Dutch in this expedition, was as follows:

The charges of the fleet — — —	2,288,464	0	0
Proviſions for the horſe, &c. — —	186,000	0	0
Freight of the merchant-ſhips, — —	1,245,000	0	0
Freight of fiſhing-boats for landing the foot, and loſs of them — — — —	47,888	0	0

This account looks as if it was drawn for ſo much ſterling; but by the particulars, and by the ſum granted by the parliament for its diſcharge, it is plain, it muſt be for ſo many guilders, which at one ſhilling and tenpence halfpenny each, were equivalent to about 686,500l. ſterling at that time.

being generally peers, a bill that ſo much leſſened their authority, could not but be obſtructed in the houſe of lords; accordingly, it was ſuffered to lie on the table. By this proceeding, which was chiefly promoted by the whigs, as well as by that of the revenue, the king came to think, that thoſe who had raiſed him to the throne, intended to depreſs his power, as much as they had exalted his perſon. He ſeemed to grow jealous of his prerogatives, the importance of each being aggravated by the earl of Nottingham, who had given him a ſcheme of all the particular points, and their dependence one on another. He was ſo poſſeſſed with the earl's repreſentations, that many of thoſe who had formerly moſt of his confidence, found a coldneſs growing upon him, which increaſed their diſguſt; and made them apprehend, they ſhould ſee another reign full of prerogative maxims.

As the whigs were diſappointed in their militia-bill, ſo they could not be brought to another point, though often preſſed to it by the king. This was an act of indemnity, which with proper exceptions of ſome criminals, the king thought would very much ſettle the minds of the nation. Accordingly the king ſent a meſſage to each houſe, expreſſing his earneſt deſire that they would prepare a bill, for a general pardon; with ſuch exceptions only, as to them ſhould ſeem neceſſary for the vindication of public juſtice, in order to free great numbers of people from the guilt, reproaches and penalties, they were liable to. But how zealous ſoever the king was for an act of indemnity, the warmeſt of the whigs would not promote it. They thought it beſt to keep many under the laſh; they intended ſevere revenges for the blood, that had been ſhed, and for the many unjuſt things, which had been done in the end of king Charles II's reign. They ſaw, that the clogging the indemnity with many comprehenſive exceptions, would create king James a great party; ſo they did not think proper to offer at that: Yet they reſolved to keep them ſtill in their power, till a better opportunity of falling on them ſhould offer itſelf. They proceeded therefore ſo ſlowly in the affair, that the bill could not be brought to a ripeneſs during this ſeſſion. It is true, the great mildneſs of the king's temper, and the gentleneſs of his governmet, which was indeed rather liable to cenſure, as being too remiſs, ſet people's minds much at eaſe. And if it gave too much boldneſs to thoſe, who began to ſet up an open oppoſition to him, yet it gained upon the greater part of the nation, who ſaw none of thoſe moving ſpectacles, that had been ſo common in former reigns; and all promiſed themſelves happy days under ſo merciful a prince. But angry men put a wicked conſtruction on the earneſtneſs the king ſhewed for the act of indemnity: they ſaid, he intended to make uſe of a ſet of prerogative men, as ſoon as he legaliy could; and that therefore he deſired the inſtruments of king James's illegal government might be once ſecured, that ſo he might employ them. The earls of Monmouth and Warrington, were infuſing jealouſies of the king into their party, with the ſame induſtry, that the earl of Nottingham was, at the ſame time, inſtilling into the king jealouſies of them; and both acted with too much ſucceſs, which brought great confuſion into the courſe of affairs. For though the earls of Shrewſbury and Devonſhire did all they could to ſtop the progreſs and effects of thoſe ſuſpicions, with which the whigs were poſſeſſed, yet they had not credit enough to do it.

The next thing of importance was to paſs an act, for declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown (as had been agreed by the convention) to the king and queen and their iſſue, and after them to the princeſs Ann and her iſſue, and after them, to the king and his iſſue, by another queen. Accordingly a bill was ſent up by the commons to the lords, for that purpoſe; with a clauſe diſabling all papiſts from ſucceeding to the crown, to which the lords added, or ſuch as ſhould marry papiſts. To this was propoſed by the biſhop of Saliſbury, an additional clauſe abſolving the ſubject, in that caſe, from allegiance. This was ſeconded by the earl of Shrewſbury, and it paſſed without any oppoſition or debate. That prelate was ordered by the king to propoſe the naming of the princeſs Sophia, ducheſs of Hanover, and her poſterity, next in the ſucceſſion; the king ſignified his pleaſure in this alſo to his miniſters. The duke of Hanover was now changing his former meaſures, and ſeparating himſelf from the intereſts of France. The lords agreed to the propoſition, and, amongſt other amendments of the bill, added a proviſo in the princeſs Sophia's favour. The bill thus amended was returned to the commons, where it occaſioned great debates, and the houſe diſagreed to the lords proviſo. Mr. Hampden preſſed it vehemently, but the tories and alſo Wildman, and all the republican party oppoſed it. Their ſecret reaſon ſeemed to be a deſign to extinguiſh monarchy, and therefore to ſubſtitute none beyond the three who were named, that ſo the ſucceſſion might quickly come to an end. But it not being decent to own this, all that they pretended was, that there being many in the lineal ſucceſſion, after the three that were named, who were then of the church of Rome, the leaving to them the poſſibility to ſucceed, upon their turning proteſtants, might have a good effect on them, and diſpoſe them to hearken to inſtruction; all which would be defeated by a declaration in favour of the houſe of Hanover, beſides, that the mentioning that houſe would give an opportunity to foreigners of intermedling too far in the affairs of the nation; and that a parliament of England had never determined the degrees of ſucceſſion beyond two or three perſons. The king, who wiſhed nothing more earneſtly than to ſee the crown ſettled in the proteſtant line, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to bring the commons to a compliance with the lords, declaring in council, that his queen, and both the prince and princeſs of Denmark, deſired it as well as himſelf. The lords likewiſe warmly inſiſted on their clauſe, alledging 'That though in the inſtrument offered to the king and queen, the limitation went no farther than to their perſons; yet in law, which has reſpect to all ſucceeding ages, and that ſettles for ever the liberties of the ſubject, they thought it reaſonable to carry the limitation of the ſucceſſion of the crown farther than was neceſſary in that inſtrument, in which the crown was offered to their majeſties, and that had no other view but of the ſucceſſion of their poſterity. 2. That they could ſee no danger, nor any ill conſequence, that might follow a farther limitation, but very much to the contrary. For, this ſecured the nation effectually from the danger of having a papiſt to reign in it at any time hereafter, ſince of ſuch a number of papiſts, as ſtood next the crown in the lineal ſucceſſion, ſome might be prevailed on to make a ſhew of changing their religion, if they had a proſpect of ſucceeding to the crown upon it; and no danger being ſo great as the having one, who is a pretended proteſtant, but in truth a concealed papiſt, to reign over us; the moſt effectual way to ſecure our religion, was, to declare the ſucceſſion in a family, that was known to be proteſtant. In the next place, it was the intereſt of England, at preſent, to do right to that great houſe, by limiting this ſucceſſion according to the proviſo. For ſince this limitation had been propoſed, if it ſhould be now laid aſide, it would look like excluding that houſe, which might provoke them to take a reſolution, that might be of great prejudice to the nation in this preſent conjuncture.'

Theſe reaſons being communicated to the commons, ſeveral conferences were held between the two houſes, but to no effect; for both houſes adhered, and the bill, after depending two months, was dropt on the birth of the duke of Glocetter, ſon of the prince and princeſs of Denmark, born the 27th of July, and chriſtened William; the king, and the earl of Dorſet (ſtanding for his Daniſh majeſty) being godfathers, and the marchioneſs of Halifax godmother. The birth of this prince greatly contributed to diſſipate the fears of a popiſh ſucceſſor. Though the bill of rights was thus laid aſide for the preſent, it was reſolved to reſume it at the opening of the next ſeſſion, the ſucceſs of which ſhall be mentioned here, to put an end to this matter at once. When the time came, the king did not think it convenient to renew the motion of the princeſs of Hanover, and ordered the biſhop of Saliſbury to acquaint her with all particulars. It was proper to have a bill paſſed, that enacted the excluſion of all papiſts. For by that means, the ſucceſſion was in a manner brought to her door. And if any in the line before her ſhould pretend to change, as it was not very likely to happen, ſo it would not be eaſily believed. Wherefore it was reſolved to carry the ſucceſſion no farther at this time. The bill paſſed the commons, without any oppoſition; and being ſent to the lords, they juſtly conſidering how far king James had gone towards introducing the popiſh religion into the nation, took ſpecial care to prevent the like for the future, by adding a clauſe to the bill, 'That the kings and queens of England ſhould be obliged, at their coming to the crown, to take the teſt in the firſt parliament that ſhould be called at the beginning of their reign; and that if any king or queen of England ſhould embrace the Roman catholic religion, or marry with a Roman catholic prince or princeſs, their ſubjects ſhould be abſolved of their allegiance; and that the crown and government of theſe realms ſhould from time to time deſcend to, and be enjoyed by ſuch perſons, being proteſtants, as ſhould have inherited the ſame, in caſe the ſaid perſons ſo reconciled to the church of Rome, or marrying a papiſt as aforeſaid, were naturally dead.' This remarkable clauſe paſſed without any oppoſition or debate, which conſidering the great importance of it, was very ſurpriſing; and being agreed to by the commons, the whole bill was at laſt preſented to the king for the royal aſſent. This act rehearſes not only the foregoing clauſe, but the whole declaration of the rights and liberties of the ſubject, offered on the 13th of February to their majeſties, and eſtabliſhes them to be the rights and liberties of the people of England; recognizes that king James II. having abdicated the government, their majeſties are king and queen; ſettles the ſucceſſion, and obliges every king and queen, at the time of their taking the coronation-oath, to ſubſcribe, and audibly repeat the declaration of the 30th of Charles II; and enacts, that no diſpenſation by non-obſtante, of or to any ſtatute ſhall be allowed, unleſs mentioned in ſuch ſtatute [p].

By theſe acts the new ſettlement in England was compleated, as far as the enemies to the revolution would permit. For that the conſtitution was not brought to greater perfection; that the declaration of rights was not more full and proportionable to the importance of the occaſion, and favourable circumſtances of the conjuncture; and that all grounds of political and religious diviſions were not removed; was entirely owing to faction, diſcontent, prejudice, diſappointment, and the like. Whilſt the event of things was uncertain, men remained under the full influence of their fears, which made them act contrary to their prejudices. But when the revolution was ſecure, and theſe fears calmed, theſe prejudices reſumed their former power, and made them argue and reaſon in contradiction to what moſt of their leaders had acted. This has already appeared, and will more fully appear in the courſe of the hiſtory [q].

It is now time to turn to Scotland, and ſee by what ſteps and how far the revolution was eſtabliſhed in that kingdom. After that, the affairs of Ireland will require the reader's attention.

As to the affairs in Scotland [r] at this time, it will be proper to premiſe, that the declaration which the prince of Orange [p] It may not be amiſs to repeat here the rights and liberties which by this act are eſtabliſhed.

" 1 That the pretended power of ſuſpending of laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without conſent of parliament, is illegal.

" 2. That the pretended power of diſpenſing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been aſſumed and exerciſed of late, is illegal:

" 3. That the commiſſion for erecting the late court of commiſſioners for eccleſiaſtical cauſes, and all other commiſſions and courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.

" 4. That the levying of money for or to the uſe of the crown, by pretence or prerogative, without grant of parliament, for longer time, or in any other manner than the ſame is, or ſhall be granted, is illegal.

" 5. That it is the right of the ſubjects to petition the king, and all commitments and proſecutions for ſuch petitioning, are illegal.

" 6 That the raiſing or keeping a ſtanding army within the kingdom in time of peace, unleſs it be with conſent of parliament, is againſt law.

" 7. That the ſubjects, which are proteſtants, may have arms for their defence, ſuitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.

" 8. That election of members of parliament ought to be free.

" 9. That the freedom of ſpeech, and debates or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or queſtioned, in any court or place out of parliament.

" 10. That exceſſive bail ought not to be required, nor exceſſive fines impoſed, nor cruel and unuſual puniſhments inflicted.

" 11. That jurors ought to be duly impannelled and returned; and jurors which paſs upon men in trials for high-treaſon, ought to be freeholders.

" 12. That all grants and promiſes of fines and forfeitures of particular perſons, before conviction, are illegal and void.

" 13. And that for redreſs of all grievances, and for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving of the laws, parliaments ought to be held frequently."

[q] It was at this time ſuggeſted in all companies, that the preſent ſettlement was illegal and unjuſtifiable: that king James would ſhortly return with a powerful army, and ſettle things on a right foundation: that the intereſt of the church of England was involved with that of king James, and the one could not ſubſiſt without the reſtoration of the other. As theſe inſinuations were countenanced by ſome of the clergy, biſhop Burnet wrote a paſtoral letter to thoſe of his dioceſe, concerning the allegiance due to king William and queen Mary, in which, among other topics, he uſes that of the right of conqueſt, which had been always declined by the king, who choſe to receive the crown by the determination of the people, as more agreeable to his declaration. This paſtoral letter (with another of Charles Blunt, more full to the ſame purpoſe) was burnt three years after, by order of the parliament then ſitting. A little before the publication of the biſhop's letter, a libel was diſperſed by the diſaffected, called, 'A Short Hiſtory of the Convention, or New-Chriſtened Parliament,' againſt which a proclamation was iſſued, May 7, promiſing the reward of a hundred pounds for the diſcovery of the author, printer, or publiſher.

[r] The earl of Belcarras, who was a very zealous oppoſer of the revolution, has written 'An Account of the affairs of Scotland relating to the Revolution in 1688, as ſent to the late king James II. when in France, which was firſt printed in London in 1714 in 8vo.' From this piece it will be proper to make ſome extracts in theſe notes, in order that they may be be compared with the other accounts of the ſame facts given in the body of this hiſtory. " Never king, (ſays he) ſucceeded to a crown or throne more with the love and eſteem of his ſubjects than your Majeſty did generally to all Scotland, of all profeſſions; nor could any thing have diſturbed your happy reign, but the jealouſies and fears that were induſtriouſly ſpread abroad, as if you had deſigned, by giving a general liberty of conſcience, to ruin the religion then eſtabliſhed. If that had not been too much believed, and the fears of again encouraging by ſuch a liberty the fanatics, then almoſt entirely ruined, there would have been few, that would have refuſed to comply with all your majeſty's demands in parliament. But the fears of bringing back the fanatic party, then ſcattered through the world, that were always lying in wait for every opportunity to ruin the monarchy, and all thoſe who were faithful in it, made even your faithfuleſt ſubjects comply but with an unwilling mind, conſidering, that ſuch a toleration would again ſet up a party, that had coſt ſo much care, time, and treaſure, to deſtroy.

" The earl of Murray not ſucceeding in that parliament, becauſe of theſe apprehenſions, and his ſmall ſkill in managing ſuch an affair, where there were ſo many intereſts to unite; your majeſty diſſolved that parliament, and iſſued out a proclamation of indulgence and toleration to all perſuaſions.

" This put the epiſcopal clergy in ſuch a rage, that they could not conceal it neither in diſcourſes nor pulpits: and the preſbyterians grew ſo inſolent with it, upon the letter your majeſty wrote to them, then aſſembled at Edinburgh, wherein you told them your predeceſſors had been ſevere, and ruined ſeveral of them, but they might be confident of your protection againſt all their enemies.

" This and the earl of Meltfort's employing James Stuart to draw moſt of the public papers ſent down, who was known to be a profeſſed and inveterate enemy to the crown and their order, made the epiſcopal clergy at that time ſay and do many things, which afterwards they heartily repented, when it was too late; for their diſlike of the greateſt part of the nation, and their jealouſy misfortunately meeting with the inveterate malice of the preſbyterians, gave the greateſt advantage that could have been wiſhed for to the unbounded ambition of the prince of Orange; for nothing ever made him make ſo bold an attempt, but theſe diviſions, and the jealouſies that were induſtriouſly ſpread abroad, few being ſatisfied. The epiſcopal clergy or party, out of fear to loſe what they had long poſſeſſed; and though the preſbyterians for a few months firſt after the getting their liberty ſeemed ſatisfied, yet ſome grew as malicious as ever, being diſappointed of getting the government into their hands, as they hoped, and a revenge on their enemies.

" The order your majeſty ſent down commanding all in any office, either civil or military, to give up their commiſſions, and take up new ones, without taking the teſt; this made all employments liable to ſeveral penalties of the laws, and occaſioned a great conſternation; but not near to what by another order all in employments were commanded to take out remiſſions for breaking of the laws, which they had done by your majeſty's command, by which they thought themſelves ſufficiently warranted; as may appear by a letter the council ſent to your majeſty, wherein not only they, but the judges gave it as their opinion, that your majeſty's giving a commiſſion was ſufficient to hinder any being liable to the law, eſpecially conſidering, that the penalty was due to yourſelf. But notwithſtanding this advice, a ſevere proclamation was ſent down by the earl of Melfort, that all ſhould take out theſe remiſſions in three months, and pay for them three pounds ſterling to himſelf, and twenty pounds to James Stuart, who was to give them out; and ſuch as did not take them out, to be purſued for breach of law, and to be rendered incapable for ever thereafter of your mercy. This was thought very hard, even by the moſt loyal of your ſubjects, to be paying for ſuch remiſſions, and eſpecially to be giving ſo much to Mr. Stuart, that had but ſome months before got a remiſſion for plotting and contriving againſt your majeſty and government, and was generally believed at that time, by all that wiſhed well to your majeſty's government, to be under-hand betraying it. Nor have their apprehenſions been falſe; for ſince the revolution he has bragged to hundreds, that he gave ſeveral advices, deſignedly to ruin it, and to advance the intereſt of his friends.

" When firſt this order was read in council, all were ſilent; but next day a repreſentation was ſent up to your majeſty, both by the council and ſecret committee, to ſhew how inconvenient it would be, if ſuch an order were proclaimed; nor was there any man more againſt it than your chancellor, (the earl of Perth) and thoſe you truſted moſt. Your majeſty was pleaſed, on theſe repreſentations, to diſcharge its being preſſed; but it gave ſuch bad impreſſions of ſome, who were employed, that nothing will ever take it off; and it was generally believed, that nothing but your majeſty's own goodneſs could have hindered a thing, that would have been ſo advantageous to the contrivers, though diſhonourable to all that ſerved you. Nothing vexed the epiſcopal clergy more at that time, than to ſee ſome fanatics put both into council and ſeſſion; but all theſe diſcontents were but like ſmothered fire, until the birth of the prince of Wales, which afterwards broke out more violently; for, after that, ſeveral of the epiſcopal clergy were ſo far miſled, that they left off in a few weeks the praying for the prince of Wales, and were ſo apt, not only to believe the moſt calumnious reports of that time, but to inſinuate in their people fears of popery and arbitrary government; which did no ſmall prejudice, and made many, that have appeared ſince of a far different temper, extremely ſatisfied at the noiſe of the prince of Orange's coming over, being ſo weak as to believe he had made ſuch an attempt only to ſecure the laws, and to relieve them of their fears. But theſe diſcontents of the epiſcopal party, though they cannot be juſtified, yet they proceeded from jealouſies more than any ill deſign againſt your majeſty's government. But the preſbyterians being encouraged from their friends in England, and the rebels, who fled into Holland, growing then more inſolent than ever, being put in hopes again, by another way, of getting entirely the government into their own hands, and a revenge on their enemies, which were the two things they ſo long wiſhed to have an opportunity for, but would never have attained the ſame, if the indulgence granted them had not brought them together from the Weſt-Indies, ſo that they appeared in far greater numbers, than could well have been believed to be yet remaining after ſo long a tract of diſcouragement, they not only were joined together, but many, that never were of that profeſſion before, joined with them, as all the diſcontented of the nation have ever done ſince the revolution; making religion always the pretext of gaining their other ends.

" The jealouſy of the catholics did not a little heighten the diſcontents of both theſe parties likewiſe; and though they were not ſo afraid of them as of each other, becauſe of their ſmall number; yet with very uneaſy eyes they beheld them coming into the chief poſts both in civil and military employments. And though the preſbyterians, by the liberty granted to all, had their ſhare; and were alſo admitted into employments, which they had never before, but when neceſſity compelled former kings; yet they were

had cauſed to be diſperſed in Scotland, had a great deal of influence upon the body of the people. But the biſhops and epiſcopal clergy being devoted to the court, had been drawn in to a more than ordinary profeſſion of adherence to king James. For upon the news of the prince's expedition, they were induced to write the following letter to the king:

May it pleaſe your moſt ſacred majeſty,

"WE proſtrate ourſelves to pay our moſt devote thanks and adoration to the ſovereign majeſty of heaven and earth, for preſerving your ſacred life and perſon, ſo frequently expoſed to the greateſt hazards, and as often delivered, and you miraculouſly proſpered with glory and victory, in defence of the rights and honour of your majeſty's auguſt brother, and of theſe kingdoms; and that by his merciful goodneſs the raging of the ſea, and madneſs of unreaſonable men, have been ſtilled and calmed; and your majeſty, as the darling of heaven, peaceably ſeated on the throne of your royal anceſtors, whoſe long, illuſtrious, and unparallelled line is the greateſt glory of this your antient kingdom.

"We pay our moſt humble gratitude to your majeſty for the repeated aſſurances of your royal protection to our national church and religion, as the laws have eſtabliſhed them; which are very ſuitable to the gracious countenance, encouragement, and protection, your majeſty was pleaſed to afford to our church and order, whilſt we were happy in your preſence among us.

"We magnify the divine mercy in bleſſing your majeſty with a ſon, and us with a prince, whom we pray heaven may bleſs and preſerve, to ſway your royal ſceptres after you; and that he may inherit, with your dominions, the illuſtrious and heroic virtues of his auguſt and moſt ſerene parents.

"We are amazed to hear of the danger of an invaſion from Holland, which excites our prayers for an univerſal repentance from all orders of men, that God may yet ſpare his people, preſerve your royal perſon, and prevent the effuſion of chriſtian blood; and to give ſuch ſucceſs to your majeſty's arms, that all, who invade your majeſty's juſt and undoubted rights, and diſturb or interrupt the peace of your realms, may be diſappointed, and cloathed with ſhame, ſo that on your royal head the crown may ſtill flouriſh.

"As, by the grace of God, we ſhall preſerve in ourſelves a firm and unſhaken loyalty; ſo we ſhall be careful and zealous to promote in all your ſubjects an intrepid and ſtedfaſt allegiance to your majeſty, as an eſſential part of their religion, and of the glory of our holy profeſſion; not doubting, but that God, in his great mercy, who hath ſo often preſerved and delivered your majeſty, will ſtill preſerve and deliver you, by giving you the hearts of your ſubjects, and the necks of your enemies. So pray we, who in all humility are, &c. [s].

EDINBURGH, Nov. 3, 1688.

This letter was fatal, not only to the Scotch biſhops, but even to epiſcopacy itſelf in Scotland; for the diſtinction was very apparent, the preſbyterians fell in with the revolution [t], ſo far from being thankful for it, that both in their pulpits and converſation they openly declared, they thought themſelves nothing obliged to any toleration they had, it being given to introduce the catholics, and ruin proteſtants among themſelves. Nor were theſe jealouſies and apprehenſions only among the clergy; for after your majeſty had given warrant to the chancellor, viſcount of Tarbat, and myſelf, to enquire of all the officers of ſtate, judges, and officers of the army, their opinion and conſent for taking off the penal laws and teſts; moſt of them, though they conſented to it, yet had ſuch a cruel apprehenſion of other things further to be preſſed upon them, that it made them extremely uneaſy. And the turning out ſir George Mackenzie from being your advocate, and the lord Harruſs and Edmiſtoun from the ſeſſion, for refuſing to conſent to what was offered, heightened extremely the humour; for they were eſteemed of the greateſt integrity and learning of that judicatory; and it ſeems not without reaſon; for though they were humourous, yet after, and ſince the revolution, they both behaved themſelves exactly well, and refuſed all the offers of employment which were made them.

"Except for theſe fears and jealouſies that were ſpread like a plague through the land; and the too covetous taking of money by ſome of your ſervants (but that I will not meddle with, being reſolved to ſay nothing here but what conſiſts with my own knowledge) all other things in the government were as eaſy, and managed with as much juſtice as was ever known in any age. For never was a treaſury and exchequer more favourable in all ſorts of compoſitions, which your majeſty allowed us to do; nor was there ever before in the council or ſeſſion more juſtice and quick diſpatch of buſineſs, nor ſoldiers better paid, and with leſs trouble in the country; which the worſt of your enemies muſt acknowledge."

[t] Lord Belcarras gives the following account of the circumſtances of the revolution in Scotland. "In this condition [mentioned in the preceding note] was the kingdom till September 1688, when your majeſty ſent down an expreſs to your ſecret committee, which conſiſted of your chancellor, marquis of Annandale, viſcount Tarbat, archbiſhop of Glaſgow, ſir George Lockhart, and myſelf, to let us know, you expected an invaſion from Holland; which at firſt was thought by the generality of the nation to be abſolutely impoſſible, and only a pretext to raiſe money, or draw the army together for other deſigns, which added ſtill to former jealouſies. But theſe miſtaken fears were quickly ſuppreſſed, when they knew of ſuch preparations, as your majeſty was making in England, and were likewiſe affirmed by ſeamen coming daily from Holland of great preparations there, and noiſe of a war quickly to break out. Your majeſty's council appeared all of them ready and willing to concur in every thing, that could be offered for making the nation as capable as could be for ſerving you. And it ſeemed for a time the noiſe of foreign war had baniſhed their jealouſies and fears from among them; and from all quarters of the country the gentlemen and burgeſſes ſent to the council new offers of duty. The militia was ordered to be raiſed and modelled to a fourth part; and the forty days pay, which the country is obliged to of the whole, would have paid this fourth part ſix months. The caſtles of Edinburgh, Stirling, &c. furniſhed the gentry modelled into troops with arms, and orders were ſent to the chiefs of the Highland clans, to have their men in readineſs; which with the ſtanding forces would have made a conſiderable army.

"On the firſt notice of the invaſion, captain Mackay, nephew to the major-general, was taken up upon ſuſpicion of having laid down his employment in Holland, to be the better able to ſerve the prince of Orange in what he intended; which was reaſonable to believe by a letter found upon him, written by himſelf to his uncle, wherein he expreſſed great affection to the ſervice of the prince of Orange, and deſired his uncle to let him know, that though he had quitted his ſervice, yet he hoped, in the condition he was now in, he could be more uſeful; which he was willing to do with the hazard of his life; and that he wanted only to know how he might put his intention in execution. He was examined by a ſecret committee ſeveral times, but gave his oath frankly, he knew nothing of any deſign, nor meant nothing by theſe expreſſions but a compliment to the prince, who had concerned himſelf in getting him a rich marriage. But after the prince of Orange's coming over, he bragged of knowing all the deſign, and valued himſelf for ſwearing frankly rather than diſcover.

"There was likewiſe taken one Blackadder, a doctor of phyſic, who was ſent over by the baniſhed lords and gentlemen in Holland, to encourage their friends, and give them an account of the inclinations and affections of the people to the prince of Orange's intereſt. The only traffick that could be made out againſt him (for he likewiſe would diſcloſe nothing, but rather perjure himſelf of what he knew) was betwixt lord Murray, ſon to the marquis of Annandale, and one Murray of Tippermoore. For by a letter taken on him from Mr. Murray to the lord Murray, he told him he had delivered his meſſage to the prince of Orange, who received it very kindly, and deſired Blackadder to give him an account weekly of all that paſſed, and to let him know, how the nation ſtood affected to the prince of Orange. More might certainly be known from the doctor, if the marquis of Annandale, who had been laying in wait from the firſt noiſe of the invaſion, for a pretext to appear diſcontent, had not taken this opportunity. He complained highly, that any, who belonged to him, ſhould be ſuſpected; and that all the work made againſt Blackadder, was only deſigned againſt his family. So, to ſatisfy him, the doctor was no farther meddled with, that he might not have the leaſt ground, at ſuch a time, to complain. But all this did not ſatisfy him; for in all meetings, both in ſecret committee and council, he affected an air chagrin and diſcontent; though, to pleaſe him, we were too indulgent to his humours. Yet a little while after pretending ſickneſs, he retired into the country, until he was aſſured of the landing of the prince of Orange; and then he returned and acted a part more to the prejudice of your intereſts, than the moſt inveterate of your enemies was then able to do. The chief reaſon he gave for his diſcontent, was family piques betwixt him and the earl of Perth, and fears of his doing him ill deeds. But it was known to all the nation, that his hopes of advancing his intereſt by the prince of Orange, on the account of his relation by his lady, was the chief motive of all his actions, or at the leaſt, by his ſeeming diſcontent with the preſent government, he thought he would ſecure himſelf of all that your majeſty had beſtowed on him too prodigally. After he withdrew, every thing went on ſmoothly in council; and even the Weſtern and fanatic gentry were contending for employments in the militia troops; but by what afterwards appeared, it was with a deſign to betray.

"Nor was there any of them more forward in offering their ſervice than ſir James Montgomery, though at the ſame time he was aſſiſting the lord Lorn to borrow a conſiderable ſum of money to carry him to Holland. The reaſon given for borrowing this money, was to make a preſent to the counteſs of Melfort; nor could they have found a pretext that would have paſſed more eaſily; for it was reaſonably believed; otherwiſe, the lending ſuch a ſum by ſuch diſaffected perſons, at ſo critical a time, could not have miſſed to be ſuſpected, and his journey ſtopped. One Mr. Campbell was ſent over by the lord S——, to invite him over by warrant from the prince of Orange, but I believe told little of the deſign, though ſir James bragged after the revolution, of his knowing all, and of his having meſſages from the prince of Orange, but was contradicted by all, who were intruſted in it, who were few enough. This was the firſt appearance of ſir James Montgomery; nor had he any manner of influence, except with ſome few of the moſt bigoted fanatics, who had made a party, and exclaimed againſt the reſt of their profeſſion for accepting of the indemnity, or taking any favour from the government; nor would any thing pleaſe them, nor could any ſix of them agree, being left to their diſcretion. But notwithſtanding theſe diviſions, all parties kept within bounds, till the calling away of the ſtanding forces, when the government was left bare, and at the diſcretion of their enemies.

"About the beginning of September your majeſty ordered the earl of Perth to let you know, how the preſbyterian miniſters intended to behave and the epiſcopal party uſed their utmoſt endeavours to obſtruct and oppoſe it. Hence, upon the news of king James's being withdrawn, the lord chancellor (the earl of Perth) reſigned immediately the great ſeal, and endeavoured to eſcape into France, but being taken was confined in Stirling caſtle; and the populace of Edinburgh inſulted, not only the papiſts, but themſelves at the juncture, judging, as they behaved, their followers would follow their example. But he believed very juſtly, that they would not uſe freedom with him, deſired me to employ ſome perſon to try their pulſe. Sir Patrick M—— was one then, that had not attached himſelf apparently to any party, but was generally well with all parties. I deſired him to go to ſome of the leading men, that were then aſſembled in town, and tell them, from whom he was ſent, and that your majeſty, conſidering the many favours you had ſhewn them, expected they would now ſhew their gratitude in influencing their people to join heartily againſt the unnatural invaſion; and that, according to their preſent behaviour, they might expect favour and protection from you for the future. They anſwered him dryly, they were but a few then, but in a fortnight there would be a general meeting of them all; that then they doubted not but they would give your majeſty ſatisfaction, with ſuch anſwers. When the time came, they put off giving any poſitive anſwer, until they had new aſſurances from their friends in Holland, and were made high with expectations, that the prince of Orange would put all the government both of church and ſtate in their hands: and then they ſent me word by ſir Patrick M——, that they owned God had made the king an inſtrument of ſhewing them ſome favour; but ſince they were convinced, that what favour was ſhewn them, was only with a deſign to ruin the proteſtant religion, they would meddle no more with him, nor have any communion with any that belonged to him, eſpecially ſince he had employed in the chief offices papiſts or perſons popiſhly inclined; and ſo deſired to be excuſed from giving any further anſwer, but that they would behave in this juncture as God would inſpire them. This anſwer ſhewed plainly, what was to be expected from them; and from that time forward, both they and the gentry of their party took little pains to diſguiſe their reſolutions. But ſtill fears of accidents kept them from doing any thing the government could publicly puniſh; nor were any of them thoroughly in the affair, or truſted in it, ſo much as to make them venture any thing for what they ſo much deſired. If any was thoroughly truſted, it was the earl of A——le then at London. At the beginning of the indulgence he turned fanatic; but in a few months was wearied of it, and came to the earl of Perth, and told him, it was only his youth that miſled him, in joining with ſuch rebellious, mutinous pack; but henceforward he would ſerve the king heartily; and that he intended to go for London immediately, and to offer his ſervice. Therefore he deſired his recommendation, which he got, and was very kindly entertained by your majeſty, and at firſt was to have the earl of A————y's troop of horſe; but the earl of A————y coming up, and not being willing to part with it, he had the promiſe of a regiment, which he was to raiſe in the ſouthern countries; but finding your majeſty's affairs in greater diſorder than he imagined, he choſe rather to join with ſome of the diſaffected lords in England. The firſt he propoſed to was the earl of D———k. He told him, he found by the company he kept conſtantly, that he was not ſatisfied with the preſent government, and that he was as much diſſatisfied himſelf as any, though he was forced to diſſemble it, until he had got ſomething done he came for: that he was reſolved never to draw ſword againſt the prince of Orange; and that if he and his friends would truſt him, he would ſerve them faithfully, and run their fate. The earl of D——k told him, he was joined with others, and could not act without their liberty, but he ſhould ſpeak to them of it, and give an anſwer. The next day he appointed him to meet him in the city with the duke of Ormond, Mr. B——ll and Mr. Maul, who belonged to the princeſs of Denmark. After they had dined, the earl of D——k told him, he had ſpoke to prince George, and the reſt then with him, of what he had offered: that they all accepted willingly of it, but expected, that he would give an oath of ſecrecy the moſt binding way they could demand, which he alſo readily promiſed. So Mr. Maul officiated, and gave him the ſacrament, and he took the oath, that he would go with them to the prince of Orange, whenever he landed. But when it came to the puſh, his heart failed him, and he excuſed himſelf, that he had got a misfortune, for which, when the prince of Orange came to London, he was for ſome days in the meſſenger's hands, which made him immediately quit them, and join with thoſe intended to ſerve your majeſty in the following convention.

"What more of this kind of treachery was carried on, I cannot be poſitive, for I believe very few Scotſmen were concerned in it; for I doubt not, if they had, but they would have valued themſelves in it with the reſt, for ſeveral did ſo, that were not concerned; nor could any ſuch treacherous deſigns have been concealed, conſidering the pains both the ſecret committee and council took to find them out. And now entirely well affected to your majeſty was the little army you had in Scotland, which was ſo advantageouſly poſted through the kingdom, that even the moſt diſaffected lived peaceably expecting the event? But ſo ſoon as your majeſty ſent your orders that they ſhould be brought together, and be in readineſs to march into England, then all diſcontented people and fanatics in the nation thought they had hit on their own time, believing your majeſty's affairs in England muſt be in a miſerable condition, when you had need of ſo ſmall a force, and for it to leave a government naked, and loſe a whole country, which otherwiſe might have been ſo uſeful to you.

"When firſt the earl of Melfort, by your majeſty's order, wrote of it to the ſecret committee, they immediately ſent an expreſs to lay before your majeſty the inconveniency of it; and likewiſe to propoſe a deſign they had with it, and modelled the militia, and a detachment of the Highlanders, to make an army of thirteen thouſand men, with half year's pay, to have lain either upon the borders of Scotland, or in the north of England; which certainly would have hindered all thoſe riſings in the north of England, which made a noiſe ſo far above what really they were, and proved ſo prejudicial to your affairs. But inſtead of following this advice, which was the unanimous advice of the whole council, the earl of Melfort wrote down an order, not ſubſcribed by your majeſty, but only in your majeſty's name, ordering, that the army ſhould immediately march, and that if any of your ſervants were afraid to ſtay behind, they might go along with the army. With a ſorrowful heart your majeſty's orders were obeyed, for the conſequences were too evident; ſo about the beginning of October they began their march. The council, after that, ordered the modelled militia to be brought together about Edinburgh, and ſome to be quartered in the ſuburbs; but the new raiſed men, that would quickly have been brought into order, if mingled with modelled troops, ſignified little to keep up the face of authority; nor was their commander ſir George Monro, better at his trade than the reſt, having loſt any thing he had learned in Germany long ago, nor had he retained any thing, but affected naſtineſs, brutality, and fanaticiſm. Neceſſity, and the recommendation of ſome, more out of friendſhip to him than the ſervice, perſuaded the council to give him a commiſſion, until your majeſty's pleaſure ſhould be known, which afterwards you confirmed.

"The preſbyterians and diſcontented party ſeeing the miſerable and abandoned condition your affairs were in, took their opportunity accordingly; for ſo ſoon as the army paſt the borders, Edinburgh was filled with numbers of them of all degrees, from all places in the kingdom, who then thought it ſafe to take off their maſks, and meet publicly in ſeveral clubs, where they deliberated, as formerly, what was fit for them to do in that juncture, as if they had been allowed by authority. And the council and ſecret committee knew, from ſome ſpies they had amongſt them, all that paſt at their meetings; yet they were forced to overlook what they had not force to ſuppreſs. The chiefs of theſe meetings were the earl of G——n, earl C——d, earl D——d, earl T——s, lord R——s, lord M——n, a fanatic, a few months before put into the ſeſſion; ſir J——s M——y, A——r younger, Mr. W——m H——n, Mr. W——m L——t, M——y of Philiphaugh, R——n, D——d, B—e of Grenock, M——m, L——n, maſter of Burley, Mr. F——s, M——y, major B——n, of Baillie-Hall, G——e S——g chirurgeon, one M——s a merchant, B——e of Broomhall, P——r, R——y L——t, the maſter of Melvil, lord B——y, ſir P—k M——y, O——n, &c. Several joined with them afterwards, but theſe were the chief beginners and headmen among them, until the baniſhed rebels from Holland met them at London, and eclipſed them. The preſbyterian miniſters did not publicly meet them, but, according to their antient cuſtom, nothing was determined without their advice and approbation. One of the firſt things they took into conſideration, was, how to hinder all correſpondence betwixt your majeſty and your council, which ſir James Montgomery undertook, and did it ſo effectually, that few packets miſſed him, which was eaſy to be done, having correſpondence both about Berwick and the north of England. Yet notwithſtanding all the care they took, ſome poſts came through, until the riſing of the northern countries in England with the earl of Danby and lord Lumley: then they opened all packets, and only ſuffered ſuch letters to paſs as they thought fit: Some expreſſes were ſent down by the earl of Melfort to his brother; but for fear of diſcouraging, always made things ſo much better than what was reported by theſe meetings at Edinburgh, or other letters that came down; that the ſecret committee was in great perplexity to know the truth. This obliged them alſo to ſeize the packet, and open the letters; but it had ſo often been done before, both by the diſcontented party in Scotland, and the lords in the north of England, that there was little or nothing learned by it. For ſeveral weeks after there came neither packets nor expreſs; at laſt one came with an account of the landing of the prince of Orange, and that your majeſty had marched down to meet him. Still the earl of Melfort gave his brother all the hopes imaginable; but the earl of D——e wrote in ſo different terms to me, that my lord chancellor reſolved to ſend one to receive your majeſty's commands, to let him know the truth of what was doing; for which one Baillie Brand, merchant in Edinburgh, was ſent expreſs, and recommended by the viſcount of Tarbat as one moſt proper, being accuſtomed to travel that road about his own affairs, and ſo might be the leſs capable of ſuſpicion. The chancellor by him gave you an account of the bad ſtate this nation was in ſince the calling away the forces, and the preſbyterians declaring entirely againſt you. But the meſſenger betrayed his truſt, and went ſtrait into the prince of Orange's camp, and was introduced by Dr. Burnet. He told the prince, he was ſent by ſeveral to offer his highneſs their ſervice. This was no ſooner known, but the viſcount of Tarbat was extremely ſuſpected to be one of theſe; but I am convinced he had not at that time any correſpondence; for there was no man in the nation in ſuch apprehenſions of danger, after he read the prince of Orange's declaration, and ſaw by it he intended to ſacrifice all to ſatisfy the preſbyterians, and thoſe rebels, that did come over with him, and who were for the moſt part the viſcount of Tarbat's perſonal enemies.

"This way failing of having your commands, the council ordered three of their number to wait on your majeſty, viz. the viſcount of Tarbat, the preſident of the council, and myſelf. The other two fearing to get through, and not being able to ride, excuſed themſelves; ſo I was ſent alone.

"Some days before I left Edinburgh, it was ſpread abroad, that the rabble of the town deſigned to make an uproar, which was purpoſely ſet about by theſe meetings to frighten thoſe you truſted, and by ſome, who had a mind to be rid of my lord chancellor, to have the government in their own hands, that they might be in a better condition to make their court to the prince of Orange. The chief of thoſe was the marquis of Annandale, who thought, that ſo early an appearance for the prince of Orange could not but be extremely meritorious; nor could they have done it more effectually, than by ſtirring up the rabble againſt the government, and making a public mutiny and exclamation againſt thoſe things mentioned by him in his declaration.

"The news of the treachery of your army, and of your majeſty's being come back to London, was no ſmall encouragement to them, that deſigned to make their court, eſpecially to the viſcount of Tarbat, and ſir J. Dalrymple, who, though the marquis of Annandale appeared the head of all, yet they were the ſprings, by which every thing was moved and ordered ſo well, that he was ſatisfied with the vanity of the name, whereas they were ſure of the profit without hazard. For if your majeſty had ſucceeded contrary to their expectation, all the ſtreſs of the diſorders they could fairly put upon him; and if the prince of Orange proſpered, they knew, they had ſuch friends about him, that they would keep all the honour of ruining the government, and getting the council to declare for them. Their chief deſign to get this accompliſhed was to get rid of the lord chancellor. The marquis of Annandale deſigned it; both out of family-pique, and to get the government into his hands, as falling due to him after the chancellor's departure, he being next officer of ſtate. The way he propoſed for this was to have all the troops diſbanded, which he knew would have all been at the chancellor's devotion, except their miſerable general, and, bad as they were, would have been better than could have been brought againſt them; for the council having kept ſome inferior officers of the earl of D——s regiment, that came down for recruits, put them in tolerable order. The viſcount of Tarbat propoſed in council, that theſe troops might be diſbanded, being an unneceſſary charge, ſince he believed there would be no more to do with ſoldiers, and the prince of Orange had declared in his declaration the illegality of keeping up forces in time of peace. The earl of Perth, who was deſirous to do every thing to ſatisfy them, and not conſidering their deſign, also the epiſcopal party. The prince of Orange being informed of theſe things, and having firſt diſpatched major-general Mackay, with ſome troops under his command, into that kingdom, he aſſembled ſuch of the Scotch lords and gentlemen, as were in London on the 7th of January, and made this ſpeech to them:

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE only reaſon, that induced me to undergo ſo great an undertaking, was, that I ſaw the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms overturned, and the proteſtant religion in imminent danger. And ſeeing you are here ſo many noblemen and gentlemen, I have called you together, that I may have your advice, what is to be done for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring your laws and liberties, according to my declaration."

As ſoon as the prince had retired, the lords and gentlemen went to the council chamber at Whitehall, and having choſen the duke of Hamilton their preſident, conſulted what advice was proper to be given his highneſs in this conjuncture; and after ſome hours debate, they agreed upon the ſubſtance of it, and appointed the clerks, with ſuch as were to aſſiſt them, to draw up in writing, what the meeting too eaſily conſented to it, and truſting ſome of theſe he ſaw moſt earneſt for it, next day they were all diſmiſſed except four companies of foot and two troops of horſe, for bringing in the public money. So ſoon as they had got them diſmiſſed, the marquis of Annandale and the reſt of the councillors, that were of his party, came to my lord chancellor's own lodging, and told him, they thought themſelves no longer in ſafety to meet in council where he was, and ſeveral others, incapacitate by law. But if he and they would retire, it would ſoon be ſeen how rigorouſly they would act in the king's ſervice, and get all the rabble pacified, and the diſcontented meeting diſmiſſed. Before he gave them any poſitive anſwer, he retired into another room, where the duke of Gordon, and all the catholic councillors were met upon the noiſe of this advice of the marquis of Annandale; and he told them what had paſſed. All unanimouſly adviſed him to be gone; and that it would look better to do it voluntarily than be compelled, as certainly they would do now when they had begun, and had all the rabble and diſcontented meetings on their ſide. Several others likewiſe, out of concern for him, gave him the ſame advice, thinking it dangerous for him to truſt an enraged multitude. Theſe advices of his friends determined him; ſo he returned to theſe lords, and took his leave of them, and went ſtrait to the country."

The earl of Belcarras then gives an account of the riots at Edinburgh, and the demoliſhing the popiſh chapel there, and plundering of ſeveral houſes belonging to papiſts, "the council not doing any thing to hinder their diſorders; for ſuch as abhorred theſe barbarities, thought themſelves happy to eſcape the rage of the rabble; others were ſo far from diſcouraging theſe abuſes, that it was generally known they were the chief promoters of them. After the noiſe of the rabble, adds he, was a little abated, the marquis of Annandale, as next officer of ſtate, called the council, and propoſed an addreſs to be ſent up to the prince of Orange, with the higheſt acknowledgments of gratitude for his generous undertaking of freeing them from popery and tyranny, and offers of future ſervice; but there were ſo many, who oppoſed it, that it was ſtopped. Thoſe, that hindered for a while the violences of the marquis of Annandale, and his party, were the two archbiſhops, the preſident of the ſeſſion, ſir George Mackenzie, maſter of B———o, Mr. C———s, H———re, now earl, and the lord L———e. But though they got the addreſs firſt offered ſtopt, yet they were out-voted, when it was debated, if it was proper to find a way at all; and ſo lord G———s was ſent up with an addreſs very ſhort, and in general terms, which was very coldly received, a franker one being promiſed and expected.——— The marquis and moſt of the council began to prepare for going up to make their court; but that they might do it the better, it was voted in the council, that they ſhould deſire the lord of the treaſury to pay their expences, which was likewiſe carried. The marquis and viſcount of Tarbat were very ready to comply, ſince they were to have their ſhare; but the earl of Tweedale (who with theſe two were all that were in town of the treaſury) was not then in a condition to go up himſelf, and abſolutely refuſed; ſo for want of a quorum the whole project was broke, and they were forced to go on their own charges. After the viſcount of Tarbat, ſir George Mackenzie, and the preſident of the ſeſſion were gone, the marquis of Annandale took upon him abſolutely the government. While they ſtaid there was at leaſt ſome decency kept; but they were no ſooner gone, but the marquis, like another Maſſinello, ordered all at his pleaſure, turned out ſeveral from their employments about the treaſury, cuſtoms, and other places, and put in creatures of his own; and when he had ordered all he thought fit, he followed the reſt of the council, and left the earl of S———e, and ſome others of the council of his own party, to manage in his abſence.

"Never was ſuch a confluence ſeen on the road of all ſorts, degrees, and perſuaſions, as at that time going up; for no ſooner was it known, that your majeſty was gone, and the prince of Orange come to London, but all that could ſcrape ſo much money together, went up; the preſbyterians and diſcontented noblemen, gentlemen, and miniſters, to receive the fruit of their labours and great promiſes; the epiſcopal party, to endeavour to ſave themſelves from the ruin they ſaw inevitably coming upon them by their enemies getting the abſolute diſpoſal of the government both in church and ſtate. But their number was nothing to be compared to the others, after they had met with their friends from Holland. Every night, after they were once gathered together, they kept their meetings in St. James's-ſtreet, at the Ship-tavern. Then they conſulted what was next to be done, both to get the government in their hands, and how to hinder all others, who were not of their party.

"One of the firſt things propoſed was, who ſhould be for ever incapacitated for all public employments. Five only were named at firſt, and ſent with monſieur Beaton to the prince of Orange, at the deſire of the whole meeting; and theſe were the duke of Queenſberry, viſcount of Tarbat, ſir George Mackenzie, viſcount of Dundee, and myſelf. But the prince of Orange abſolutely refuſed, being reſolved to put nobody in deſpair, till once he knew, how they intended to behave for his intereſt; which ſtop made us go on no further in that affair, though they intended (as was mentioned) next parliament, that all ſhould be incapacitated, whoever had ſerved your majeſty in any employment whatſoever. But that took ſo many in, and ſo many of themſelves and friends being concerned, it was likewiſe hindered, not only by the prince of Orange, who deſired not to be confined to them, but by moſt of the leading men among them, who accepted the chief employments, and particularly the duke of Hamilton, whom I cannot paſs by, without giving your majeſty ſome account of his behaviour, not only in this affair, but a little before; and eſpecially what I was moſt concerned in myſelf.

"The day after your majeſty's firſt going from London I came there; and hearing the unhappy news I thought it was reaſonable to deſire the advice of all other councillors, who were there, what I ſhould write to the council, who had ſent me up to receive your commands, and let your majeſty know the condition of the kingdom, and give you new aſſurances of loyalty and fidelity, in terms very different from what was alledged by ſome, before your majeſty went away, as if the council of Scotland had been ſending ſome of their number to join with thoſe, that had petitioned you for the calling a new parliament. After I had got together all the councillors, which were the earl of A———y, lord L———n, viſcount of Dundee, lieutenant general D———s, we went to the duke of Hamilton's lodging, where I told them on what account I was ſent; and now that your majeſty was gone, deſired their advice what I ſhould write home, (for all that time we knew nothing of what troubles had happened,) and gave the duke a letter from the council, wherein they deſired he might aſſiſt me in receiving your majeſty's commands, and telling you the condition they were in. So ſoon as he read his own, he deſired to ſee the letter I had brought to your majeſty; otherwiſe he would not meddle in our affairs. To ſatisfy him, I gave him a double of it; and though he preſſed with all the paſſion his natural fire and inſolent temper could permit, that I might give him the principal, I abſolutely refuſed to do it at all; and I had no reaſon, ſince he was not to deliver it, and that your majeſty was gone. This put him into ſuch a fury, that he no more could conceal his deſign of deſiring the letter, and told, that if he had the principal letter, he ſhould give it to the lords met at Whitehall, to ſhew them what a letter I had brought up, ſubſcribed by a chancellor and ſeveral other councillors ſtill ſitting there contrary to law: That he would meddle in nothing, wherein they were concerned; and that he was free himſelf, having never acted ſince the laſt indemnity; but that he would conſult with the Engliſh lords, what was proper next to be done; and ſo in a rage left us in his own houſe. But three days after, when he heard of your majeſty's coming back from Feverſham, and that things were like not to go on as he expected, he ſent for the viſcount of Dundee, and made great excuſes for his paſſion, and deſired him to go to us all, and offer his friendſhip, and in his own lodging prays and intreats us, that we might make no more of it. After your majeſty's coming back, no man, for the ſhort time you ſtaid, appeared more concerned for your ſervice. But your majeſty had no ſooner come to Whitehall, than he had his coach ready, and went ſtrait to the ſeſſion houſe to the prince of Orange, and offered him his ſervice, and was received more kindly than any other, not out of affection, but that he ſaw him the fitteſt tool to manage the different intereſts of the nation; for with the diſcontented noblemen and gentlemen none appeared more diſſatisfied with all that had been done in the former reign, though none had a greater hand in all that was done. With the preſbyterians he always pretended he had been in their intereſt; and what he did, that looked like compliance with the government againſt them, was only to keep them from greater misfortunes. With the epiſcopal clergy, at leaſt with ſuch as truſted him, who were very few, he begged they might ſuſpend their judgment of him, until a convention; then it ſhould be ſeen, who were moſt for the intereſt of the king and nation. With theſe pretexts, which is no hard taſk for men that will abandon for their intereſts all truth, honour, and religion, he cajoled a vaſt number of all perſuaſions, and made himſelf thought abſolutely neceſſary; which was the only thing he aimed at both in your brother's reign and your own. And to carry on this the better among the different parties, in appearance he meddled with none of their meetings, for that would declare him too much a party, until he got all things ready for their great meeting at Whitehall, whereof he was choſen preſident. He propoſed the great diſorders at home; that all the nation was caſt looſe without any ſhadow, or order of government. Therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary, that a government ſhould be lodged ſomewhere, until a convention of eſtates were called: The great diſorders that had fallen out, and the licentious liberty the mob had taken, made many comply to that propoſition, though extremely againſt their inclinations. And what made it paſs the eaſier, was the time of this convention being prefixed to ſo ſhort a day as the fourteenth of March, 1689. Beſides it could hardly be avoided without being impriſoned, all the roads being ſtopped, and paſſage abſolutely denied, and ſo would have rendered them incapable of appearing for your intereſt. In the convention met then, the earl of Arran did read over a ſhort paper, wherein he told them, he believed there could be no other means to reſtore peace and happineſs in Britain, but to ſend to your majeſty, and deſire you would return. There were a great many there, who would willingly join in ſuch a propoſition; but his lordſhip brought it in without letting any of your friends know it. Beſides, at that time the earl of Arran was extremely ſuſpected, both for his going in to the prince of Orange on the firſt noiſe of your majeſty's going away, and the great intereſt his father had with the prince of Orange, and the fanatic diſcontented party. The moſt ſenſible and beſt of your friends judged likewiſe, that though this propoſal ſeemed juſt and bold, yet it was then ill-timed, conſidering, if any had joined with him, the prince of Orange would immediately have ſent down troops to Scotland, which would inevitably hinder all appearance for your intereſt in the convention, which was believed to be the only place proper to appear in; and that at that time no wiſe man ought to do more, but to get out of the claws of their enemies. In this meeting there was nothing elſe done, but an offer of ſigning the aſſociation, which all refuſed, who intended to act for your intereſt. After that was over, both parties made what haſte they could to get home, but ſtill the prince of Orange denied paſſage until he was declared king: which was thought he did, that all the Scots there might kiſs his hand, which would be a kind of acknowledgment. But notwithſtanding that duke Hamilton, and all thoſe who came over from Holland, and ſeveral others went and did it; yet many of the Scots, even of thoſe, who were as violent as any, refuſed it; which was extremely ill taken." Acc. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 16, &c.

The

thought expedient to adviſe the prince, and to bring it to them the next day in the afternoon. Accordingly the writing was preſented to them; and ſome time being ſpent in conſultation about the fitteſt way of convening a general meeting of the eſtates of Scotland, at laſt they agreed in their opinion, and ordered the advice to be tranſcribed fair with the amendments. But as they were going to break up for that time, the earl of Arran propoſed to them, "that they ſhould move the prince of Orange, to deſire the king to return, and call a free parliament; which would be the beſt way to ſecure the proteſtant religion and property, and to heal all breaches." This propoſal ſeemed diſagreeable to the whole meeting, and eſpecially to the duke of Hamilton, their preſident, the earl's father; but they immediately broke up. The next day, they met at three of the clock in the ſame place, and ſir Patrick Hume took notice of the propoſal made by the earl of Arran, and deſired to know, whether any perſon there would ſecond it; but none appearing to do it, he ſaid, "that what the earl had propoſed was evidently oppoſite and inimicous to his highneſs the prince of Orange's undertaking, his declaration, and the good intentions of reſtoring the proteſtant religion, and of reſtoring their laws and liberties expreſſed in it;" and farther deſired, "that the meeting ſhould declare this to be their opinion of it." The lord Cardroſs ſeconded ſir Patrick's motion. It was anſwered by the duke of Hamilton, their preſident, "that their buſineſs was to prepare an advice to be offered to the prince; and the advice being now ready to go to the vote, there was no need, that the meeting ſhould give their ſenſe of the earl's propoſal, which neither before nor after ſir Patrick's motion any had pretended to own or ſecond; ſo that it was fallen out of doors; and that the vote of the meeting upon the advice brought in by their order, would ſufficiently declare their opinion." This being ſeconded by the earl of Sutherland, the lord Cardroſs, and ſir Patrick Hume acquieſced in it; and the meeting voted unanimouſly the advice following:

"We the lords and gentlemen of the kingdom of Scotland, aſſembled at your highneſs's deſire in this extraordinary conjuncture, do give your highneſs our humble and hearty thanks for your pious and generous undertaking for preſerving the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring the laws and liberties of theſe kingdoms.

"In order to the attaining theſe ends, our humble advice and deſire is, that your highneſs take upon you the adminiſtration of all affairs, both civil and militaty; the diſpoſal of of the public revenues and fortreſſes in the kingdom of Scotland; and the doing every thing that is neceſſary for the preſervation of the peace of the kingdom, until a general meeting of the ſtates of the nation; which we humbly deſire your highneſs to call, to be holden at Edinburgh the 14th day of March next, by your letters or proclamation, to be publiſhed at the Market-croſſes of Edinburgh, and other headboroughs of the ſeveral ſhires and ſtewartries, as ſufficient intimation to all concerned, and according to the cuſtom of the kingdom. And that the publication of theſe your letters or proclamation be by the ſheriffs or ſtewart-clerks for the freeholders, who have the value of lands, holden according to law, for making elections, and by the town clerks of the ſaid boroughs, for the meeting of the whole burgeſſes of the reſpective royal boroughs, to make their elections, at leaſt fifteen days before the meeting of the eſtates at Edinburgh, and the reſpective clerks to make intimation thereof, at leaſt ten days before the meeting for the elections; and that the whole electors and members of the ſaid meeting at Edinburgh, qualified as above expreſſed be proteſtants, without any other exception or limitation whatſoever; to deliberate and reſolve what is to be done for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring the laws and liberties of the kingdom, according to your highneſs's declaration.

"Dated at the council-chamber the 10th day of January 1689."

This addreſs being ſubſcribed by above thirty lords and about eighty gentlemen, was preſented in their preſence at St. James's by the duke of Hamilton to the prince of Orange, who thanked them for the truſt they repoſed in him, and deſired a time to conſider upon ſo weighty an affair. And accordingly upon the 14th of January the prince met them again at St. James's, and ſpoke to them as follows:

My lords and gentlemen,

"IN purſuance of your advice I will, until the meeting of the ſtates in March next, give ſuch orders concerning the affairs of Scotland, as are neceſſary, concerning the calling of the ſaid meeting, for the preſerving of the peace, the applying of the public revenue to the moſt preſſing uſes, and putting the fortreſſes in the hands of perſons, in whom the nation can have a juſt confidence. And I do further aſſure you, that you will always find me ready to concur with you in every thing, that may be found neceſſary for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and reſtoring the laws and liberties of the nation."

The earl of Crawford then deſired of his highneſs, that himſelf, the earl of Lothian and others, who came to town ſince the addreſs had been preſented, might be allowed to ſubſcribe it; which was accordingly done; after which the prince retired, and all ſhewed great ſatisfaction with his anſwer.

On the 14th of March the convention of Scotland met[u]; and after public prayers performed by the biſhop of Edin-

[u] The earl of Belcarras obſerves, that how to behave in the convention, puzzled not a few, but all the loyal party: Some thought they could not in conſcience go to any meeting called by the prince of Orange; that it was a breach of their oath in the teſt to ſit in any meeting not called by regal authority. "But others judged, ſays he, that ſince your majeſty was not in a condition at that time to call a convention, they might very lawfully go, ſince it was only to ſerve you, that they expoſed themſelves to a victorious and inſulting enemy. But your majeſty ſending over George H———y juſt at the time when theſe reſolutions were forming, made all your friends reſolve to go down; and ſince they knew you allowed them, to endeavour to make all the intereſt they could, that members might be rightly choſen.

"The marquis of Annandale was come up a little before me, to receive the rewards of his ſervice; but he was drily received, and there were ſo many enemies about the prince of Orange, that he began again to look to his old friends, and to make great apologies for what was paſt in Scotland, and promiſed his aſſiſtance in the convention. There was ſo much need for help, that he was received, and all your friends joined to go down to Scotland to prepare your friends in the ſeveral counties and towns for the election of commiſſioners. But it was too long before it was reſolved on, and many of the loyal gentlemen abſolutely refuſed to meet on call, which gave the prince of Orange's party and fanatics great advantage. Yet notwithſtanding of theſe diſadvantages, if forces had not been ſent down, and all the aforeſaid perſons admitted, without any repeal, a thing never heard of before, your intereſt had been aſſerted in the convention.

"The firſt that came down of either parties, was the viſcount of Dundee and myſelf. When we came to Edinburgh about the end of February, we found that city in a great quiet, and generally well affected. The college of juſtice, to free themſelves, after the marquis of Annandale left the government, armed themſelves, and made up a battalion of very good men, which kept all the diſaffected in great awe. But duke Hamilton believing they would not be for his purpoſe, got an order ſent down with commiſſary M——o to diſband them. On our firſt coming we waited on the duke of Gordon, who was capitulating to render up the caſtle of Edinburgh. At our entry into the caſtle, we met all the duke's furniture coming out; which gave us ſmall hopes of his keeping it; but we had the good fortune to convince him, that it would be ſo much for your majeſty's intereſt, and his own honour, that he promiſed to keep it out until he ſaw what the convention would do. I ſay not this in the leaſt to diſparage any thing he did, for I ſaw him have very good inclinations to do for your intereſt. But his never having orders from you, and his hearing all other forts and places given up, diſcouraged him extremely. He had likewiſe a great temptation from the prince of Orange, for he wrote to him a very obliging letter, with full aſſurance of indemnity and protection. But notwithſtanding of that, and of ſeveral advices of ſuch as he believed wiſhed him well, and who haunted him conſtantly to get him to deliver up the caſtle, yet he reſolved to hold out. But the great error he committed (though ſeveral others were laid to his charge, that were not true,) was, after he had reſolved it, he did not get provided; for then the city of Edinburgh would not have denied him any thing; or, if they had, he could eaſily have compelled them.

"Some days before the convention ſat down, the duke of Hamilton and other weſtern lords and gentlemen, brought publicly into town ſeveral companies of foot, and quartered them in the city; beſides great numbers, that they kept hid in cellars and houſes below the ground, which never appeared until ſome days after the convention was begun, though they were generally believed to be thrice as many as there were. This was the firſt error committed by your friends; for in reaſon they ought all to have left the convention, and gone, and ſitten in ſome other town by themſelves, which they might have done ſafely; but there was ſo great hopes of doing well in that meeting, that it made many unwilling, notwithſtanding of their hazard, to leave it. Nor can I ſay, wanted there probability for this opinion; for if ſeveral had not left us after all the reiterated oaths imaginable, and others admitted into the convention by abſolute force, we would have been by far the major part. But ſuch injuſtice was never heard of as was committed in their judging of elections: for if any of their party had had ſix voices, the other that had an hundred, ſignified nothing. Beſides, the manner of elections was out of all rules ever before heard tell of, and a new way taken, which was propoſed by the lord Stair, that all proteſtants, without diſtinction, ſhould have votes in the election; which put it intirely in the hands of the rabble, which they managed ſome by promiſes, and others by a little money. Nor could even all theſe ſiniſtrous arts and tricks have compaſſed their ends, if your friends could have had an honeſt man to be preſident, that was not publicly obnoxious to the fanatics, which forced them, notwithſtanding of all that was paſſed, to pitch upon the marquis of Annandale; not that they had confidence either in his parts or honeſty, but that he was the only man could be ſet againſt duke Hamilton. Both parties were extremely concerned, looking on the choice of a preſident as a deciſive ſtroke; for by it they could know, whom to reckon on. Nor had they ſmall reaſon for their judgment; for the firſt day the duke of Hamilton was choſen preſident, contrary even to their own expectation; above twenty left us, that had burgh, (wherein he prayed for the safety and restoration of king James) the first thing, which they entered upon, was the chusing of a president. The marquis of Athol was proposed by the bishops, and the party which still adhered to the abdicated king; but the duke of Hamilton, who was set up in competition with him by those, who were friends to engaged to us, and voted for us, seeing we were the weakest party, and that the others would have both forces and shew of authority on their side. The next thing they voted was a committee of elections, which they got filled with their own party, and ended the affair; for by that they saw themselves so strong, nothing could be heard among them, but 'put it to the vote,' which they always carried without debate, and so scandalously, that even duke Hamilton, who, to give him his due, understood reason and the law of the nation at another rate than any tumultuous carriage, and several times endeavoured to hinder it. Nor can I say, if his cause had been good, but he behaved himself, until he came to the chief matter, with a great deal of prudence and moderation, insomuch that some of their own party began to repent of their choice. Some few days were taken up in judging of elections, which would have taken much longer time, if several, who saw there was no manner of justice so much as pretended to among them, had not given it over and yielded, which made them grow stronger every day. None concerned in that affair of elections behaved so well as Mr. C————s H————e, after his brother the earl of H————s's death, the title fell to him; but by reason of the debts of the family, he did not take on him the title, fearing to lose a considerable interest, that was left him with this provision, that if the estate of H————e came to him, then that estate should go to his younger brother. So not pretending to be a peer, he was chosen one of the commissioners for the shire; but when it was brought before the convention, he was cast, as one they expected would be none of their friends. So soon as the sentence was pronounced, he told the president, Since they had taken away one way of his sitting in that convention he had a right to, he should try another, which they could not refuse him: and so went out, and took place as earl of H————e, with the hazard of losing the best part of his estate.

"There was likewise another extraordinary affair of that kind. One Mr. B——e of Tarwoodhead, that had pretended some years before to be Lord Forester, but was summoned before the council for usurping a title he had no right to, and discharged under a considerable penalty never more to pretend to it. But those at London, who had the writing of letters, not knowing his title, or, more likely, believing he would be of their interest, procured him a letter from the prince of Orange to come to the convention. So soon as he was challenged by sir George Mackenzie, he produced his letter, which was voted a sufficient right to sit. Several as unjustly as these were received; I only instance them, to shew how that convention was constituted, most of the commissioners having no right. The first thing they took into consideration, after the house was thus constituted, was the getting the castle of Edinburgh into their hands. That which pressed them most to it, there was two pretending to have the government of it, the earl of L——n and the earl of L——n likewise. It being the first of any consideration in Britain holding out, the prince of Orange was very desirous to have it reduced. The earl of L——n and T——e were sent up to capitulate with duke Gordon, who promised them he would comply with their desire, and give it up the next day at ten o'clock. So soon as the viscount of Dundee and I heard them give this answer to the convention, we were mightily alarmed, and sent up one immediately to remember his grace of his engagement to us, and to lay before him the ruin of your affairs if they once got the castle into their hands. As irresolution was the cause of his promise to them, so what arguments were used to him on the other side meeting with his desire to serve you, brought him about again. His greatest obstacle then was, how to come fairly off. The earl of T——e with his flattering insinuating way had got him to go too great a length. For that, it was advised, that next day, when they came to demand the castle, he should tell, he would willingly give it up, but he could not see how he could be safe himself from the rabble of the town, and those that were brought into it. But to free them from all fear that he should give the convention any disturbance, he should offer bail for twenty thousand pounds to live peaceably in it. But though he was very well satisfied with this advice, yet that very night he grew again irresolute, and sent to tell us, that except we came to him immediately, he would not keep his word. This was impossible to do, for they having placed the town-companies of Edinburgh upon the castle-hill, suffered none they suspected to go up; yet one ventured to him, to know what he had to say to us. He sent us word, that notwithstanding of all that was past, he would deliver it up, except we both gave it under our hands, that it was of absolute necessity for your affairs not to yield it up; which we both did that night; and the next morning the viscount of Dundee got into the castle, and confirmed him absolutely in his resolution of keeping it out, by telling him the resolutions were taken by your friends of leaving Edinburgh, and setting out for Stirling. So next day, when they expected to have the castle at the hour appointed, he refused again, and hostilities went on.

"Being thus left by many of those we trusted, and despairing of doing any thing in that convention, next day we resolved in our general meeting, that we would quit it, and call a convention at Sterling; which your majesty had given power to the archbishop of St. Andrews, the viscount of Dundee, and myself, to do by a letter you sent us from Ireland by one Mr. B——n. But before we could determine that, it was absolutely necessary to be secure of the earl of M——r and marquis of Annandale, the one having command of Sterling castle, and the other, that he might bring us Highlanders to guard the town. The earl of M——r had all along appeared one of the firmest in your interest from the time he came to London; for he gave us all the assurances imaginable, that he would do according as the major part thought fit. The marquis of Annandale also consented to leave Edinburgh, and go strait to Sterling: but he never continued six hours in one resolution, which broke all our design; for his wavering made our departure be put off, still expecting he would be brought about to do it. At last a positive hour was condescended on, and several made themselves ready, whom we hardly expected. After it was resolved to be gone, it was thought fit by all your friends, that one should be sent to let you know the reason of our leaving the convention, and receive your commands, which the laird of Cullin undertook.

"Before we were to go off, just as the convention were sitting down, there came one to the viscount of Dundee, telling him, that there were six or seven men in a house intended to murder him and sir George Mackenzie; and that if he would get a warrant, he might instantly carry them to the house where they were. So soon as the convention met, he told this to the duke of Hamilton, who proposed it in the convention; but they absolutely refused to meddle in it, but went to other affairs. This made the viscount of Dundee press yet the more to be gone than before, so evident a piece of justice being refused him, though he offered to prove it at the bar. Neither was there any of your friends, who could think themselves longer safe; which certainly the other party was extremely glad to see, for all they desired was to have the house alone. It is not to be doubted but they made several such things to pass purposely to frighten us; but it was hard trusting men, who had the power in their hands, that they would stop to put in execution what so many of them have professed, and at least not condemned by the most moderate of the party, when their interest or revenge was concerned. But after all of us were fully determined to make the best of our way the next morning to Sterling, the marquis of Annandale's heart failed. So some, who went down to him, thinking to get him to go along, he desired we might go to the place we ordinarily met in, and stay yet another day, which we all consented to; and that we might the better cover our design of going away, we resolved to go for that day to the convention. Just as we were almost dispersed and gone to the house, the viscount of Dundee came in, who knew nothing of the marquis of Annandale's delay, nor of your friends resolution to stay a little for him; but expected all were just a going. He was mightily surprized at their resolution, and told me, notwithstanding of that, he would go before; and if any of them got out of town he would wait for them. It was very evident his going away would give the alarm, which made me extremely earnest, that he might stay one day longer: but he had before made an appointment with some to go with him, so he went strait away with about fifty horse. As he was riding near the castle of Edinburgh, the duke of Gordon made a sign to speak with him at the west-side of the castle, where, though it be extremely steep, yet he told the duke all that was resolved upon, and begged he might hold out the castle till your friends might get him relieved, which he positively promised to do. Whilst they were speaking, some of those who were set to blockade the castle, perceived them, and came running into the convention, and told them, that there was a great number of horse gathering together, and that the viscount of Dundee was talking with duke Gordon, which they looked on as a horrid crime, after they had outlawed him. Their fears also increased, believing it was a general design against them; and that which augmented their fright the more, was, that several messengers brought word after each other, that they were still increasing. At last the duke of Hamilton in a mighty fury told the convention, that now it was time to look to their own safety, since the papists and enemies to the settling the government were so bold as to gather together. That he doubted not but there were several there among them who were on the design. Therefore it was his opinion, that the door should be immediately bolted, and the keys laid on the table: that some of their number should be sent out to beat the drums, to gather together all those well affected to religion and liberty. That he had brought some foot from the west country, fearing the designs of their enemies, to defend them. What he said was approved of by all their party: several of them also bragged of the numbers they had brought, and called them thrice as many as they were. The earl of L——n was pitched upon to go out and gather them together; which when he had done, there was never so miserable a parcel seen; nor is it to be doubted, if your friends had known their own strength, and not believed your enemies to be far stronger than they really were, they might, with all the ease imaginable, that day have effectually vindicated your right and defeated your enemies.

"Such of your friends as were locked within the house, and guarded likewise without, looked upon themselves as undone; and the thing that saved them, was, that they could come to no resolution among themselves. But I cannot say much of their intentions, having it from some, that changed parties so often, that I can assert nothing on their credit. The fear being a little over, and that they saw they had most of your friends in their power, and that there was no tumult in town, nor that the viscount of Dundee grew any stronger, but was marching away; so they ordered Major B——n to gather all he could together, and follow him, which he did, but never came within sight of him.

"After that they had secured the town and thought themselves out of hazard, duke Hamilton dismissed the convention, to the great satisfaction of all your friends, little expecting they would come off so easily, and all this noise ended in nothing. But with that also ended all hopes of setting up another convention at Sterling, for the marquis of Annandale gave it quite over, the earl of M——r made a feint to get out of the town, but went by the only post that was guarded, and was stopped there, and brought back, and gave his parole not to stir out of Edinburgh without leave of the convention. These two giving it over, every body, that was apprehensive, shifted for themselves, and lurked in Edinburgh; next day there was a mighty change; for several, either out of fear or interest, left us. Those of note were the earl of M——r and Annandale who changed thoroughly, and went along with every thing, that could be proposed. Several also both of barons and burgesses did the like; so that by such of their friends, as left the house, which did likewise some of the bishops, they got their meeting almost unanimous.

"The night following they searched the town for some officers they suspected, yet found none but one that had a mind to be taken, lieutenant general D————s. When he went to England with the army, he certainly knew nothing of any design among them; but he had not conversed long with the lord C————ll, K————k, and some others, but he grew one of the hottest of the party, insomuch that he proposed to my lord to betray and carry in his regiment, as I was informed by the viscount a while after. Before he made the proposition, he told him, he had an affair of great importance to them both to tell, if he would give him his oath never to reveal it; which when he had done, though he abhorred the motion, yet he thought himself obliged in honour to conceal it. So soon as he had cleared himself to duke Hamilton, of any design he had against them, he was dismissed. This he could easily do; for none in all the revolution acted a blacker part, for he not only sent in a battalion of the Scots guards, but was in all the designs of betraying, and above all laid down his employment to get the greater credit with your friends, and at the same time was engaged to the prince of Orange, to let him know what passed and was designed by his enemies.

"Being now free of most of those that obstructed them, some having quitted the house, and others joined with them, they fell heartily to work with the affair, upon which they had met; but fearing, lest the prince of Orange should think they went slowly on, they sent up the lord K————s with a letter, containing the reasons of their delay; which were, that now they were free from those, that had opposed the settling the nation, and doubted not but to come shortly to a conclusion to his satisfaction. Next they chose a committee for settling the government, and another for considering the present state of the nation. What was done or failed in either, I cannot give a full account; of having first left the house; so can say little but from other king William, carried it by near forty voices. The next thing they did was to appoint a committee of five out of every ſtate, for examining controverted elections, which happened to be not above twelve. After that, for the ſafety of the aſſembly, they took into conſideration the caſtle of Edinburgh, which was yet commanded by the duke of Gordon, a papiſt, whom they required to put that caſtle into their hands. The duke deſired an indemnity for all that was paſt, and ſecurity for the future; which the convention condeſcending to, ſo far as he had acted as a papiſt, they ſent the earls of Tweedale and Lothian to him with a pardon in writing, both for himſelf and all who were with him; whereupon he deſired twenty-four hours time to conſider of it, which was likewiſe granted. On the 15th, the two earls were again ſent to require him to deliver the caſtle upon the terms demanded by him, and agreed to by the convention; but inſtead of ſtanding to that, he demanded twelve days more, both to conſider of it, and to receive an anſwer to the propoſals he had ſent to the prince of Orange; and after ſeveral meſſages had paſt on both ſides, he at laſt declared, that he would not ſurrender the caſtle. Upon this, the convention ſent the heralds at arms, to charge him immediately to deliver up that fortreſs; which he perſiſting to refuſe, the heralds went to the Market-croſs, and ſolemnly proclaimed him a traitor and rebel.

The 16th, one Crane, an Engliſhman, who was ſaid to be a ſervant to king James's queen, delivered a letter from that prince to the convention; and at the ſame time the preſident acquainted the aſſembly, that the lord Levin was arrived expreſs with another letter from king William. This occaſioned a debate, which of the two letters ſhould be read firſt; but it being repreſented, that they were convened by the king of England, and that king James's letter might enjoin the diſſolution of their aſſembly, the majority carried it for king William, whoſe letter was read with great applauſe in manner following:

My lords and gentlemen,

"WE are very ſenſible of the kindneſs and concern, which your nation has evinced towards us, and our undertaking for the preſervation of your religion and liberty, which were in ſuch imminent danger. Neither can we in the leaſt doubt of your confidence to us, after having ſeen how far ſo many of your nobility and gentry have owned our declaration, countenancing and concurring with us in our endeavours, and deſiring us, that we will take upon us the adminiſtration of affairs civil and military, and to call a meeting of the eſtates, for ſecuring the proteſtant religion, and the antient laws and liberties of your kingdom, which accordingly we have done.

"Now it lies in you to enter into ſuch conſultations, as are moſt probable to ſettle you on ſure and laſting foundations; which we hope you will ſet about with all convenient ſpeed with regard to the public good, and the general intereſt and inclinations of the people; that, after ſo much trouble and great ſuffering, they may live happily and in peace; and that you may lay aſide all animoſities and factions, that may hinder ſo good a work.

"We are glad to find ſo many of the nobility and gentry, when here in London, were ſo much inclined to an union of both kingdoms; and that they did look upon it as one of the beſt means for procuring the happineſs of both nations, and ſettling of a laſting peace among them; which will be advantageous to both, they living in the ſame iſland, having the ſame language, and the ſame common intereſt of religion and liberty; eſpecially at this juncture, when the enemies of both are ſo reſtleſs, endeavouring to make and encreaſe jealouſies and diviſions, which they will be ready to improve to their own advantage and the ruin of Britain. We being of the ſame opinion as to the uſefulneſs of this union, and having nothing ſo much before our eyes as the glory of God, eſtabliſhing the reformed religion, and the power and happineſs of theſe nations, are reſolved to uſe our utmoſt endeavour in advancing every thing, that may conduce to the effectuating the ſame. So we bid you heartily farewel."

From our court at Hampton-Court, the 7th day of March 1688.

After the reading of this letter, a committee was named to draw up an anſwer to it in the moſt thankful and dutiful manner; and then, before they would admit of the letter from king James to be opened, an act paſſed by the almoſt unanimous conſent of the houſe, aſſerting and maintaining the lawfulneſs of the convention, notwithſtanding any thing that might be alledged in the ſaid letter to the contrary; and declaring, that they would not diſſolve, but continue ſitting, until the government, religion, laws, liberties, and properties were ſettled and eſtabliſhed. After this king James's letter was read, containing, "That having been informed, that the peers and repreſentatives of ſhires and boroughs of this his ancient kingdom, were to meet together at Edinburgh, by the uſurped authority of the prince of Orange, he thought fit to let them know, that as he had at all times relied upon the faithfulneſs and affection of them, his antient people, ſo much, that in his greateſt misfortunes heretofore he had recourſe to their aſſiſtance, and that with good ſucceſs to his affairs; ſo now again he required of them to ſupport his intereſt, and expecting from them what became loyal ſubjects, generous and honeſt men, that they would neither ſuffer themſelves to be cajoled and frightened into any action miſbecoming true-hearted Scotſmen; and that to maintain the honour of the nation, they would contemn the baſe example of diſloyal men, and eternize their names by a loyalty ſuitable to the many profeſſions they had made to him. That in doing of this they would chuſe the ſafeſt part, ſince thereby they would avoid the danger they muſt needs undergo, the infamy and diſgrace they muſt bring upon themſelves in this world, and the condemnation due to the rebellious in the next. And that they would likewiſe have the opportunity to ſecure to themſelves, and their poſterity, the gracious promiſes he had ſo often made of ſecuring their religion, laws, properties, liberties, and rights; which he was ſtill reſolved to perform, as ſoon as it was poſſible for him to meet them ſafely in a parliament in that his ancient kingdom. In the mean time he exhorts them, not to fear to declare for him the lawful ſovereign, who would not fail, on his part, to give them ſuch ſpeedy and powerful aſſiſtance, as ſhould not only enable them to defend themſelves from any foreign attempt, but put them in a condition to aſſert their rights againſt his and their enemies, who had depreſſed the ſame by the blackeſt of uſurpations, the moſt unjuſt as well as moſt unnatural of attempts; which though almighty God might for a time permit, and let the wicked proſper, yet the end muſt bring confuſion upon ſuch workers of iniquity. He farther let them know, that he would pardon all ſuch, as ſhould return to their duty before the laſt day of that month [March] incluſive; and that he would puniſh with the rigour of the laws, all ſuch, as ſhould ſtand out in rebellion againſt him or his authority. So not doubting, that they would declare for him, and ſuppreſs whatever might oppoſe his intereſt; and that they would ſend ſome of their hands. And both parties being concerned, the one againſt the other at that time, a conſiderable allowance muſt be given to both their reports, if one deſire to know the truth impartially. But ſtill there remained ſome of your friends, that gave them ſome trouble, particularly ſir George Mackenzie, the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, and Mr. O————e, who behaved themſelves extremely well, when the chief affair came in of ſettling the government. But reaſon ſignified little to men, that were reſolved to go through with what they had begun; nor could it have ſignified much upon another account: for among them all, generally ſpeaking, there was never ſeen ſuch a ſet of men gathered together; for they had few, ſave ſir James Montgomery, and John Dalrymple, that could make the leaſt reply, but only put it to the vote, which they were ſure to carry among themſelves. Likewiſe there were ſome diviſions: ſome would have the crown declared immediately vacant, as was done in England, and the prince of Orange proclaimed. Others, who were cautious, and would willingly have ſeen a little better about them before they made ſo bold a ſtep, propoſed an union with England, and took all the pains imaginable to engage your friends into it, and ſo bring them back to the houſe, alledging there would be nothing ſo much for your intereſt as the gaining of time; and if that this propoſal did not go on, the government would be preſently ſettled; but if it were once ſet on foot, and your friends aſſiſt it, ſeveral months would be ſpent before any ſuch treaty could be ended.

"The chief of theſe, who managed the affair, were the viſcount of Tarbat, and the lord S——s. Your friends ſoon perceived, that they only deſigned to do this as effectually for the prince of Orange by an union; for all, that were for this, have conſented to the prince of Orange's being king, and to all that was done in England. Thus to free themſelves of the odium of ſuch a deed, your majeſty's buſineſs ſucceeded and ended. Then they wanted not apprehenſions; for your affairs in Ireland were vaſtly magnified both by your friends and by your enemies. This proſpect took extremely with thoſe, that had a mind to trim, or were not in hopes of employments. But there were two different intereſts in the houſe againſt it; for duke Hamilton, and all he had influence upon, who expected the great employments for himſelf and children, as the reward of his ſervice; then the bigoted fanatics, who feared that ſuch an union, where the church of England was the ſtrongeſt party, might be of ill conſequence to their kirk, which they deſigned not only to eſtabliſh upon the old foot, but, according as they did before, endeavour the reformation of their brethren in England. The two parties were by far ſtronger than the trimmers, eſpecially ſince your friends would not meddle; ſo that they never ventured to propoſe it publicly." Account of the affairs of Scotland, p. 56, &c.

He

number with an account of their diligence and the poſture of his affairs there, he bid them heartily farewel."

This menacing letter, which was dated from on board the St. Michael, March 1, 1689, was the more ungrateful by being counterſigned by the earl of Melfort, a perſon odious to all the preſbyterians of Scotland, who made up the major part of the convention; ſo that, inſtead of ſerving the intereſt of king James, it rather provoked that aſſembly to be the more unanimous and forward in ſettling the government after the example of England. The meſſenger, who brought the letter, was firſt ſecured, and then, not being thought worth detaining, diſmiſſed with a paſs inſtead of an anſwer.

The next care of the convention was to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence; for which purpoſe they ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed, requiring all perſons from the age of ſixteen to ſixty to be in a readineſs to take arms. They likewiſe changed a great many officers of the militia all over the kingdom; appointed ſir Patrick Hume, who came over with king William from Holland, to command the militia of horſe of his county, notwithſtanding his attainder for the buſineſs of the earl of Argyle was not yet taken off; and ordered eight hundred men to be levied under the command of the earl of Levin, who came alſo over with his majeſty; and theſe were raiſed and armed in a few hours, and appointed to guard the city of Edinburgh.

On the 19th of March they paſſed an act, approving the addreſs of the Scots nobility and gentry in London; by which they thankfully 'acknowledged the great benefit done to their nation by the prince of Orange, in delivering them from the eminent encroachments on their laws and fundamental conſtitution, and from the near dangers, which threatned an overturning of the proteſtant religion; and alſo deſired his highneſs to accept the adminiſtration of the government of that kingdom.' The ſame day, upon reading of ſome letters from ſeveral lords and gentlemen in Ireland, deſiring aſſiſtance of the convention, they ordered two thouſand muſkets and twenty barrels of powder to be immediately ſent them; that a further proviſion of arms and ammunition ſhould be bought up for them in Holland; and that two ſmall frigates ſhould cruize between Scotland and Ireland, for mutual intelligence between both kingdoms.

Whilſt the convention was thus providing for their own ſecurity, and the relief of their proteſtant brethren in Ireland, the lord viſcount Dundee held a private conference with the duke of Gordon at the poſtern gate of the caſtle of Edinburgh, at which they concerted meaſures to diſturb the public tranquillity. The convention being informed of this violation of their orders, by which they had forbid all manner of correſpondence with the duke, ordered Dundee to appear before them; but he retired with thirty or forty horſe to Linlithgow [w]. Upon this a party of horſe was ſent after him; and the convention apprehending, that he might ſurprize the caſtle of Sterling, they immediately diſpatched away the governor thereof, the earl of Mar, to ſecure that important fortreſs. And the houſe finding, that the attorney-general Mackenzie, five biſhops, the earls of Hume, Dumferling, Lauderdale, Birley, and Callender, the viſcounts Dundee, Stourmont, and ſeveral other diſaffected members, to the number of fifty, did abſent themſelves, ſent their maces to require their attendance; and it was propoſed, that ſuch as had refuſed to ſign the act, aſſerting the lawfulneſs of their aſſembly, ſhould be expelled the houſe. But theſe being few in number, that motion was not purſued.

On the other hand the duke of Gordon, in order to cover his real deſign, having beat a parley, and deſired to capitulate, ſome perſons were appointed to treat with him. But it appeared at laſt, that he only intended to amuſe the convention, and did not deſign to quit the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, till he ſhould be forced to it. For on the 22d of March he acquainted the magiſtrates of Edinburgh, that he had received advices from Ireland of king James's being landed there; and that to expreſs his joy upon the occaſion, he ſhould be obliged to fire all his cannon; but bid them not be alarmed at it, ſince he deſigned no hurt to the city. The convention being informed of this meſſage, ordered the caſtle to be blocked up; and upon the 23d, an act was paſſed and proclaimed for ſecuring all ſuſpected perſons. The ſame day the anſwer of the convention to king William's letter was read and ſigned in a meeting of the whole houſe, very few excepted, and ordered to be ſent away immediately by the lord Roſs, who took poſt, and preſented it to his majeſty, importing:

"That as religion, liberty, and laws, are the deepeſt concerns of mankind, ſo the deep ſenſe of the extreme hazard, theſe had been expoſed to, muſt produce ſuitable returns from the kingdom to his Majeſty, whom in all ſincerity and gratitude they acknowledged to be, under God, their great and ſeaſonable deliverer; and they heartily congratulated, that as God had honoured his majeſty to be an eminent inſtrument for the preſervation of his truth, ſo he had rewarded his undertaking with ſucceſs, in the conſiderable progreſs which he had made in delivering them, and in preſerving to them the proteſtant religion. That they returned their moſt dutiful thanks to his majeſty for his accepting the adminiſtration of public affairs, and convening the eſtates of that kingdom. That they ſhould with all convenient diligence take his gracious letter into their conſideration; hoping ſhortly, by the bleſſing of God, to fall upon ſuch reſolutions as might be acceptable to his majeſty; ſecure the proteſtant religion, and eſtabliſh the government, laws, and liberties of that kingdom upon ſolid foundations, moſt agreeable to the general good and inclinations of the people. That [w] He had been ſome time before at London, and had fixed a correſpondence both with England and France, though he had employed Dr. Burnet to carry meſſages from him to king William, to know what ſecurity he might expect if he ſhould go and live in Scotland without owning his government. The king's anſwer was, that if he would live peaceably, and at home, he ſhould be protected; to which he replied, that unleſs he were forced to it he would live quietly. But he returned to Scotland with other reſolutions; and all the party determined to ſubmit to his command; and upon his retiring from Edinburgh, he went up and down the Highlands, and ſent his agents about to bring together what force they could collect. Burnet. II. 22. The earl of Belcarras tells us that a few days after the convention were certain, that the viſcount of Dundee had gone by Sterling to his own houſe, they ſent an herald and a trumpet to command him and my lord L———n to return, under pain of being denounced rebels to the ſtate. My lord L———n obeyed, and was immediately diſmiſſed, being then no member of the houſe, and they having nothing to lay to his charge. The viſcount of Dundee wrote a letter, excuſing his not obeying their order, wherein he gave the reaſons, for which he left the convention, which were, "that he could ſtay no longer in that place, after that he had told in full convention of ſo many of his enemies, who deſigned to murder him, yet could have no juſtice. He told alſo, he could not think that convention any more free, wherein there were ſo many brought in from the weſtern countries to overawe its members, nor where they were guarded with foreign troops; (for juſt at this time Mackay was come down from England with four Dutch regiments;) but if they would do him juſtice, and give him aſſurance of liberty, he promiſed to return immediately. I have given this account the more full, becauſe it was inſinuated, after my lord Dundee went to the Highlands, that ſeveral of your friends broke their engagements to him, and did not go along, but were ſo far from being in any ſuch engagements, that they would have diſobeyed you, if they had gone; for your poſitive commands were ſent with George H———y, that if we ſaw there could be nothing done in the convention, then we ſhould quit it, and keep as quiet as we could till farther orders, and until you could ſend us aſſiſtance from Ireland; but the deſign of going to Sterling made the one go for the other; ſo that was ruined by the faint-heartedneſs of the marquis of Annandale and ſome others. All that knew your commands, endeavoured to retire home and ſave themſelves; nor did ever the viſcount of Dundee reſolve to meddle, until he had your orders, except he had been obliged to ſave himſelf from a party, that came to apprehend him. Notwithſtanding of the difficulties your friends had met with, ſome of them did not give over hopes of breaking the deſign of the convention, and get another to meet in ſome ſafe place. That which raiſed this, was the coming down of the duke of Queenſberry. The duke, upon the noiſe of the invaſion, had appeared ſincerely in your intereſt; and I muſt do him the juſtice to ſay, I never ſaw any man more concerned than he was for the ſteps his ſon made in England, after your majeſty was gone. He joined in all the meetings we had for your ſervice, and employed what intereſt he could to get commiſſioners for the ſhires he was concerned in chooſing, as we wiſhed; nor could any thing be complained of him, but his too long ſtay at London; for if all your friends had appeared, as they promiſed, the firſt day of the convention, they had been by far the ſtrongeſt, and if Scotland had then declared for you, when you was almoſt maſter of Ireland, the prince of Orange had paſſed his time ill in England, conſidering he had France to deal with on the other ſide. This made us extremely concerned, ſince that we could do no more in that convention, either to get another to counter-act them, or to get them forced from Edinburgh, which would have made a great delay before the time they could have another convention eſtabliſhed, and which they intended to ſet up at Glaſgow, if they had been forced from Edinburgh. The only thing could be thought of by all your friends to get this done, was to engage the duke of Gordon to fire upon the town, which certainly would have broke up the convention; for they always ſuſpected ſome deſign of forcing them from Edinburgh. In this reſolution no man ſeemed ſo forward as the marquis of Annandale, for it was of great concern to have him ſo; for after the earl of M———r had intirely quitted us, and by that they had got Sterling in their hands, there was no man in the nation (conſidering how well affected his Highlands were) could be ſo uſeful, if your friends had retired northwards, as was intended, till they had received your orders from Ireland. And that, which made us depend on him (for all the eſcapes he made) was the great influence the earl of D———e had with him; and he applied all his endeavours to keep him to his duty, and acted in all your concerns with as much zeal and affection, till he was made priſoner, as any ever ſerved you.

"The counteſs of E———l, who had kept intelligence with duke Gordon from the time the caſtle was blocked up, undertook to let him know our advice; which accordingly ſhe did; but he abſolutely refuſed to do any thing but defend himſelf until he had your majeſty's orders. So our whole deſigns were broke; for ſince there was no way found out to make them leave Edinburgh, all of us ſeeing that there was no more to be expected, either from the convention, or from thoſe that pretended to be our friends, left the town, and retired home, ſuch as the earl of H———e, viſcount of S———t, viſcount of O———d, lord S———r, earl of S———k, earl of P———e, Mr. Henry Maul his brother, the ſheriff of B———e, and ſeveral others. Acc. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 77. &c.

as to the propoſal of the union, they doubted not but his majeſty would ſo diſpoſe the matter, that there might be an equal readineſs in the kingdom of England to accompliſh it, as one of the beſt means for ſecuring the happineſs of theſe nations, and ſettling a laſting peace. That they had hitherto and ſtill ſhould endeavour to avoid animoſities or prejudice, which might diſturb their councils: That as they deſigned the public good, ſo it might be done with the general concurrence and approbation of the nation. And that in the mean time, they deſired the continuance of his majeſty's care and protection towards them in all their concerns, whereof the kind expreſſions in his gracious letter had given them full aſſurance."

The forces which king William had ſent into Scotland under major-general Mackay, and which conſiſted of four regiments of foot and one of dragoons, being arrived there, the convention ordered them to be quartered in Leith and the ſuburbs of Edinburgh; and gave a commiſſion to that general to be commander in chief of ſuch militia, or other forces, as ſhould be raiſed for the ſafety of that kingdom in the preſent juncture. And at the ſame time the lord Levingſton and viſcount Dundee, with deſign to amuſe the convention, wrote letters to the duke of Hamilton, their preſident, giving an account of their withdrawing from Edinburgh.

On the 26th of March a committee was named for ſettling the government, which was compoſed of eight lords, eight knights, and eight burgeſſes, and out of which the biſhops were left, as having diſguſted the generality of the ſtate, by their former compliance with king James's arbitrary government, by their prayers at the beginning of the ſeſſion, and other paſſages in their behaviour, that diſcovered their diſaffection to king William, and the ſettlement then about to be made. This committee, after five or ſix days ſitting, followed the precedent of the Engliſh convention, in declaring the throne vacant[x]; and to ſupport this aſſertion, had recourſe to king James's violations of the fundamental laws and conſtitutions, and appointed a ſub-committee to draw up an account of the particular inſtances of thoſe violations. Upon this, three parties were formed; one compoſed of all the biſhops and ſome of the nobility, who affirmed the proceedings to be contrary to their laws and oaths. Others thought, that their oaths were only to the king, as having the executive power to ſupport him in that; but that if he ſet himſelf to invade and aſſume the legiſlature, he renounced his former authority, by ſubverting that, upon which it was founded; for which reaſon they were for a declaratory judgment. The third party was of thoſe, who agreed with the former in their concluſion, but not in coming to ſo ſpeedy a determination. They were of opinion, that it was the intereſt of Scotland to be brought under the laws of England, and to be united to the parliament of England; and that this was the propereſt time for doing that to the beſt advantage, ſince England would be obliged, by the preſent ſtate of affairs, to receive them upon good terms. They were therefore willing to proceed againſt king James; but they thought it not reaſonable to proceed with too much haſte in a new ſettlement, and were for maintaining the government in an interregnum, till the union ſhould be perfected, or at leaſt put in a probable way. This was ſpecious, and many went into it; and ſince it tended to the putting a ſtop to a full ſettlement, all, who favoured king James, joined in it, becauſe by this more time was gained. To this project it was objected, that the union of the two kingdoms muſt be a work of time, ſince many difficulties would ariſe in any treaty about it; whereas the preſent circumſtances were critical, and required a ſpeedy deciſion, and quick proviſion to be made for their ſecurity; ſince, if they continued in ſuch a neutral ſtate, they would have many enemies, and no friends; and the zeal, that was now working amongſt them for preſbytery, muſt raiſe a greater averſion than ordinary in the body, that was for the church of England, to any ſuch treaty with them. At laſt the whole houſe, except twelve, approved of what the committee had done, and paſſed the following act: 'The eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare, that king James the VII being a profeſſed papiſt, did aſſume the royal power, and acted as a king, without ever taking the oath required by law, and had, by the advice of evil and wicked councillors, invaded the fundamental conſtitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal and limited monarchy to an arbitrary deſpotic power; and had governed the ſame to the ſubverſion of the proteſtant religion, and violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government; whereby he had forefaulted the crown, and the throne was become vacant.'

Immediately after this the eſtates ordered, that the committee for ſettling the government ſhould bring in an act for ſettling the crown upon their majeſties William and Mary; and to conſider the terms of the deſtination of the crown; and likewiſe to prepare an inſtrument of government, to be offered with the crown for redreſſing the grievances, and ſecuring the liberties of the people[y].

[x] The earl of Belcarras obſerves, that a few days after many of king James's friends had left the convention, "The committee prepared all that was intended in the convention, but found great difficulties how to declare the throne vacant. Some were for abdication, as had been done in England, but that could not paſs among the moſt violent of them, for it could not be imagined, that your majeſty left Scotland. Others were for making uſe of an old obſolete word forefaulting, uſed for a bird's forſaking her neſt. But ſir John Dalrymple ended the debate by ſuch reaſons againſt both, that they agreed to his new propoſal, which was, 'That your majeſty, by committing ſuch acts as he named, forefaulted your right to the crown;' making this childiſh diſtinction, that they intended not to forefault you as a traitor, but only declare you forefaulted; which would make the affair clear, and take off any pretenſions the prince of Wales might afterwards have. This immediately was taken and voted the next day by all preſent, except five, the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, ſir George Mackenzie, lord B———e, Mr. O———e and one B———h. All the reſt, which did intend to go along, had left the houſe.

"After the throne was declared vacant, duke Hamilton propoſed filling it again, (although as preſident he was not obliged to vote,) and that the humble offer thereof ſhould be made to the prince and princeſs of Orange. This was done more unanimouſly than the other; for the duke of Queenſberry and marquis of Annandale, who had been abſent from the firſt vote, came and aſſented to the ſecond, and told the houſe, that they were not fully convinced of their right in declaring the throne vacant; but ſince they had done it, they acquieſced, and none deſerved ſo well to fill it as the prince of Orange; and afterwards went with the reſt to the market-croſs of Edinburgh, where they were declared king and queen of Scotland, where the duke of Hamilton, to ſhew his zeal, did the meaneſt action, that ever could be heard tell of in a duke, for he officiated as clerk, and read from the croſs, to the people, the act of convention. Next they voted lord L———n, ſir James Montgomery, and ſir John Dalrymple, to carry up their offer, with their grievances and claim of right, which were the conditions pretended as giving him the crown. And that they might be in greater ſafety during the adjournment, which they were to make, until they knew, whether the prince and princeſs of Orange had accepted of their preſent, they voted a full power to duke Hamilton to impriſon whomſoever he ſuſpected, until the return ſhould come back, fearing if ſuch a power were lodged in many, ſome advertiſements might be given. Acc. of Aff. of Scot. p. 82.

[y] According to this vote the committee drew up an act, reciting the methods, by which king James had invaded the conſtitution of that kingdom: "1. By erecting public ſchools and ſocieties of the jeſuits; and not only allowing maſs to be publicly ſaid, but alſo converting proteſtant chapels and churches to public maſs-houſes, contrary to the expreſs laws againſt ſaying and hearing maſs. 2. By allowing popiſh books to be printed and diſperſed by a patent to a popiſh printer, deſigning him printer to his majeſty's houſhold, college, and chapel, contrary to law. 3. By taking the children of proteſtant noblemen and gentlemen, ſending them abroad to be bred papiſts, and beſtowing penſions upon prieſts to pervert proteſtants from their religion by offers of places and preferments. 4. By diſcharging proteſtants, at the ſame time he employed papiſts in places of the greateſt truſt, both civil and military, &c. and intruſting the forts and magazines in their hands. 5. By impoſing oaths contrary to law. 6. By exacting money without conſent of parliament or convention of eſtates. 7. By levying and keeping up a ſtanding army in time of peace, without conſent of parliament, and maintaining them upon free quarter. 8. By employing the officers of the army as judges throughout the kingdom; by whom the ſubjects were put to death without legal trial, jury, or record. 9. By impoſing exorbitant fines to the value of the parties eſtates, exacting extravagant bail, and diſpoſing of fines and forfeitures before any proceſs or conviction. 10. By impriſoning perſons without expreſſing the reaſon, and delaying to bring them to trial. 11. By cauſing ſeveral perſons to be proſecuted, and their eſtates to be forfeited, upon ſtretches of old and forfeited laws, upon weak and frivolous pretences, and upon lame and defective proofs; as particularly the late earl of Argyle, to the ſcandal of the juſtice of the nation. 12. By ſubverting the rights of the royal boroughs, the third eſtate of parliament, impoſing upon them not only magiſtrates, but alſo the whole town-council and clerks, contrary to their liberties and expreſs charters, without any pretence, of ſentence ſurrender, or conſent. So that the commiſſioners to parliaments being choſen by the magiſtrates and councils, the king might in effect as well nominate the eſtate of parliament. Beſides that many of the magiſtrates by him put in were papiſts: and the boroughs were forced to pay money for the letters impoſing thoſe illegal magiſtrates upon them. 13. By ſending letters to the chief courts of juſtice, not only ordering the judges to ſtop 'fine die,' but alſo commanding how to proceed in caſes depending before them, contrary to the expreſs laws; and by changing the nature of the judges patents 'ad vitam' or 'culpam' in a commiſſion 'de bene placito,' to diſpoſe them to a compliance with arbitrary courſes, and turning them out of their offices, if they refuſed to comply. 14. By granting perſonal protections for civil debts, contrary to law.

"All which were miſcarriages of king James; utterly and directly contrary to the known laws, freedoms, and ſtatutes of the realm of Scotland.

"Upon which grounds and reaſons the eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland did find and declare, that king James VII, being a profeſt papiſt, did aſſume the regal power, &c. whereby he had forefaulted the rights of the crown, and the throne was become vacant.

"Therefore in regard his royal highneſs, then prince of Orange, ſince king of England, whom it pleaſed God to make the glorious inſtrument of delivering theſe kingdoms from popery and arbitrary power, by advice of ſeveral lords and gentlemen of the Scots nation then at London, did call the eſtates of this kingdom to meet upon the fourteenth of March laſt, in order to ſuch an eſtabliſhment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties might not again be in danger of being ſubverted; the ſaid eſtates being at that time aſſembled accordingly in a full and free repreſentative of the nation, taking into their moſt ſerious conſideration the beſt means for attaining the

The ſmall number of thoſe, who adhered to king James, endeavoured to prevent the paſſing of this act; and among the reſt the biſhop of Edinburgh repreſented, that it related many unlawful acts, of which that king was innocent, and which were wholly to be charged on his miniſters: That ſuppoſing him to be guilty, they were not competent judges of his miſdemeanors, being illegally convened; and therefore that the beſt method the convention could follow for the good of the nation, was to deſire and favour his majeſty's return into his dominions, who out of gratitude would not fail to redreſs all their grievances. This ſpeech was anſwered with great force and ſpirit by one of the members; ſo that the act being read and agreed to in the convention, the ſame day their majeſties were crowned king and queen of England, they were alſo proclaimed king and queen of Scotland.

The fatal blow, which by a clauſe in this act was given to epiſcopacy, not only occaſioned great diſcontents in Scotland, but very much increaſed thoſe of England, and rendered the union of both nations deſperate. And indeed it was thought an abſurd thing, that this clauſe, whereby it was declared, that prelacy in the church was a great and inſupportable burthen to the nation, ſhould be inſerted in a claim of rights, for which not only they had no law, but which was contrary to many laws then in being; ſo that though they might have offered it as a grievance, there was no colour for pretending it was a national right. But they had a notion among them, that every article, that ſhould be put into the claim of rights, became an unalterable law, and a condition, upon which the crown was to be held; whereas grievances were ſuch things, as were ſubmitted to the king and parliament to be redreſſed, or not, as they ſhould ſee cauſe. But the biſhops, and thoſe who adhered to them, having left the convention, the preſbyterians had a majority of voices to carry every thing, as they pleaſed, how unreaſonable ſoever, and upon this the aboliſhing of epiſcopacy was made a neceſſary article of the new ſettlement.

It may here be obſerved, that ſoon after the king came to St. James's, the epiſcopal party in Scotland had ſent up the dean of Glaſgow, to know what the prince of Orange's intentions were with relation to that party; and the prince anſwered, that he would do all he could to preſerve them, granting a full toleration to the preſbyterians. But this was, in caſe they concurred in the new ſettlement of the kingdom; for if they ſhould oppoſe that, and if by a great majority in parliament, reſolutions ſhould be taken againſt them, he could not make a war for them, though he would do all that was in his power to maintain ſuch of them, as ſhould live peaceably in their functions. This the prince ordered Dr. Burnet likewiſe to write back, in anſwer to what ſome biſhops and others had writ to him upon that ſubject. But the viſcount Dundee, when he returned into Scotland, poſſeſſed them with ſuch an opinion of another ſpeedy revolution, that would be brought about in favour of king James, that they reſolved to adhere firmly to his intereſts; and thus declaring in a body, with ſo much zeal, in oppoſition to the new ſettlement, it was not poſſible for king William to preſerve epiſcopacy there; all thoſe, who expreſſed their zeal for him, being equally zealous againſt that order.

Amongſt thoſe, who appeared in this convention, none diſtinguiſhed himſelf more than ſir James Montgomery, a gentleman of good parts, but of a moſt unbridled heat and of a reſtleſt ambition. He bore the greateſt ſhare in the whole debate, and promiſed himſelf a conſiderable poſt in the new government. The duke of Hamilton preſided with remarkable diſcretion and courage; ſo that the bringing the ſettlement ſo ſoon to a calm concluſion was chiefly owing to him.

On the 13th of April the convention ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed, forbidding all perſons to own the late king James VII. for their king, or obey, aſſiſt, or accept any commiſſions, that might be given out by him, or any way to hold correſpondence with him; and requiring all the miniſters of the goſpel within the kingdom publicly to pray for king William and queen Mary. This proclamation was partly occaſioned by the coming over of one Braday from Ireland, with commiſſions from king James, and letters from his ſecretary the earl of Melfort to the earl of Belcarras, and others [z], diſcovering the deſigns of his maſter and his adheends aforeſaid, did in the firſt place, as their anceſtors in like caſes had uſually done, for the vindicating and aſſerting their antient rights and liberties, declare, that by the law of Scotland no papiſt could be king or queen of the realm, nor bear any office therein; nor that any proteſtant ſucceſſor could exerciſe the regal power, till they had ſworn the coronation oath. 2. That all proclamations aſſerting an abſolute power to null and diſable laws, in order for erecting ſchools and colleges for jeſuits, converting proteſtant churches and chapels into maſs-houſes, and the allowing maſs to be ſaid, and the allowing popiſh books to be printed and diſperſed, was contrary to law. 3. That the taking the children of noblemen and gentlemen and others, and keeping them abroad to be bred papiſts; the making funds and donations to popiſh ſchools and colleges; the beſtowing penſions on prieſts; and the ſeducing proteſtants from their religion by offers of places and preferments, was contrary to law. 4. That the diſarming of proteſtants, and employing papiſts in the greateſt places of truſt, both civil and military, &c. was contrary to law. 5. That the impoſing an oath without authority of parliament, was contrary to law. 6. That the raiſing of money without conſent of parliament or convention, was contrary to law. 7. That employing the officers of the army as judges, &c. was contrary to law. 8. That the impoſing extraordinary fines, &c. was contrary to law. 9. That the impriſoning of perſons without expreſſing the reaſons, &c. was the ſame. 10. That the proſecuting and ſeizing men's eſtates as forfeited, upon ſtretches of old obſolete laws, &c. was contrary to law. 11. That the nominating and impoſing magiſtrates, &c. upon boroughs, contrary to their expreſs charter, was the ſame. 12. That the ſending letters to the courts of juſtice, ordaining the judges to deſiſt from determining of cauſes, and ordaining them, how to proceed in cauſes depending before them, &c. was contrary to law. 13. That the granting of perſonal protections was the ſame. 14. That the forcing the ſubjects to depoſe againſt themſelves in capital cauſes, however the puniſhments were reſtricted, was contrary to law. 15. That the uſing torture without evidence, or in ordinary crimes, was contrary to law. 16. That the ſending of an army in a warlike manner into any part of the kingdom in time of peace, and exacting locality and free quarters, was the ſame. 17. That charging the ſubjects with law-boroughs at the king's inſtance, and impoſing bonds without authority of parliament, and the ſuſpending advocates for not appearing, when bonds were offered, was contrary to law. 18. That the putting garriſons into private men's houſes, in time of peace, without authority of parliament, was illegal. 19. That the opinions of the lords of the ſeſſions in the two caſes following were illegal, viz. that the concerting the demand of the ſupply of a forefaulted perſon, although not given, was treaſon; that perſons refuſing to diſcover their private thoughts in relation to points of treaſon, or other men's actions, are guilty of treaſon. 20. That the fining huſbands for their wives withdrawing from church, was illegal. 21. That prelacy, and ſuperiority of an office in the church above preſbyters, is and has been a great and inſupportable burthen to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people ever ſince the reformation, they having reformed popery by preſbytery, and therefore ought to be aboliſhed. 22. That it is the right and privilege of the ſubject to proteſt for remedy of law to the king and parliament againſt ſentences pronounced by the lords of the ſeſſions, provided the ſame do not ſtop executions of the ſaid ſentences. 23. That it is the right of the ſubject to petition the king; and that all proſecutions and impriſonments for ſuch petitioning were contrary to law.

" Therefore for the redreſs of all grievances, and for the amending, ſtrengthening, and preſerving the laws, they claimed that parliaments ought to be frequently called and allowed to ſit, and freedom of ſpeech and debate allowed to the members.

" And then they further claimed and inſiſted upon all and ſundry the premiſes as their undoubted rights and liberties, and that no declaration or proceedings to the prejudice of the people in any of the ſaid premiſes ought, in any wiſe, to be drawn hereafter into example; but that all forfeitures, fines, lois of offices in impriſonments, baniſhments, proſecutions, and rigorous executions be conſidered, and the parties redreſſed.

" To which demand of their rights, and redreſs of their grievances, they took themſelves to be encouraged by the king of England's declaration for the kingdom of Scotland in October laſt, as being the only means for obtaining a full redreſs and remedy therein.

" Therefore foraſmuch as they had an entire confidence, that his majeſty of England would perfect the deliverance ſo far advanced by him, and would ſtill preſerve them from the violation of the rights, which they had aſſerted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, laws and liberties; the ſaid eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland had reſolved, 'That William and Mary, king and queen of England, be declared king and queen of Scotland, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the ſaid kingdom to them the ſaid king and queen during their lives, and the longeſt liver of them; and that the ſole and full exerciſe of the power to be only in and exerciſed by him the ſaid king, in the names of the ſaid king and queen during their lives. And after their deceaſe, that the ſaid crown and royal dignity be to the heir of the body of the ſaid queen; which failing, to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; which alſo failing, to the heirs of the body of the ſaid William king of England.'

" And then withal they prayed the ſaid king and queen to accept the ſame accordingly."

It was alſo declared by the inſtrument, that the following oath,

'I A. B. do ſincerely promiſe and ſwear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their majeſties king William and queen Mary. So help me God.'

ſhould be taken by all proteſtants, by whom the oaths of allegiance, or any other oaths and declarations, might be required by law inſtead of it; and that the oath of allegiance and all other oaths and declarations ſhould be abrogated.

[z] " The firſt, ſays the earl of Belcarras, that found the effects of this power (of the duke of Hamilton to impriſon whomſoever he pleaſed) was the viſcount of Dundee and myſelf, occaſioned by your majeſty's ſending over one Mr. Braday with letters from Ireland, wherein you gave us the ſame orders, that before you had done with Mr. H———y; which was to do nothing till your further orders, and that five hundred foot and three hundred horſe, which you had ready to ſend, were landed. Theſe letters were taken by the folly of Mr. Braday, for he had told all his buſineſs to one Mr. T———n, who came over with him out of Ireland on purpoſe to betray him; and even after he had diſcovered him to duke Hamilton, and that he was ſeized on and ſearched, they could find nothing about him, all his letters being hid in a falſe bottom of his wallet; nor had they any ſuſpicion where they were, until he eaſed all their minds, by telling all he knew of the matter, from whom and to whom he came, which had never been known but by him, the letters having no directions. Duke Hamilton, by virtue of the power given him, immediately ordered the earl of L———n to ſend over one hundred foot to my lord Dundee, and as many to me; but his houſe being twenty miles farther off than mine; beſides having the river of Tay betwixt him rents. Braday being taken and examined, ſome expreſſions were found in theſe letters, which highly offended the convention. 'You will aſk me, without queſtion,' ſays Melfort to Claverhouſe, 'how we intend to pay our army; but never fear that, ſo long as there are rebels eſtates. We will begin with the great ones, and end with the little ones, &c.' In another to the lord Belcarras he ſays, 'The eſtates of the rebels will recompenſe us. Experience has taught our illuſtrious maſter, that there are a good number of people, that muſt be made Gibeonites, becauſe they are good for nothing elſe. You know, that there are ſeveral lords, that we marked out, when we were both together, that deſerve no better. Theſe will ſerve for examples to others.' After the reading of theſe letters, the preſident of the eſtates addreſſing himſelf to the aſſembly, ſaid, 'You hear, gentlemen, our ſentence pronounced; and that it behoves us either to defend ourſelves, or die.' Upon which the lord Belcarras, the lord Lochore, and lieutenant-colonel Balfour were committed to priſon, and ſeveral others bound to their good behaviour on ſufficient ſecurity. And being thus made ſenſible of their danger, the eſtates ordered four new regiments of foot and ten troops of horſe to be immediately levied, beſides the forces, which ſeveral of the nobility offered to raiſe. Garriſons were put into the caſtle of Dunnator, Ardmillian, and Arran, and a ſhip ſent from Ireland with ſix thouſand arms, which were deſigned for the rebels in the north of Scotland, was ſeized on the weſtern coaſt, whither ſhe was driven by a ſtorm.

After the eſtates had received the king's anſwer to their letter, they gave another to their commiſſioners for tendering the crown to king William and queen Mary; wherein they deſired their majeſties to ſign and ſwear the oath, which the law had appointed to be taken by the kings and queens at their acceſſion to the crown, till ſuch time as affairs ſhould allow that kingdom the happineſs of their preſence, in order to their coronation. They declared, that they were ſenſible of his majeſty's kindneſs and paternal care in promoting the union, which they hoped was reſerved for him to accompliſh. They thanked his majeſty for ſending thoſe troops, that might help to preſerve them; and aſſured him, that as it was the intereſt of England to contribute towards the ſecurity of Scotland; ſo they ſhould not be wanting on their parts to give their aſſiſtance for the reducing of Ireland.

The commiſſioners from the convention, who were the earl of Argyle for the lords, ſir James Montgomery for the knights, or, as they call them, the barons; and ſir James Dalrymple for the boroughs, being arrived at London upon the 11th of May, met in the council-chamber, and from thence were conducted by the maſter of the ceremonies to the banqueting-houſe, where their majeſties were prepared to receive them, ſitting on their thrones. They firſt preſented the letter from the eſtates to his majeſty; then the inſtrument of government; next, a paper containing the grievances, which they deſired might be redreſſed; and laſtly, an addreſs to his majeſty for turning the convention into a parliament. All theſe being read to their majeſties, the king returned to the commiſſioners the following anſwer: "When I engaged in this undertaking, I had particular regard and conſideration for Scotland; and therefore I did emit a declaration in relation to that, as well as to this kingdom, which I intend to make good and effectual to them. I take it very kindly, that Scotland hath expreſſed ſo much confidence in, and affection to me. They ſhall find me willing to aſſiſt them in every thing, that concerns the weal and intereſt of that kingdom, by making what laws ſhall be neceſſary for the ſecuring of their religion, property, and liberty, and to eaſe them of what may be juſtly grievous to them."

After this the coronation-oath was tendered to their majeſties, which the earl of Argyle ſpoke word by word diſtinctly, and the king and queen repeated it after him, holding up their right hands all the while, after the manner of taking oaths in Scotland. The commiſſioners, by the authority of the eſtates, repreſented to his majeſty, "That the clauſe of the oath, in relation to the rooting out of heretics, did not import the deſtroying of heretics; and that by the law of Scotland no man was to be perſecuted for his private opinion; and even obſtinate and convicted heretics were only to be denounced rebels, or outlawed, whereby their moveable eſtates are confiſcated." Hence his majeſty, at the repeating that clauſe in the oath, did declare, that he did not mean by theſe words, that he was under any obligation to become a perſecutor. To which the commiſſioners made anſwer, that neither the meaning of the oath, nor the law of Scotland, did import it. Then the king replied, that he took the oath in that ſenſe, and called the commiſſioners there preſent, to be witneſſes of his ſo doing.

On the 5th of June the duke of Hamilton acquainted the convention, that his majeſty had been pleaſed to appoint him his commiſſioner; and that he was impowered to give his conſent to an act for the turning the meeting of the ſtates into a parliament, in which his majeſty's further pleaſure was, that the earl of Crawford ſhould preſide. This act was accordingly paſſed the ſame day; and the parliament was prorogued to the 17th of June.

His majeſty being now king of Scotland, as well as of England, reſolved to form a miniſtry for that kingdom[a]. He determined to rely chiefly for advice on Dalrymple the father, who had been recommended to him, before he left the Hague, by the penſioner Fagel. And though he had heard great complaints of him, (as indeed there was ſome ground for them, (yet ſince his ſon ſir John Dalrymple was and them, and having a good party of his own regiment conſtantly with him, they found it not ſo ſafe to apprehend him. But I was taken and brought to Edinburgh, and put in a common gaol. I had the liberty of it at firſt, for ſome days that the convention did not ſit; but as ſoon as they met, and read the letters, there were never men in greater rage than generally the whole houſe was againſt me. Upon reading of one from the earl of Melfort to me, wherein, after he had given us aſſurance of ſpeedy relief, he expreſſed himſelf much after this manner: 'That he wiſhed ſome had been cut off, that he and I ſpoke about, and then things had never come to the paſs they were at; but when we got the power again, ſuch ſhould be hewers of wood and drawers of water.' This duke Hamilton took as meant of himſelf; but what the earl of Melfort's intentions were in theſe expreſſions, I cannot determine; but to juſtify him and myſelf, I do declare, that he never in his life made the leaſt inſinuation to me of any ſuch propoſition. But whatever he intended by them, nothing could have been more to the prejudice of your affairs, nor for my ruin, than this, which did ſhew, that nothing but cruelty would be uſed, if ever your majeſty returned. Theſe letters were printed both in Scotland and England, and were like to have their deſigned effect; for when they were read in the convention, though I had many relations there, yet few appeared my friends, except the duke of Queenſberry, which was the more generous in him, for we had been in very ill terms, and until your majeſty's departure, I ſaw his inclinations ſincerely to follow you. He told the houſe, he doubted not but the earl of Melfort had writ thoſe letters on purpoſe to ruin me; and if letters coming to me could be made criminal, it was in the power of every man's enemies to expoſe him to what they pleaſed. That which inclined the duke of Queenſberry to believe this the more was, that he knew of my concurring with many of your faithful ſervants, (notwithſtanding of my friendſhip and relation to the earl of Melfort) to deſire your majeſty, by Mr. L———y, captain C———n and C———n who were ſent to you to intreat, that the earl of Melfort ſhould not come along with you, for at that time there was never a man in any nation ſo abhorred; inſomuch that whatever came from your majeſty, if he was thought to be the leaſt concerned in it, there needed no more to give all the iſle of Britain a prejudice againſt it. This, I confeſs, made many of us deſire your majeſty, that he might not come along with you. That there were ſome, that did this out of perfect ſpite, I cannot deny; but theſe were but a few to the vaſt number that did otherwiſe, ſincerely for your majeſty's ſervice, finding how obnoxious he was to all parties: nor had he greater enemies in the nation, than the generality of the Roman catholics. Though what the duke of Queenſberry ſaid, did ſhew his inclinations, yet it did ſignify nothing to allay the heat, for duke Hamilton told him, he had as little reaſon as any to ſatisfy me, for he doubted not but he himſelf was alſo meant. And generally all of them thought they were comprehended under hewers of wood and drawers of water. So I was voted cloſe priſoner, where I was kept fourteen weeks, till after the caſtle of Edinburgh was ſurrendered, at which time I was put in there. Nor did they limit their rage and malice to me; only by all they thought I was concerned in this, and likewiſe muſt feel it; and to make the greater noiſe, they apprehended ſeveral gentlemen, whom they thought my friends, and put them likewiſe in a common gaol; and it was propoſed by the earl of C———d, that the lord Lochore, who was one of thoſe taken with me, ſhould be made cloſe priſoner; he ſaid, he was ſure, (conſidering the friendſhip I had for him) he knew all that was deſigned, or had been acted in the late civil government. But this even duke Hamilton did not incline to; but the other urging, it was brought to a vote, and carried in the negative only by three." Acc. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 84.

[a] "During the adjournment of the convention, ſays the earl of Belcarras, all appeared very quiet, though at that time humours and diſcontents began to ariſe among themſelves, the prince of Orange not being able to ſatisfy the pretenſions and avarice of them all. And thoſe, that had appeared early for his intereſt, and had been the chief inſtruments of raiſing the rabble in Edinburgh, and had ſhewn their zeal for him in the convention, thought they had better pretenſions than thoſe who came over with him, they having only acted what they had done out of neceſſity, being for the moſt part forfeited perſons.

"The prince of Orange, till he had got his buſineſs done, managed both parties, ſo that each believed he had all to expect; but after the convention they quickly found their miſtake, for his own inclinations were entirely for thoſe that came over with him, and he got the lord Melvil, a creature of his own, made ſole ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, and the council named as he had a mind, at leaſt of ſuch as he, if they could do him no good, they could ſignify as little againſt him, by which his power would be the greater. In it were named ſome, more for ſhew of their families, than any kindneſs for their perſons or eſteem for their parts: ſuch as the marquis of D———s, earl of M———n, earl M———l, earl of E——l, and earl of E———n, who, though they were not fanatics, yet were ſure not to contradict any thing that was to be done. Yet this diſſatisfied extremely the preſbyterians, who now thought none ſhould have been admitted but ſuch as had given proof of their converſion, and ſo inraged ſeveral, that had pretentions, particularly ſir James Montgomery, who thought nothing leſs due to his merit than to be ſecretary. Duke Hamilton was little better ſatisfied to ſee, that all the employments were neither at his diſpoſal, nor given to his children and friends, for whom he had made ſo many fruitleſs attempts both in your brother's reign and in your own. But though the diſcontents and jealouſies were generally known, yet they did not publicly declare againſt one another till at the firſt ſeſſion of the parliament in June 1689, where duke Hamilton was commiſſioner, and the earl of Crawford preſident. Acc. of the Aff. of Scotland, p. 96.

one of the three commiſſioners from the ſtates of Scotland, he concluded from thence, that the family was not ſo much hated, as he had been informed; and therefore continued ſtill to be adviſed by him. The epiſcopal party were afraid of ſir James Montgomery's being made ſecretary of ſtate, from whom they expected nothing but extreme ſeverities; for which reaſon they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to prevent his preferment to that poſt; and the lord Melvil, who had married the ducheſs of Monmouth's ſiſter, and had continued from the year 1660 firm to preſbytery, and had been of late forced to leave the kingdom, being looked on as an eaſy man, who would have credit enough to reſtrain the fury of that party, he was made ſole ſecretary. But this proved a very unhappy ſtep; for as he was by his principles bigoted to preſbytery, and ready to ſacrifice every thing to the humours of that party; ſo he proved to be in all reſpects a narrow-hearted man, who minded his own intereſts more than either that of the king or of his country. This choice gave a great diſtaſte; and that was followed by a miniſtry, in the framing of which he had the chief hand, who were weak and paſſionate men. All offices were ſplit into commiſſions, that many might have ſome ſhare; but it rendered them all contemptible. And though Montgomery had a conſiderable poſt offered him, yet his miſſing that, which he aimed at, ſunk deep in his mind, and began to work in him an averſion to the king, which broke out afterward into much fury and plotting againſt him. Nor did the duke of Hamilton think, that he was conſidered, in the new model of the miniſtry, as he had deſerved, and might juſtly have expected.

The parliament in Scotland was opened, on the ſeventeenth of June with much ill humour; and they reſolved to carry the redreſs of grievances very far. Lord Melvil hoped to have gained the preſbyterian party, by ſending inſtructions to the duke of Hamilton, to open the ſeſſion with an act in favour of preſbytery; but the majority reſolved to begin with their temporal concerns, and the firſt grievance, to which redreſs was deſired, was the power of the lords of the articles, that relating ſo immediately to the parliament itſelf. The king conſented to a proper regulation, as that the number ſhould be enlarged and changed, as often as the parliament ſhould deſire it; and that the parliament might bring matters before them, though they were rejected by the lords of the articles. This anſwered all the juſt complaints, that had been made of that part of the conſtitution; but the king thought it was the intereſt of the crown to preſerve it thus regulated. Yet it was pretended, that, if the name and ſhadow of that were ſtill kept up, the parliament would in ſome time be inſenſibly brought under all thoſe reſtraints, that were now to be provided againſt; for which reaſon they moved to take it quite away. The duke of Hamilton wrote long letters both to the king and to the lord Melvil, giving a full account of the progreſs of an ill humour, that was got among them, and of the ill conſequence it was like to have. But he had no anſwer from the king, and lord Melvil wrote him back dark and doubtful orders; upon which the duke took little care how matters went, and was not ill pleaſed to ſee them go wrong. The revenue was ſettled on the king for life; and they raiſed the money, which was neceſſary for maintaining a ſmall force in Scotland, though the greateſt part of an army of ſix thouſand men was paid by England. But even the Preſbyterians began to carry their demands high; they propoſed to have the king's ſupremacy, and the right of patronage, taken away; and they aſked ſo high an authority to their church government, that the duke of Hamilton, though of himſelf indifferent as to thoſe matters, yet would not agree to them. He thought theſe broke in too much on their temporal concerns, and would eſtabliſh a tyranny in preſbytery, that could not be eaſily borne. He wrote to biſhop Burnet, who ſpoke ſometimes to the king on thoſe ſubjects, his deſign being chiefly to ſhelter the epiſcopal clergy, and to keep the change, that was now to be made, on ſuch a foot, that a door might ſtill be kept open. But the torrent was ſo ſtrong, that it was not poſſible for the king, had he been ever ſo zealous for epiſcopacy, to have preſerved it at that time, and yet all the king's enemies in England, continually charged him for the alterations then made in Scotland.

A new debate was likewiſe ſet on foot in that parliament concerning the judges. By the law there, when the king names a judge, he ought to be examined by other judges, whether he is qualified as the law directs. But in the year 1661, becauſe the bench was to be filled with a new ſet of judges, ſo that there was none to examine the reſt, the nomination, which the king then made, was read in parliament; and no objection being made to any of them, they did upon that ſit and act as judges. It was expected, that the ſame method ſhould be followed at this time. But, inſtead of that, the king continued ſuch a number of the former judges, as was ſufficient to examine thoſe, who were now to be advanced; ſo that was ordered to be done. Upon this, thoſe, who oppoſed every thing, pretended, that the nomination ought to be made in parliament; and they had prepared objections againſt every one, who was in the liſt; intending by this to put a public affront on one of the firſt and moſt important acts of the king's government. But the duke of Hamilton had a poſitive inſtruction ſent him, not to ſuffer this matter to be brought into parliament; yet he ſaw the party was ſo ſtrong, that they had a clear majority. Nor did he himſelf very much approve of the nomination, eſpecially that of the elder Dalrymple, ſoon after made lord Stair, to be preſident. And therefore he diſcontinued the parliament.

While theſe animoſities were thus fomented, viſcount Dundee had got together a conſiderable body of gentlemen, with ſome thouſands of Highlanders. He ſent ſeveral meſſengers over to Ireland, preſſing king James to come either to the north of England, or to Scotland; but at the ſame time deſired, that he would not bring the lord Melfort over with him, or employ him in Scots buſineſs; and that he would be contented with the exerciſe of his own religion. It may be eaſily ſuppoſed, that all this was very diſagreeable to king James; and that the lord Melfort diſparaged all the viſcount's undertakings. In this he was much ſupported by the French about that king, who had it given them in charge, as a main inſtruction, to keep him up to an high owning of his religion, and of all thoſe, who were of it; and not to ſuffer him to enter into any treaty or conditions with his proteſtant ſubjects, by which the papiſts ſhould in any ſort ſuffer, or be ſo much as diſcouraged. The Iriſh were willing enough to croſs the ſeas to England, but would not conſent to the going over to Scotland. The viſcount therefore was only furniſhed from Ireland with ſome ſmall ſtore of arms and ammunition, and had kind promiſes encouraging him, and all, who joined with him.

Lieutenant-general Mackay commanded their majeſties forces in Scotland. He followed the viſcount Dundee's motions, who was leſs incumbered with cannon and baggage, and ſo marched quicker than it was poſſible for Mackay to follow. His men were for the moſt part new levied, and without experience; but he had ſome old bodies, on whom he depended. The heads of the clans among the Highlanders promiſed to join him; but moſt of them went over to the viſcount Dundee. At laſt, after many marches and motions, they came to an engagement on the 26th of May, at Killikranky, ſome few miles above Dunkell. The ground was narrow, and lord Dundee had the advantage. He broke through Mackay's army, who fled; and probably, if the viſcount had outlived that day, the victory might have been purſued very far. But a random ſhot put an end to his life, and to the whole deſign [b]; for Mackay rallied his men, and made ſuch a ſtand, that the other ſide fell into great diſorder, [b] "Your affairs, ſays the earl of Belcarras to king James, ſuffered prejudice by the victory, conſidering the great loſs of the viſcount of Dundee, who was the man the moſt proper for any ſuch undertaking in the nation; for he well underſtood the different tempers of thoſe he had to deal with, and knew well when and to whom it was fit to ſhew kindneſs, and alſo when to uſe roughneſs without ſeverity. And though he was naturally more ſparing of his money, than profuſe, yet wherever your majeſty's ſervice or ambition prompted, he ſtuck at nothing, but diſtributed frankly whatever he could command, which gained him entirely the hearts of thoſe who followed him, and brought him into ſuch a reputation, that if he had ſurvived that day, in all probability he would have given ſuch a turn to your affairs, that the prince of Orange could neither have gone nor ſent into Ireland; by which your majeſty would have been entire maſter of that kingdom, and in a condition to have landed what forces you pleaſed in Scotland, which was the only thing all your friends moſt deſired. Next day after the fight, an officer riding by the place where my lord Dundee fell, found lying there a bundle of papers and commiſſions, which he had about him. Thoſe, who ſtripped him, thought them but of ſmall concern, ſo they left them there lying. This officer a little after did ſhew them to ſeveral of your friends, among which there was one paper did no ſmall prejudice to your affairs, and would have done much more had it not been carefully ſuppreſſed. It was a letter of the earl of Melfort's to my lord Dundee, when he ſent him over your majeſty's declaration, in which was contained not only an indemnity, but a toleration for all perſuaſions. This the earl of Melford believed would be ſhocking to Dundee, conſidering his hatred to fanatics; for he writes, that notwithſtanding of what was promiſed in your declaration, indemnity and indulgence, yet he had couched things ſo, that you would break them when you pleaſed; nor would you think yourſelf obliged to ſtand to them. This not only diſſatisfied him, but alſo many of your friends, who thought a more ingenuous way of dealing better both for your honour and intereſt.

"Never were men in ſuch a conſternation as duke Hamilton and the reſt of the parliament then at Edinburgh, when they heard from thoſe that fled, of the defeat of Mackay. Some were for retiring into Ireland; others and could never be formed again into any conſiderable body. And a fort was ſoon after built at Innerlochy, which was called fort William, and ſerved to cut off the communication between the northern and ſouthern Highlanders.

The ſiege of Edinburgh was likewiſe carried on with ſuch vigour, that the duke of Gordon ſeeing his ammunition ſpent, his houſe entirely ruined by the bombs, great breaches made in the walls by the cannon, and the beſiegers advanced to the ditch; and deſpairing of relief, ſince the lords Dunmore, Tarbat, and Lovat, with whom he had intelligence, were ſecured, he delivered up that important fortreſs on the 13th of June to ſir John Lanier, and ſurrendered himſelf and his whole garriſon to king William's diſcretion, upon condition that their lives ſhould be ſecured.

Thus the whole iſland of Great Britain acknowledged the ſovereignty of king William, and ſubmitted to his government; but Ireland was far from following the example of Scotland, and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced to obedience.

The earl of Tyrconnel had been made lord lieutenant of Ireland in the beginning of king James's reign, on purpoſe to carry on his deſigns for the eſtabliſhment of popery in that kingdom[c]. The earl of Clarendon (whom Tyrconnel ſucceeded) had given public and ſolemn aſſurance that king James would maintain their act of ſettlement. But Tyrconnel went roundly to work. He turned all the Engliſh proteſtant officers out of the army, and placed Iriſh papiſts in their room. So an army paid by virtue of the act of ſettlement to ſecure it, was put into the hands of thoſe who were engaged both in religion and intereſt to deſtroy the ſettlement, and thoſe concerned in it, which was ſuch a violation of the law, as could not be any way palliated. Upon this the proteſtants of Ireland looked on themſelves as at mercy, ſince the army was now made up of their enemies. Fitton, a zealous papiſt, and who knew no other law but the king's pleaſure, was at the ſame time made lord chancellor. This ſtruck all people with great terror, to ſee a man of Tyrconnel's temper, entirely depended on by the Iriſh, capable of the boldeſt undertakings, and of the moſt cruel execution, in full poſſeſſion of the government. It was viſible, father Peter and the jeſuits were throwing king James into deſperate meaſures, and that in caſe all other methods failed, and his Engliſh army deſerted him, he ſhould think of accompliſhing his deſigns by the aſſiſtance of France and an Iriſh army. In theſe circumſtances was Ireland, when the prince of Orange landed in England. Tyrconnel gave out new commiſſions for levying thirty thouſand men; and reports were ſpread all over the iſland, that a general maſſacre of the proteſtants was deſigned in November. Terrified at this, the proteſtants began to run together for their defence both in Munſter and Ulſter. They had no great ſtrength in Munſter, having been diſarmed; nor any ſtore of ammunition for the few arms they had. So deſpairing of defending themſelves, great numbers came over to England, full of diſmal apprehenſions for thoſe left behind. They moved earneſtly that a ſpeedy aſſiſtance might be ſent them. In Ulſter the proteſtants had more ſtrength, but they wanted a leader. The lords of Granard and Montjoy, in whom they moſt confided, kept ſtill ſuch meaſures with Tyrconnel, that they would not take the conduct of them. However, Londonderry, the chief town in the north of Ireland, had taken arms before the prince of Orange reached London, as had alſo Inniſkillin, Slego, Coleraine, Kilmore, and ſome others of leſs note. As ſoon as the prince came to St. James's, the nobility and gentry of Ireland, who were then in London, met at the duke of Ormond's houſe, and drew up an addreſs to be preſented to him, with draughts of the chief ports of that kingdom, praying him to take them into his protection, which the lords and commons of England had before deſired.

There was at this time, a great variety of opinions about the affairs of Ireland. Some thought that the leaving Ireland in ſo dangerous a ſtate, might be a means to bring the convention to a more ſpeedy ſettlement of England, and that therefore the prince ought not to make too much haſte to relieve Ireland. This advice was generally believed to be given by the marquis of Halifax. The truth was, the prince did not know whom to truſt. The Engliſh army was diſcontented, and probably, if he had ſent any of them they would have joined Tyrconnel: Nor could he ſend away any of his Dutch troops, on whom he chiefly truſted for maintaining the quiet of England. Then the magazines were ſo exhauſted, that till new ſtores were provided, there was little ammunition to ſpare. The raiſing new troops was a work of time, nor were there any ſhips of war in thoſe ſeas to ſecure the tranſports. And to ſend a ſmall company of officers with ſome ammunition, which was all that could be done on a ſudden; ſeemed to be expoſing them to the enemy. Theſe conſiderations inclined him to take another method. It was thought by ſome, that Ireland would certainly follow the fate of England. This was managed by an artifice of Tyrconnel's, who, by deceiving and threatning the moſt eminent proteſtants in Dublin, got them to write over to London, and give aſſurances that he would deliver up Ireland, if he might have good terms for himſelf. The earl of Clarendon was much depended upon by the proteſtants in Ireland, who made all their applications to the prince by him. Thoſe who were employed by Tyrconnel to deceive the prince, ſaid Tyrconnel would never reſign, unleſs he was aſſured, that Clarendon was not to ſucceed. Upon which the prince avoided ſpeaking to Clarendon about the Iriſh affairs, who having poſſeſſed himſelf with the hopes of Tyrconnel's poſt, and ſeeing them fruſtrated, became a violent oppoſer of the new ſettlement, reconciled himſelf to king James, and remained ever after a warm promoter of his intereſt. The prince being under difficulties how to relieve Ireland, hearkened to a propoſition made him; which was, to ſend over lieutenant-general Hamilton one of the officers that belonged to Ireland, and a ſort of priſoner of war to the prince. Hamilton who had ſerved in France with reputation, had great credit with Tyrconnel, and though a papiſt, was believed to be a man of honour. He undertook to prevail with Tyrconnel to reſign, and promiſed to return, in caſe he did not ſucceed. But inſtead of perſuading Tyrconnel to ſubmit, Hamilton adviſed him to ſtand out, for that all things in England were turning very faſt in favour of king James. This ſtep had a very ill effect, for before Hamilton came to Dublin, Tyrconnel was in ſuch deſpair, as looking on all as loſt, that he ſeemed to be very near a full reſolution of getting the beſt terms he could. This appears the more probable from what paſſed at an extraordinary council, to conſider the ſtate of affairs, held by Tyrconnel in the caſtle of Dublin the day after king James retired from Rocheſter into France, which he could not have heard of. At this council chief juſtice Keating, the only proteſtant judge in the kingdom, made a ſpeech to this purpoſe; "That it would be in vain to contend with the forces, which the prince of Orance had brought to England, and which had maſtered all oppoſition, or rather had met none in their march from the weſt to London; and that they would certainly find their work as eaſy in Ireland. That they ſhould call to mind the misfortunes they lay under by their laſt rebellion, and the conſequences, that would attend another by the utter forfeiture of all their lands and eſtates. That in the north the proteſtants were already in arms, and would readily join with any other proteſtants, who ſhould be ſent to their aſſiſtance. That the government of England being in the prince of Orange's hands, there was no ſuccour to be expected from that kingdom; nor had they any fund of money to maintain a war, the revenue of Ireland not being ſufficient to diſcharge the public expence; and that this revenue would decreaſe daily. Therefore, concluded he, as I am called to give my advice on this extraordinary occaſion, ſo I will not be anſwerable for any of the miſeries, that may enſue upon your non-compliance, but exhort your excellency to make a wiſe, timely, and honourable accommodation, which I doubt not you may obtain for yourſelf and people. May almighty God direct your intentions for the good of the public."

Tyrconnel heard the judge with patience, who was ſeconded by ſome of the more moderate papiſts; and at length others into the weſtern ſhires of Scotland; nor knew they whether to abandon the government, or ſtay a few days, until they ſaw if my lord Dundee came nearer, for they never imagined he was killed. Then they conſidered whether to ſet at liberty all priſoners, or to make them more cloſe; the laſt was reſolved on. So we were all ſhut up; but though all liberty was denied us of ſeeing our friends, yet we never had ſo many viſits of your enemies, all making excuſes for what had paſſed, proteſting they always wiſhed us well, as we ſhould ſee, whenever they had the opportunity. The fright of thoſe who fled, augmented their own loſs, for col. L———r and ſeveral others, to excuſe themſelves, told all was cut off, when a few days after ſeveral came to Edinburgh, who, they ſaid, had been killed; and there being no noiſe of the viſcount Dundee's advancing forwards, they began to take a little more heart, and ſoon after they got notice of his death, which put them out of all apprehenſion; for they knew very well there was none in the army could make uſe of the victory, which ſoon appeared." Acc. of the Aff. of Scotland, p. 107.

[c] He had been named by Oates, in his Narrative, for that very employment; and therefore when the proteſtants ſaw him put into it, many who believed nothing of a plot before, gave credit now to that narrative; and the common ſaying was, "that if Oates was an ill evidence, he was certainly a good prophet." He exerciſed at the ſame time ſo much falſhood and barbarity, that if the army had not been the beſt principled with loyalty and obedience of any in the world, they would have mutinied, or at leaſt have diſpatched him. moved in council, that if they would ſtand by and declare for the king and proteſtant religion, he would immediately make the earl of Granard, preſident of that council, lieutenant-general, and the lord Montjoy, major general of the army of that kingdom; which the earl of Granard declining, Tyrconnel left the council abruptly without coming to any reſolution. But Hamilton's arrival and perſuaſions ſecured him to king James, though he ſaw he muſt manage ſo as to gain as much time as he could, that the prince might not make too much haſte before a fleet and ſupplies came from France. Accordingly ſeveral letters were ſent over to England giving aſſurances that Tyrconnel was fully reſolved to treat and ſubmit.

King James came into France in December 1688, where he was received with great civility by Lewis XIV, but the meanneſs of his diſcourſe and his whole appearance and behaviour ſoon gave diſguſt to that court; and his conſtant application to hunting made him conſidered as a prince, who from a cowardly deſpair reſigned himſelf up to fortune, and abandoned a crown, which he found himſelf too weak either to recover or even to wear. In ſhort, the more the French ſaw of him, the leſs pity they had for his misfortunes. He was perpetually ſurrounded by the jeſuits, affecting to declare himſelf of their ſociety; and his bigotry was ſo exceſſive, that it expoſed him to contempt; ſo that the archbiſhop of Rheims, brother to monſieur de Louvois, ſeeing him come from maſs, could not avoid ſaying with an ironical tone, 'there goes a very honeſt gentleman, who has abandoned three kingdoms for a maſs.' However the king of France aſſured him, that as they had both the ſame intereſts, ſo he would never give over the war, till he had reſtored him to his throne. The only proſpect which king James now had, was to keep up his party in Ireland and Scotland. Tyrconnel ſent him private meſſages, earneſtly preſſing him for ſpeedy ſupplies, though at the ſame time to carry on his pretended deſign to ſubmit to the prince of Orange, and to diſguiſe his real intentions, he perſuaded the lord Montjoy to go with the chief baron Rice, to king James, to repreſent to him the weakneſs of Ireland, and the neceſſity of yielding to the time, and waiting a better opportunity of ſerving himſelf of his Iriſh ſubjects. He ſwore moſt ſolemnly, that he was in earneſt in this meſſage, and that he knew the court of France would oppoſe it with all their power; 'for,' ſaid he, 'that court minds nothing but their own intereſt, and they would not care, if Ireland were ſunk to the pit of hell, ſo they could but give the prince of Orange but three months diverſion.' 'But,' added he, 'if the king be perſuaded to ruin his faſteſt friends to do himſelf no ſervice, only to gratify France, he is neither ſo merciful nor ſo wiſe as I believe him to be. If he recover England, Ireland will fall in courſe, but he can never expect to conquer England by Ireland. If he attemps it, he ruins Ireland to do himſelf no kindneſs, but rather to exaſperate England the more againſt him, and make his reſtoration impoſſible.' He intimated likewiſe, that if the king would not do it, he would look on his refuſal to be forced on him by thoſe, in whoſe power he was, and that he ſhould 'think himſelf obliged to do it without his conſent.' Every body told the lord Montjoy, that this was all an artifice to amuſe the proteſtants, and to get him, who was the likelieſt man to head them, out of the way; notwithſtanding which, he was prevailed upon, contrary to the general opinion of all the proteſtants in Ireland, to undertake the buſineſs, having firſt had theſe conceſſions made him in behalf of the proteſtants. 1. That no more commiſſions ſhould be given out, or new men raiſed. 2. That no more of the army ſhould be ſent into the north. 3. That none ſhould be queſtioned for what was paſſed. 4. That no private houſe ſhould be garriſoned or diſturbed with ſoldiers. He was no ſooner ſet out from Dublin with the chief baron Rice, but Tyrconnel, according to his uſual method of falſhood, denied theſe conceſſions, and refuſed to obſerve any of them; and the lord Montjoy, immediately after his arrival at Paris, inſtead of being heard to deliver his meſſage, was committed priſoner to the baſtile, on account of the great zeal, which he had lately ſhewn for the proteſtant intereſt; and this further exaſperated the proteſtants of Ireland againſt king James, and made them look upon him as a violator of public faith to his ſubjects. However Tyrconnel gained his point, which was a good deal of time. Thoſe who adviſed the ſending over of Hamilton, were now out of countenance, and the earl of Clarendon loudly exclaimed againſt it. Sir William Temple's ſon, ſecretary at war, who had raiſed in the prince a high opinion of Hamilton's honour was terribly affected with his treachery, and ſoon after, without any other viſible cauſe of melancholy, went in a boat on the Thames near the bridge, and leaped into the river and drowned himſelf.

Whatever diſpoſition Lewis XIV. had to ſupport king James, the French miniſtry was at that time much divided. Louvois had the greateſt credit, and was very ſucceſsful in all his counſels; ſo that he was moſt conſidered. But Seignelay was believed to have more perſonal favour, and to be more entirely united to madam Maintenon. Theſe two were in a high competition for favour, and hated each other. Seignelay had the marine, as the other had the army, for his province. King James therefore having the moſt dependance on the marine, and looking on the ſecretary for that poſt as the moſt powerful favourite, made his chief application to him; which induced Louvois to croſs and retard every thing, which was propoſed for his ſervice; ſo that matters went on ſlowly and very defectively. There was likewiſe another circumſtance in king James's affairs, that did him much hurt. The count de Lauſun, (who was once deſigned for the huſband of mademoiſelle de Montpenſier, daughter of Gaſton duke of Orleans, though Lewis XIV. thought proper to break off the match, after he had conſented to it) had come over to England to king James, and offered him his ſervice, and had attended on the queen, when ſhe retired to France. He had obtained a promiſe from king James of the command of ſuch forces, as the king of France would aſſiſt him with. Louvois hated Lauſun; nor did the king of France like to employ him; and therefore Louvois ſent to king James, deſiring him to aſk of the king of France, Souvray, a ſon of his, whom he was educating to ſerve in war, to command the French troops. But king James had ſo engaged himſelf to Lauſun, that he thought he could not in honour depart from it. From that moment therefore, it is ſaid, Louvois ſtudied by all the ways he could think of, to diſparage him, and all the propoſitions he made. However, king James obtained about five thouſand Frenchmen to be ſent over with him to Ireland[d], but no conſiderable ſupplies of money. But when Lauſun, who was to have the command of theſe forces, was to depart, he demanded to be made a duke of [d] Sir John Reresby tells us, that the French king furniſhed him with a ſquadron of fourteen men of war, ſix leſſer frigates, and three fireſhips, all well manned and fitted; as alſo with a ſum of two hundred thouſand livres in ready money, and fifty thouſand piſtoles, as a preſent for his pocket, together with plate, tents, and a moſt royal and ſplendid equipage. He aſſiſted him likewiſe with eight experienced field officers, one hundred of inferior note, a guard of one hundred Swiſs, a band of ſkilful pioneers, fifteen thouſand of his own natural ſubjects, arms for forty thouſand men more, cannon and ammunition in a great abundance, and over and above made him an offer of fifteen thouſand of his French troops; but king James excuſed himſelf, ſaying, 'He would ſucceed by the help of his own ſubjects, or periſh in the attempt.' Sir John likewiſe informs us, that on the firſt of March 1688-9, a lady of his acquaintance, who had been intruſted with ſome jewels of king James's, ſhewed him a letter from that king, dated the 17th of February N. S. intimating, that he was to ſet out the next day for Ireland, "and depended upon his old friends to aſſiſt him in his cauſe. This lady, adds ſir John, told me, the French king had ſupplied him with a great treaſure of money, and ſix thouſand Swiſs proteſtants: that he intended to go through Ireland for Scotland, there to call a parliament, inſtead of the propoſed convention; and that from thence he would march into England, and put himſelf entirely into the hands of the proteſtant intereſt. She added, that as ſhe had a friendſhip for the lord privy ſeal, [the marquis of Halifax] ſhe had a mind to diſcloſe herſelf to him, if with any ſafety ſhe ſo might do. I told her I would ſpeak to his lordſhip that very night, and let her know farther. Having an opportunity of ſpeaking to him accordingly, I failed not to be as good as my word, though I muſt own, the topic being of ſo nice and tender a ſort, I did it with great caution. However, I gave him plainly to underſtand, that the chief motive, which induced the lady to deſire a meeting with him, was, to impart to him what might be for his own good, and the ſervice of the public. Hereupon he began to be more free and open with me than he had hitherto been on this chapter; and I told him in general, that great deſigns were on foot. He ſaid, he believed it; and that though men ſeemed to be for the preſent intereſt as moſt prevalent, it was not altogether diſcreet to venture too far: That if matters really were as I had ſaid, it was but ſafe to carry it fair with thoſe in the oppoſition, and ſo let ſome people know he ſpoke always with great reſpect of king James: That if we came to blows, it was uncertain who would ſtrike hardeſt; and that he ſhould be glad to meet the lady at my houſe, whenever ſhe pleaſed. But his lordſhip however ſaid, all imaginable care would be taken to ward off any danger, that might threaten us: That an army of twenty thouſand men would be preſently raiſed: That all ſuſpicious perſons would be ſecured, the parliament intending to inveſt the king with a power to impriſon whom he pleaſed, and to keep them in ſafe cuſtody till they came to a trial; and in fine, that the parliament would moſt plentifully furniſh the king for the proſecution of the war. At this time ſeveral lords and gentlemen of both houſes withdrew to their ſeveral countries; and I was told, that ſome, who were outwardly great friends to the preſent government, were treating for terms on the other ſide; which I particularly communicated to his lordſhip, and particularly made mention of ſome he little ſuſpected. Whereupon his lordſhip ſaid, that if king James was actually driving on at the rate reported, the papiſts would certainly contrive ſome how or other to aſſaſſinate or kill king William; well knowing, what a taſk it would be to defend the crown on the head of a woman; with much to the ſame effect.——On the 3d of March lord Halifax met the lady I juſt now mentioned to have received a letter from king James. She dealt very frankly with him, but durſt not tell him all ſhe knew. However, he deſired her to be his friend, if any alteration of affairs ſhould by any means be brought to paſs." Reresby's Mem. p. 332, &c.

France, and propoſed that affair firſt to Seignelay, who mentioning it to Lewis XIV, the king was extremely angry with the demand, and when Lauſun ſpoke of it to him, expreſſed himſelf with great ſeverity. Upon this Lauſun excuſed himſelf, by alledging, that king James had ordered him to ſolicit that honour; and he requeſted that king and his queen to declare the ſame to the king of France, which they both did. But he being refuſed the title, thought proper to lay aſide all thoughts of going to Ireland, though king James ſoon after made him a knight of the garter; and Roſen, a German, was appointed to go in his room under the title of lieutenant-general. The reſt of the officers were Maumont, captain of the guards, in the poſt of Mareſchal de camp; Puſignan, colonel of the regiment of Languedoc, as brigadier of the foot; Ley Gar, brigadier of the horſe; and Boſelaw, captain of the guards, as major general. Beſides theſe officers there were ſent likewiſe an hundred captains and an equal number of lieutenants. When king James took his leave of the king of France, the latter told him; that the beſt thing he could wiſh him, was never to ſee him again. He took ſhipping at Breſt, and landed at Kingſale in Ireland on the 12th of March 1688-9. The next day he went, with a numerous attendance, to Cork, where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who cauſed one of the magiſtrates to be executed for declaring for the prince of Orange. On the 24th of March king James entered Dublin in a triumphant manner, and the next morning having called a council turned out the earl of Granard the chairman, and chief juſtice Keating; and in their rooms, placed Cartwright, biſhop of Cheſter; and lieutenant colonel Dorrington and count D'Avaux the French embaſſador, who under another title was governor of Ireland for the king of France. In ſhort the officers and domeſtics of king James, were almoſt all French.

Theſe circumſtances gave ſome colour to a report then current, that there was a ſecret treaty between him and the French king, by which king James obliged himſelf, as ſoon as he ſhould be reſtored to his kingdoms, to renounce all claim to the title and arms of France; to reſign the ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas, and the honours of the flag: To furniſh France at his own charge with thirty ſhips of the line, and twenty thouſand land forces, when he ſhould be required: To make no treaty or alliance, without the conſent of the king of France; to have an army conſtantly on foot, and to keep in his pay ten thouſand French, and five thouſand catholic Swiſs; to yield up Ireland to Lewis, who in return, engaged to conquer for him Sicily and Sardinia; and laſtly, in caſe the two princeſſes king James's daughters, ſhould become widows, to put them into the hands of the French king, in order to be married to whom he ſhould think proper, upon condition, that the eldeſt ſon that ſhould be born of ſuch marriage, ſhould be king of Scotland and Ireland, England and it's dominions in America remaining to the prince of Wales. The French were to have as a ſecurity for the performance of theſe conditions a garriſon in Dover caſtle, and at Portſmouth and Plymouth. And by the additional articles to this treaty, it was reſolved to ſuppreſs the proteſtant religion in Ireland. This treaty appeared ſo improbable, that the reality of it was doubted by many, but it muſt be owned that king James's conduct in Ireland, confirmed the ſuſpicions of others that he had actually entered into ſuch an engagement.

Upon his arrival at Dublin, he ordered five proclamations to be publiſhed: one ſeemingly in favour of his proteſtant ſubjects, who had lately left that kingdom, requiring them to return home, with aſſurance of his protection; and further requiring all his ſubjects, of what perſuaſion ſoever, to join with him againſt the prince of Orange. A ſecond, commending all his Roman catholic ſubjects for their vigilance and care in arming themſelves; yet whereas it had encouraged ſome robberies, it required all but ſuch, who were actually under command and pay in the army, to lay up their arms in their ſeveral abodes. A third, inviting the country to carry proviſion to his army. A fourth, raiſing ſuch monies, as were current in Ireland. And a fifth, calling a parliament to meet at Dublin on the 7th of May. At the ſame time he created the earl of Tyrconnel a duke, and beſtowed the royal regiment on colonel Dorrington in the room of the duke of Ormond.

The proteſtants were ſo little inclined to truſt king James's promiſes, that they choſe to ſtand upon their defence; and gathering into one body, made a ſhew of oppoſing his forces in the open field. But being routed by lieutenant-general Hamilton [c] at a place called Drummore, their reſiſtance and defeat gave occaſion to king James and Tyrconnel to uſe thoſe in their power with redoubled ſeverity, and to march towards the north with an army of about twenty thouſand men, to force the reſt out of their ſtrong holds.

King William being ſenſible of the deſperate condition of his Iriſh ſubjects, had already ſent capt. James Hamilton, with ammunition and arms to Londonderry, and named col. Lundee, on whoſe fidelity he depended, governor of that town. But it ſoon appeared, how much he was miſtaken in his choice. On the 13th of April, Mr. George Walker, rector of Donahmore in the county of Tyrone, who had raiſed a regiment for the defence of the proteſtants, receiving intelligence, that king James having taken Coleraine and Kilmore, after a ſtout reſiſtance, was drawing his forces towards Londonderry, haſtened thither to give Lundee an account of it. The governor at firſt believed it to be only a falſe alarm, but was ſoon convinced of the contrary, the enemy being advanced to Cledyford. Walker returned to Lyfford, where he joined col. Crafton, and afterwards according to Lundee's directions, took his poſt at the Long Cauſey, which he vigorouſly maintained a whole night; but being over-powered by the enemy's numbers, retreated to Londonderry, where he vainly endeavoured to perſuade Lundee to take the field. On the 17th of April col. Lundee thought fit to call a council of war, and that col. Cunningham and col. Richards, who two days before came into the river of Lough-Foyle with their regiments from England, ſhould be members of it. Accordingly they met, and with other gentlemen either equally diſaffected, or at beſt, as little acquainted with the condition of the town, or the inclination and reſolution of the people, they at laſt concluded, "that there was no proviſion in the town of Londonderry for the preſent garriſon, and the two regiments on board, for above a week or ten days at moſt; and it appearing, that the place was not tenable againſt a well appointed army; therefore it was not convenient for his majeſty's ſervice, but the contrary, to land the two regiments under colonel Cunningham. That conſidering the preſent circumſtances of affairs, and the likelihood the enemy would ſoon poſſeſs themſelves of that place, it was thought moſt convenient, that the principal officers ſhould withdraw themſelves, as well for their own preſervation, as in hopes, that the inhabitants, by a timely capitulation, might make terms the better with the enemy." After this reſolution, an inſtrument was prepared to be ſubſcribed by the gentlemen of the town-council, and to be ſent to king James, who was advanced in perſon with his army as far as St. John's town; and it was recommended with this encouragement, that there was no doubt, but upon ſurrender of the town, king James would grant a general pardon, and order reſtitution of all that had been plundered from them. Some gentlemen were influenced by theſe conſiderations to ſubſcribe; others not only refuſed, but began to conceive ſome jealouſies of their governor; and ſome, though they did but gueſs at their proceedings, expreſſed themſelves after a ruder manner, threatening to hang both the governor and his council. However, captain White was ſent out to the king to receive propoſals from him; and it was at the ſame time agreed with lieutenant-general Hamilton, that he ſhould not march the army within four miles of the town. But, contrary to this agreement, king James, upon the confidence given him, the town would ſurrender at the ſight of his formidable army, advanced on the 18th of April at the head of it before the walls, where meeting with a warm reception, which put his men in ſome diſorder, he retired to St. John's town. In the mean time Mr. Muckeridge the town-clerk, ſaw it abſolutely neceſſary to give the people ſome intimation of the proceedings at the council of war; which diſcovery ſo enraged them againſt the governor and his council, that the latter finding themſelves in danger, made their eſcape in confuſion, though not without ſome hazard to their perſons, from the ſoldiers themſelves, who were under great diſcontent to be deſerted by thoſe, who had engaged them in difficulties, which they were then under. The governor could not ſo eaſily retire, being more obnoxious than any of the reſt, and therefore thought it convenient to keep his chamber. A council being appointed there, Mr. Walker and major Baker endeavoured to perſuade him to continue his government; but he poſitively refuſing to concern himſelf, they, out of reſpect to his commiſſion, thought it a duty to contribute to his ſafety, and ſuffered him to diſguiſe himſelf, and in a ſally for the relief of Culmore, to paſs in a boat with a load of match on his back; from whence he went to Scotland, where he was ſecured, and ſent to London, to anſwer for the miſcarriages laid to his charge.

The garriſon of Londonderry being thus effectually encouraged by Mr. Walker to maintain the town againſt king James, they unanimouſly reſolved to chuſe both him and major Baker to be their governors during the approaching ſiege. But theſe gentlemen conſidering the importance as well as uncertainty of ſuch an office, acquainted by letter colonel Cunningham, (whoſe buſineſs they had reaſon to think it was to take care of them) with this matter, and deſired him to undertake the charge; but he pretending, that by his inſtructions he was obliged to obey the orders of colonel Lundee, refuſed the propoſal, and returned to England, where both he and colonel Richards were deſervedly caſhiered. Upon this refuſal Mr. Walker and major Baker accepted the government of the garriſon, and regimented the men in the town, to the number of ſeven thouſand and twenty, under eight colonels, and three hundred and thirty-three inferior officers.

It was certainly a bold undertaking in this divine and major Baker to maintain againſt a formidable army, commanded by a king in perſon, an ill-fortified town, with a garriſon compoſed of poor people, frightened from their own homes, and without a proportionable number of horſe to ſally out, or engineers to inſtruct them in the neceſſary works. Beſides, they had not above twenty guns, and not one of them well mounted; and not above ten days proviſion, in the opinion of the former governor; ſo that ſeveral deſerted every day; and others not only gave conſtant intelligence to the enemy, but induſtriouſly endeavoured to betray the governors. On the 20th of April king James inveſted the place; and the next day began to batter it; of which the governors ſent advice to England by Mr. Bennet, acquainting his majeſty with their reſolutions to defend themſelves to the laſt, and imploring a ſpeedy aſſiſtance. In the mean time ſeveral attacks were made by the beſiegers, and as many ſallies by the beſieged, in both which the beſieged had always the advantage; and they would have had leſs reaſon to fear either the number or rage of their enemies without, if they had not had within both famine and ſickneſs to oppoſe.

On the 29th of April king James retired from the camp[f] to meet his parliament at Dublin; and the beſiegers finding their attempts ſtill attended with ill ſucceſs, removed their main body from St. John's town, and pitched their tents upon Bely-ugry hill, about two miles diſtant from Londonderry, for the cloſer guard of the town, to hinder the beſieged from coming to the wells of water. On the 17th of June the beſiegers made an aſſault on that part of the place which they thought moſt acceſſible, but were repulſed with great ſlaughter; and the next morning they began to batter the walls with their uſual ill ſucceſs. On the other hand the beſieged began to be reduced to the laſt extremity, when they eſpied three ſhips that fired at Kilmore caſtle, and attempted to come up the river, which however was prevented by the enemies ſhot. Not long after they diſcovered a fleet of thirty ſail in the lough, which they believed came from England to their relief, though they could not propoſe any method to get intelligence from them, the enemy watching them more narrowly, and having raiſed batteries oppoſite to the ſhips, lined both ſides of the river with muſketeers, and contrived in the narrow part of the river, where the ſhips were to paſs, a ſort of ſtaccado, being a boom of timber joined by iron chains, and ſtrengthened by a cable of twelve inches thickneſs twiſted round it. Notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, one Roch boldly adventured to get to the water-ſide over againſt the town, and then ſwimming croſs the river gave the beſieged an account, that major-general Kirk[g] was come to their aſſiſtance with men, proviſion, and arms; and how much he deſired to get with his ſhips up to the town. With this meſſenger Kirk had ſent another, one Craney, a Scotſman, to give them the ſame account, and to know the condition of the garriſon; but he being taken by the enemy, was by them inſtructed to frame a meſſage much differing from the other. Thereupon the beſiegers invited the garriſon to a parley, telling them, that they were under great miſtakes about the major-general, and their expectations from England, where things were all in confuſion; and that they might have leave to inform themſelves further from the meſſenger, whom they had taken. The beſieged ſent ſome to that purpoſe, who ſoon diſcovered the cheat, and returned with other particulars of his treachery. The governors received further intelligence by a little boy, who with great ingenuity brought two letters from the major-general at Inch, the one tyed in his garter, and the other within a cloth-button. By the latter the general aſſured Mr. Walker, "that he would endeavour all means imaginable for their relief, but found it impoſſible by the river, which made him ſend a party to Inch, whither he was going himſelf to try, if he could beat off the enemies camp, or divert them ſo, that they ſhould not preſs the town. That he had ſent officers, ammunition, arms, great guns, &c. to Inniſkillin, who had 3000 foot and 1500 horſe, and a regiment of dragoons, that had promiſed to come to their relief; and at the ſame time he would attack the enemy by Inch. That he expected ſix thouſand men from England every minute, they having been ſhipped eight days before. That he had ſtores and victuals for the town, and was reſolved to relieve them. That England and Scotland were in a very good poſture, and all things there very well ſettled. That they in the town ſhould be good huſbands of their victuals, and, by God's help, they ſhould overcome thoſe barbarous people. That ſeveral of the enemy had deſerted to him, who all aſſured him they could not ſtay long."

All this while the beſieged were not a little weakened by the raging famine; and though many bold attempts were made to reach the ſhips in the river, they were ſtill fruſtrated by the enemies ſhot. About this time major Baker being taken very ill, and made incapable to act as governor, colonel Michelburn was choſen to aſſiſt Mr. Walker, that if one ſhould fall, the town might not be left without a government, and to the inconveniences of a conteſted election. On the other ſide the arrival of Marſhal Roſen, the French general, who was appointed to command in chief in the Iriſh camp, very much ſpirited the beſiegers. This general having viewed the fortifications of the town, and finding, how little his men had advanced in the ſiege, expreſſed himſelf with great fury againſt the beſieged, and ſwore he would level the place with the ground, and bury thoſe, who defended it in its ruins, putting all to the ſword, without conſideration of either age or ſex, and would ſtudy the moſt exquiſite torments to lengthen the miſery of ſuch, as he ſhould find obſtinate. But neither his threats nor his fair promiſes, of both which he was very liberal, had any effect upon thoſe, who had ſo abſolutely devoted themſelves to the defence of their city, their religion, and the intereſt of king William and queen Mary. And leſt any ſhould contrive to ſurrender the town, or move it to the garriſon, the governor made an order, that no ſuch thing ſhould be mentioned upon pain of death. On the 20th of June died governor Baker, to the great loſs and affliction of the beſieged. Three days before lieutenant-general Hamilton ſent ſome plauſible offers to the garriſon, to which they ſeemed to hearken, till they had uſed that opportunity to ſearch for proviſions; and though they were reduced to the neceſſity of feeding upon horſe-fleſh, dogs, cats, rats, and mice, tallow, ſtarch, dried and ſalted hides; in a word, on the moſt loathſome things, that men in their condition ever uſed for ſuſtenance; yet they unanimouſly reſolved to eat the Iriſh, and then one another, rather than ſurrender; and their anſwer to Hamilton was, "that they much wondered he ſhould expect they ſhould place any confidence in him, who had ſo unworthily broke faith with king William, their ſovereign: that he was once generouſly truſted, though an enemy, and yet betrayed his truſt; and they could not believe he had learned more ſincerity in an Iriſh camp." This bold anſwer ſo enraged the French general, that he publiſhed an order directed to the governors and garriſon of Londonderry, importing, "that if they did not deliver the town to him by the firſt of July, according to lieutenant-general Hamilton's propoſals, he would diſpatch his orders as far as Baliſhannon, Charlemont, Belfaſt, and the barony of Imſhoven, and rob all, protected as well as unprotected, proteſtants, that were either related to the garriſon, or of their faction; and that they ſhould be driven under the walls of Londonderry, where they ſhould

[f] 'King James came in perſon to encourage the beſiegers; but finding the ſiege went on very ſlowly, he is ſaid to expreſs himſelf thus, 'Had his army been Engliſh, they would have brought him the town, ſtone by ſtone, by that time.' Story's Continuation of the War in Ireland, p. 5.

[g] The employing him was not at all approved of. Though he had deſerted king James, it was feared, that he was ſo conſcious of his ſanguinary conduct, after the defeat of the duke of Monmouth at Sedgemore, that, as the Engliſh proteſtants would never be reconciled to him, ſo he muſt therefore do ſomething to regain the good will of their enemies. However, this is certain, that he lay ſix weeks in the lough, without attempting to relieve the garriſon of Londonderry, who were all the while reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs. Oldmixon, p. 21. This agrees with what biſhop Burnet ſays, that Kirk made not that haſte to relieve them that was neceſſary, conſidering the miſery they were in, II. 19.

be ſuffered to ſtarve. He alſo threatened to ruin and lay waſte all their country, if there ſhould appear the leaſt probability of any troops coming from England for their relief." But he concluded, " that if they would return to their obedience, and ſurrender the town upon any tolerable conditions, he would cauſe the capitulation to be punctually obſerved, and protect them from all injuries." But the beſieged received this letter with the ſame contempt and indignation, as they had done Hamilton's propoſals.

The news of this order being brought to Dublin before it was executed, the biſhop of Meath went immediately to king James, to ſee, if he could prevail with him to prevent ſuch a barbarous proceeding. The king very calmly ſaid to the biſhop, ' that he had heard of it before, and that he had ſent orders to ſtop it: that general Roſen was a foreigner, and uſed to ſuch proceedings, as were ſtrange to us, though common in other places; and that if he had been his own ſubject, he would have called him to account for it.' Yet he continued that general ſtill in employment, whoſe dragoons and ſoldiers executed his orders againſt the proteſtants with the utmoſt rigour. They firſt ſtript and drove the whole country for thirty miles round before them, not ſparing nurſes with their ſucking children, women big with child, nor old decrepit perſons; ſome women in labour, and ſome who were juſt brought to bed, were driven among the reſt. The very popiſh officers, who executed the thing, confeſſed that it was the moſt diſmal ſight they had ever ſeen; and that the cries of the poor people ſeemed to be ſtill in their ears. They owned, that they gathered above four thouſand, others ſaid, ſeven thouſand; and that they kept many of them without meat or drink for a whole week; that ſeveral hundred died in the place before they were diſmiſſed, and many more on the way as they went home again to their houſes. Nor were they better, when they came there; for the ſtraggling ſoldiers, rapparees, and pilferers, who followed the army, had left them neither meat, drink, houſhold ſtuff, nor cattle, but had taken away all in their abſence, ſo that the generality of them afterwards periſhed for want, and many of them were knocked on the head by theſe ſoldiers. This ſhocking proceeding confirmed the beſieged in their reſolution never to yield to ſuch barbarous people; and it made them ſet up a gallows in view of the beſiegers, and threaten to hang all the priſoners they had taken during the ſiege, if their friends were not immediately diſmiſſed; and they acquainted the enemy, that they might ſend prieſts to their friends to prepare them for death after their own methods. The priſoners declared, they could not blame the garriſon for putting them to death, ſince their own people exerciſed ſuch cruelty on innocent perſons, who were under their protection; but deſired leave from the governor to write a letter to lieutenant-general Hamilton, which being allowed, they ſent him a letter ſigned by Nettervil, Butler, Aylmer, Macdonel, Darcy &c. acquainting him, ' that the lives of twenty priſoners lay at ſtake; and therefore, they made it their requeſt, that he would repreſent their condition to the marſhal general Roſen. That they were all willing to die with ſwords in their hands for his majeſty, but it was hard to ſuffer like malefactors; nor could they lay their blood to the charge of the garriſon, the governor and the reſt having treated them with all the civility imaginable.' To this letter the lieutenant general anſwered, ' that what thoſe poor people were like to ſuffer, they might thank themſelves for, being their own fault; which they might prevent by accepting the conditions, that had been offered them. And if, added he, you ſuffer in this, it cannot be helped, but ſhall be revenged on many thouſands, of thoſe people, as well innocent as others, within or without that city.' However the ſight of the gallows, and the importunity of ſome friends of thoſe, who were to ſuffer prevailed upon Hamilton; ſo that on the 4th of July the poor half ſtarved proteſtants had leave to return to their habitations, after they had been kept under the walls of the town three days without meat. The garriſon now conſiſted of five thouſand ſeven hundred and nine men; and to leſſen that number yet more, the governors crowded five hundred of their uſeleſs people among the proteſtants under the walls, who paſſed undiſtinguiſhed with them, though in exchange they got ſome able and ſtrong men out of their numbers.

By this time the ſcarcity of the vileſt eatables was increaſed to ſuch a degree, that the garriſon and inhabitants had nothing left, unleſs they could prey upon one another. And it is remarkable, that a certain gentleman, who had preſerved himſelf in good caſe, whilſt the generality were reduced to ſkeletons, conceived himſelf in the greateſt danger, and fancying ſeveral of the ſoldiers looked upon him with a greedy eye, thought fit to hide himſelf for three days. Mr. Walker, the governor, being with good reaſon apprehenſive, that theſe diſcouragements might at length overcome that reſolution, which the garriſon had ſo long expreſſed, conſidered of all imaginable methods to ſupport them; to this end he preached on the 30th of July, in the cathedral, and endeavoured to confirm their conſtancy by reminding them of what " importance it was to the proteſtant religion at that time; and told them that they need not doubt, but that God would at laſt deliver them from the difficulties they were under." In this he proved a true prophet, for about an hour after the ſermon the garriſon diſcovered three ſhips, which major general Kirk had ſent according to his promiſe, " that when they could hold out no longer, he would be ſure to relieve them, to the hazard of himſelf, his men, and ſhips." The Montjoy of Londonderry, commanded by captain Browning; and the Phœnix of Coleraine, commanded by captain Douglaſs; both laden with proviſion, were convoyed by the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy made a moſt furious fire upon them from Culmore, and both ſides of the river, which they received and returned with the greateſt bravery. The Montjoy made a little ſtop at the boom, occaſioned by her rebound, after ſtriking and breaking it, ſo that ſhe was run a ground. Upon this the enemy gave the loudeſt and moſt joyful ſhout, and the moſt dreadful to the beſieged, fired all their guns upon her, and were preparing their boats to board her. The trouble and concern of the beſieged to ſee their laſt hopes diſappointed, are not to be expreſſed; but the Montjoy firing a broadſide, the ſhock looſened the ſhip ſo, that ſhe got clear, and paſſed the boom. Captain Douglaſs all this while was engaged, and the Dartmouth gave the enemy warm entertainment, till at length the three ſhips got up to the town to the inconceivable joy and tranſport of a garriſon, which reckoned only upon two days life, having nothing left but nine lean horſes, and a pint of meal to each man. Hunger and the fatigue of war had ſo far prevailed amongſt them, that of ſeven thouſand five hundred men regimented, they had now alive but four thouſand three hundred, of whom at leaſt a fourth part were rendered unſerviceable. This brave and ſucceſsful undertaking ſo diſcouraged the enemy, that on the laſt of July they raiſed the ſiege in the night-time with great confuſion, and in their retreat made a miſerable havock in the country, robbing and burning all before them for ſeveral miles. They loſt between eight and nine thouſand men before the walls of the town and an hundred of their beſt officers, moſt of whom fell by the ſword, the reſt of fevers and fluxes, and the French pox, which was very remarkable upon the bodies of ſeveral of their dead officers and ſoldiers. Upon their retreat they firſt incamped at Strabone; but hearing of the defeat of their forces under lieutenant general Mackarty by the Inniſkillin men, they removed their camp further off. Major general Kirk being come to Londonderry was received by the governor and the whole garriſon with the greateſt joy and acclamations; and the next day Mr. Walker complimented him with his own regiment, that after doing the king all the ſervice in his power, he might return to his own profeſſion. But the major general deſired him to diſpoſe of it as he pleaſed; and accordingly he beſtowed it on captain White, a gentleman of experienced valour and known merit. The ſame day a council was called at Londonderry, wherein Mr. Walker was deſired and prevailed on immediately to embark for England with an addreſs of thanks from the garriſon and inhabitants to their majeſties; and upon his arrival at court received that welcome and reward, which his eminent ſervices had merited [h].

Inniſkillin, another town in the north of Ireland, ſignalized itſelf no leſs than Londonderry in the proteſtant cauſe; for upon notice, that Derry had denied entrance to the lord Antrim's regiment, they reſolved not to admit any Iriſh garriſon; and having raiſed a regiment of twelve companies, gave the command of it to Guſtavus Hamilton, a perſon of con-

[h] Colonel Michelburn, who commanded one of the regiments in Londonderry during the ſiege, claimed to himſelf a conſiderable ſhare in the defence of that town, and drew up a memorial wherein he complained of " the injuſtice done him both by Colonel Baker and Mr. Walker, in aſſuming to themſelves all the honour of it, and taking little or no notice of him, who, according to that memorial, was from the firſt to the laſt of that ſiege as forward and as ſerviceable as they, and particularly in advancing conſiderable ſums of money for the uſe of the garriſon, which they were not ſo well able to do; and which he himſelf wanted afterwards ſo much, that in Mr. Harley's miniſtry he lay in the Fleet priſon for a debt contracted while he was ſoliciting the payment of the arrears coming to him, which were paid at laſt, but in a manner far ſhort of the merit of ſo gallant an action in the defence of Londonderry. duct and reſolution, whom they likewiſe choſe for their governor. The townſmen being thus in ſome poſture of defence, proclaimed king William and queen Mary on the 11th of March; but the lord Gilmoy declaring for king James ſome time after his arrival at Dublin, ſummoned the governor of Inniſkillin to ſurrender that place to him, with a promiſe from the king to grant them better terms than they might ever expect from him afterwards. A council being called, it was unanimouſly reſolved to ſtand firm to their former reſolutions of defending the proteſtant religion, and maintaining king William's title. Whereupon the lord Gilmoy landed all his forces towards Crom, a caſtle ſixteen miles from Inniſkillin, and poſſeſſed by the proteſtants, which was beſieged ſometime by part of his troops; but the Inniſkilliners having thrown a relief of two hundred men into the caſtle, forced him to raiſe the ſiege, and to retreat to Belturbet. On the 24th of April a detachment of the garriſon of Inniſkillin, headed by lieutenant-colonel Lloyd, made an excurſion into the enemies country, took and demoliſhed the caſtle at Anghor, and returned home with a conſiderable booty. Several other ſkirmiſhes and rencounters paſſed between the two parties, wherein the Inniſkilliners always came off with advantage; but the moſt remarkable of thoſe actions was that which happened the day before Londonderry was relieved, wherein two thouſand Inniſkilliners fought and routed ſix thouſand Iriſh, at a place called Newton-Butler, and took their commander Mackarty (commonly called lord Moncaſhel) with the loſs only of twenty men killed, and fifty wounded [i].

Purſuant to king James's proclamation, the Iriſh parliament met at Dublin [k] the 7th of May; and the ſame day he made a ſpeech, wherein he told them, "That the exemplary loyalty which that nation expreſſed to him, at a time when others of his ſubjects ſo undutifully miſbehaved themſelves to him, or ſo baſely betrayed him; and their ſeconding their deputy, as they did, in this bold and reſolute aſſerting of his right, in preſerving that kingdom for him, and putting it in a poſture of defence, made him reſolute to come to them and venture his life with them, in defence of their liberties and his own right. That to his great ſatisfaction he had not only found them ready to ſerve him, but that their courage had equalled their zeal. That he had always been for liberty of conſcience, and againſt invading any man's right or liberty, having ſtill in mind the ſaying of holy writ, 'Do you as you would be done unto, for this is the law and the prophets.' That it was this liberty of conſcience he gave, which his enemies both at home and abroad dreaded to have eſtabliſhed by law in all his dominions, and made them ſet themſelves up againſt him, though for different reaſons, ſeeing that if he had once ſettled it, his people, in the opinion of one, would have been too happy, and in the opinion of the other, too great. That this argument was made uſe of to perſuade their own people to join with them, and ſo many of his ſubjects to uſe him as they had done; but nothing ſhould ever perſuade him to change his mind as to that, and whereſoever he was maſter, he deſigned, God willing, to eſtabliſh it by law, and have no other teſt or diſtinction but that of loyalty, expecting their concurrence in ſo chriſtian a work, and in making laws againſt profaneneſs and againſt all ſorts of debauchery. That he ſhould moſt readily conſent to the making ſuch good and wholeſome laws, as might be for the good of the nation, the improvement of trade, and relieving ſuch as had been injured by the late act of ſettlement, as far forth as might be conſiſtent with reaſon, juſtice, and the public good of his people. That as he ſhould do his part to make them happy and rich, he made no doubt of their aſſiſtance, by enabling him to oppoſe the unjuſt deſigns of his enemies, and to make the nation flouriſh. That to encourage them the more to it, they knew with how great generoſity and kindneſs the moſt chriſtian king gave ſure retreat to the queen, his ſon, and himſelf, when they were forced out of England, and came to ſeek for protection and ſafety in his kingdoms; how he embraced his intereſt, and gave him ſuch ſupplies of all ſorts, as enabled him to come to them, which without his obliging aſſiſtance he could not have done; and that this he did at a time, when he had ſo many conſiderable enemies to deal with, and ſtill continued ſo to do." He concluded as he had begun, and aſſured them, "that he was as ſenſible as they could deſire of the ſignal loyalty they had expreſſed to him; and that he ſhould make it his chief ſtudy, as it had always been, to make them and all his ſubjects happy."

This ſpeech being ended, and the king withdrawn, ſir Richard Neagle attorney general, who was choſen ſpeaker of the commons, extolled to that houſe their obligations to the king of France and the duke of Tyrconnel for that glorious meeting, and how proper it was for both houſes to return his majeſty thanks for his gracious ſpeech, and to deſire count D'Avaux, the French embaſſador, to do the ſame to his moſt chriſtian majeſty, on their behalf, for his generous aſſiſting king James. Theſe addreſſes were drawn up and preſented immediately; and then a bill was brought in, containing a recognition of the king's title, and an abhorrence of the prince of Orange's uſurpation, and defection of the Engliſh. The next day his majeſty publiſhed the following declaration, addreſſed to all his loving ſubjects in the kingdom of England.

"JAMES REX.

"ALtho' the many calumnies and diſmal ſtories, by which our enemies have endeavoured to render us and our government odious to the world, do now appear to have been advanced by them, not only without any ground, but againſt their own certain knowledge, as is evident by their not daring to attempt to prove theſe charges to the world; which we cannot but hope hath opened the eyes of our good ſubjects, to ſee how they have been impoſed upon by deſigning men, who, to promote their own ambitious ends, care not what ſlaughter they reduce our kingdoms to; yet we cannot but rejoice, that we have had an opportunity to demonſtrate the falſeneſs and malice of their pretences, ſince this our arrival in this our kingdom of Ireland, by making it our chief concern to ſatisfy the minds of our proteſtant ſubjects, that the defence of their religion, privileges, and properties is equally our care with the recovery of our rights. To this end we have preferred ſuch of them, of whoſe loyalty and affection we are ſatisfied, to places both of the higheſt honour and truſt about our perſon, as well as in our army. We have, by granting our royal protection to ſuch, whoſe minds were ſhaken by the arts of our rebellious ſubjects, diſpelled their apprehenſions, and effectually ſecured them againſt the attempts even of their private enemies. Our ear hath always been open to their juſt complaints; and ſo far hath our royal mercy been extended to thoſe, who were in arms againſt us, that we have actually pardoned ſeveral hundreds of them; and moſt notorious criminals are kept in an eaſy confinement, as they themſelves acknowledge. We have taken care, that our ſubjects of the church of England be not diſturbed in the exerciſe of their religion; and all proteſtant diſſenters enjoy liberty of their conſciences without any moleſtation. And, out of our royal care for the proſperity of our people, we have recommended to our parliament as the firſt thing neceſſary to be diſpatched, to ſettle ſuch a ſecurity and liberty both in ſpiritual and temporal matters, as may put an end to theſe diviſions, which have been the ſource of all our miſeries; being reſolved, as much as in us lies, to entail liberty and happineſs upon our people, ſo far as to put it out of the power of our ſucceſſors to invade the one, and infringe the other. And

[i] This is the account of Story, in his 'Continuation of the Wars in Ireland;' and it is probable, that Mr. Burchet means the ſame action, when he tells us that "about the time of raiſing the ſiege of Londonderry, the king's forces commanded by Colonel Berry, near Linaſkea, had a ſignal victory over the enemy, inſomuch that with the number killed by the army, and thoſe which were knocked on the head by the country people, they loſt not leſs than four thouſand men; and their cannon, with moſt of their ſurviving officers, were taken, among whom was major-general Mackarty, who was ſhot through the thigh, and run into the back." Burchet, B. iv, c. 2, p. 419.

[k] Biſhop King obſerves, that every body foreſaw, what a kind of parliament that would be, and what was likely to be done in it. "Our conſtitution, ſays he, lodges the legiſlative power in the king, lords, and commons: and each of theſe is a check on the other; that if any one attempt a thing prejudicial to the kingdom, the other may oppoſe and ſtop it. But our enemies had made all theſe for their purpoſe; and therefore no law could ſignify any thing to oppoſe them, it being in their power to remove any laws when they pleaſed, by repealing it. The king was their own, both inclined of himſelf, and eaſy to be prevailed on by them, to do what they would have him; ſo that we could promiſe ourſelves no help from his negative vote." The biſhop then ſhews what methods were taken to fill the houſe of Lords with popiſh peers, ſo that there were only four or five proteſtant temporal lords, and four ſpiritual lords in it; ſeveral acts being paſſed not with the conſent of theſe laſt, though it was pretended in the preambles to them; and that the houſe of commons was filled in ſuch a manner, that only two proteſtants, ſuch as deſerved that name, were in it. By this means "the parliament openly profeſſed itſelf a ſlave to the king's will, and he was looked on as factiouſly and rebelliouſly inclined, that would dare to move any thing after any favourite in the houſe had affirmed, that it was contrary to the king's pleaſure." State of Proteſtants in Ireland, p. 168,—172.

this, we take God to witneſs, was always our deſign, of which we ſee our good ſubjects here are more and more convinced by the great number of thoſe, who having been ſeduced or frightened by the reſtleſs importunities of our enemies, are returned to their country and habitations, and who aſſure us daily more would follow, if the ports were open. But the uſurpers know too well the ſincerity of our intentions to permit the repaſſage of our ſaid ſubjects, fearing nothing more than that their experience ſhould undeceive the reſt, who are reſtrained more through ignorance than any ill intention; and therefore deny them that liberty, which we afford to all, whoſe deſigns, we are ſatisfied, tend not to the diſturbance of the peace. By this our gracious and royal care of our proteſtant ſubjects, where the greateſt part of our nation is catholic, and have, as well as we, received the higheſt provocation from their fellow-ſubjects of contrary perſuaſions, ſo that nothing but our inclination to juſtice, and deſire to ſee our people flouriſh, could move us to ſuch a proceeding, we hope our ſubjects in England will make a judgment of what they may expect from us; and we do hereby promiſe and declare, that nothing ſhall ever alter our reſolutions to purſue ſuch, and no other methods, as by our ſaid ſubjects in parliament ſhall be found proper for our common ſecurity, peace, and happineſs. And that none may be debarred of aſſiſting us in recovering our rights, and redeeming of our people from their preſent ſlavery, out of any apprehenſions from paſt miſcarriages, we do hereby aſſure all our ſubjects of what quality ſoever, let their crimes againſt us be ever ſo great, that if in twenty four days after our appearance in perſon in our kingdom of England, they return to their obedience, by deſerting our enemies, and joining with us, we will grant them our full pardon, and all paſt miſcarriages ſhall be forgot; ſo little do we delight in the blood or ruin of our people. But if after this our gracious condeſcenſion they ſhall yet continue to aſſiſt our enemies and rebels, we do, before God, charge all the blood, which ſhall afterwards be ſhed, upon them and their adherents; and we doubt not, by the bleſſing of God upon our arms, to force the moſt obſtinate to their duty; though, as we have made appear, in reducing our rebellious ſubjects in this kingdom, we deſire to uſe no other than lenity and mercy."

How ill king James's proceedings agreed with this declaration and ſpeech was quickly ſeen, for on the 12th of May a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by the lord chief juſtice Nugent [l] for 'repealing the act of ſettlement;' which, without any oppoſition, was read three times, and ſent to the lords. By this bill two thirds of the proteſtants of the kingdom, who held their eſtates by virtue of the acts of ſettlement and explanation, were deprived of them. There was no conſideration had, how any man came to his eſtate; for though he purchaſed it at ever ſo dear a rate, he muſt loſe it, and it was to be reſtored, without exception, to the proprietor or his deſcendent, who had it before October 22d 1641, upon what account ſoever he loſt it; though they themſelves did not deny, but many deſerved to loſe their eſtates; and even the ſon of ſir Phelim O'Neile, the great murtherer and rebel, was reſtored. In the upper houſe the biſhop of Meath very learnedly argued againſt this bill, alledging, among other objections, that no penalty was provided on ſuch as ſhould enter eſtates without injunctions; no conſiderations for improvements; no ſaving for remainders; no time given tenants and poſſeſſors to remove their ſtock and corn; no proviſion for proteſtant widows; and that it allowed only repriſals for original purchaſe-money, which was hard to make out, and was an injury to the ſecond or third purchaſer. He ſhewed likewiſe, that the bill was unjuſt, and not for the public, or even the king's advantage; but would ruin the kingdom and deſtroy the public faith, as well as inconvenient in point of time. And he concluded with theſe words; "My lords, either there was a rebellion in this kingdom [in 1641], or there was not. If there was none, then we have been very unjuſt all this while in keeping ſo many innocents out of their eſtates; and God forbid, that I ſhould open my mouth in defence of ſo groſs an injuſtice. But then what ſhall we ſay to his majeſty's royal father's declaration in his Icon Baſilike, who there owns, that there was a rebellion; and in purſuance of that opinion, paſſed an act to ſecure ſuch as ſhould adventure money for the ſuppreſſing of it. Nay, what ſhall we ſay to the two bills, that have been brought into this houſe, the one by an honourable lord, which owns it fully; the latter from the commoners, which owns a rebellion, but extenuates it? I take it then for granted, there was a rebellion; and if ſo, it was either a total or a partial one. If it was a general one, then all were guilty of it, and none can pretend to be reſtored to his eſtate farther than the king in his mercy ſhall think fit to grant it him. If it was a partial one, then ſome diſcrimination ought to be made between the innocent and the guilty; the innocent ſhould be reſtored, and the guilty excluded from their eſtates. But here is a bill, that makes no diſtinction between them, but innocent and nocent are to fare alike; the one is to be put in as good a condition as the other. And can your lordſhips imagine, that it is reaſonable to do this, when we all know, that there has been a court of claims erected for the tryal of innocents; that ſeveral had put themſelves upon the proof of their innocence; and after a full hearing of all that they could offer for themſelves, have been adjudged nocent?" But notwithſtanding the force and evidence of the biſhop's reaſons, ſupported by an addreſs in behalf of the purchaſers under the act of ſettlement, preſented to the king by the earl of Granard, and drawn up by the lord chief juſtice Keating; yet the lord chancellor Fitton's [m] arguments prevailed, and the bill received his royal aſſent, and paſſed into an act. Nor indeed could it be expected otherwiſe, when the greateſt part of both houſes were Roman catholics, and conſiſted of [l] This gentleman, who was afterwards created baron of Riverſtown, was the ſon of one, who had been earl of Weſtmeath, but had loſt his honour and eſtate for being an actor in the rebellion begun in 1641. He had never been taken notice of at the bar, when he was advanced by king James to the poſt of chief juſtice of the king's-bench, and pitched upon to judge, whether the outlawries againſt his father and his fellow-rebels ſhould be reverſed; and whether the ſettlement of Ireland founded on thoſe outlawries ſhould ſtand good. It was a demonſtration to the proteſtants, what the king intended, when he aſſigned them ſuch a chief juſtice; and indeed this gentleman did not fail to anſwer the expectation conceived of him. He reverſed the outlawries as faſt as they came before him, notwithſtanding a ſtatute made in point againſt it; and in all cauſes, that ever came before him, wherein the plaintiffs and defendants were papiſt and proteſtant, he was obſerved always to give ſentence for the former. Nay, it was ſhrewdly ſuſpected, that he went ſharer in ſome conſiderable cauſes, and not only appeared for them on the bench, but alſo ſecretly encouraged and fomented them. Before him, a deed ſhould be judged forged or not forged, according as it ſerved a popiſh intereſt. And a proteſtant needed no more to gain a cauſe againſt another proteſtant than to turn papiſt. He ſignalized himſelf likewiſe in another reſpect, which was by committing and perſecuting perſons for feigned offences and treaſons, and by countenancing and encouraging, and after diſcovery, protecting falſe witneſſes againſt proteſtants. Many were brought in danger of their lives by his contrivances; and when the accuſed were acquitted on trial, by a palpable demonſtration that the witneſſes were perjured, he declared that they neither could nor ſhould be proſecuted, for they only ſwore for the king, and he believed the accuſed perſons guilty, though it could not be proved. In ſhort, he ſhewed all the venom and rigour againſt them he could; he was ſet up to deſtroy them, and he went as far in it as his power could reach; his weakneſs, not his inclination, hindered him from carrying it further. King's State of Proteſtants, p. 68,—69.

[m] He had been detected of forgery, not only at Weſtminſter and Cheſter, but likewiſe fined by the houſe of lords in parliament, and laid many years in priſon, whence he was taken by king James and advanced to the office of lord chancellor of Ireland; though he wanted law and natural capacity, as well as honeſty and courage, to diſcharge ſuch a truſt, and had no other quality to recommend him beſides his being a convert papiſt. But the myſtery of this promotion was eaſily diſcovered. The papiſts of Ireland had gone a great way to retrieve the eſtates, which they had forfeited by the rebellion in 1641, by counterfeit ſettlements, forgeries, and perjuries; and to do their buſineſs in a great meaſure, there needed no more than to find a judge, who would be favourable to and countenance ſuch proceedings; and where could they find a more favourable judge, than one who was notoriouſly involved in the ſame guilt, and who probably in ſome caſes did not eſteem ſuch arts unlawful? But beſides this, there is requiſite to a chancellor a peculiar quickneſs of parts and dexterity, to penetrate into the contrivances of cheats and forgeries; for which ſir Alexander Fitton's natural ſlowneſs and heavineſs incapacitated him. But this very defect, together with his zeal for popery, fitted him to execute the king's deſign as effectually as any that could have been found. He could not underſtand the merit of a cauſe of any difficulty, and therefore never failed to give ſentence according to his inclination, having no other rule to lead him. And how he was inclined towards proteſtants, appeared from his declarations on all occaſions againſt them. He did not ſtick, on a hearing, to declare, that 'they were all rogues, and that amongſt forty thouſand there was not one, who was not a traitor, a rebel and a villain.' For this reaſon he would not allow the guardianſhip of a child to the proteſtant mother, but gave it, againſt the poſitive words of the law, to the popiſh relations. For this reaſon he refuſed to hear ſo much as a demurrer in the caſe of Mr. Strafford, the popiſh dean of Chriſt church. For this cauſe he over-ruled both the common rules of practice of the courts, and the laws of the land, declaring in open court, 'that the chancery was above all laws, and that no law could bind his conſcience;' and he acted accordingly in many caſes, where the proteſtants were concerned. After hearing a cauſe between one of them and a papiſt, he would often declare 'that he would conſult a divine before he gave a decree; that is, he would have the opinion of a popiſh prieſt, his chaplain, educated in Spain, and furniſhed with diſtinctions to ſatisfy his conſcience, how far he ſhould do juſtice to proteſtants. Many papiſts came and made affidavits of being in poſſeſſion, when they never were, and got injunctions and orders without any more trouble to quiet their poſſeſſions. But a proteſtant though never ſo palpably diſturbed, could not procure any order, but was ſent to the common law to recover his poſſeſſion by a popiſh jury, returned by a popiſh ſheriff, before a popiſh judge: that is, he muſt expect law from judges and officers who ſate and acted in defiance of law. If at any time the chancellor was forced to grant an injunction or a decree, it was with all the difficulties and delays that could be; and, often the thing was loſt and deſtroyed before the order came for recovering it. King's State of the Proteſtants in Ireland, p. 65,—67, &c.

the ſons and deſcendents of thoſe perſons, who had forfeited their eſtates by the rebellion in one thouſand ſix hundred and forty one, men, who had no freeholds or eſtates in the kingdom, but were purpoſely elected to make themſelves eſtates by taking them away from proteſtants. And by theſe means the Engliſh proteſtants loſt more in Ireland than all king James's party in England and Scotland at that time were worth.

But to make a final extirpation of the proteſtants, there was an act of attainder paſſed in parliament, by which all proteſtants, whoſe names they could find, of both ſexes, and all ages and degrees were attainted of high treaſon, and their eſtates veſted in the king, upon pretence of their being out of the kingdom at the time of paſſing the act. And leſt ſome ſhould be forgotten of thoſe, who were abſent, and not put into the bill of attainder, there was contrived a general clauſe in the act of repeal, by which the real eſtates of all, who dwelt or ſtaid in any place of the three kingdoms, which did not own king James's power, or correſponded with any ſuch as were termed rebels, or were any ways aiding, abetting, or aſſiſting to them from the firſt day of Auguſt 1688, are declared to be forfeited and veſted in his majeſty; and that without any office or inquiſition found thereof. By which clauſe almoſt every proteſtant, who could write, in the kingdom, had forfeited his eſtate; for the packets went from London to Dublin, and back again, conſtantly from Auguſt to March 1688, and few had friends in England, or in the north, but correſponded with them by letters; and every ſuch letter is made by this clauſe a forfeiture of eſtate. They had intercepted and ſearched every packet, that went or came the latter part of this time, and kept vaſt heaps of letters, which were of no conſequence at all to the government; and theſe letters were produced as evidences in the houſe of commons againſt thoſe, who appeared in behalf of their abſent friends, or oppoſed the attainting of ſuch proteſtants, as they had ſome kindneſs for; and they were further reſerved to prove a correſpondence againſt the few men of eſtates, who were in the kingdom. Beſides, it was the end of September 1688, before they heard any thing of the prince of Orange's deſign to make a deſcent into England; and yet to have been in England or Scotland at any time in the month before, or to have correſponded with any there, was made a forfeiture of eſtate by this act. And leſt the children and deſcendents of the proteſtants thus attainted, who had eſtates before 1641, ſhould come in and claim them after the death of the attainted perſons, by virtue of the ſettlement made on valuable conſiderations, and upon marriage, all ſuch remainders and reverſions were cut off. When this bill of attainder was preſented to the king for his aſſent, ſir Richard Neagle, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, told him, that 'many were attainted in that act upon ſuch evidence, as ſatisfied the houſe; and the reſt of them, upon common fame.' By this act near three thouſand proteſtants were attainted, and among theſe two archbiſhops, one duke, ſeventeen earls, ſeven counteſſes, twenty-eight viſcounts, two viſcounteſſes, ſeven biſhops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, eighty-three clergymen, two thouſand, one hundred, and eighty-two eſquires and gentlemen; and all of them declared traytors, and adjudged to ſuffer the pains of death and forfeiture.

The ſeverity of this act exceeded even that of the famous proſcription at Rome, during the laſt triumvirate. For more were condemned in the little kingdom of Ireland, than were proſcribed at that time through the vaſt extent of the Roman empire. And to make this of Ireland yet the more terrible and unavoidable, the act left no room for the king to pardon after the laſt day of November 1689; and if the pardon was not inrolled before that time, it was declared abſolutely void and null; and at the ſame time the act itſelf was concealed, and no proteſtant allowed a copy of it till the time limited for pardons was paſt at leaſt four months; ſo that the ſtate of the perſons attainted was deſperate and irrecoverable, except an Iriſh parliament ſhould think proper to relieve them; for the king took care to put it out of the power of any Engliſh (as well as out of his own) to help them, by conſenting to another act of this parliament, intitled, 'An act declaring, that the parliaments of England cannot bind Ireland, and againſt writs of errors and repeals out of Ireland into England.'

The parliament of Ireland having made ſome other acts, and among the reſt, one for 'liberty of conſcience,' was prorogued on the 20th of July to the 12th of January enſuing; and ſo ended this ſeſſion, whoſe proceedings occaſioned no leſs diſturbance in that kingdom, than the war itſelf.

It was not thought enough, that Tyrconnel had ſtopt the maintenance of the univerſity of Dublin; but upon king James's arrival, the vice-preſident, fellows and ſcholars, were all further proceeded againſt and ejected; their furniture, library, and communion-plate ſeized, and every thing that belonged to the college, and to the private fellows and ſcholars, taken away. All this was done, notwithſtanding that when they waited upon king James at his firſt coming to Dublin, he promiſed them, 'That he would preſerve them in their liberties and properties, and rather augment than diminiſh the privileges and immunities granted to them by his predeceſſors.' In the houſe they put a popiſh garriſon, turned the chapel into a magazine, and many of the chambers into priſons for proteſtants. One Moore, a popiſh prieſt, was nominated provoſt, and one Macarty library-keeper, and the whole deſigned for them and their fraternity; and three of the former collegians were forbid to meet together on pain of death. One archbiſhopric, ſeveral biſhoprics, and a great many other dignities and livings of the church were deſignedly kept vacant; and the revenues firſt paid into the exchequer, and afterwards diſpoſed of to popiſh biſhops and prieſts, while in the mean time the cures lay neglected. So that it plainly appeared, that the deſign was to deſtroy the ſucceſſion of the proteſtant clergy. At length things were carried to ſo great an height, that moſt of churches in and about Dublin were ſeized upon by the government; and colonel Lutterel, governor of that city, on the 18th of June 1690, iſſued out an order, commanding 'all proteſtants, who were not houſe-keepers, to depart out of the ſaid city; and all ſuch as were houſe-keepers, to deliver up their arms, both offenſive and defenſive; and likewiſe forbidding above five proteſtants meeting any where upon pain of death, or ſuch other puniſhment, as a court-martial ſhould think fit.' And being aſked, whether this was deſigned to hinder their meeting in churches? He anſwered, that it was intended to prevent their aſſembling there, as well as in other places, and accordingly all the churches were ſhut up, and all religious aſſemblies forbid throughout the kingdom upon pain of death.

While king James was purſuing theſe violent meaſures, king William, among other objects of his care, was conſulting the general good of Europe, and endeavouring to check the exorbitant power of France. It has been obſerved, that the king of France had violated the peace of Nimeguen of 1678, and the twenty years truce of 1684, by his ſudden invaſion of the empire in 1688. The diet of Ratiſbon incenſed at this invaſion, and the cruel devaſtation of the palatinate, unanimouſly reſolved in March 1689, to make a vigorous war "upon the enemy, not only of the empire, but of all chriſtendom; and even a greater than the Turk himſelf with whom he was joined in a league againſt the Emperor."

The United Provinces had in ſome meaſure proclaimed war againſt France, by their manifeſto which they had publiſhed October 28, 1688; containing the reaſons of their aſſiſting the prince of Orange in his expedition to England, wherein they ſaid, that having conſidered the good underſtanding between the kings of Great-Britain and France, and that there was a ſtrict and ſecret alliance between them, it was to be feared, if the king of Great-Britain ſhould attain to an arbitrary power over his people, the two kings, being united in intereſt and hatred of the proteſtant religion, would endeavour to overturn, and if poſſible deſtroy their ſtate; and therefore they had reſolved to aſſiſt the prince in his deſign of going over to England, not, as he declared, to invade the kingdom, or dethrone the king, but to preſerve the laws and liberties of the nation, by obliging him to call a free parliament. This manifeſto was followed March 9th 1689, by a formal declaration of war.

On the 3d of May 1689, Spain provoked at the proceedings of the French king and his unjuſt declaration of war of April 15, ordered the marquis of Caſtanaga, governor of the Netherlands, to proclaim war againſt France, as the common diſturber of Chriſtendom. The elector of Brandenburg had alſo declared war the 13th of April. In this ſituation of affairs, the emperor's envoy, the Spaniſh embaſſador, and the Dutch miniſters earneſtly preſſed the king to proclaim war againſt the common enemy, eſpecially as he had openly eſpouſed the cauſe of king James, whom he had ſent into Ireland with a conſiderable body of French forces. To theſe ſollicitations ſo agreeable to his inclinations, the king readily yielded, and Mr. Hampden made a motion in the houſe of commons, for an addreſs to his majeſty for a war with France; which addreſs was voted unanimouſly by three hundred hundred and fifty members, and preſented by the houſe in a body in the following terms [n].

"WE your majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, moſt humbly lay before your majeſty our earneſt deſire, that your majeſty would be pleaſed to take into your ſerious conſideration, the deſtructive methods of late taken by the French king againſt the trade, quiet, and intereſt of this your kingdom; and particularly the preſent invaſion of the kingdom of Ireland, and ſupporting your majeſty's rebellious ſubjects there. Not doubting in the leaſt, but that through your majeſty's wiſdom, the alliances already made, with ſuch as may hereafter be concluded on this occaſion by your majeſty, may be effectual to reduce the French king to ſuch a condition, that it may not be in his power hereafter to violate the peace of Chriſtendom, nor prejudice the trade or proſperity of this your majeſty's kingdom.

"To this end we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, to reſt aſſured, upon this our ſolemn and hearty engagement, that when your majeſty ſhall think fit to enter into a war againſt the French king, we will give your majeſty ſuch aſſiſtance in a parliamentary way, as may enable your majeſty (under that protection and bleſſing God Almighty has ever afforded you,) to ſupport and go through with the ſame."

To which addreſs the king gave this anſwer.

"I receive this addreſs as a mark of the confidence you have in me, which I take very kindly, and ſhall endeavour, by all my actions, to confirm you in it.

"I aſſure you, that my own ambition ſhall never be an argument to incline me to engage in a war, that may expoſe the nation either to damage or expence. But in the preſent caſe I look upon the war ſo much already declared, in effect, by France againſt England, that it is not ſo properly an act of choice, as an inevitable neceſſity in our own defence.

"I ſhall only tell you, that as I have ventured my life and all that is dear to me, to reſcue this nation from what it ſuffered, I am ready ſtill to do the ſame, in order to the preſerving it from all its enemies. And as I do not doubt of ſuch aſſiſtance from you, as ſhall be ſuitable to your advice to me, to declare war againſt a powerful enemy; ſo you may rely upon me, that no part of that, which you ſhall give for the carrying it on with ſucceſs, ſhall be diverted by me to any other uſe."

Upon this reſolution of a war with France, the king publiſhed 'A proclamation for the encouraging French proteſtants to tranſport themſelves into this kingdom;' declaring, "that finding, in his ſubjects, a true and juſt ſenſe of their deliverance from the perſecution lately threatning them for their religion, and of the miſery and oppreſſions the French proteſtants lay under; ſuch of them as ſhould ſeek their refuge in, and tranſport themſelves into this kingdom of England, ſhould not only have his royal protection, but he would ſo aid and aſſiſt them in their ſeveral trades and ways of livelihood, as that their being in this realm might be comfortable and eaſy to them." Some perſons who were abſolutely diveſted of charity, were diſpleaſed with this invitation given to foreigners to ſettle here; but the generality highly applauded it, not only out of tenderneſs for their perſecuted brethren, but alſo out of regard to the advantage of England; juſtly conſidering, that the kind entertainment, which queen Elizabeth gave to the Walloons, whom the inquiſition had driven out of the Low Countries, had vaſtly improved the woollen and ſilken manufactures of this nation; and that the Dutch daily increaſed in riches, and ſtrength, by the favour which they ſhewed to the French refugees, ſome of whom were wealthy merchants, and the reſt either laborious and induſtrious artificers, or brave and experienced officers and ſoldiers, who would chearfully venture their lives in the defence of the proteſtant religion, and of thoſe ſtates, which afforded them protection. At the ſame time another proclamation prohibited the importation of all ſorts of manufactures and commodities whatſoever of the growth, production, or manufacture of France.

Not long after the French papiſts, ſeeing the countenance given to the proteſtants of their nation, became very inſolent; publicly traducing the preſent government, and diſperſing ſeveral ſorts of libels and ſeditious papers. The houſe of lords being informed of their audacious behaviour, and ſuſpecting they might proceed to more dangerous attempts, ordered an addreſs to be preſented to his majeſty, deſiring he would iſſue out a proclamation, that no French papiſt might come into Whitehall, St. James's or St. James's Park; and that all French papiſts, who were not houſeholders or merchants, ſhould leave the kingdom within ſix weeks, and all others within ſix months, under the pain of being proſecuted as alien enemies according to law. To this addreſs, his majeſty anſwered, he would ſpeedily give orders therein; but a few days after, the lord chamberlain acquainted the houſe, "that his majeſty finding upon further conſideration, that to baniſh all French papiſts might be diſadvantageous to the nation, they trading to other countries, which were his majeſty's allies: and beſides, his majeſty having promiſed them to protect them, whilſt they lived peaceably here, thought fit to ſuſpend the iſſuing ſuch a proclamation, until he had aſked their lordſhips further opinion in that matter." Upon this meſſage, the peers thought fit to leave the affair to the king's diſcretion; many of them having heard the king often declare 'that he came over to deliver the proteſtants, and not to perſecute the Romaniſts.' And indeed not only foreigners, but Engliſh papiſts, were uſed with ſo much clemency, that they too were really gainers by the revolution, not only in being exempted from thoſe public appearances, which in the late reign had been very troubleſome and expenſive to them, but even in a protection of their perſons and eſtates from the fury of the people, to which they had in great part been ſacrificed, if king William would but have connived at it.

The king being aſſured of the aſſiſtance of the commons, acquainted the lords with his intention of ſpeedily declaring war againſt France; whereupon their lordſhips unanimouſly reſolved to aſſiſt and ſerve him therein to the utmoſt of their power. And the ſame day a declaration of war againſt the French king was ſolemnly proclaimed, being drawn up in the following form by the maſterly pen of Mr. Sommers, afterwards lord chancellor.

"WILLIAM R.

"IT having pleaſed Almighty God to make us the happy inſtruments of reſcuing theſe nations from great and imminent dangers, and to place us upon the throne of theſe kingdoms; we think ourſelves obliged to endeavour to the uttermoſt to promote the welfare of our people, which can never be effectually ſecured, but by preventing the miſeries that threaten them from abroad.

"When we conſider the many unjuſt methods the French king hath, of late years, taken to gratify his ambition; that he has not only invaded the territories of the emperor and the empire, now in amity with us, laying waſte whole countries, and deſtroying the inhabitants by his armies, but declared war againſt our allies, without any provocation, in manifeſt violation of the treaties confirmed by the guaranty of the crown of England; we can do no leſs than join with our allies in oppoſing the deſigns of the French king, as the diſturber of the peace, and the common enemy of the chriſtian world.

"And beſides thoſe obligations we lie under by treaties with our allies, which are a ſufficient juſtification of us for taking up arms at this time, ſince they have called upon us ſo to do; the many injuries done to us and our ſubjects, without any reparation by the French king, are ſuch, that (however of late years they were not taken notice of for reaſons well known to the world, nevertheleſs) we will not paſs them over, without a public and juſt reſentment of ſuch outrages.

"It is not long ſince the French took licences from the Engliſh governor of Newfoundland to fiſh in the ſeas upon that coaſt, and paid a tribute for ſuch licences, as an acknowledgement of the ſole right of the crown of England to that iſland. And yet of late the encroachment of the French upon our ſaid iſland and our ſubjects trade and fiſhery, have been more like the invaſions of an enemy, than becoming friends, who enjoyed the advantages of that trade only by permiſſion.

"But that the French king ſhould invade our Caribbee iſlands, and poſſeſs himſelf of our territories of the province of New-York, and of Hudſon's Bay, in a hoſtile manner, ſeizing our forts, burning our ſubjects houſes, and enriching his people with the ſpoil of their goods and merchandizes; detaining ſome of our ſubjects under the hardſhip of impriſonment, cauſing others to be inhumanely killed, and driving the reſt to ſea in a ſmall veſſel, without food and neceſſaries to ſupport them, are actions not becoming even an enemy; and yet he was ſo far from declaring himſelf ſo, that at that very time he was negotiating here in England by his miniſters a treaty of neutrality and a good correſpondence in America.

[n] Sir Thomas Clarges ſeconded Mr. Hampden, and another member ſpoke thus: "Mr. Speaker, I bear all the reſpect that I owe to crowned heads, but I cannot help ſaying, that it is of abſolute neceſſity to declare war with 'the moſt chriſtian Turk' who ravages Chriſtendom, and makes war more barbarouſly than the Turks themſelves."

"The proceedings of the French king againſt our ſubjects in Europe are ſo notorious, that we ſhall not inlarge upon them. His countenancing the ſeiſure of Engliſh ſhips by French privateers, forbidding the importation of great part of the product and manufactures of our kingdom, and impoſing exorbitant cuſtoms upon the reſt, notwithſtanding the advantage he and the French nation reap by their commerce with England, are ſufficient evidence of his deſign to deſtroy the trade, and conſequently to ruin the navigation, upon which the wealth and ſafety of this nation very much depend.

"The right of the flag, inherent in the crown of England, has been diſputed by his orders, in violation of our ſovereignty of the narrow ſeas, which in all ages has been aſſerted by our predeceſſors, and we are reſolved to maintain, for the honour of our crown and of the Engliſh nation.

"But that, which moſt nearly touches us, is his unchriſtian perſecution of many of our Engliſh proteſtant ſubjects in France for matters of religion, contrary to the law of nations and expreſs treaties, forcing them to abjure their religion by ſtrange and unuſual cruelties, and impriſoning ſome of the maſters and ſeamen of our merchants ſhips, and condemning others to the gallies, upon pretence of having on board either ſome of his own miſerable proteſtant ſubjects, or their effects.

"And laſtly, as he has for ſome years laſt paſt endeavoured by inſinuations and promiſes of aſſiſtance to overthrow the government of England; ſo now by open and violent methods, and the actual invaſion of our kingdom of Ireland, in ſupport of our ſubjects in arms and in rebellion againſt us, he is promoting the utter extirpation of our good and loyal ſubjects in that our kingdom.

"Being therefore thus neceſſitated to take up arms, and relying on the help of Almighty God in our juſt undertaking, we have thought fit to declare, and do hereby declare war againſt the French king; and that we will, in conjunction with our allies, vigorouſly proſecute the ſame by ſea and land, ſince he hath ſo unrighteouſly begun it; being aſſured of the hearty concurrence and aſſiſtance of our ſubjects in ſupport of ſo good a cauſe; hereby willing and requiring our general of our forces, our commiſſioners for executing the office of high admiral, our lieutenants of our ſeveral counties, governors of our forts and garriſons, and all other officers and ſoldiers under them by ſea and land, to do and execute all acts of hoſtility in the proſecution of this war againſt the French king, his vaſſals and ſubjects, and to oppoſe their attempts; willing and requiring all our ſubjects, to take notice of the ſame, whom we henceforth ſtrictly forbid to hold any correſpondence or communication with the ſaid French king or his ſubjects. And becauſe there are remaining in our kingdoms many of the ſubjects of the French king, we do declare and give our royal word, that all ſuch of the French nation, as ſhall demean themſelves dutifully towards us, and not correſpond with our enemies, ſhall be ſafe in their perſons and eſtates, and free from all moleſtation and trouble of any kind.

"Given at our court at Hampton-court, the 7th day of May 1689, in the firſt year of our reign."

The king had juſt before made a treaty with the ſtates, by which a joint fleet of fifty Engliſh and thirty Dutch men of war, beſides frigates and fireſhips, was to be fitted out and equipped for one year. The fleet was to be divided into three ſquadrons, one to ſerve in the Mediterranean, another in the Iriſh ſeas and channel, and the third, conſiſting only of frigates, to cruiſe from between Dover and Calais, as far as Yarmouth on one ſide, and Walcheren in Zealand on the other.

Some days before this proclamation the war was more effectually declared by an engagement between the Engliſh and French fleets in Bantry Bay. For admiral Herbert having received notice, that king James was landed in Ireland, haſtened to that coaſt with all the ſtrength which could poſſibly be collected, in hopes to intercept the ſhips of war, which were his convoy, in their return; and commanded the reſt of the fleet to follow him; and that they might loſe no time, to ſail ſingly, without waiting for one another, the places appointed for rendezvous being the coaſt of Ireland, or ten leagues weſt of Scilly. He came before Cork the 17th of April with only twelve ſhips of war, one fire ſhip, two yatchs, and two ſmacks; and was there informed, that king James, who had been conducted over by twenty-two ſhips from France, had landed at Kinſale above a month°. This induced him to cruiſe firſt before Breſt, and then in the ſoundings, in hopes of meeting theſe ſhips. But not ſucceeding, he returned to the Iriſh coaſt the 29th of April, and diſcovered in the evening, near Kinſale, a fleet of forty-four ſail, of which he loſt ſight the next day; but judging them to be to the weſtward, he bore away with the wind eaſterly, for Cape Clear, and in the evening ſaw them ſtanding into Bantry Bay.

He lay before the Bay until morning, and then ſtood towards them, having increaſed his ſtrength to nineteen ſhips of war; but the Dartmouth, a ſmall frigate, was one of the number. The French were at anchor, being twenty eight, moſt of them from ſixty to ſeventy guns, and ſome larger, with five fire ſhips, and the tranſports which had carried to Ireland about five thouſand men, were at ſome diſtance plying to windward. Upon ſight of the Engliſh ſhips, thoſe of the enemy got under ſail, and when admiral Herbert had, not without difficulty, worked up within two miles of them, they bore down on him in a very orderly line; and one of their ſhips being within muſket-ſhot of the Defiance, which led the van of the Engliſh fleet, they two began the fight, and were followed by the reſt as ſoon as poſſible. The admiral endeavoured to gain the wind of the enemy, or at leaſt to engage cloſer than they ſeemed willing to do; but finding he could not do either, and that it was not adviſeable to maintain in ſuch a manner ſo unequal a fight, he ſtretched off to ſea, not only to get his ſhips into a regular line, but to gain the wind if poſſible. But the French were ſo very cautious in bearing down, that he could not meet with an opportunity of doing it; ſo that continuing the fight upon a ſtretch until about five in the afternoon, the French admiral tacked and ſtood in towards the ſhore; and as the Engliſh ſhips had ſuffered ſo much in their maſts and rigging, that above one half of them were unfit for further action; ſo doubtleſs the French received conſiderable damage. How far their admiral was reſtrained by orders, is not known; but it is certain, that he made very little uſe of the greateſt advantages; for as he had the wind, ſo had he double the force, beſides fireſhips. Conſidering therefore all circumſtances, and that moſt of the Engliſh ſhips were very ill manned, they came off more fortunately than could reaſonably have been expected; for there were no more than ninety men killed, and two hundred and ſeventy wounded, captain George Aylmer of the Portland being the only captain ſlain in the action. After the engagement, admiral Herbert repaired to his rendezvous, ten leagues weſt from the iſlands of Scilly, where he was in hopes of meeting with ſuch an additional ſtrength, as might have inabled him to proceed in ſearch of the French; but being diſappointed, he returned to Spithead. The French indeed aſſumed to themſelves the honour of the day, and rejoycings were made on that account in France. Father Daniel tells us, that count de Chateau Renaud, lieutenant general of the French fleet, being ordered to carry to Ireland a conſiderable convoy of proviſions and ammunition, with three thouſand men, while he was landing them, received advice, that admiral Herbert, was approaching to attack him. The two fleets were pretty near equal; and the count advanced to receive the Engliſh, whom he defeated and purſued, till night gave them an opportunity of eſcaping. The count returned to Breſt, where he was welcomed with the loudeſt acclamations of joy, having landed his troops, defeated the Engliſh fleet, taken ſeven Dutch veſſels richly laden, in his return; brought back his own fleet in as good condition as he carried it out, and all this within the ſpace of eleven or twelve days. It is reported, that when king William received the news of this ſea-fight, he ſaid, 'Such an action was neceſſary in the beginning of a war, but would have been raſh in the courſe of it.'

A fortnight after the king went to Portſmouth, both to haſten the refitting of the fleet, and to diſtribute rewards to the officers and ſoldiers, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the engagement. Admiral Herbert was ſoon after made earl of Torrington; captain John Aſhby, commander of the Defiance, and captain Cloudeſly Shovel, of the Edgar, received the honour of knighthood; and each ſeaman a gratuity of ten ſhillings. And beſides this donative to the living, the king's bounty extended to the relicts of thoſe, who had loſt their lives in their country's ſervice.

Being returned from Portſmouth, the king went with the queen to view the earl of Nottingham's houſe at Kenſington, which he deſigned to purchaſe, and make his reſidence during the ſitting of the parliament, upon account of its ſituation in an healthful air, and in the neighbourhood of London. The houſe being approved of, the purchaſe was ſoon after agreed upon with the earl for twenty thouſand pounds.

To return to the proceedings of the parliament. The reſt of this ſeſſion was chiefly employed in raiſing ſupplies for the war in Ireland and with France, in reverſing attainders and judgments paſſed in the late reigns, and inquiring after the authors of the late illegal proceedings and preſent miſconduct of affairs.

As to the ſupplies, beſides what has been already mentioned, ſix hundred thouſand pounds was given for the maintenance of the forces to be employed in Ireland, and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds towards the charge of the navy. For raiſing theſe ſums, an additional exciſe of nine-pence a barrel was laid upon beer, ale, and other liquors, (which by a committee appointed for that purpoſe was eſtimated at twelve hundred thouſand pounds); and a tax was voted upon all ground-rents for new buildings, upon new foundations, within the bills of mortality, ſince March 25, 1660, except ſuch as were within the walls of the city; and an eſtimate was ordered to be taken of them, and of the forfeited eſtates, which eſtates (not including Bedfordſhire, Lincolnſhire and Cardiganſhire, from whence no liſts had been ſent in) the committee ſtated at three hundred and forty-eight thouſand pounds, but of the ground-rents they could not as yet make any eſtimate. A poll-tax was alſo paſſed, and in order to defray the extraordinay expences of the French war, a ſupplemental bill to the poll-tax was voted by the commons, and ſent up to the lords for their concurrence; but the lords adding a clauſe to it for peers to name commiſſioners to rate themſelves, the commons would not agree to it. After ſome debates, the lords poſitively adhering to their clauſe, the bill was dropped, and inſtead of it another was paſſed for an aid of twelve-pence in the pound. The friends of the revolution imagining the buſineſs would ſoon be at an end, gave in to the aſſeſſors the full value of their eſtates, which being made the ſtandard in all future aſſeſſments, during both the French wars, they continued to pay to that value, whilſt thoſe who were not ſo zealous came much more eaſily off. The ſpeaker, upon preſenting this bill to the king, made a ſpeech, ſetting forth "the burden the French king had laid upon our manufactures, his attempts againſt our religion and liberties, by encouraging thoſe that deſigned their ſubverſion, and his devaſtations in the countries of our allies." Another money-bill paſſed the commons, for an additional duty on coffee, tea and chocolate; but the lords adding a proviſo for a draw-back on exportation, ſo warm a diſpute aroſe between the two houſes, whether the lords had power to alter and rate a tax given by the commons, that the bill did not paſs this ſeſſion.

The attainders reverſed this ſeſſion were thoſe of lord Ruſſel, grandfather to the preſent duke of Bedford, (whoſe death is in the act declared a murder) of Algernon Sidney, Corniſh, and Alicia Liſle, widow of John Liſle, who was one of the commiſſioners of the great-ſeal in the time of the commonwealth, and was afterwards aſſaſſinated in Swiſſerland. She had been moſt unjuſtly condemned by Jefferies, contrary to three verdicts of the jury.

The caſe of the earl of Devonſhire was alſo taken into conſideration by a committee of privileges appointed by the lords [P], who having examined the matter, reported, "That they were of opinion, that the proceedings againſt the earl of Devonſhire in the court of the king's bench in Eaſter term in the third year of king James II, (upon an information for an aſſault upon Mr. Culpepper, wherein his lordſhip's plea of privilege of parliament was over-ruled, and he was fined thirty thouſand pounds, and thereupon committed to the King's bench in execution) was a great violation of the privileges of the peers of this realm. And thoſe judges, who ſat in the ſaid court, when the ſaid judgments were given, and the ſaid commitment made, ſhould be required to attend at the bar of this houſe, to anſwer for the great offence, which they have committed thereby." Accordingly on the 6th of May, ſir Robert Wright and ſir Richard Holloway being brought to the bar, and Mr. juſtice Powell being in his place, they were ſeverally aſked what they had to ſay for themſelves in this buſineſs. Mr. juſtice Powell ſaid to this effect, "That it was his great misfortune, that he was miſguided by ſome books, which he looked on as authorities, which he found by their lordſhips judgment were not ſo: And he humbly begged their lordſhips and the earl of Devonſhire's pardon. As to the fine, he looked upon three thouſand pounds to be a fine enough; and that his ſilence in that buſineſs was his greateſt fault, for which he alſo begged pardon."

Then ſir Robert Wright alledged, "That as to the breach of privilege, they were miſguided by precedents. As to the fine, which is uſually ſet according to the quality and eſtate of the perſon fined, it came from the puiſne judge thirty thouſand pounds, and ſo to him laſt, according to the courſe of the court; and if he was miſtaken, he begged pardon, for he never had the leaſt diſreſpect to the earl of Devonſhire." Laſtly, ſir Richard Holloway ſpoke to this effect; "That he as ſecond judge pronounced the fine thirty thouſand pounds, which was ſet nemine contradicente; and if a leſſer fine had been propoſed, he ſhould have accepted it, and did not juſtify the proceedings, but looked on it as an exceſſive fine, and begged my lord Devonſhire's pardon, and ſubmitted all to their lordſhips." The lords aſked them, whether they had no diſcourſe together before concerning the ſaid fine. Sir Robert Wright denied it, and ſir Richard Holloway declared, that he had no direction from either the king or lord chancellor concerning the ſaid fine. But Mr. juſtice Powell appealed to the memory of ſir Richard Holloway, that there was a diſcourſe of the fine, five or ſix days before at the lord chancellor's; where ſir Robert Wright, ſir Richard Holloway, ſir Richard Allibone, and himſelf were. This, ſir Richard Holloway pretended he did not remember, and ſir Robert Wright denied that they were there purpoſely about the ſaid fine. Theſe two being withdrawn, Mr. juſtice Powell was aſked, what diſcourſe they had at the lord chancellor's? To which he anſwered, "That the chancellor firſt propoſed twenty thouſand pounds, and afterwards ſaid, it would be better, if thirty thouſand pounds, and then the king might abate ten thouſand pounds. And he declared his diſlike of this to the other judges, tho' not before the lord chancellor." After the examination, notice having been given to the king's council, that if they had any thing to offer, "Whether a peer of this realm might by law be committed in execution for a fine?' They might propoſe it; but they offering nothing upon that queſtion, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, upon a full conſideration of the ſeveral caſes and precedents, wherein the privileges of peers had been concerned, declared and adjudged on the 15th of May, "That the court of king's-bench, in over-ruling the earl of Devonſhire's plea of privilege of parliament, and forcing him to plead over in chief, it being within the uſual time of privilege, did thereby commit a manifeſt breach of privilege; and that the fine of thirty thouſand pounds impoſed by the court of king's-bench upon the ſaid earl was exceſſive and exorbitant, and againſt magna charta, the common right of the ſubject, and the law of the land; and that [P] The earl had been a zealous promoter of the bill of excluſion againſt the duke of York; which rendered him extremely obnoxious to that duke, who took occaſion to make him feel the effects of his diſpleaſure after he came to the crown. The earl had been very rudely inſulted within the verge of the court by colonel Culpepper, for which he contained himſelf, and only worked out the ſatisfaction of giving him his pardon, upon condition, that he ſhould never more appear in Whitehall. But immediately after the defeat of the duke of Monmouth, the colonel was encouraged to ſhew himſelf at court, and was riſing into a creature of it. The earl of Devonſhire meeting him in the king's preſence-chamber, and receiving from him, as he thought, an inſulting look, he took him by the noſe, led him out of the room, and gave him a contemptuous blow with the head of his cane. For this bold act the earl was proſecuted in the king's bench upon an information, and had a fine of thirty thouſand pounds impoſed upon him, and was committed, though a peer, to the king's bench priſon, till he ſhould pay it. But he, who was never able to bear any confinement that he could break from, eſcaped only to go home to his ſeat at Chatſworth. Upon the news of his being there, the ſheriff of Derbyſhire had a precept to apprehend him, and bring him with his poſſe to London. But he invited the ſheriff, and kept him a priſoner of honour, till he had compounded for his own liberty, by giving bond to pay the full ſum of thirty thouſand pounds; which bond being found among the papers of king James after his abdication, it was given up to the earl by king William. It is ſaid, that the counteſs dowager of Devonſhire, his mother, being uneaſy to ſee him under ſo great an hardſhip, waited on king James to beg her ſon's pardon; and, for the diſcharge of the fine, humbly deſired, that his majeſty would accept of her delivering up bonds, and other acknowledgments, for above ſixty thouſand pounds lent by her huſband and his mother, to his royal father and brother in their greateſt extremities; but this requeſt was rejected. Kennet's Memoirs of the Family of Cavendiſh, p. 136, —138.

no peer of this realm, at any time, ought to be committed for non payment of a fine to the king."

The next judgment that was reverſed, was that of Mr. Samuel Johnſon, chaplain to the unfortunate lord Ruſſel, and author of ſeveral tracts which had given offence to the courts of king Charles II. and James II. His ſufferings being reported to the houſe of commons [q], it was reſolved, "That the judgment againſt Mr. Johnſon was illegal and cruel. That the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion was illegal, and conſequently the ſuſpenſion of the biſhop of London, and the authority committed to the three biſhops, null and illegal, That Mr. Johnſon's not being degraded by his own dioceſan, if he had deſerved it, was null and illegal. That a bill be brought in to reverſe the judgment, and to declare all the proceedings before the three biſhops, null and illegal, And that an addreſs be made to his majeſty to recommend Mr. Johnſon to ſome eccleſiaſtical preferment ſuitable to his ſervices and ſufferings [r]."

Titus Oates likewiſe took the opportunity now of the indignation of the parliament, againſt the illegal proceedings of the late reign, to apply to the lords for a reverſal of the two judgments againſt him on the point of perjury; for which he had ſuffered more by the cruelty of the papiſts, than any other man ever endured with life. Whilſt this buſineſs was depending, Oates printed a paper (which he owned before the lords, and for which he was confined, being voted to contain matters tending to breach of privilege) wherein he alledged, "That in the year 1678, he had diſcovered a horrid popiſh conſpiracy for the deſtruction of the late king Charles II, his preſent majeſty, then prince of Orange, and the proteſtant religion, within theſe kingdoms; and proved it ſo fully, that ſeveral parliaments and courts of juſtice, before whom he gave his teſtimony, declared their belief of it by public votes; and the condemnation of ſeveral of the conſpirators, accuſed not only by him, but by ſeveral other witneſſes. That the houſe of lords being ſenſible of the great ſervice of Oates, gave him their thanks in a moſt public manner, and addreſſed king Charles II. to grant his royal protection to the ſaid Oates, and give him a ſubſiſtance, till the parliament conſidered of a reward ſuitable to his great and public ſervice to the king and kingdom. That the ſaid Oates diſcovered the traiterous conſpiracy, which Coleman held with La Chaiſe, confeſſor to the French king, which gave both houſes of parliament full ſatisfaction of the popiſh plot; and other letters were produced by a perſon of quality, by which the government was ſatisfied of the underhand dealing of a great miniſter of ſtate at that time, in order to procure a ſum of money to put off the parliament, all which did ſtill juſtify the ſaid Oates, and did verify the truth of his diſcoveries. That the duke of York having a great influence upon king Charles II, as alſo ſeveral other of the popiſh party, did prevail on him to ſuffer the ſaid Oates to be indicted of perjury, in two ſeveral indictments ſix or ſeven years after he had given his teſtimony concerning the popiſh plot, and brought the ſame to a trial in 1685, in the reign of king James II, with an addition of ſome other witneſſes, but all papiſts, and brought up at St. Omer's, excepting one, who had likewiſe his education at St. Omer's, but was turned proteſtant, as he pretended, and was made a miniſter by the biſhop of St. Aſaph. That the lord chief juſtice Jefferies's brow-beating Oates's witneſſes, as ſeveral peers could teſtify, and appearing ſo much Oates's enemy, the king's council perverting the teſtimony, and no council daring to appear for Oates, he was found guilty of perjury. That the aforeſaid indictments he had removed into the lords houſe by writs of error; and if their lordſhips would be pleaſed to examine into the merits of the cauſe, he would produce three witneſſes, yet alive, that would juſtify his being in town at the time, that St. Omer's witneſſes ſwore him out of town: That he could produce Mr. Jenniſon, who would prove, that Ireland was in town in Auguſt 1678; which contradicted the Staffordſhire witneſſes. That the papiſts themſelves having juſtified Oates's teſtimony by their open and avowed violation of our laws, liberties, and religion, and executing thoſe things in the reign of the late king, which he did diſcover them to be contriving in the reign of king Charles II. which was the ſubſtance of his teſtimony; he hoped the reputation of St. Omer's witneſſes, who were bribed with places and offices in the army, and ſums of money, ſhould not prevail with the houſe of lords from ſetting aſide the judgments brought before their lordſhips. All which was humbly offered to the conſideration of the lords and commons."

The lords, after hearing the opinion of all the judges, and the council at the bar, did at laſt order, that the judgments given againſt him ſhould be reverſed; and accordingly a bill of reverſal which had paſſed the commons, was read twice in the houſe of lords, who with ſome amendments inſerted a proviſo, "That until the matters for which Titus Oates was committed for perjury, were heard and determined in parliament; the ſaid Oates, ſhould not be received in any court or cauſe whatſoever to be a witneſs." A proviſo, liable to ſo many exceptions, was proteſted againſt by thirteen lords; becauſe (as they ſaid) the other part of the bill reverſed the judgments againſt Oates, whilſt this proviſo enacted him to be incapable of being a witneſs, which is more infamy than being a ſlave. The bill being ſent down to the commons, they diſagreed to the proviſo; which occaſioned a memorable conference between the two houſes, and that begot ſuch heats, as were like to come to a dangerous height, if they had not been allayed by the adjournment of the parliament. And all that Oates was able to obtain in this ſeſſion, was his diſcharge from confinement, and an addreſs from the lords, at the deſire of the commons, requeſting the king to grant him his pardon. The king complied with their requeſt, and moreover, allowed him a penſion of three pounds a week.

In the beginning of the ſeſſion, a cloſe committee had been [q] This report was made by Mr. Chriſty on the 24th of June 1689, and was as follows:

That in Trinity-term, 'ſecundo Jacobi regis,' information was exhibited againſt the ſaid Mr. Johnſon in the king's-bench, in the name of ſir Robert Sawyer the king's attorney general, for making, printing, and publiſhing, a ſcandalous and ſeditious libel, entitled, 'An humble and hearty addreſs to all the proteſtants in king James's army.' That the ſame term they forced him to plead, procured a jury to find him guilty, convicted him, and gave the judgment following, which was pronounced by ſir Francis Withens:

1. To pay five hundred marks to the king, and to lie in the priſon of the king's-bench till it be paid.
2. To ſtand in the pillory three days, in three ſeveral places, viz. the Palace-Yard Weſtminſter, Temple-Bar, and the Old-Change.
3. To be whipped by the common hangman, from Newgate to Tyburn.

That the judges of the king's-bench, who ſat in the court, were the lord chief juſtice Herbert, ſir Francis Withens, ſir Robert Wright, and ſir Richard Holloway.

That the ſentence was to be executed in November in the next Michaelmas-term, but they deſired, that Mr. Johnſon might firſt be degraded, for it would be a ſcandal to the clergy to have ſo infamous a puniſhment inflicted upon a miniſter. Whereupon he being a priſoner in the king's-bench, which is in Surrey, and in the dioceſe of the biſhop of Wincheſter, he was ſummoned the 19th of November, 1686, to appear the next day, the 20th of November, in the convocation-houſe of St. Paul's, in the dioceſe of the biſhop of London, he being rector of Curringham in Eſſex, within that dioceſe. Upon the 20th of November, a habeas corpus was brought to carry him from the king's-bench priſon to the convocation-houſe, where he found the biſhops of Durham, Rocheſter, and Peterborough, to exerciſe the authority and juriſdiction of the biſhop of London during his ſuſpenſion, and ſome clergymen, and many ſpectators, and a libel exhibited againſt him by one GodfreyLee, a proctor, dated that day, charging him of being guilty of great miſdemeanors, but ſpecified none, nor proved any; only referred to the record before the king's temporal judges.

That Mr. Johnſon demanded a copy of the libel, and an advocate, both which the biſhops denied him; but immediately proceeded to his ſentence, which was,

1. That he ſhould be declared an infamous perſon.
2. That he ſhould be deprived of his rectory of Curringham in Eſſex.
3. That he ſhould be a mere layman, and no clergyman, and deprived of all right and privilege of prieſthood.
4. That he ſhould be deprived thereof, and of all veſtments and habits of prieſthood.
5. That he ſhould undergo the puniſhment aforeſaid.

Againſt which proceeding Mr. Johnſon proteſted, as being againſt law, and the 132d canon, not being done by the biſhop of London, his own dioceſan; but they refuſed his proteſtation.

That he appealed to the king in chancery, but they refuſed to admit his appeal.

And immediately they proceeded to execute the ſaid ſentence, and to degrade him, by putting on a ſquare cap, and then taking it off again; then they pulled off his gown, then his girdle, which he demanded as his own proper goods bought with his own money, which they promiſed him to ſend, but they coſt him twenty ſhillings to have them again. After all, they put a bible into his hand, which he would not part with, but they took it from him by force. All this was done, the libel, ſentence, and execution of it, in three hours ſpace, on Saturday the 20th of November, having proceeded ſummarily as they did.

That on Monday the 22d of November, the judgment in the king's-bench was executed with rigour and cruelty; the whipping, being with a whip of nine cords, ſhewed to the committee, and Mr. Rouſe the under ſheriff, tore off his caſſock upon the pillory, and put a frieze coat upon him.

That Mr. Johnſon's wife had alſo an information exhibited againſt her in the king's-bench, for the like matter as that againſt her huſband.

[r] Mr. Johnſon could never obtain any church preferment. The king gave him three hundred pounds a year, out of the poſt office, for his and his ſon's life; beſides one thouſand pounds in money, and likewiſe beſtowed a place of one hundred pounds a year on his ſon. Mem. of Mr. Sam. Johnſon, p. 15.

The

appointed by the lords to examine and take informations concerning the death of the late earl of Eſſex, which had been attended with many ſuſpicious circumſtances; and this committee was revived in the next ſeſſion, but before the report was made to the houſe, the parliament was diſſolved, and conſequently a ſtop put to all proceedings [s].

The committee appointed in relation to the ſtate priſoners having examined their caſes, made a report of what they had diſcovered. After inſpecting the accounts of Graham and Burton, (who had been the wicked ſolicitors of the illegal proſecutions, and had been confined ſome time before) it appeared, "that the ſaid Graham and Burton, from the year 1679 to the year 1688, had received near forty eight thouſand pounds out of the exchequer, which they alledged to have paid to witneſſes, jurors, ſolicitors, council, and themſelves, and other perſons concerned in their proſecutions of indictments, informations, and trials of perſons in capital and other pretended criminal cauſes, and quo warrantos againſt corporations, and other proceedings in the name, and on behalf of the late king: That, for inſtance, in proſecuting for pretended conſtructive treaſons, the lord Ruſſel, Algernon Sidney, eſq; ſir Thomas Armſtrong, the lords Brandon and Delamere, John Hamden, eſq; alderman Corniſh, and divers others; and in their preſenting upon information, for ſuppoſed miſdemeanors and crimes not capital, ſir Samuel Barnadiſton, ſir Patience Ward, ſir Thomas Pilkington, Slinſby Bethel, ſir William Williams, Mr. Samuel Johnſon, Oates, and many others, they charged their accounts with exorbitant expences. That there were ſeveral witneſſes concurring with theſe accounts to make it manifeſt, that the ſaid Graham and Burton were inſtrumental in moſt or all the illegal proſecutions for the taking away the lives and eſtates of thoſe, that had ſuffered the loſs of either, within eight years laſt paſt: And that they had, by their malicious indictments, informations, and proſecutions of quo warrantos openly endeavoured the ſubverſion of the proteſtant religion, and the government of the realm, and waſted many thouſand pounds of the public revenue thereof in their undue proſecutions and ſolicitations."

Then they proceeded to the caſe of ſir Robert Wright, late lord chief juſtice, and found him concerned in all the cruelties done in the weſt, after Monmouth's invaſion; one of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, guilty of great enormities in the affair of Magdalen College; and one of the judges that gave judgment in the caſe of Hales, that the king might legally diſpenſe with the ſtatutes of the kingdom.

The caſe of the late lord Jefferies was alſo reported, whoſe crimes were ſo well known to all the world, that there was no need of other evidence. He had been inſtrumental in all the arbitrary proceedings of the late reign, but eſcaped the puniſhment which he might have juſtly expected, by dying in the Tower on the 18th of April. He is ſaid to haſten his death, by drinking ſpirituous liquors. Whilſt he continued priſoner there, he was viſited by Dr. John Scott, the celebrated author of the Chriſtian Life; and being urged by him to improve his preſent ſituation by a ſerious review of his paſt life, he expreſſed great concern upon the occaſion; but with regard to one part of his conduct, which had expoſed him to moſt cenſure, his behaviour in the weſt after the defeat of the duke of Monmouth, he declared, that how cruel ſoever his proceedings might be thought, they had by no means come up to the ſeverity, which king James expected from him, his majeſty being extremely diſpleaſed with him on that account [t].

As the illegal proceedings of the late reign and their authors were inquired into, ſo the miſcarriages of the preſent were alſo diſcuſſed. The lords, after addreſſing the king to put the Iſle of Wight, Jerſey, Guernſey, Scilly, Dover-Caſtle and other places into a poſture of defence, and to diſarm papiſts, impowered a committee to look into the miſcarriages in Ireland, and to ſend for perſons and papers for their information. The committee having acquainted the houſe, that they could not come to a full diſcovery of the miſcarriages in Ireland, without a ſight of the minute-book of the committee for Iriſh affairs, to the firſt of May laſt, the lords ordered an addreſs to the king, that the ſaid minute-book might be communicated to the committee. The king's anſwer to this addreſs was 'I will conſider of it;' which obſtructed the proceedings of the committee near the whole month [u]. But upon the commons voting, "that thoſe perſons, who had been the occaſion of delaying the ſending relief to Ireland, and had adviſed his majeſty to defer

[s] The ſubſtance of the evidence offered to the committee to prove that earl to have been murdered, with the reaſons why the inquiry was not reſumed in the next parliament in 1690, is related by Laurence Braddon, in his book againſt Burnet, p. 186, &c. where he ſays, "I believe, that no proſecution of any murder, in the Britiſh annals recorded, ever met with ſuch oppoſition, as the proſecution of this murder did. And firſt from all the jacobite intereſt, as well proteſtant as papiſt. And how great that intereſt ever ſince the revolution hath been, the many treaſonable conſpiracies and open rebellions have ſufficiently proved. Secondly, king James II. being father to the late queen Mary and queen Anne, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that neither of theſe two queens would have had their father ſtigmatized with that moſt infamous character of being a murderer, and in more inſtances than one. And whether king William, out of reſpect to his queen, might any ways hinder the fixing ſuch an infamy upon his queen's father, I cannot tell. But this I ſenſibly felt to be true, viz. that queen Anne upon her firſt coming to the crown, ſtruck me out of the civil liſt, becauſe, as her majeſty then ſaid, 'I had thrown blood in her father's face.' Thirdly, the counteſs dowager of Eſſex, by the influence of biſhop Burnet, did deſire the lords committees in 1689, not to proceed any farther in that inquiry; for the counteſs, by the biſhop, did then endeavour to perſuade the lords committees, and ſeveral other lords, that my lord of Eſſex murdered himſelf. Fourthly, there was a certain great man charged, as ordering this murder, who had been the main inſtrument, in the hand of Providence, of bringing about the revolution; and by this very gentleman's counſels king William was, for ſome years, very much influenced. What intereſt therefore that great man had with king William, or with any other perſons whatſoever, was applied to hinder the proſecution of this murder. And laſtly, the late biſhop Burnet himſelf was not only the principal cauſe of hindering the counteſs from engaging in this proſecution; but that prelate did otherwiſe endeavour to blaſt the credit of this inquiry, by ſometimes repreſenting me (as in his late hiſtory) as an enthuſiaſtical man, and therefore no regard was to be had to what I ſaid or did in relation to that inquiry. At other times that biſhop did repreſent me as a man of 'a very ſtrong imagination,' (a ſoft character for a madman) from whence I was eaſily inclined to take up a belief of things upon ſuch evidence, as was not ſufficient to prove the things to be; but I was ſo poſſeſſed of imaginary beings, there was no convincing me by any arguments of their non-exiſtence." The ſame gentleman likewiſe relates the following remarkable ſtory of what was ſuppoſed to be one of the principal occaſions of haſtening the poiſoning of king Charles II. Some ſhort time before the death of that king, there was a pamphlet written and printed in Holland, entitled, 'An inquiry into a detection of the barbarous murder of the late earl of Eſſex;' and many hundred of theſe were brought to England. In this pamphlet there were many arguments given to prove the murder; and the author humbly beſought his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to give his royal aſſurance of a pardon to him, who ſhould prove that murder; and that then the duke of York ſhould be proved to have been the principal author and rewarder thereof. Several hundred of thoſe books were, one night, about twenty days before king Charles II's death, diſperſed by ſome gentlemen, and for the moſt part laid at the doors of privy counſellors and of other noblemen, and juſtices of the peace. One of theſe books was conveyed to the king, who read the ſame, and then ſent for lord Allington, then conſtable of the tower; and charged his lordſhip to read and conſider the ſame, and in a ſhort time to return the book, and to give his majeſty his opinion of it: and alſo what his lordſhip thought as to the manner of the earl of Eſſex's death. Lord Allington ſent this book to ſir Thomas Rowe, but charged him to return it the next day, becauſe his lordſhip intended then to reſtore it to his majeſty. Sir Thomas read and returned the book accordingly, and ſhortly after waited again upon lord Allington, who then informed ſir Thomas, that he had been again with the king, and returned the book; and that his majeſty aſked his lordſhip, whether he had read and conſidered it; which his lordſhip having aſſured his majeſty he had done, the king commanded him to give his judgment as to the earl of Eſſex's death. But his lordſhip deſiring his majeſty to excuſe him from giving any judgment in that point, the king ſaid to him, 'I command you to deal very plainly and ſincerely with me in relation thereunto.' 'Sir,' replied lord Allington, 'if your majeſty commands me to deal therein ſincerely with your majeſty, I muſt then ſay, that I am of opinion, that unfortunate lord had very foul play.' 'Then, if I live,' ſaid the king, 'I will make a very ſtrict inquiry into that matter; and I command you to come to me to-morrow.' As ſoon as lord Allington withdrew, the duke of York came in whilſt the king had the book in his hand; and, as the king next day informed his lordſhip, the duke aſked his majeſty, 'who had brought him that villainous lying pamphlet.' But the king then ſaid, 'that he did not believe it to be a lying pamphlet, and he was reſolved to make ſtrict inquiry into the earl of Eſſex's death; and that his highneſs ſhould go abroad before that inquiſition was made.' The duke replied, that 'he had already travelled too much.'

"The ſubſtance of what is above mentioned, ſays Mr. Braddon, relating to what paſſed between king Charles II. and lord Allington, I had from ſir Thomas Rowe, ſoon after the revolution. And ſome few days after that diſcourſe between the king and the duke, the king and the lord Allington were ſeized with ſuch illneſs, as was generally thought to be the effects of poiſon; and the lord Allington died about three days before the king, and his majeſty died the 6th of February, 1684-5. And ſo by that king's being forced to travel too ſoon into the other world, king James delayed his own travels in this, until the juſt deſertion of his own troops forced him to become a fugitive and a penſioner to that great monarch, whoſe arbitrary government he liked much better, than to be circumſcribed by thoſe good laws, which hindered him from ruining both our church and ſtate." Braddon, p. 186, &c.

Burnet ſays, this Braddon was an honeſt but enthuſiaſtical man. He had, it ſeems, pickt up a great variety of circumſtances, which he thought ſo convincing, that he believed himſelf bound to proſecute the matter; eſpecially the evidence of a boy and girl, both at about ten or twelve years of age, who reported, the very day the deed was done, that they heard great crying in the earl's lodging, and ſaw a bloody razor flung out at the window, which was taken up by a woman that came out of the houſe where he was lodged. Braddon talked of theſe things ſo publicly, that he was tried for ſpreading falſe news to alienate people's hearts from the king, and was fined two thouſand pounds. Burnet, I. 570.

[t] This account ſir Joſeph Jekyll, late maſter of the rolls, had from the mouth of Dr. Scott himſelf.

[u] This putting off the inſpection of the minute-books, gave a handle to the enemies of the government, to inſinuate that matters were not much mended by the revolution, and that the preſent courtiers were no better friends to the nation, than others had been. This was, it ſeems, the firſt anſwer of king William that was not agreeable to both houſes.

the giving leave for ſome members of the houſe of peers to inſpect the minute-book of the committee for Iriſh affairs, were enemies to the king and kingdom," he acquainted the lords and commons, that he gave leave, that a committee of the upper-houſe might inſpect the book, according to their deſire. However, this book not being ſufficient to diſcover the miſcarriages in Ireland, the lords addreſſed the king, "that he would pleaſe to direct, that the minutes in relation to Ireland, ſince his taking the adminiſtration of the government upon him, to the time when the council-books began, might be communicated to the committee of their houſe." To this the king anſwered, "That there were no minutes of the Iriſh affairs in the time mentioned by their lordſhips."

After this the commons, in a committee of the whole houſe, having conſidered the ſtate of the nation, came at laſt to this reſolution, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty upon theſe heads: Firſt, that there had been delays in the ſuccour of Ireland. Secondly, That there were not ſufficient preparations to tranſport the forces to Ireland. And, thirdly, That ſeveral ſhips had been taken for want of guards and convoys to preſerve them. As the delays of ſending relief to Ireland were imputed to the marquis of Halifax, the queſtion was put at the ſame time, whether it ſhould be repreſented to his majeſty, that it was inconvenient to his affairs, that the marquis of Hallifax was in his majeſty's council? Which however was carried in the negative, ſeventy-ſix for an addreſs, and ninety againſt it.

A few weeks before Mr. John Howe, vice-chamberlain to the queen, moved for an addreſs to the king, to remove from his preſence and councils ſuch as had been impeached by parliament, and had betrayed the liberties of the nation. Though nobody was named, yet it was eaſy to perceive, that the perſons, againſt whom this addreſs was to be levelled, were the marquiſſes of Carmarthen and Hallifax, the firſt of which had been formerly impeached of high-treaſon, and to the other was chiefly imputed the preſent ill-conduct of affairs. The matter was debated with great warmth; and becauſe the contrary party were not prepared to oppoſe this unexpected motion, it would certainly have been carried in the affirmative, if thoſe, who were zealous for it at firſt, had not cooled on the ſudden. Monſieur Dyckvelt diſcourſing with Mr. Howe about this motion, the latter juſtified himſelf by alledging, that "he did not think it to be of any ill conſequence to his majeſty: and beſides, that a place at court ſhould never ſilence him, when the good of his country required him to ſpeak." And the next day he renewed the motion, and was ſtrongly ſupported in it; but the oppoſite ſide requiring the perſons to be named, and nobody offering to do it, the motion came to nothing. Mr. Howe, it ſeems, had miſſed of ſome advantages that he had propoſed to himſelf, upon which he went into the higheſt oppoſition that was made in the parliament to the court all this reign, not without indecent reflections on the king, and a moſt virulent attacking of all his miniſters. He was a man of ſome wit, but of little judgment, and no great ſhare of religion. He was member for Cirenceſter [w].

About this time certain treaſonable papers and letters from king James, ſome of them written with his own hand, and directed to divers perſons in London and in the country, having been intercepted at Liverpool in Lancaſhire, and ſent to court, his majeſty communicated them to the parliament. And becauſe, among other enigmatical expreſſions, mention was made in them of 'contraband goods ready to be ſhipped off in order to be run into ſuch places, where they might not be ſeized by cuſtom-houſe officers,' which ſufficiently diſcovered the deſign of an invaſion; Mr. Hampden the father, who at that time happened to be chairman of the committee of the whole houſe, repreſented the imminent danger that threatened the kingdom, and what difficulties his majeſty lay under to prevent it for want of money, and therefore moved for a farther ſupply. This motion, from a privy councillor, and at a time, when the houſe was going to adjourn, was thought very impolitic, and was ſo far from being backed by any member, not even by his own ſon, that it rather occaſioned ſome ſharp reflections [x]. Mr. Garroway, though one of the well-affected, ſaid, "That they had given money enough for that year: That if they had thought there had been occaſion for more, they would have prevented the king's demands: That it was not the want of money; but the ill conduct of thoſe, that had the management of affairs, that cauſed the difficulties, which the government lay under: That the miſcarriages in aſſiſting the proteſtants of Ireland had been of ſo ill conſequence, that if they were not ſpeedily remedied, the houſe would be obliged to take notice of them." Mr. Howe ſtood up next, and ſaid, 'Their preſent dangers proceeded from their not addreſſing the king for removing his evil councillors, as he himſelf had moved not long before.' However, the houſe having taken the intercepted letters into conſideration, reſolved to addreſs the king to deſire him to ſecure all papiſts of note, and to diſarm and take away their horſes from the reſt; and as a conſequence of this affair, a bill was brought in 'for attainting ſeveral perſons in rebellion againſt their majeſties;' but however it was not finiſhed this ſeſſion [y].

Articles of high-treaſon were alſo drawn up by the commons againſt ſir Adam Blair, captain Henry Vaughan, captain Frederick Mole, and John Eliot and Robert Grey doctors of phyſic, for diſperſing the declaration of king James, which he publiſhed in Ireland, directed 'to all his loving ſubjects in the kingdom of England.' Theſe articles being ſent up to the lords and read to the perſons accuſed, they deſired a copy of their impeachments, and time and council to make their defence; which being granted, they delivered their anſwers within a few days, pleading their innocence, and ſubmitting themſelves for their trial to their lordſhips judgments. The copies of all which being ſent to the commons, no farther progreſs was made in this affair during the ſeſſion.

Before the adjournment a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, "for the injoining the wearing the woollen manufactures of this kindom at certain times of the year." Upon which the ſilk-weavers of London and Canterbury preſented a petition to their lordſhips in a tumultuous manner, praying to be heard before the ſaid bill ſhould be paſſed into a law. Whereupon the houſe ordered their ſpeaker to tell the petitioners, "That the lords did not then think fit to give an anſwer, becauſe they obſerved there was an unuſual manner of application, and that the bailiffs, wardens, and aſſiſtants of the company ſhould have directed their members better: That the lords did firſt require, that thoſe crouds ſhould go home; and when that was done, neither they nor other people of this nation needed to doubt but that their lordſhips would do juſtice, and hear the objections of parties concerned in this or any other bill, that ſhould come before them." Upon this, due care being taken to prevent the return of ſuch unruly multitudes, who were ſuppoſed to be ſet on by the enemies of the government, the weavers remained quiet in their houſes; and the bill was unanimouſly rejected by the lords.

The moſt material acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were theſe:

An act to veſt in the two univerſities the preſentations belonging to papiſts. The univerſity of Oxford is to preſent to all popiſh livings in the ſouthern counties [z]; and the univerſity of Cambridge to thoſe in the northern. And if any truſtee, mortgagee, or grantee, of ſuch advowſon preſent, without notice to the reſpective univerſity, he forfeits five hundred pounds to the univerſity. No popiſh benefice is to be granted to any perſon having another; and ſuch benefice to be void by abſence of ſixty days in one year.

Acts for erecting courts of conſcience in Briſtol, Glouceſter, and Newcaſtle, which have been much to the benefit and eaſe of the inhabitants.

An act for aboliſhing the court of the marches of Wales, which had been continued by Henry VIII, the preſident and council whereof had power to hear and determine by [w] There was a report then current concerning Mr. Howe, that a certain builder applied to him for his intereſt, to obtain a grant of the waſte ground, on which now ſtands the ſtreet called the Seven-Dials. Another had before applied to the lord Portland for the ſame grant, who finding it to be worth about ten thouſand pounds, fairly told the king the value of it. Mr. Howe coming ſoon after with his ſolicitation, the king aſked, 'What it might be worth?' he replied, 'About one thouſand pounds.' The king ſaid, 'Is that all? You ſhall have a thouſand pound without ſo much trouble.

[x] Mr. Hampden, among the dangers to which the nation was expoſed, having named that of falling into the hands of the French and Iriſh, Mr. S——— moved 'to add the Dutch.' And this ſhews how early the Dutch fell under the diſpleaſure of thoſe who were no well-wiſhers to the revolution. Oldmixon.

[y] The lords inſiſted upon hearing the depoſitions of the witneſſes from their own mouths, and not thinking there was ſufficient evidence againſt the following perſons, agreed to leave them out of the bill; namely, Thomas lord Howard, the earl of Dover, the lord Hunſdon, ſir Roger Strickland, ſir Edward Herbert, colonel Hugh Southerland, and ſir William Jennings. But the prorogation put a ſtop to this bill.

[z] Namely, Oxfordſhire, Kent, Eſſex, Middleſex, Suſſex, Surry, Hampſhire, Berkſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Gloceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Warwickſhire, Wiltſhire, Somerſetſhire, Devonſhire, Cornwal, Dorſetſhire, Hereford ſhire, Northamptonſhire, Pembrokeſhire, Caermathenſhire, Brecnockſhire, Monmouthſhire, Cardiganſhire, Montgomeryſhire. The reſt of England and Wales belongs to Cambridge.

their diſcretion of matters belonging to the court. This had proved an intolerable burden to Wales and the borders at all times, and means to introduce an arbitrary power, eſpecially in the late reigns, when a new-convert family were at the head of it; nor could the earl of Macclesfield, the laſt preſident who kept his court at Ludlow, reduce it to ſuch order, as to ceaſe to be a grievance, and therefore it was diſſolved.

An act for the relief of the proteſtant Iriſh clergy. By which act thoſe clergymen that had been forced from their country, and had benefices there, were enabled to hold any benefice in England, without forfeiting their promotions in Ireland, but were obliged to reſign their eccleſiaſtical preferments in England, when reſtored to thoſe they had been forced to relinquiſh.

An act to repeal the ſtatute of Henry IV, againſt multiplying gold and ſilver. By this act the melting and refining of metals, improving them and their ores, and extracting gold and ſilver from thence (which had been forbidden) are allowed; on condition that all the gold and ſilver thus extracted, be brought to the mint at the tower, to be converted into money. At which place the extractors are to receive the full value of their gold or ſilver, according to the fineneſs thereof.

One of the laſt acts of this ſeſſion was that for raiſing the ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the Dutch. Though ſeveral lords had ſecurities appropriated out of the duties appointed for the payment of this ſum, for arrears due to them as ſervants of king Charles II; and though by this bill theſe arrears were limited to ſixty thouſand pounds, which was far ſhort of their demand, they however obſtructed not the paſſing of the bill; and therefore upon a repreſentation of their caſe and conduct in an addreſs to the king by the peers, he was pleaſed to ſay, "I am ſenſible of their behaviour towards me on this occaſion, and will not forget it." When the king came to give the royal aſſent to this bill, the ſpeaker made the following ſpeech:

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"THE commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, taking into conſideration the great aſſiſtance that was given by the ſtates of the United Provinces to your majeſty, in your glorious deſign of reſtoring theſe kingdoms to their ancient rights and liberties, and how for that end they entruſted their army and fleet to your majeſty's diſpoſal, at a time when they had war declared, and an invaſion threatned by the French king, merely to divert them: They do here humbly preſent your majeſty with a bill, appointing certain duties of exciſe and cuſtoms, for the raiſing ſix hundred thouſand pounds, which they deſire may be applied by your majeſty, for the ſatisfaction of the charges which have been expended by the ſtates in this expedition.

"It is little more than an age ſince the illuſtrious prince of Orange, your majeſty's great grand-father, whoſe name will ever be famous for his love to his country, did, by the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh, redeem thoſe provinces from the like oppreſſions; which ſhews how inſeparable the intereſt of theſe two nations are. And ſince it was the policy of thoſe that laboured our deſtruction to divide us, it ought to be the endeavour of all true lovers of their country, to keep us firmly united in order to our preſervation.

"The commons have likewiſe conſidered of the great arrears, that were left due by king Charles the ſecond to his ſervants, and have therefore made a proviſion of ſixty thouſand pounds for them, which they humbly deſire your majeſty would pleaſe to diſtribute among them, in ſuch proportions as your majeſty in your princely wiſdom ſhall think moſt fit.

"And having proceeded thus far in the weighty affairs depending before them, they now become humble ſuitors to your majeſty for a receſs, that thereby they may have the opportunity of repairing into their ſeveral counties, and promoting your majeſty's ſervice; and what remains at preſent for want of time to diſpatch, they doubt not but that they ſhall be able to perfect it at their next meeting, and, as they hope, to the entire ſatisfaction of your majeſty, and your whole kingdom."

That part of the ſpeech which mentions the aſſiſtance given by the Engliſh to the United Provinces, when under oppreſſion, highly pleaſed thoſe, who in their hearts were no friends to the Dutch; and it is ſaid by ſeveral hiſtorians, to be a very artful reminding them of their former obligations to the Engliſh. The diſaffected had already infuſed into weak minds a notion of the Dutch, being our enemies in point of commerce, and that we ought to be as jealous of them as of the French; a maxim that has all along been eſpouſed and propagated by the enemies to the revolution.

After paſſing theſe and ſome other bills [a], the two houſes adjourned to the 20th of September, and afterwards to the 19th of October.

The affairs of Ireland had been a continual ſubject of complaint all this ſeſſion; the dangerous condition of the proteſtants in that kingdom, and the neceſſity of a ſpeedy relief, had been conſtantly repreſented by the king in his ſpeeches, and urged by the commons in their addreſſes. But whatever might be the cauſe, though king James had been ſix months in Ireland, though the diſtreſſes of the proteſtants were ſo well known, and the whole nation impatient for their relief, yet no army had yet been ſent thither. Commiſſions indeed had been iſſued for raiſing eighteen regiments of foot, and five of dragoons, for the reduction of Ireland; and the levies had gone on ſo ſucceſsfully, that the regiments were compleat in leſs than two months. But the like diſpatch was not uſed in providing tranſports, a train of artillery and proviſions. Theſe things were managed with great ſlowneſs and neglect, and eſpecially the proviſions, which were not only long in getting ready, but very bad when they were got. Mr. Harbord, pay-maſter of the forces intended for Ireland, was alſo purveyor; ſo the fault both as to the expedition and the ſtores, were charged on him.

Duke Schomberg, to whom the king had given the command of the army, was very uneaſy at the dilatory proceedings of the managers of both tranſports and proviſions; and to prevent farther inconveniencies, laboured with Mr. Harbord to quit one of his employments, who, though unwillingly, was at laſt prevailed with to reſign the purveyorſhip, which was given to Mr. Shales. The duke had propoſed not to ſtay for the tranſports, but to march the forces directly to Port-Patrick in Scotland, from whence it was but a few hours paſſage into Ireland. Had this been done, it would have ſaved two or three months, and by that means prevented the rebellion of Dundee, relieved Londonderry, and hindered king James from forming ſo ſtrong an army, and the French from landing, in Ireland. But this deſign was oppoſed like the reſt of the meaſures for haſtening the relief of that kingdom. At length, upon the news of the raiſing of the ſiege of Londonderry, the new levies began to embark at Cheſter and Liverpool; and general Schomberg, having taken his leave of the commons, thanked them for the preſent they had made him, and received aſſurances of their particular regard of himſelf and army, ſet out for Cheſter [b].

On the 12th of Auguſt he ſailed with about ninety veſſels of all ſorts, and near ten thouſand men, horſe and foot, and arrived the next day at Carrickfergus, where the army preſently landed on Bangor ſide without oppoſition. The firſt thing he did was to ſend out parties to ſcour the adjacent country, and get intelligence of the enemy. This done, he marched his forces to Belfaſt, which the enemy had abandoned, retiring to Carrickfergus; and where ſeveral perſons joined him, who durſt not declare before. The army being ſufficiently refreſhed, ſeveral regiments were detached towards Carrickfergus with ſome cannon and mortars; upon whoſe approach the enemy beat a parley; but the general not allowing their demands, the town was ordered to be attacked. On the 22d the trenches were opened, ſome bat-

[b] The commons had given him one hundred thouſand pounds, to be paid out of the civil liſt, which however the king never paid; but in lieu of it, five thouſand a year, was ſettled upon him and his heirs as a reward for his ſervices, and to make him amends for the like revenues he had loſt in France and Germany. Two peers and two commoners were named truſtees, for the making purchaſes in order thereto. But it was afterwards paid out of the poſt-office. When he was introduced into the houſe, he ſate down covered in a chair, and after a a ſhort ſpace he roſe up, and, uncovered, told them "he had deſired that honour, to make his juſt acknowledgments for their great favours, and to take his leave of them, being now going to Ireland, where he ſhould freely expoſe his life in the king's ſervice and theirs." The ſpeaker replied: "The ſervices done by his grace to the king and kingdom were ſo great, that they could never be forgotten: That the commons were extremely ſatisfied that the army was committed to his conduct, and that, at whatever diſtance he ſhould be, they would have a particular regard of himſelf, and the army under his command." Pr. of H. C. II. 344. How this promiſe was fulfilled will quickly appear.

teries raiſed, and the ſiege carried on in form. This made the beſieged more eager to capitulate; but duke Schomberg refuſing to let them march out with the uſual ſigns of honour, and they inſiſting upon it, the attacks were purſued with great vigour till the 26th of Auguſt, when conſiderable breaches being made, and all things ready for a general aſſault, the garriſon was contented to accept what conditions the beſiegers were pleaſed to grant; which were to be conducted with their arms, and as much baggage as they could carry on their backs, to the next Iriſh garriſon, which was Newry.

Whilſt the ſiege of Carrickfergus was carried on, the reſt of the horſe, foot, and dragoons, which for want of tranſports had ſtaid behind, were embarked at Highlake, and ſafely landed in Ireland. On the 28th of Auguſt the general returned to Belfaſt, and two days after his own French regiment of horſe joined the army; which being muſtered on the laſt day of that month, was found to conſiſt of four regiments of horſe, one of dragoons, and eighteen of foot[c]. The artillery horſes being moſt of them yet at Cheſter, duke Schomberg ordered the greateſt part of the train to be ſhipped, and the fleet to ſail with them and all other neceſſaries to Carlingford; while in the mean time he marched the army beyond Liſburne, and ſo through Hillſborough, and pitched his camp at Drummore, the place where the northern proteſtants of Ireland were not long before routed by Hamilton. The day following he continued his march to Loughbrilane, where the Inniſkillin horſe and dragoons joined him, and cheerfully offered themſelves to be an advanced-guard to the army. Upon their approach the Iriſh abandoned Newry, a very ſtrong paſs, having firſt ſet fire to the town; which news being brought to the general, he diſpatched a trumpet to the duke of Berwick, who commanded there, to acquaint him, "that if they went on to burn in this barbarous manner, he would not give any quarter." This meſſage had ſo good an effect, that the Iriſh abandoned Dundalk without doing any harm to the town, where duke Schomberg marched with his army, and encamped about a mile north of it in a low moiſt ground, having the town and the river towards the ſouth, the Newry mountains to the eaſt, and to the north, hills and bogs intermixed. The bad weather, long and conſtant marches, and ſcarcity of proviſions, made his raw men already begin to faint; but here they met with ſome refreſhments, and on the 8th of September were reinforced by major general Kirke's, ſir John Hanmer's, and brigadier Stuart's regiments. The duke at firſt deſigned to have continued his progreſs; but the ſhips with the train of artillery, not being come up in time to Carlingford, according to his directions, was a great diſappointment to him; and ſo much the more as he had intelligence by an engineer, who deſerted the enemy, that general Roſen was then at Drogheda with about twenty thouſand men. Roſen hearing that the Engliſh halted at Dundalk, ſaid, 'he was ſure Schomberg wanted ſomething;' and therefore ſent part of his forces to ſeize on Ardee, a ſmall town between Drogheda and Dundalk.

Duke Schomberg continued in an uncertain poſture till the 20th of September, when in the morning he had an account, that king James having aſſembled all his forces near Drogheda, advanced towards him; and that a party of two thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe were gone beyond the mountains to attack the paſs at Newry, and fall into his rear. Upon this he detached a party of horſe againſt them, at the ſight of whom they retreated towards Sligo. However the day following the enemy appeared in order of battle, and a great party of their horſe advanced towards the intrenchments of the duke's army. Several of the Engliſh officers were for engaging the enemy, but the duke told them, 'Let them alone; we will ſee what they will do;' and though he ſaw them coming within cannon ſhot of his camp, yet he ſaid ſtill, that he did not think they deſigned to fight. However, one day ſeeing them draw their army into two lines, he ſent lieutenant general Douglaſs to the camp, to order all the foot to ſtand to their arms, and the horſe to return to the camp upon a certain ſignal, but till then to go on with their foraging. The ſoldiers, who were ſtruggling with diſeaſes and want in their tents, received theſe orders notwithſtanding with the utmoſt cheerfulneſs; but in ſome time the Iriſh drew off, and ſo the affair ended to the great diſappointment of the army, who hoped no leſs than to defeat the enemy, and by a victory to put an end to their miſeries. But duke Schomberg juſtly conſidered, that the enemy was much ſuperior in horſe; that his own men were undiſciplined, and withal weakened by hunger and ſickneſs, while the other army enjoyed health and plenty; and that the loſs of a battle might be attended with the loſs Ireland. In a day or two after the Iriſh marched away, there was a dangerous conſpiracy diſcovered in the Engliſh camp, which was carried on by ſome French papiſts, who had inliſted themſelves in the proteſtant regiments of that nation, the officers having been obliged to raiſe their companies in ſo much haſte, that they had no time to examine them very ſtrictly. A captain of one of theſe regiments being informed, that four of his ſoldiers and a drummer, who were Roman catholics, deſigned to go over to the enemy, he cauſed them to be ſecured, and found letters about one of them to monſieur d'Avaux, the French embaſſador. Upon ſtricter examination the fellow declared, he had letters from one du Pleſſis, who was likewiſe a papiſt, but now ſerved as a private ſoldier in one of the French regiments, though he had formerly been a captain of horſe in France, whence he had been obliged to fly for murder. Du Pleſſis being ſeized, freely confeſſed that he had written to king James, and to the French embaſſador, and acquainted them, that there were divers papiſts in the three French regiments, whom he promiſed to bring over to the Iriſh camp, upon condition he might have the command of them, and his pardon in France. He and his five accomplices were therefore brought to their trial, ſentenced to death by a council of war, and accordingly executed; after which the French colonels made ſtrict inquiry what papiſts there were in their regiments, and found about two hundred and fifty, who by order of the general were ſecured, diſarmed, and ſent over priſoners into England, and from thence to Holland, where they were ſet at liberty.

Though duke Schomberg remained in his camp with the groſs of his army, he did not reſtrain the Inniſkilliners from making excurſions. Nor had he reaſon to repent this liberty which he allowed them; for on the 27th of September he received an account, that about a thouſand of them, headed by colonel Lloyd, had routed a body of five thouſand Iriſh, that were marching towards Sligo, of whom they killed ſeven hundred, took O Kelly their commander, and forty other officers priſoners, beſides a great booty of cattle, with the loſs of very few of their men. The duke was ſo pleaſed with the news, that having ordered all the Inniſkillin horſe and foot in his camp to draw out, he rode all along their line with his hat off, and cauſed the Dutch guards, and the Inniſkillin foot to make three running fires, which were anſwered by the Inniſkillin horſe, and by the cannon upon the works; as alſo from the ſhips that lay at the mouth of the river.

The joy of this ſucceſs was ſometime after much abated by the loſs of Sligo and James-town. The Iriſh marching that way in a conſiderable body, commanded by Sarsfield, thoſe of James-town not thinking it tenable, abandoned it, and marched to Sligo, loſing ſome of their men, and killing ſome of the Iriſh in their haſty retreat. Next day Sarsfield, with his detachment, advanced before Sligo; whereupon colonel Ruſſel retired to Balliſhannon, and adviſed the foot alſo to quit the place. But notwithſtanding this, St. Sauveur, a reſolute French captain in Melloniere's regiment, with his own company of French grenadiers, and colonel Lloyd with his bold Inniſkilliners ſtaid in the town, and upon the approach of Sarsfield retreated to the two forts, Lloyd into one, and St. Sauveur into the other. Lloyd not knowing how to ſubſiſt his men, retired that night with ſome loſs; but the French captain having carried in ſome proviſions, and finding ſome ammunition in the fort, reſolved ſtoutly to maintain his poſt. The nights were then dark; and he fearing leſt the enemy might make their approaches to the fort undiſcovered, got a great many fir-deals, and dipping the end of them in tar, they gave ſuch a light when ſet on fire, and hung over the walls, that he diſcovered the enemy advancing towards them with an engine called a ſow; but having killed the engineer, and two or three more, the reſt retreated, and he burnt the engine. Day no ſooner appeared, than the Iriſh were forced to quit a ſmall field-piece, which they had planted in the ſtreet, being galled with ſhot from the fort, by St. Sauveur's men, who preſently after ſallied out, and killed many of the enemy.

But at laſt their proviſion being ſpent, and there being little or no water in the fort, they ſurrendered it upon honourable terms; and at their marching over the bridge, colonel Sarsfield, who would have purchaſed theſe brave ſoldiers at any rate, ſtood with a purſe of gold, and offered every man, who would ſerve king James, horſe and arms, with five guineas advance; yet they all made anſwer, 'They would never fight for papiſts,' except one, who the very next day after he had got horſe, arms, and the gold, brought all off with him to Dundalk.

Though duke Schomberg had prudently declined fighting with the Iriſh upon unequal terms; a raging ſickneſs, occaſioned by the unwholſomeneſs of the place, wet weather, and ill food, daily ſwept away, or at leaſt diſabled a great number of officers and ſoldiers. Among the reſt died ſir Edward Deering, a gallant gentleman, who had contributed more than any man in the county of Kent towards bringing about the revolution; colonel Henry Wharton, a bold and active man, ſon to Philip lord Wharton; ſir Thomas Gower, and colonel Hungerford, two young gentlemen of diſtinguiſhed merit. As for the common ſoldiers there periſhed at Dundalk about two thouſand; and as many ſick were ſhipped off to be tranſported to Belfaſt, but of them not above eleven hundred came aſhore, the reſt dying at ſea. In ſhort, ſo great was the mortality, that by the next ſpring above one half of the army, that was tranſported over, was loſt. Winter approaching, both armies went into quarters, and duke Schomberg renewed his inſtances for the coming over of the ſeven thouſand auxiliary Danes, who about this time arrived in England and Scotland, purſuant to the treaty concluded with the king of Denmark on the 15th of Auguſt.

The general was cenſured by ſome perſons for not putting things more to hazard. It was ſaid, that he meaſured the Iriſh by their numbers, and not by their want of ſenſe or courage; and ſuch complaints were ſent of this to the king, that he wrote twice to him, preſſing him to put ſomewhat to the venture. But duke Schomberg ſaw the enemy was well poſted; well provided, and above thrice his number, and that they had ſeveral good officers among them. If he had puſhed matters, and had met with a misfortune, his whole army, and conſequently all Ireland, would have been loſt; for he could not have made a regular retreat. The ſure way was to preſerve his army, and that would ſave Ulſter, and keep matters entire for another year. And therefore though this conduct of his was blamed by ſome, yet better judges thought, that the managing of this campaign, as he did, was one of the greateſt parts of his life.

King William's arms were not more ſucceſsful at ſea; for admiral Torrington, with the confederate Engliſh and Dutch fleet under his command, having made a ſhew of landing his men to ſurprize Cork, thought fit to abandon that enterpriſe upon a falſe intelligence, that the French were advancing towards him; and he was ſoon after obliged to put into Torbay, moſt of the Engliſh ſeamen being diſabled by ſickneſs. This misfortune was juſtly charged on thoſe, who had victualled the fleet, for it was obſervable, that all this while the Dutch continued healthy. Admiral Torrington having taken in ſound proviſions and refreſhed his men, put to ſea again; but not having an opportunity of engaging the enemy, the ſummer paſſed without any conſiderable action in the channel; only the Engliſh had the misfortune to loſe the Dartmouth, a man of war of forty guns, which, after a ſtout reſiſtance, was taken by the French. Our trade likewiſe ſuffered conſiderably; for the French not ſetting out a fleet any more, ſent out many cruiſers and privateers into our ſeas, that England ſuſtained great loſſes by them, there not being at that time a ſufficient number of frigates to convoy and ſecure the merchantmen; ſo that though we ſeemed maſters of the ſea, we were great loſers there.

The affairs abroad, this ſummer, were a little more proſperous. Not only war was proclaimed againſt France by the Empire, Brandenburg, the States General, and Spain; but moreover an offenſive and defenſive alliance between the emperor and the ſtates general, was concluded the 12th of May at Vienna. As this was the beginning of the grand alliance, it will be neceſſary to inſert the ſubſtance of the principal articles:

I. and II. Perpetual friendſhip, and an alliance offenſive and defenſive againſt France.

III. and V. Neither party to make peace or truce, without conſent of the other; and if any treaty be entered into by common conſent, all particulars ſhall be communicated on both ſides, and nothing concluded by one, without the conſent of the other.

IV. No peace to be made till the treaties of Weſtphalia, Oſnaberg, Munſter, and the Pyrenean, ſhall be fully vindicated and reſtored.

VI. and VII. After the preſent war ſhall be ended, there ſhall remain a perpetual defenſive alliance, between the emperor and the ſtates, againſt France; and if France ſhould attack either, the other to aſſiſt with all his forces.

X. To this treaty ſhall be invited Spain by the emperor, and England by the ſtates, and all the allies of either party ſhall alſo be admitted, if they ſhall think fit to accede.

The ſeparate articles are:

"In caſe the king of Spain ſhould die without iſſue, the ſtates general ſhall aſſiſt the emperor with all their forces, to take poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, with all its dominions and rights, and to uſe their friendly endeavours with the electors their allies, that the emperor's eldeſt ſon Joſeph, king of Hungary, may be ſpeedily choſen king of the Romans: And if France ſhould by threats or arms oppoſe it, they will aſſiſt his imperial majeſty with their utmoſt force. The crown of England ſhall be likewiſe invited, to enter into theſe articles."

Theſe articles were added, becauſe the king of France, notwithſtanding the moſt ſolemn renunciation, was openly endeavouring to procure the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, for his ſon the dauphin, and alſo to make him king of the Romans, which would have been fatal not only to Holland, but to all Europe.

To this alliance and the ſeparate articles, king William acceded the 9th of December this year.

The king alſo made a treaty with the ſtates general in Auguſt, by which are confirmed former treaties of peace and commerce[d]; particularly the defenſive league, concluded at London, March 3, 1678; of which the chief articles are: "In caſe either party is attacked, &c. the other upon notice and demand, ſhall endeavour to cauſe hoſtilities to ceaſe, and reparation to be made for any injuries received: And in caſe a war ſhall enſue, the ally not attacked ſhall be obliged to declare war two months after the notice and demand, and during the two months ſhall endeavour to mediate an accommodation. If the king of Great-Britain is attacked, the ſtates ſhall aſſiſt him with ſix thouſand foot and twenty men of war; if the ſtates are attacked, the king ſhall aſſiſt them with ten thouſand foot, and the ſame number of ſhips of war: Theſe ſuccours ſhall be ſupplied and maintained by the party that ſends them. It is left to the choice of the ally at war, whether the other ſhall continue the ſuccours, without declaring war alſo."

About the ſame time the king entered into an alliance with Chriſtian V. king of Denmark; by virtue of which, the Engliſh army in Ireland was ſuddenly reinforced by ſeven thouſand Danes, ſix thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe.

Notwithſtanding theſe confederacies againſt him, the king of France was not diſcouraged from purſuing his ambitious deſigns. However, the campaign in Flanders did not favour him this year. It was opened with Liege departing from the neutrality they had accepted, and declaring againſt France, which was done by delivering to the Dutch a great convoy of powder, bombs, and money deſigned for Bonne, and brought to Liege by a French officer. But this was followed by nothing conſiderable. The French had in Flanders an army of about eighty thouſand men, commanded by marſhal d'Humieres, whilſt that of the Allies, under the prince of Waldeck, was not above ſixty thouſand. The prince of Waldeck was a man of great compaſs and true judgment; equally able in the cabinet and in the camp. But he was generally unſucceſsful, becauſe he was never furniſhed in proportion to his ſchemes. The opinion the armies had of him as an unfortunate general, made him really ſo; for ſoldiers cannot have much heart, when they have no confidence in their leader. In the prince of Waldeck's army were a body of troops, conſiſting of Dutch and Engliſh, ſent over by king William to the aſſiſtance of the States. The Engliſh were commanded by the earl of Marlborough. The two armies paſſed the ſummer without any remarkable action, except the battle of Walcourt, which was reckoned a raſh undertaking in d'Humieres. This action happened about the middle of Auguſt, in the following manner. The mar-ſhal d'Humieres hearing that a great number of Dutch horſe were gone out to forage, made a motion with his whole army in order to ſurprize them. The prince of Waldeck had no ſooner notice of it, but he gave the foragers a ſignal to return to the camp; but that did not prevent their being vigorouſly charged by the French, who killed ſome of them. Their vanguard advancing attacked the village of Forge, where eight hundred foot were poſted to countenance the foragers, being commanded by the Engliſh colonel Hodges, lieutenant colonel Goes, and the major of a regiment of horſe, who for above two hours maintained their ground with extraordinary reſolution, but had been overpowered by numbers, had not Roo, major-general of the cavalry, (who was ſent to bring back the lieutenant-generals Webbenum, Marlborough, and d'Hubi) come in with their horſe timely to their relief. With that reinforcement they made a retreating fight againſt the main force of the enemy, till they came to a riſing ground near Walcourt, where they joined a battalion of Lunenburghers, which had been reinforced by another of colonel Hales. The French attacked the town with their uſual vigour upon a firſt onſet, which laſted near an hour and half; during which time prince Waldeck ordered lieutenant-general Alva to march with three regiments to their relief, which were ſupported by the guards, and two Engliſh regiments headed by the earl of Marlborough, while major general Slaugeburg advanced almoſt at the ſame time with ſome other battalions of foot, to the other ſide of the town. By all theſe motions, and the ſtout reſiſtance of thoſe in the town, the French perceived they had engaged themſelves too far, and began to think of a retreat; which they performed in great haſte and diſorder, and conſequently with conſiderable loſs, leaving behind them ſome cannon and ammunition, and near two thouſand officers and ſoldiers killed and wounded. This was the allies computation, who on their ſide owned the loſs of above three hundred men, amongſt whom were lieutenant-colonel Grimes of the Engliſh, the major of the dragoons of Zell, and ſome inferior officers. And thus ended the campaign in Flanders, without any other memorable action, except that of the Spaniards, who acted in a ſeparate body towards Courtray, levelled a great part of the French lines, and raiſed conſiderable contributions on the enemies territories.

The ſucceſs of the allies in Germany, was much greater. The French by their ſudden invaſion of Germany, were maſters of almoſt all the three eccleſiaſtical electorates. In Treves, Mont Royal (where Montal commanded) on one ſide, and Bonne in Cologne on the other, left a large ſpace at their diſcretion, and they only wanted Coblentz. They had alſo Keiſerſwert in Cologne, where cardinal Furſtemberg had placed a German garriſon under Marcogney. Mentz was likewiſe in their poſſeſſion, where the marquis d'Uxelles commanded with twelve battalions of the beſt troops of France, the regiment of bombardiers, the company of miners, a regiment of horſe, and another of dragoons. He had under him Choiſy, an able engineer who had defended Maeſtricht, and fortified the town. The ſame care was taken of Philipſburg and Landau.

As to the Palatinate, nothing was to be ſeen there, but the lamentable remains of the avarice and fury or fears of the French. In Heidelburg, the capital, the caſtle was blown up, and half the city burnt. They had deſtroyed Manheim, and thrown even the ruins into the Rhine and the Necker. Worms and Spires as bordering too near upon Alſatia, were reduced to aſhes, and Frankendahl and ſeveral caſtles were demoliſhed.

All theſe conqueſts as well as the frontiers of France were covered with a numerous army under marſhal de Duras. He had for lieutenant generals the counts de Choiſeul and d'Auvergne, the duke of Villeroy, baron de Monclare, marquis de Bouflers, duke of Vendome, marquis de Genlis, and count de la Feuillée. His marſhals de camp were the counts de Teſſé and de Tallard, and the marquiſſes d'Harcourt, de Vivans, and de Neuchelle. Beſides theſe, the marquiſſes de Biſſy commanded in Lorrain, de Sourdis in Cologne, de Chamilly at Straſbourg, and monſieur Catinat, afterwards marſhal of France, in Luxemberg. Theſe generals were all good officers. But with all this, the arms of France did not prevail this ſummer. Three conſiderable armies roſe up againſt her at once. One of fifty thouſand men, under the duke of Bavaria; one of forty-ſeven thouſand under the elector of Saxony; and the third of fifty-one thouſand, commanded by the elector of Brandenburg. The duke of Lorrain was at the head of the imperial troops, who after a ſiege of about two months, took Mentz by capitulation. The French, by their own confeſſion, had above nine hundred men ſlain, and fourteen hundred wounded. The duke ſenſible of the merit and bravery of the marquis d'Uxelles, left him maſter of the articles of capitulation. By the taking of Mentz, Franconia, which before lay expoſed, was now covered. The elector of Brandenburg laid ſiege to Keiſerſwert, and was purſuing the attacks with vigour, when the garriſon, partly French, and partly Germans, divided themſelves, and demanded to capitulate, and ſurrendered upon articles. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, the elector beſieged Bonne, where baron d'Asfeld commanded with very good officers under him. He had eight battalions of foot, a regiment of horſe, and another of dragoons. The ſiege, by reaſon of ſeveral interruptions, proved very tedious; but at laſt the counterſcarp, and ſome outworks being taken by ſtorm, the garriſon ſurrendered after fifty-five days blockade, and twenty-ſix days cloſe ſiege. The taking of Bonne, which laid the Rhine open as far as to Mentz, was partly owing to the duke of Lorrain, who after the ſurrender of Mentz, led part of his army to the aſſiſtance of the elector of Brandenburg. The duke ſhewed a generous regard for baron d'Asfeld who had ſo long and ſo bravely defended the place againſt himſelf and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg. With this ſiege ended the campaign on the Rhine.

France ſeemed to have a fair opportunity of repairing theſe loſſes in Catalonia, the Spaniards having no army there, nor able to ſend out one. But Lewis only ordering the duke de Noailles to advance with nine batallions, three regiments of horſe, twelve pieces of cannon, and two mortars; all that Noailles could do was to beſiege Campredon, which he took in five days. He afterwards held out a ſiege againſt the Spaniards and forced them to retire. The campaign ended with the demolition of that town and citadel.

The only event that France could conſider this year as an advantage, was the death of pope Innocent XI. His family name was Odeſchalchi. He was born at Camo, in Milan, of a family that was become rich, by dealing in banks. He bore arms when young in Flanders, in the ſervice of Spain; and it is ſaid, that an affront put upon him by a Frenchman in the war, was the cauſe of his hatred to France. He afterwards became firſt ſecretary to the apoſtolical chamber, biſhop of Novarra, legate of Bologna and cardinal. It is affirmed, he arrived at theſe honours by loſing on purpoſe, large ſums of money at gaming with Donna Olympia niece of Innocent X. and making her magnificent preſents. It was known, that he did not ſo much as underſtand Latin, and had a maſter when he was made cardinal to teach him to pronounce that little he had occaſion for at high maſſes. Of divinity he underſtood nothing. However this be, his advancement to the papal chair was applauded at Rome, as every one expected to live eaſy and happy under his government. As he was very knowing in money matters, the vaſt debts the papacy was involved in by his waſteful predeceſſors, were by his frugal management diſcharged. To theſe talents he joined an exemplary piety, a conſtant oppoſition to whatever favoured of ſuperſtition, an ardent zeal for reformation of manners, a diſintereſtedneſs uncommon, and perhaps too great with regard to his relations, who got nothing by his pontificate, but the bare honour of having a pope in their family. His oppoſition to, and ſufferings from France, (which have been mentioned) are reckoned by her enemies, as ſo many virtues, and even the proteſtants themſelves are full of his praiſes. It is certain, they were greatly indebted to him: For, had he but favoured the poſtulation of cardinal Furſtemberg, the king of France, with an elector of Cologne at his devotion, would have forced Germany to hide her reſentments, and by that means have been able to ſuſtain king James on the throne, and more than ever weakened the proteſtant intereſt. The pope did the contrary, and gave occaſion to the ſaying, that 'it were to be wiſhed for the church of Rome, that the pope had turned catholic and king James become Huguenot.' He died the 2d of Auguſt after a pontificate of about thirteen years, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Ottoboni a Venetian, who ſate in the papal chair but a year and half. The king of France renounced his pretenſion to the franchiſes, but had no other return for it, than the promotion of Fourbin and ſome others, he recommended to be cardinals. For the new pope, who took the name of Alexander VIII. would not yield the point of the regale, nor would he grant the bulls, for thoſe who were named by the king of France to the vacant biſhoprics, and had ſigned the formulary of 1682, declaring the pope fallible and ſubject to a general council. And when Alexander felt himſelf near death, he paſſed a bull in form, which confirmed all Innocent's bulls, and by this put a new ſtop to a reconciliation with the court of France.

But to return to the affairs of England, during the receſs. The king went this year to the races at New-market. The concourſe of people there upon this occaſion was extraordinary great; nor did the univerſity of Cambridge omit this opportunity of waiting upon the king, being introduced by the duke of Somerſet, their chancellor. Dr. Covel the vice-chancellor, who had been chaplain to the queen in Holland, addreſſed himſelf to the king in an eloquent ſpeech, congratulating him upon the glorious ſucceſſes, with which he had been bleſſed in his endeavours to reſcue the church and nation from the imminent dangers, that threatened both, and which were more particularly pointed againſt the univerſities; and concluded with an humble recommendation of themſelves to his majeſty's protection. To this the king anſwered, "That as God had bleſſed him in this undertaking, ſo he would faithfully diſcharge his truſt in preſerving the church of England, and giving all protection and favour to the univerſities." The day following the king made a viſit to the univerſity of Cambridge, where he was received and entertained with demonſtrations of joy, duty, and loyalty. Three days after that he returned to Hampton-court from New-market.

This was not the only time the king appeared in public this ſeaſon. The lord mayor's day being at hand, ſir Thomas Pilkington, who was continued for the year 1690, invited to dinner the king and queen, the prince and princeſs of Denmark, and both houſes of parliament. The king accepting the invitation, their majeſties, attended by their royal highneſſes, and a numerous train of the nobility and gentry, went firſt to a balcony prepared for them in Cheapſide to ſee the proceſſion; which for the great numbers of the citizens of the ſeveral guilds, the full appearance of the artillery, the richneſs of the pageants, and the ſplendor and good order of the whole proceeding, ſurpaſſed all that had been ſeen before on the like occaſion. But that, which deſerves to be particularly mentioned, was the royal city regiment of volunteer horſe, which being richly accoutred, and led by the earl of Monmouth, attended their majeſties from Whitehall into the city. The cavalcade being paſſed by, the king and queen were conducted by the two ſheriffs to Guildhall, where they and their retinue were entertained with a magnificent feaſt. His majeſty, to expreſs his ſatisfaction, conferred the honour of knighthood on Chriſtopher Lethulier, and John Houblon, the two ſheriffs, and on Edward Clarke and Francis Child, two of the aldermen. Five days before, the king having been pleaſed to permit the grocers of London to chuſe him ſovereign maſter of that company, the wardens, with ſome of the principal members, preſented to him a copy of their election, and inſtrument of his freedom of the ſaid company, in a golden box; for which his majeſty thanked them, and as a mark of his royal favour, made Ralph Box, their chief warden, a knight. Not many days after, an indignity was offered to the king's picture in the guild-hall of London, by cutting away the ſceptre and crown thereof; which occaſioned the lord-mayor and court of aldermen to promiſe a reward of five hundred pounds to any perſon, who ſhould diſcover the author of that inſolence.

The day appointed for the parliament to meet drawing near, at which time the king deſigned likewiſe to ſummon a convocation, he thought fit to fill up the vacant ſees of Worceſter, Chicheſter, [e] and Briſtol, which were beſtowed, the firſt on Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, dean of St. Paul's; the ſecond on Dr. Simon Patrick, dean of Peterborough; and the third on Dr. Gilbert Ironſide, warden of Wadham college in Oxford, who were conſecrated on the 13th of October at Fulham by the biſhops of London, St. Aſaph, and Rocheſter, commiſſioned for that purpoſe.

Now the time allowed by act of parliament for the clergy to take the oaths being expired, ſeveral of them refuſed to qualify themſelves, ſome of whom were ſuſpended ab officio, particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhops of Gloceſter, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough; and though the generality of the clergy took the oaths, it was (as has been obſerved) by the help of reſervations and diſtinctions, and not out of a perſuaſion that their allegiance was due to the king. Beſides he was ſuſpected by them, on account of the favour ſhewn to diſſenters, but chiefly for his aboliſhing epiſcopacy in Scotland, and his conſenting to the ſetting up preſbytery there. This gave ſome credit to the reports, that were with great induſtry infuſed into many of them, of the king's coldneſs at beſt, if not his averſion, to the church of England. The leading men in both univerſities, eſpecially Oxford, were poſſeſſed with this; and it began to have very ill effects over all England. Thoſe, who did not carry this ſo far as to think, as ſome ſaid they did, that the church was to be demoliſhed; yet ſaid, that a latitudinarian party was like to prevail, and to engroſs all preferments. Theſe were thought leſs bigoted to outward ceremonies; for which reaſon it was generally ſpread about, that men zealous for the church would be neglected, and thoſe, who were more indifferent in ſuch matters, would be preferred. Many of the latter had managed the controverſies with the church of Rome with ſo much clearneſs, and with that ſucceſs, that the papiſts, to revenge themſelves, and to blaſt thoſe, whom they conſidered as their moſt formidable enemies, had caſt aſperſions on them as Socinians, and as men, who denied all myſteries. And now ſome angry men at Oxford, who apprehended, that thoſe divines were likely to be moſt conſidered in his reign, took up the ſame method of calumny, and began to treat them as Socinians. The earl of Clarendon, and ſome of the biſhops, who had incurred the ſuſpenſion for not taking the oaths to the government, took much pains to ſpread theſe ſlanders. Beſides this, the proceedings in Scotland caſt a great load on the king, though it was certain he could not hinder the change of the government of that church, without putting all his affairs into great diſorder. For the epiſcopal party had gone almoſt univerſally into king James's intereſts; ſo that the preſbyterians were the only party, that the king had in that kingdom. He did indeed aſſure many perſons, that he would reſtrain and moderate the violence of the preſbyterians; and lord Melvill, the ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, promiſed the ſame thing very ſolemnly, and at firſt ſeemed much determined upon it. But when that lord ſaw ſo great a party formed againſt himſelf, and that many of the preſbyterians inclined to favour that party, and to ſet themſelves in an oppoſition to the court, he thought it was the king's intereſt, or at leaſt his own, to engage that party entirely, which he found no method ſo effectual to do, as by abandoning the miniſters of the epiſcopal perſuaſion to their fury. He ſet up therefore the earl of Crawford as the head of his party, who was paſſionate in his temper, and out of meaſure zealous in his principles, and was now choſen preſident of the parliament. He received and encouraged all the complaints, that were made of the epiſcopal miniſters. The convention, when they paſſed the votes, declaring the king and queen, had ordered a proclamation to be read the next Sunday in all the churches in Edinburgh, and in all the other churches in the kingdom by a certain prefixed day, but which was ſo near at hand, that it was ſcarce poſſible to lay proclamations all round the nation within that time; and it was abſolutely impoſſible for the clergy to meet together, and to come to any reſolution among themſelves. For the moſt part the proclamations were not brought to the miniſters till the morning of the Sunday, in which they were ordered to be read; ſo this having the face of a great change of principles, many could not on the ſudden reſolve to ſubmit to it. Some had not the proclamations brought to them till the day was paſt. Many of theſe read it the Sunday following. Some of thoſe, who did not think fit to read the proclamation, yet obeyed it, and continued after that to pray for the king and queen. Complaints were brought to the council of all thoſe who had not read or obeyed the proclamation; and they were in a ſummary way deprived of their benefices. In the executing this, the earl of Crawford ſhewed much eagerneſs and violence. Thoſe, who did not read the proclamation on the day appointed, had no favour, though they did it afterwards; and upon any word, that fell from them, either in their extemporary prayers, or ſermons, that ſhewed diſaffection to the government, they were alſo deprived. All theſe things were publiſhed throughout England, and much aggravated, and raiſed the averſion, that the friends of the church had to the preſbyterians ſo high, that they began to repent their having granted a toleration to a party, that, where they prevailed, ſhewed ſo much fury againſt thoſe of the epiſcopal perſuaſion. So that thoſe, who had labour-ed to excuſe the change, which the king was forced to conſent to, and had promiſed in his name great moderation towards their friends in Scotland, were much out of countenance, when they ſaw the violence, with which matters were carried there. Theſe things concurred to give the clergy ſuch ill impreſſions of the king, that there was little reaſon to look for ſucceſs in a deſign, which was then preparing for the convocation, for which a ſummons was iſſued out to meet, during the next ſeſſion of parliament.

Though the king had failed in his deſign of uniting his proteſtant ſubjects, by the admiſſion of thoſe that were willing and able to ſerve, into employments and benefices, yet ſo deſirous was he of this union, that he was reſolved to try to obtain by the convocation, what he had in vain endeavoured to eſtabliſh by the parliament. Accordingly, the project of a comprehenſion was ſet on foot, of which ſome foundation had been laid even before the revolution. In the preceding reign, the clergy, when under the influence of their fears of popery, had expreſſed an inclination to come to a temper with relation to the preſbyterians, and ſuch other diſſenters, as could be brought into a comprehenſion with the eſtabliſhed church. The biſhops had mentioned it in their petition to king James, for which they were tried; and Dr. Sancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, towards the end of that reign, foreſeeing ſome ſuch revolution, as ſoon after was brought about, began to conſider, how utterly unprepared they had been at the reſtoration of king Charles II, to ſettle many things to the advantage of the church, and what a happy opportunity had been loſt for want of ſuch a previous care, as he was therefore deſirous ſhould be now taken for the better and more perfect eſtabliſhment of it; and as it was viſible to all the nation, that the more moderate diſſenters were generally ſo well ſatisfied with that ſtand, which the church divines had made againſt popery, and the many unanſwerable treatiſes they had publiſhed in confutation of it, as to expreſs an unuſual readineſs to come into the church; it was thought worth the while, when they were d liberating about thoſe other matters, to conſider at the ſame time what might be done to gain the diſſenters, without doing any prejudice to the church. The ſcheme was laid out, and the ſeveral parts of it were committed, not only with the archbiſhop's approbation, but direction, to ſuch divines of the church, as were thought moſt proper to be intruſted with it. The archbiſhop took one part to himſelf; another was committed to Dr. Patrick, afterwards biſhop of Ely; and the reviewing of the daily ſervice and the communion book was referred to a ſelect number of divines, of whom Dr. Sharp, afterwards archbiſhop of York, and Dr. Patrick were two. The deſign was to improve and inforce the diſcipline of the church, to review and enlarge the liturgy, by correcting of ſome things, and adding of others; and, if it ſhould be thought adviſable by authority, when this matter ſhould come to be legally conſidered, firſt in convocation, and then in parliament, by leaving out ſome few ceremonies, confeſſed to be indifferent in their nature, as indifferent in their uſage, ſo as not neceſſarily to be obſerved by ſuch, as ſhould make a ſcruple of them. And this deſign was known to and approved by the other biſhops. King William therefore, who had promiſed the diſſenters not only in his declaration, but when they addreſſed him at his firſt coming, to endeavour an union between them and the church, reſolved to reſume the affair, and to promote it to the utmoſt of his power. As it was thought neceſſary to prepare and digeſt matters before they ſhould be offered to the convocation, a ſpecial commiſſion under the great-ſeal was given to ten biſhops and twenty divines, to draw up a ſcheme of the whole affair [f]. Great care was taken to name thoſe ſo impartially, that no exceptions could lie againſt them. The commiſſion was as follows:

"Whereas the particular forms of divine worſhip, and the rites and ceremonies appointed to be uſed therein, are things in their own nature indifferent and alterable, and ſo acknowledged; it is but reaſonable, that upon weighty and important conſiderations, according to the various exigencies of time and occaſions, ſuch changes and alterations ſhould be made therein, as to thoſe that are in place and authority, ſhould from time to time ſeem either neceſſary or expedient.

"And whereas the book of canons is fit to be reviewed, and made more ſuitable to the ſtate of the church; And whereas there are defects and abuſes in the eccleſiaſtical courts and juriſdictions, and particularly there is not ſufficient proviſion made for the removing of ſcandalous miniſters and reforming of manners either in miniſters or people; And whereas it is moſt fit, that there ſhould be a moſt ſtrict method preſcribed for the examination of ſuch perſons as deſire to be admitted into holy orders, both as to their learning and manners.

"We therefore, out of our pious and princely care for the good order, and edification, and unity of the church of England, committed to our charge and care; and for the reconciling, as much as is poſſible, of all differences among our good ſubjects, and to take away all occaſions of the like for the future, have thought fit to authorize and impower you, &c. and any nine of you, whereof three to be biſhops, to meet from time to time, as often as ſhall be needful, and to prepare ſuch alterations of the liturgy and canons, and ſuch propoſals for the reformation of eccleſiaſtical courts, and to conſider of ſuch other matters, as in your judgments may moſt conduce to the ends above-mentioned [g].

The commiſſioners ſate cloſely upon the affair for ſeveral weeks. They had before them all the exceptions, that either the puritans before the civil war, or the nonconformiſts ſince the reſtoration, had made to any part of the church-ſervice. They had alſo many propoſitions and advices that had been offered, at ſeveral times, by many biſhops and divines upon thoſe heads. Matters were well conſidered, and freely and calmly debated; and all was digeſted into an entire correction of every thing, that ſeemed liable to any juſt objection [h]. The point, which created the greateſt difficulty, was about the admitting of diſſenting miniſters to [f] This method was become neceſſary, ſince by the ſubmiſſion which the clergy in convocation made to Henry VIII, and which was confirmed in parliament, they bound themſelves not to attempt any new canons, without obtaining the king's leave firſt, and that under a premunire.

[g] The names of the commiſſioners were as follow:

Thomas Lamplugh, lord archbiſhop of York.
Henry Compton, lord biſhop of London.
Peter Mew, lord biſhop of Wincheſter.
William Lloyd, lord biſhop of St. Aſaph.
Thomas Sprat, lord biſhop of Rocheſter.
Thomas Smith, lord biſhop of Carliſle.
Jonathan Trelawney, lord biſhop of Exeter.
Gilbert Burnet, lord biſhop of Saliſbury.
Humfrey Humfreys, lord biſhop of Bangor.
Nicholas Stratford, lord biſhop of Cheſter.
Edward Stillingfleet, late dean of St. Paul's London, now biſhop of Worceſter.
Simon Patrick, late dean of Peterborough, now biſhop of Chicheſter.
John Tillotſon, D. D. late dean of Canterbury, now dean of St. Paul's London.
Richard Meggot, D. D. dean of Wincheſter.

Edward Fowler, D. D. prebendary of Gloceſter.
Robert Grove, D. D. prebendary of St. Paul's, London.
John Williams, D. D. prebendary of St. Paul's, London.

[h] Dr. Nichols gives the following account of the proceedings of the commiſſioners. "They began with reviewing the liturgy; and firſt they examined the calendar; in which, in the room of apocryphal leſſons, they ordered certain chapters of canonical ſcripture to be read, that were to the people's advantage. Athanaſius's creed being diſliked by many becauſe of the damnatory clauſe, it was left to the miniſters choice to uſe it, or change it for the apoſtle's creed. New collects were drawn up, more agreeable to the epiſtles and goſpels, for the whole courſe of the year; and theſe were compoſed with that elegance and propriety of expreſſion, and ſuch a flame of devotion, that nothing could more affect the hearts of the hearers, and elevate their minds towards God. They were firſt drawn up by Dr. Patrick, who was reckoned to have great ſkill in liturgical compoſures. Biſhop Burnet added to them yet farther force and ſpirit. Dr. Stillingfleet afterwards examined them with great judgment, carefully weighing every word in them; and Dr. Tillotſon had the laſt hand, giving them ſome free and maſterly ſtrokes of his eaſy and flowing eloquence. Dr. Kidder, who was well verſed in the oriental tongues, made a new verſion of the pſalms more agreeable to the original. Dr. Tenniſon made a collection of the words and expreſſions throughout the liturgy, which had been excepted to, and propoſed others in their room, that were clear and plain, and leſs liable to objection. Other things alſo were propoſed, that were left to be determined by the convocation: As, 1. That the croſs in baptiſm might be either uſed or omitted at the choice of the parents. 2. That a non-conformiſt miniſter going over to the church ſhould not be ordained according to the common form, but conditionally, much in the ſame manner as the baptizing of infants is ordered in the church, if there be not evidence of their being baptized before, with the addition of the epiſcopal benediction, as was cuſtomary in the antient church, when clerks were received, who had been ordained officiate in the church, when duly reconciled to it. Some of the commiſſioners were inclined not to inſiſt on the re-ordination of them, alledging, that they ought not to ſhew leſs regard to the vocation of preſbyterian miniſters, than to that of Roman catholic prieſts, whoſe ordination was never queſtioned upon their joining in communion with the church of England. But the majority thought it more proper to keep a middle courſe, which was, firſt with reſpect to Romiſh prieſts, to leave it undecided, whether their ordination was good or not. But becauſe they were not obliged to give credit to their certificates, that therefore ſuch of them, as for the future ſhould turn proteſtants, ſhould live in lay-communion only, unleſs they were re-ordained to a legal title of any church or cure. And, ſecondly, that though they did not determine the ordination of Preſbyterians to be altogether invalid, yet they thought it neceſſary for their miniſters to receive orders from a biſhop, who, in conferring the ſame, might add a clauſe to the common form, as the church had already ordained in the caſe of uncertain baptiſm, to this effect, 'If thou art not already ordained, I ordain thee, &c.' And this was the greateſt conceſſion that was made by the commiſſioners. Among thoſe commiſſioners were ſome very rigid men, the principal of whom was Dr. Jane[i]; but they either never came to their meetings, or ſoon withdrew from them, declaring themſelves diſſatisfied with the deſign, ſome owning plainly, that they were againſt all alterations whatſoever. They thought, too much was already done for the diſſenters in the toleration, which was granted them; but that they would do nothing to make that ſtill eaſier. They ſaid farther, that the altering the cuſtoms and conſtitution of the church, to gratify a peeviſh and obſtinate party, was like to have no other effect on them, but to make them more inſolent; as if the church, by offering theſe alterations, ſeemed to confeſs, that ſhe had been hitherto in the wrong. They thought, this attempt would divide the clergy among themſelves, and make their people loſe their eſteem for the liturgy, if it appeared, that it wanted correction. They alſo excepted to the manner of preparing matters by a ſpecial commiſſion, as limiting the convocation, and impoſing upon it. And to load this with a word of an ill ſound, they called this 'a new eccleſiaſtical commiſſion.' But in anſwer to all this it was ſaid, that if by a few corrections or explanations all juſt ſatisfaction was offered to the chief objections of the diſſenters, there was reaſon to hope, that this would bring over many of them, at leaſt of the people, if not of the teachers among them; or, if the prejudices of education wrought too ſtrongly upon the preſent age, yet, if ſome more ſenſible objections were put out of the way, it might juſtly be hoped, that this would have a great effect on the next generation. If theſe condeſcenſions were made ſo, as to own, in the way of offering them, that the nonconformiſts had been in the right, that might turn to the reproach of the church: but ſuch offers being made only in regard to their weakneſs, the reproach fell on them, as the honour accrued to the church, who ſhewed herſelf a true mother, by her care to preſerve her children. It was not offered, that the ordinary poſture of receiving the ſacrament kneeling ſhould be changed: that was ſtill to be the received and favoured poſture; only ſuch, as declared they could not overcome their ſcruples in that matter, were to be admitted to it in another poſture. Ritual matters were of their own nature indifferent, and had been always declared to be ſo: All the neceſſity of them aroſe only from the authority in church and ſtate, that had enacted them. It was therefore an unreaſonable ſtiffneſs to deny any abatement in ſuch matters, in order to the healing of the wounds of the church. Great alterations have been made in ſuch things in all ages of the church. Even the church of Rome was ſtill making ſome alterations in her rituals; and changes had been made in that of England often ſince the reformation in the reigns of king Edward VI, queen Elizabeth, king James I, and king Charles II. Theſe changes were always made upon ſome great turn; critical times being the moſt proper for deſigns of that kind. The toleration, now granted, ſeemed to render it more neceſſary than formerly, to make the terms of communion with the church as large as might be, that ſo it might draw over to it the greater number from thoſe, who might now leave it more ſafely; and therefore the greater care ought to be uſed in order to the gaining of them. And as for the manner of ordained by heretics. Dionyſ. Alex. apud Euſeb. hiſt. eccleſ. l. vii. cap. 2. Concil. Nic. I. canon. 8. Juſtin. ſive Anth. Reſponſ. ad orthod. Reſp. 18. Theod. hiſt. eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 8. of which way of ordaining, archbiſhop Bramhall had given a precedent, when he received ſome Scots preſbyters into the church." Nichols apparat. ad defenſ. eccleſ. Anglic. p. 95.

But the moſt complete account of this affair is publiſhed by Dr. Edmund Calamy, in his abridgment of Baxter's hiſtory of his own time. The committee (ſays he) being met in the Jeruſalem chamber, a diſpute aroſe about the authority and legality of the court; the biſhop of Rocheſter, though he had ſo lately acted in an illegal one, being one of thoſe that queſtioned it. The grounds of this ſcruple were the obligations the clergy lay under by act of parliament of king Henry VIII, not to enter into any debates about making any alterations in church affairs, without the king's ſpecial and immediate privacy, and direction firſt given concerning ſuch alterations. It was anſwered, that that muſt be done either by an act of the king's own judgment, or by a private cabal, (both which ways would be very exceptionable) or elſe by his majeſty's commiſſion to a certain number of eccleſiaſtics, to conſult about, and prepare what was neceſſary to be altered, as it was in the preſent caſe. For, moreover, the commiſſioners pretended not to make theſe alterations obligatory by virtue of a law, but only to get them ready to lay before the convocation; the very reports being not ſo much as to be referred to the privy council, leſt they might be ſubject to be canvaſſed and modelled by lay hands. However the biſhops of Wincheſter and Rocheſter, and Dr. Jane and Dr. Aldrich withdrew diſſatisfied; and the reſt, after a liſt of all that ſeemed fit to be changed, was read over, proceeded very unanimouſly, and without any heats, in determining, as follows, (each article, as ſoon as agreed on, being ſigned by the biſhop of London) viz.

That the chaunting of divine ſervice in cathedral churches ſhall be laid aſide, that the whole may be rendered intelligible to the common people.

That beſides the pſalms being read in their courſe as before, ſome proper and devout ones be ſelected for Sundays.

That the apocryphal leſſons, and thoſe of the old teſtament, which are too natural, be thrown out, and others appointed in their ſtead by a new calendar, which is already fully ſettled, and out of which are omitted all the legendary ſaints days, and others not directly referred to in the ſervice book.

That not to ſend the vulgar to ſearch the canons, which few of them ever ſaw, a rubric be made, ſetting forth the uſefulneſs of the croſs in baptiſm, not as an eſſential part of that ſacrament, but only a fit and decent ceremony. However, if any do, after all, in conſcience ſcruple it, it may be omitted by the prieſt.

That likewiſe if any refuſe to receive the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper kneeling, it may be adminiſtered to them in their pews.

That a rubric be made, declaring the intention of the lent-faſts, to conſiſt only in extraordinary acts of devotion, not in diſtinction of meats; and another to ſtate the meaning of Rogation Sundays and Ember weeks; and appoint, that thoſe ordained within the 'quatuor tempora' do exerciſe ſtrict devotion.

That the rubric, which obliges miniſters to read or hear common prayer, publicly or privately every day, be changed to an exhortation to the people to frequent thoſe prayers.

That the abſolution in morning and evening prayer may be read by a deacon, the word 'prieſt' in the rubric being changed into 'miniſter,' and thoſe words, 'and remiſſion,' be put out as not very intelligible.

That the 'gloria patri' ſhall not be repeated at the end of every pſalm, but of all appointed for morning and evening prayer.

That thoſe words in the te deum, 'thine honourable, true, and only ſon,' be thus turned, 'thine only begotten ſon,' honourable being only a civil term, and no where uſed in ſacris.

The benedicite ſhall be changed into the 128th pſalm; and other pſalms likewiſe appointed for the benedictus and nunc dimittis.

The verſicles after the lord's prayer, &c. ſhall be read kneeling, to avoid the trouble and inconveniences of ſo often varying poſtures in the worſhip. And after theſe words, 'give peace in our time, O Lord,' ſhall follow an anſwer promiſſory of ſomewhat on the people's part, of keeping God's laws, or the like; the old reſponſe being grounded on the predeſtinating doctrine, taken in too ſtrict an acceptation.

All high titles or appellations of the king, queen, &c. ſhall be left out of the prayers, ſuch as 'moſt illuſtrious, religious, mighty, &c. and only the word 'ſovereign' retained for the king and queen.

Thoſe words in the prayer for the king, 'grant that he may vanquiſh and overcome all his enemies,' as of too large extent, if the king engage in an unjuſt war, ſhall be turned thus; 'proſper all his righteous undertakings againſt thy enemies,' or after ſome ſuch manner.

Thoſe words in the prayer for the clergy, 'who alone workeſt great marvels,' as ſubject to be ill interpreted by perſons vainly diſpoſed, ſhall be thus, 'who alone art the author of all good gifts;' and thoſe words, 'the healthful ſpirit of thy grace,' ſhall be, 'the holy ſpirit of thy grace,' healthful being an obſolete word.

The prayer, which begins, 'O God, whoſe nature and property,' ſhall be thrown out, as full of ſtrange and impertinent expreſſions, and beſides not in the original, but foiſted in ſince by another hand.

The collects for the moſt part are to be changed for thoſe the biſhop of Chicheſter has prepared, being a review of the old ones with enlargements, to render them more ſenſible and affecting; and what particular expreſſions are needful to be retrenched.

If any miniſter refuſe the ſurplice, the biſhop, if the people deſire it, and the living will bear it, may ſubſtitute one in his place, that will officiate in it; but the whole thing is left to the diſcretion of the biſhops.

If any deſire to have godfathers and godmothers omitted, and their children preſented in their own names to baptiſm, it may be granted,

About the Athanaſian creed, they came at laſt to this concluſion, that leſt the wholly rejecting it ſhould by unreaſonable perſons be imputed to them as Socinianiſm, a rubric ſhould be made, ſetting forth or declaring the curſes denounced therein, not to be reſtrained to every particular article, but intended againſt thoſe, that deny the ſubſtance of the chriſtian religion in general.

Whether the amendment of the 'tranſlation of the reading pſalms' (as they are called) made by the biſhop of St. Aſaph and Dr. Kidder, or that in the bible, ſhall be inſerted in the prayer-book, is wholly left to the convocation to conſider of and determine.

In the litany, and communion ſervice, &c. were likewiſe ſome alterations made, as alſo in the canons.

[i] The reſt of the rigid ones were, Mew, Sprat, Aldrich, Beaumont, Montague, Goodman, Beveridge, and Alſton. Moſt of theſe were ſo far from thinking of a comprehenſion, that they would hardly own the reformed abroad to be true churches, much leſs the diſſenters at home.

preparing

preparing theſe overtures, the king's ſupremacy ſignified little, if he could not appoint a ſelect number to conſider of ſuch matters, as he might think fit to lay before the convocation. This did no way break in upon their full freedom of debate, it being free to them to reject, as well as to accept, of the propoſitions to be offered to them. But while they were arguing this matter on both ſides, the party, that was now at work for king James, took hold of this occaſion to inflame men's minds. It was ſaid, the church was to be pulled down, and preſbytery was to be ſet up: that all this now in debate was only intended to divide and diſtract the church, and to render it by that means both weaker and more ridiculous, while it went off from its former grounds, in offering ſuch conceſſions. The univerſities took fire upon this, and began to declare againſt it, and againſt all who promoted it, as men, who intended to undermine the church. Severe reflections were caſt on the king, as being in a contrary intereſt to the church; for the church was as the word given out by the jacobite party, under which they thought they might more ſafely ſhelter themſelves. There were great canvaſſings every were in the elections of convocation-men; a thing not known in former times; ſo that it was ſoon very viſible, that the clergy were not in a temper cool or calm enough to encourage the further proſecution of ſuch a deſign.

When the convocation met, the lower houſe immediately diſcovered their diſpoſition, by their choice of a prolocutor. The perſon deſigned by the biſhop of London and moſt of his brethren, and the moderate part of the clergy, was Dr. Tillotſon, dean of Canterbury, whom the king had lately made clerk of his cloſet, and uſed to call 'the honeſteſt man, and the beſt friend, that ever he had in his life.' But it was carried by a great majority of votes for Dr. Jane of Oxford, a profeſſed enemy of the diſſenters, who being preſented to the biſhop of London as preſident for his approbation, made a cuſtomary ſpeech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the liturgy of the church of England as eſtabliſhed by law, above that of all chriſtian communities, and intimated, that it wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this ſentence by way of triumph, 'nolumus leges Angliæ mutari.' The biſhop of London, to whom the prolocutor had been chaplain, made a ſpeech in the ſame language with great moderation and candour. He told the clergy, "that they ought to endeavour a temper in thoſe things, that are not eſſential to religion, thereby to open the door of ſalvation to a multitude of ſtraying chriſtians: That it muſt needs be their duty to ſhew the ſame indulgence and charity to the diſſenters under king William, which ſome of the biſhops and clergy had promiſed to them in their addreſſes to king James." And he concluded with a pathetic exhortation to unanimity and concord. Many of the members being abſent, the convocation adjourned to the next day, without debating any thing of moment.

At the next meeting, the biſhop of London being ſenſible, that the majority of the lower houſe were reſolved to oppoſe the intended union with the diſſenters, acquainted the convocation, "That having communicated the royal commiſſion, by which they were empowered to act, to an eminent civilian, he had found it defective in not having the great ſeal; and therefore he ſhould prorogue them till that was procured." During this interval, many arguments were uſed to bring the moſt rigid of the inferior clergy to a charitable condeſcenſion, and the deſired union; but to very little purpoſe. There was a jealouſy and a diſtruſt not to be conquered; though there could be but two arguments of any force to juſtify their averſeneſs to enter upon the terms of accommodation. One was, that it ſeemed to derogate from the dignity of the church of England, to make any ſtep towards the altering of her conſtitution, till it did appear, that the diſſenters themſelves did deſire a reconcilement, and were ready to offer ſome propoſals, or to accept of others. A ſecond argument might be, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſome of his ſuffragans, and ſome other divines, would not own the preſent government, and were therefore ready to fall into a new ſeparation from their brethren; ſo that at this juncture it might be dangerous to make any change, that might give a pretence of being for the old church, as well as the old king.

On the 4th of December, while both houſes of convocation were ſitting together in Henry VII's chapel, the earl of Nottingham brought in the king's commiſſion, which was read to the aſſembly, there being preſent twelve biſhops and a good number of the inferior clergy. This done, the king's meſſage was alſo read:

"WILLIAM R.

"HIS majeſty has ſummoned this convocation, not only becauſe it is uſual upon holding a parliament, but out of a pious zeal to do every thing, that may tend to the beſt eſtabliſhment of the church of England, which is ſo eminent a part of the reformation, and is certainly the beſt ſuited to the conſtitution of this government; and therefore does moſt ſignally deſerve, and ſhall always have both his favour and protection. And he doubts not but you will aſſiſt him in promoting the welfare of it, ſo that no prejudices, with which ſome men may have laboured to poſſeſs you, ſhall diſappoint his good intentions, or deprive the church of any benefit from your conſultations. His majeſty therefore expects, that the things, that ſhall be propoſed, ſhall be calmly and impartially conſidered by you; and aſſures you, that he will offer nothing to you, but what ſhall be for the honour, peace, and advantage both of the proteſtant religion in general, and particularly of the church of England."

At the ſame time the earl of Nottingham made a ſpeech to the aſſembly, exhorting them to lay aſide all partial prepoſſeſſions and animoſities in their proceedings.

The meſſage being read, the biſhops went to the Jeruſalem chamber, from whence they ſent a copy of it to the lower houſe, and alſo the following form of an addreſs to the king, to which they deſired their concurrence.

"WE the biſhops, &c. in convocation aſſembled, having received your majeſty's gracious meſſage, together with a commiſſion from your majeſty, by the earl of Nottingham, hold ourſelves bound in gratitude and duty, to return our moſt humble thanks and acknowledgments of the grace and goodneſs expreſſed in your majeſty's meſſage, and the zeal you ſhew in it for the proteſtant religion in general, and the church of England in particular; and of the truſt and confidence repoſed in us by this commiſſion. We look on theſe marks of your majeſty's care and favour as the continuance of the great deliverance Almighty God wrought for us by your means, in making you the bleſſed inſtrument of preſerving us from falling under the cruelty of popiſh tyranny; for which as we have often thanked Almighty God, ſo we cannot forget that high obligation and duty, which we owe to your majeſty; and on theſe new aſſurances of your protection and favour to our church, we beg leave to renew the aſſurance of our conſtant fidelity and obedience to your majeſty, whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

The lower houſe, which ſeemed reſolved to do nothing, would not conſent to this addreſs; but firſt pleaded for the privilege of preſenting a ſeparate addreſs of their own drawing up; and then dropping that pretenſion, they fell to making amendments, and gave a reaſon why they could not concur with the biſhops in their form, in theſe words: 'We are deſirous to confine our addreſs to his majeſty's moſt gracious meſſage, and to thoſe things only therein, which concern the church of England.' Hereupon a conference was deſired, which was managed chiefly between the biſhop of Saliſbury and the prolocutor; and theſe reaſons were reported, why their lordſhips inſiſted on the expreſs mention of the proteſtant religion; "1. Becauſe it is the known denomination of the common doctrine of the weſtern part of chriſtendom, in oppoſition to the errors and corruptions of the church of Rome. 2. Becauſe the leaving out this may have ill conſequences, and be liable to ſtrange conſtructions both at home and abroad, among proteſtants as well as papiſts. 3. Becauſe it agrees with the general reaſon offered by the clergy for their amendment, ſince this is expreſsly mentioned in the king's meſſage; and in this the church of England being ſo much concerned, the biſhops think it ought to ſtand in the addreſs." The lower-houſe debated theſe reaſons, and diſagreed to them, and then reſolved, "That inſtead of the 'proteſtant religion,' they would rather ſay, 'proteſtant churches.'" Their lordſhips deſired a reaſon of this alteration: which was returned in theſe words: "We being the repreſentatives of a formed eſtabliſhed church, do not think fit to mention the word 'religion' any farther than it is the religion of ſome formed eſtabliſhed church." The lords returned the amendments with this alteration: "The intereſt of the proteſtant religion in this and all other proteſtant churches." The lower houſe thinking it a diminution to the church of England to join it with foreign proteſtant churches, would have the words 'this and' to be omitted; and at laſt, with great difficulty, the following addreſs was agreed on, and preſented to the king on Thurſday, Decemb. 12.

"WE, your majeſty's moſt loyal and moſt dutiful ſubjects, the biſhops and clergy of the province of Canterbury, in convocation aſſembled, having received a moſt gracious meſſage from your majeſty by the earl of Nottingham, hold ourſelves bound in duty and gratitude, to return our moſt humble acknowledgments for the ſame; and for the pious zeal and care your majeſty is pleaſed to expreſs therein, for the honour, peace, advantage, and eſtabliſhment of the church of England: Whereby, we doubt not, the intereſt of the proteſtant religion in all other proteſtant churches, which is dear to us, will be the better ſecured under the influence of your majeſty's government and protection. And we crave leave to aſſure your majeſty, that in purſuance of that truſt and confidence you repoſe in us, we will conſider whatſoever ſhall be offered to us from your majeſty, without prejudice, and with all calmneſs and impartiality; and that we will conſtantly pay the fidelity and allegiance, which we have all ſworn to your majeſty and the queen; whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

The king well underſtood, why this addreſs omitted the thanks, which the biſhops had returned for his royal commiſſion, and the zeal, which he had ſhewn for the proteſtant religion; and why there was no expreſſion of tenderneſs to the diſſenters, and but a cool regard to other proteſtant churches. However, he returned this gracious anſwer, addreſſed to the biſhops:

"My lords,

"I take this addreſs very kindly from the convocation. You may depend upon it, that all I have promiſed, and all I can do for the ſervice of the church of England, I will do; and I will give you this new aſſurance, that I will improve all occaſions and opportunities for its ſervice."

By all their proceedings hitherto, the lower houſe of convocation had ſhewn an utter diſlike to the buſineſs for which they were chiefly aſſembled, and by what followed, their averſion to the union ſo earneſtly deſired by the king, was no leſs manifeſt. For inſtead of taking any meaſures for a comprehenſion in favour of the moderate diſſenters, they turned their thoughts to their non-juring brethren, and a zealous ſpeech was made in behalf of the biſhops under ſuſpenſion, "That ſomething might be done to qualify them to ſit in convocation; yet ſo, as that the convocation might not incur any danger thereby." But this being a point of great difficulty, it was left to farther conſideration; whilſt they laboured to find out ſome other buſineſs to divert them from that, for which they were called together. To that end the prolocutor attended the preſident and biſhops, and in the name of the houſe repreſented to their lordſhips, "That there were ſeveral books of very dangerous conſequence to the Chriſtian religion and the church of England; particularly Notes upon Athanaſius's Creed, and two letters relating to the preſent convocation, lately come abroad; and deſired their lordſhips advice, in what way, and how far, ſafely, and without incurring the penalty of Stat. 25. Hen. VIII. the convocation may proceed, in the preventing the publiſhing the like ſcandalous books for the future, and inflicting the cenſure of the church, according to the canons provided in that behalf, upon the authors of them." Upon which the prolocutor ſoon after acquainted the houſe "That the preſident had declared his ſenſe of the ill conſequence of thoſe books, that were ſent up from this houſe to their lordſhips; and that, upon inquiry, he could not receive any ſatisfaction, how far the convocation might proceed in that affair; but he would, as far as lay in him, take farther order about it."

When the Preſident and his brethren ſaw the diſpoſition of the lower houſe, they found it was to no purpoſe to communicate any propoſals to them; and therefore the king was adviſed to ſuffer the ſeſſion to be diſcontinued. And thus as the convocation was not diſpoſed to enter upon buſineſs, they were kpet from doing miſchief by prorogations, for a courſe of ten years. This was in reality a favour to them; for, ever ſince the year 1662, the convocation had indeed continued to ſit, but to do no buſineſs: ſo that they were kept at no ſmall expence in town, to do nothing, but only to meet and read a Latin Litany. It was therefore an eaſe to be freed from ſuch an attendance to no purpoſe.

The ill reception which the lower houſe had given the king's meſſage, raiſed a great clamour againſt them, ſince all the promiſes made in king James's reign, were now entirely forgot. But however, their proceedings were a great diſappointment to the non-juring clergy who were under ſuſpenſion. They were it ſeems deſigning to make a ſchiſm in the church, whenever they ſhould be turned out, and their places filled up by others. They ſaw, it would not be eaſy to make a ſeparation upon a private and perſonal account, and therefore wiſhed to be furniſhed with more ſpecious pretences. And if alterations had been made in the rubric, and other parts of the common-prayer, they would have pretended that they ſtill adhered to the ancient church of England, in oppoſition to thoſe who were altering it, and ſetting up new models [k]. Thus was loſt a fair opportunity not only of reviſing the liturgy, rubrics and canons, but alſo of reconciling the moderate diſſenters to the church, who with the reſt have been forced to be contented with the act of toleration, under the excluſion from all offices and employments, by means of a teſt which was primarily intended to keep out the Roman catholics, and to which the diſſenters made no oppoſition, in hopes of being relieved from it [l].

The parliament, purſuant to the late adjournment, met the 19th of October, when the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"THOUGH the laſt ſitting continued ſo long, that perhaps it might have been more agreeable to you, in relation to your private concerns, not to have met again ſo ſoon; yet the intereſt of the public lays an indiſpenſable obligation upon me to call you together at this time.

"In your laſt meeting you gave me ſo many teſtimonies of your affection as well as confidence in me, that I do not at all queſtion, but in this I ſhall receive freſh proofs of both.

"I eſteem it one of the greateſt misfortunes can befal me, that in the beginning of my reign, I am forced to aſk ſuch large ſupplies; though I have this ſatisfaction, that they are deſired for no other purpoſes, than the carrying on theſe wars, in which I entered with your advice, and aſſurance of your aſſiſtance. Nor can I doubt of the bleſſing of God upon an undertaking, wherein I did not engage out of a vain ambition, but from the neceſſity of oppoſing the deſigns of deſtroying our religion and liberties.

"It is well known, how far I have expoſed myſelf to reſcue this nation from the dangers that threatened, not only your liberty, but the proteſtant religion in general, of which the church of England is one of the greateſt ſupports, and for the defence whereof I am ready again to venture life.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"That which I have to aſk of you at preſent is, that what you think fit to give towards the charges of the war for the next year, may be done without delay. And there is one reaſon, which more particularly obliges me to preſs you to a ſpeedy determination in this matter, becauſe the next month there is appointed at the Hague, a general meeting of all the princes and ſtates concerned in this war againſt France, in order to concert the meaſures, for the next cam-

[k] Biſhop Burnet called this 'a happy direction of providence.' Strange, that one who thought a reformation in the rubric, canons, and courts was much wanted, ſhould believe the particular interpoſition of heaven to prevent it on account of an ill uſe that might have been made of it by a few non-juring clergy; whereas the reformation intended would have been of infinite advantage to the church, as it would have removed all the exceptionable parts of her worſhip and diſcipline, and thereby enlarged the bounds of communion. But thus it is, that ſome of our wiſeſt writers and ſpeakers uſe the words, providence, judgments, and mercies.

[l] When the teſt (IV. 1672), againſt the catholics was debating, the court, in hopes of diverting the bill, had it propoſed, that ſome regard ſhould be had to proteſtant diſſenters. Love, member for London, and a diſſenter, ſeeing into this artifice, moved, that an effectual ſecurity might be found againſt popery, and that nothing might interpoſe till that was done; that then the diſſenters would try to deſerve ſome favour, but at preſent were willing to lie under the ſeverity of the law, rather than clog a more neceſſary work with their concerns. To this the friends of the diſſenters agreed, and the teſt was paſſed. Though it was voted that a bill ſhould be brought in, to give eaſe to the diſſenters, no act ever paſſed in their favour, nor has the teſt been removed to this day.

The

paign; and till I know your intentions, I ſhall not only be uncertain myſelf what reſolutions to take, but our allies will be under the ſame doubts, unleſs they ſee me ſupported by your aſſiſtance. Beſides, if I know not in time what you will do, I cannot make ſuch proviſions as will be requiſite, but ſhall be expoſed to the ſame inconveniences the next year, which were the cauſe, that the preparations for this were neither ſo effectual or expeditious as was neceſſary. The charge will be alſo conſiderably leſſened by giving time to provide things in their proper ſeaſon, and without confuſion.

"I have no other aim in this but to be in a condition to attack our enemies in ſo vigorous a manner, as by the help of God may, in a little time, bring us to a laſting and honourable peace; by which my ſubjects may be freed from the extraordinary expence of a lingering war. And that I can have no greater ſatisfaction than in contributing to their eaſe, I hope I have already given proof. That you may be ſatisfied, how the money has been laid out, which you have already given, I have directed the accounts to be laid before you, whenever you ſhall think fit to call for them.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have one thing more to recommend to you, which is the diſpatch of 'a bill of indemnity,' that the minds of my good ſubjects being quieted, we may all unanimouſly concur to promote the welfare and honour of the kingdom."

It is remarkable, that this ſpeech which met with univerſal applauſe, was compoſed by the king himſelf,---who the day before produced it to the council, written with his own hand, telling them, 'He knew moſt of his predeceſſors were uſed to commit the drawing up of ſuch ſpeeches to their miniſters, who generally had their private aims and intereſts in view; to prevent which he thought fit to write it himſelf in French, becauſe he was not ſo great a maſter of the Engliſh tongue. He deſired them therefore to look it over, and change what they found amiſs, that it might be tranſlated into Engliſh [m].'

At the ſame council the marquis of Hallifax deſired for ſeveral reaſons, which he forbore to mention, to be excuſed from the office of ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, which was readily granted him, and a commiſſion was given to ſir Robert Atkyns, chief baron of the exchequer, to ſupply his place.

The buſineſs of Oates, and ſome other matters, which had raiſed ſuch heats between the two houſes, being only ſuperſeded by the repeated adjournment of parliament, it was moved in council to put a final end to them by a prorogation. But the king thought fit to do nothing in an affair of ſuch a nature, without the advice of both houſes. The lords readily conſented to it; and as for the commons, tho' ſome of their members pretended, that ſuch a prorogation was irregular, after the king had made a ſpeech, wherein he had propoſed new matters to their conſideration, yet the contrary opinion carried it by a great majority; ſo that the king being come to the houſe of lords on Monday the 21ſt of October, ſir Robert Atkyns the new ſpeaker, acquainted both houſes, that it was his majeſty's pleaſure, that the parliament ſhould be prorogued, to the Wedneſday following. Before this prorogation, Dr. Crew biſhop of Durham, contrary to the expectation of moſt people, took the oaths, and ſubſcribed the declaration appointed by law. He had been one of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners, and upon king James's abdication, had abſconded himſelf for ſome time. He had endeavoured to get beyond ſea, and offered to compound by reſigning his biſhopric, but at laſt he was prevailed on to merit a pardon for what he had done by ſubmitting to the government.

The parliament being met on the 23d of October, the king declared to them from the throne, "That having ſpoke ſo lately to them, he need not ſay any thing now, matters not having been altered ſince that time; and therefore referred to what he had ſaid laſt to both houſes, and deſired, that ſpeedy reſolutions might be taken." Whereupon the commons unanimouſly reſolved, "that they would ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty in reducing Ireland, and joining with his allies abroad in a vigorous proſecution of a war againſt France."

Accordingly, when the king at their requeſt had laid before them the neceſſary charges of the next year's ſervice, with the accounts of the laſt ſummer's expences, they unanimouſly voted a ſupply of two millions for thoſe purpoſes [n].

The parliament this ſeſſion was chiefly employed about the ſtate-priſoners, the inſtruments of the illegal proceedings in the late reigns, and the miſcarriages in Iriſh and other affairs.

As to the ſtate-priſoners, the act for detaining ſuſpected perſons in priſon being expired, and ſeveral of thoſe perſons having petitioned the houſe to be tried at the king's bench, a committee was appointed to inquire into the informations which had been given againſt them, and the miſdemeanors of Burton and Graham, the great oppreſſors in the late reign, were again reported to the houſe. The caſe likewiſe of baron Jenner was reported, who was charged with declaring for the diſpenſing power, and acting in the affair of Magdalen college. Theſe three were ordered to be brought before the houſe to be examined, but Jenner having been bailed and releaſed, before the warrant was ſerved, the ſerjeant at arms was ordered to take him into cuſtody, and likewiſe Burton and Graham, who were brought before the houſe, and not giving ſatisfaction, a committee was appointed to prepare a charge againſt them. At the ſame time were releaſed upon bail, the lords Preſton [o], Forbes and ſir John Fenwick. But the commons reſolved to impeach the earls of Peterborough, Saliſbury, and Caſtlemain, ſir Edward Hales and Obadiah Walker, of high-treaſon, for being reconciled to the church of Rome contrary to law, and other crimes. A bill was alſo ordered to be brought in to declare the late lord chancellor Jefferies's eſtate forfeited to the crown, and to attaint his blood. But this bill met with ſo much oppoſition that no progreſs was made in it. However, for a terror to all the late inſtruments of popery, and arbitrary power, the houſe agreed, "that the pecuniary penalties incurred by all privy councillors, lord lieutenants, deputy lieutenants, and militia officers, juſtices of the peace, and by any other perſons, who had accepted or exerciſed any office or place of profit, either military or civil, (other than ſuch as are now officers, in their majeſties army or fleet) contrary to the law againſt popiſh recuſants, ſhould 'be ſpeedily levied, and applied to the public ſervice.'

The lord Griffin, who was made a peer about a fortnight before king James's abdication, having been often required by letters and otherwiſe to attend the houſe of lords, and ſtill refuſing to appear, their lordſhips deſired the king by an addreſs to ſummon him by proclamation to ſurrender himſelf, at ſuch a day as his majeſty ſhould appoint to their houſe, if then actually ſitting, or to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate. His lordſhip being accordingly ſummoned, ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Nottingham, and having made his appearance before the houſe of lords, the ſpeaker told him, that he

[m] The ſpeech was approved by all the board except the earl of Monmouth, who objected againſt the expreſſion, 'L' Egliſe Anglicane étoit le principal appui de la religion proteſtante;' i. e. 'The church of England is the chief ſupport of the proteſtant religion.' So it was altered to, 'The church of England is one of the greateſt ſupports of the proteſtant religion.' Sir Thomas Clarges, a member of the houſe of commons, found fault that his majeſty had not ſaid, 'The church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.'

[n] The funds for raiſing this ſupply were a land-tax of two ſhillings, and another of one ſhilling in the pound, in which the Quakers are excuſed from double taxes, additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate, after the following rates:

Upon every hundred weight of coffee —	5	12	0
Upon every hundred weight of cocoa-nut —	8	8	0
Upon every pound of tea — — —	0	5	0

This is the ſame bill that had been dropped the laſt ſeſſion, upon a diſpute whether the peers can alter a money bill or tax. It was now paſſed with the alteration propoſed by the lords of a drawback upon exportation. An additional poll-tax was alſo paſſed, by which twenty ſhillings a head was laid upon every ſhop-keeper, tradeſman, and artificer, worth three hundred pounds perſonal eſtate. This bill had alſo been dropped the laſt ſeſſion, upon a debate, whether the lords ſhould appoint commiſſioners of their own to tax themſelves. A tax of 100,000l. was moved (by ſir Edward Seymour, it is ſaid) to be laid on the Jews; but the motion came to nothing.

[o] The lord Preſton preſenting to the houſe of lords a patent from king James, dated from Verſailles the 21ſt of January 1688-9, by which he was created a baron of England, their lordſhips voted him guilty of high-treaſon. However, they thought fit to refer the examination of that matter to the judges their aſſiſtants. The lord Preſton pretended, that the patent being dated one day before the meeting of the convention, which had voted the throne vacant, it ought to be valid. To which it was anſwered, that the vacancy was ſuppoſed to begin from the moment king James left the kingdom, whereby he abdicated the government. The next day the judges brought in the lord Preſton guilty of a high miſdemeanor, for which he was committed to the Tower. Not long after he acknowledged and begged pardon for his fault by a petition to the lords, which was rejected upon his ſubſcribing himſelf viſcount Preſton, without expreſſing of what kingdom. The next day he preſented another, wherein he ſtiled himſelf viſcount of Scotland; and it being likewiſe alledged in his behalf, that by accepting a patent from king James, he never meant an affront to king William, but only to ſecure his own perſon from impriſonment, (being at that time proſecuted at law by the lord Montagu for a conſiderable ſum of money) he was releaſed from his confinement.

This

knew what he had to do before his ſitting in that houſe; whereupon his lordſhip deſired time to conſider of taking the oaths, he not being prepared for it; which was readily granted.

The ſame day the parliament was prorogued, a packet was intercepted, which plainly diſcovered how little the lord Griffin was inclined to own the preſent government. The diſcovery happened in the following manner. His lordſhip having cauſed a large pewter bottle to be made with a double bottom, ordered his cook to go to a pewterer's at an unſeaſonable hour of the night, to get the falſe bottom ſoldered. The pewterer finding a packet between the two bottoms of the bottle, began to ſuſpect ſomething; and the cook not giving him a ſatisfactory anſwer about the contents, he made bold to open it. The ſuperſcription of ſeveral letters directed to king James, the duke of Berwick, &c. juſtified the pewterer's ſuſpicion, who immediately ſeized the lord Griffin's cook, and carried him to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, but he being gone to bed, and his ſervants refuſing to admit the pewterer to his maſter's preſence, the lord Griffin, who by this time began to apprehend what had befallen his meſſenger, took this opportunity to make his eſcape. Beſides the letters, there was found an account of ſome private reſolutions of the council, and an exact liſt of all the land and ſea forces of England. Whereupon the lord Griffin's houſe and papers were ſearched, his lady committed to the Tower, ſeveral ſuſpected perſons arreſted, and the Cuſtom-houſe officers ordered to ſtop all unknown perſons, who offered to croſs the ſeas without paſſes. The lord Griffin having abſconded himſelf ſome few days, and finding it difficult to go out of the kingdom, ſurrendered himſelf to the earl of Shrewſbury, ſecretary of ſtate, who having examined him, committed him to the cuſtody of a meſſenger, from whence he was ſent to the tower. The commons upon this appointed a committee to inquire how the lord Griffin came to know a reſolution, which the king had communicated to four perſons only; and the lords addreſſed his majeſty to let him underſtand, that the ſaid lord being one of their members, they were conſequently his proper judges. The king having left the cognizance of this affair to the peers, they began to examine the papers intercepted in the pewter bottle, which were the only evidence againſt the lord Griffin. And becauſe, ſome few days before, it had been reſolved in that houſe, that colonel Algernon Sidney was unjuſtly condemned, nothing but writings found in his cloſet having been produced againſt him, the earl of Rocheſter argued, from a parity of reaſon in favour of lord Griffin, who, after ſeveral warm debates, was ſet at liberty upon bail.

As to the inſtruments of the illegal proceedings of the late reigns, the lords as well as the commons, appointed a committee to examine who were the adviſers and proſecutors of the murders of the lord Ruſſel, colonel Sidney, ſir Thomas Armſtrong, alderman Corniſh and others, and who had the chief hand in the quo warrantos and delivering up of charters. This committee was appointed, at the motion of the duke of Bolton, and it was deſired by the lords, that Mr. John Hampden and Mr. John Trenchard, members of the houſe of commons, might attend the committee, to inform them what they knew of theſe matters. Theſe two gentlemen had been accuſed, for being concerned with the duke of Monmouth and the lord Ruſſel in the plot of 1683. Trenchard had been charged with undertaking to raiſe a body of men at Taunton, but he had denied every thing. And it was then well known, his greateſt crime was the being the firſt man, that had moved the excluſion in the houſe of commons. Mr. Hampden was let into all the duke of Monmouth's ſecrets, and knew the whole affair. Upon lord Howard's evidence, he was brought in guilty of a miſdemeanor, and fined 40,000l. the moſt extravagant fine, that had ever been ſet for a miſdemeanor, and which amounted to an impriſonment for life. He was afterwards concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, and upon pleading guilty and begging his life, was pardoned.

He is ſaid to have been ſo aſhamed of this, that it gave his ſpirits ſuch a diſorder, he could never maſter, and which had a terrible concluſion, for about ten years after he cut his own throat. He was grandſon of him that pleaded the cauſe of England, in the point of ſhip-money; his father was an eminent man, and zealous in the excluſion. He himſelf was a man of great parts, and a critic in Latin, Greek and Hebrew, of great heat and vivacity, but too unequal in his temper.

Mr. Hampden appeared before the committee, and, as it is ſaid, made a long ſpeech, tending rather to extol his own ſervices, than to diſcover the authors of lord Ruſſel's death[p]. However this be, though this inquiry laſted ſome weeks, and gave occaſion to much heat, nothing could be proved, upon which votes or addreſſes could have been grounded: yet the lord Hallifax, having concurred with the miniſtry and council in the ſeverities and executions in the end of king Charles's reign, and in the quo warrantos, and ſurrendering the charters, ſaw it was neceſſary for him to withdraw now, and quit the court. And ſoon after he reconciled himſelf to the tories, and upon all occaſions protected the whole party. The privy-ſeal was put in commiſſion after the lord Hallifax had reſigned, and given to William Cheney, ſir John Knatchbull, and ſir William Pultney.

As to the miſcarriages in the Iriſh affairs, which had been a continual ſubject of complaint, the commons being informed that the duke Schomberg's army was ſcarce fourteen thouſand ſtrong, though there were twenty-three thouſand upon the eſtabliſhment, they deſired the king to appoint commiſſioners to go over and inquire into the condition of the army in Ireland. Though the king aſſured the houſe that he would comply with their addreſs, yet ſome members moved, that the commons ſhould ſend commiſſioners of their own nomination, both to look into the expence, and to prevent falſe muſters; which ſeemed to be an encroachment on the royal prerogative. Others ſaid, that duke Schomberg would have done well to have come himſelf in perſon, to acquaint the houſe with the cauſes of the weakneſs of his army, in order to ſecure his own reputation. And others went farther, reflecting on that general for not fighting king James's forces. Though the duke wanted no apology among thoſe, who knew his capacity, yet being informed, that his conduct was called in queſtion, even in the parliament itſelf, he acquainted the king with the reaſons, that had obliged him not to ſtir from his camp upon the approach of king James; alledging, that his army had never exceeded twelve thouſand effective men, moſt of them newly raiſed, and little better than thoſe of the late king, who had double that number: That he had waited for artillery, horſes and carriages above a month: That the army had all along wanted bread; the horſes, ſhoes and provender; and the ſurgeons and apothecaries, proper medicines for the ſick. This account was confirmed by Mr. Lumley, brother to the lord Lumley, and by count Solmes, who at this time arrived from Ireland, and reported further, that the army was can-

[p] This matter is thus related by Kennet after Boyer. It is certain, (ſay they) that Mr. Hampden was able to give the lords a great light into that affair, having been involved in the like danger himſelf, and out of which he diſengaged himſelf not without difficulty. But this inquiry was not ſo much intended againſt Mr. Hampden, as againſt the marquis of Hallifax, who had endeavoured Mr. Hampden's ruin, by procuring a note from the late duke of Monmouth, which repreſented Mr. Hampden as the chief accomplice with the lord Ruſſel. But the duke afterwards repenting of having accuſed one of his beſt friends, earneſtly demanded his note from king Charles II. to whom the marquis had delivered it, and at laſt obtained it on this condition, never to return into his majeſty's preſence. Mr. Hampden appeared before the committee of the lords, and made a long ſpeech, in which he rather aimed at juſtifying himſelf, than at diſcovering the authors of the lord Ruſſel's death. He extolled his ſervices to the preſent government, inſinuating, that the whole intrigue in inviting over the prince of Orange had been managed by himſelf, and Mr. Johnſton, (a Scotſman, ſon of the lord of Warriſton, who had been executed in 1663, and firſt couſin of biſhop Burnet) whom he had employed to gather the reſults of the ſeveral conſultations in private houſes. He urged, that by his concern in this affair he had expoſed himſelf to imminent danger; for had Johnſton been ſuſpected, he would have been ſent into Scotland, and forced by the rack (which is allowed in that kingdom) to diſcover thoſe who ſet him at work. Upon this account it was that Mr. Hampden, after the revolution, made ſeveral offers at being ſecretary of ſtate; but the king thought him of too hot a temper for a place that requires a ſettled head. One day Mr. Hampden, with deſign to remind the king of his own ſervices; repreſented to him, that thoſe of Mr. Johnſton were ſtill left unrewarded; to which the king replied, that, 'he had not forgot either Mr. Hampden or Mr. Johnſton.' However, neither of them had much reaſon to complain; the king having named the firſt to be his envoy into Spain, and the other into Switzerland; which employments they both refuſed.

Great part of this relation ſeems to be taken from uncertain memoirs; for as it is not true that the inviting over the prince of Orange was managed by him and Johnſton, Mr. Hampden cannot be juſtly ſuppoſed to ſay ſo. Nor is the dialogue with the king any more likely. Neither could they with juſtice ſay, that an envoyſhip to Spain was a ſufficient reward for the ſervice Mr. Hampden had done the king; ſince, by their own confeſſion, he had contributed ſo much towards the revolution. However, it muſt be owned, Mr. Hampden thought himſelf neglected, and was ſo far diſguſted as to ſay, 'I think I deſerve to have ſomething offered me at leaſt.' This is the worſt that thoſe who knew him intimately, heard him ever ſay. However this be, Mr. Cox, upon Mr. Hampden's recommendation was ſent to Switzerland, and Mr. Stanhope brother to the Lord Cheſterfield, was diſpatched to Madrid. About the ſame time, the lord Paget was ſent envoy to the emperor, and the lord Durſley, afterwards earl of Berkley to Holland, to relieve the earl of Pembroke, who was made a privy-councillor, and not long after firſt commiſſioner of the Admiralty, upon the reſignation of the lord Torrington.

He

toned in pretty good winter-quarters; that abundance of men and horſe had been ſwept away by ſickneſs, and want of food or cloathing; but that the ſick now recovered very faſt; and as for the officers, that ſeveral of them had killed themſelves with drinking too plentifully Iriſh uſquebaugh, particularly ſir Edward Deering, colonel Wharton, and ſir Thomas Gower: That the miſcarriages of Ireland were wholly to be charged on Mr. John Shales, purveyor-general to the army; and that upon duke Schomberg's landing at Dundalk, there was ſo general a conſternation among the Iriſh, that he might have marched directly to Dublin, if he had not wanted proviſions and a train of artillery. Dr. Walker alſo acquainted the commons with theſe things, whereupon theſe addreſſed the king, that Shales might be taken into cuſtody, and all his accounts, papers, and ſtores ſecured; and that duke Schomberg might be empowered to appoint an abler perſon. Next day major Wildman brought the king's anſwer: "That he had ſome time ſince taken order therein, being informed of captain Shales's miſdemeanors in his employment, and had written to duke Schomberg for that purpoſe; and believed what was deſired was already done, though the wind being contrary, he had not yet received any account from Ireland." But the commons ſtill eager upon this affair, reſolved upon another addreſs, to requeſt his majeſty to name thoſe, who had recommended Shales to his ſervice, which however the king declined to do, becauſe, as he ſaid, Shales had been propoſed in full council. This Shales had been purveyor to king James's army, whilſt encamped on Hounſlow-Heath; and upon that account was greatly ſuſpected of diſhoneſt practices under king William.

A few days after, the king ſent the following meſſage to the commons in writing:

WILLIAM R.

"HIS majeſty having already declared his reſolutions to proſecute the war in Ireland with the utmoſt vigour; and being deſirous to uſe the means, that may be moſt ſatisfactory and effectual in order to it, is graciouſly pleaſed, that this houſe do recommend a number of perſons, not exceeding ſeven, to be commiſſioned by his majeſty to take care of the proviſions, and ſuch other preparations, as ſhall be neceſſary for that ſervice.

"His majeſty is further pleaſed to let the houſe know, that upon conſideration of the addreſs of the 11th of November, he gives them leave to nominate ſome perſons to go over into Ireland, to take an account of the number of the army there, and the ſtate and condition of it, who ſhall receive his majeſty's orders accordingly."

This condeſcending meſſage was ſo well received by the houſe, that both theſe affairs were left to the king. However they took this opportunity to preſs him to diſcover thoſe, who had recommended Shales; to which he replied, 'it is impoſſible for me to give an anſwer to this queſtion,' but promiſed to take all poſſible care to carry on the war in Ireland with vigour, and to employ ſuch perſons, as might be moſt proper for the ſervice. But the complaints of miſmanagement were ſo great, that on the 15th of December, the commons reſolved, "that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to lay before him the ill conduct and ſucceſs of affairs in reference to Ireland, the armies and fleet; and humbly to deſire his majeſty, that he will pleaſe to take it into his conſideration, and, in his wiſdom, to find out the authors of theſe miſcarriages, and to appoint affairs to be managed by perſons unſuſpected, and more to the ſafety of his majeſty, and ſatisfaction of his ſubjects." The houſe likewiſe having been informed, that the miſcarriages of the fleet proceeded from a raging ſickneſs amongſt the ſeamen, occaſioned by great quantities of corrupt and unwholeſome proviſions, which had been furniſhed to the navy, the laſt ſummer, and the ſame being atteſted by ſeveral members of the houſe upon their own knowledge, it was reſolved, on the 23d of November, "That ſir John Parſons, ſir Richard Haddock, alderman Sturt, and Mr. Nicholas Fenn, victuallers of the fleet, ſhould be ſent for in cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, to anſwer to the ſaid complaints." And within a few days after, the king appointed Thomas Papillon, Simon Mayne, John Agar, Humphrey Ayles, and James Howe, commiſſioners for victualling the navy.

About the ſame time the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, and ſeveral members made complaints of the late miſcarriages, and charged them on the miniſtry. Mr. Hampden made a ſpeech wherein he urged, "that he could not but wonder to ſee thoſe very perſons in the miniſtry, whom the late king James had employed, even when his affairs were moſt deſperate, to treat with the then prince of Orange," and moved for an addreſs to deſire the king to remove the perſons, whom he had marked out, from his preſence and councils. This ſpeech (ſays a certain hiſtorian) might have made greater impreſſion, had he not at the ſame time complained, that ſeveral of the commonwealth's-men were then employed by the government; upon which, the houſe, who knew, that both he, his father, and their predeceſſors had ever adhered to the republican party, broke out into a general laughter. As ſoon as the houſe was compoſed, ſeveral members ſtood up in defence of the perſons, on whom Mr. Hampden had reflected, alledging, "that the reaſon why they had been deputed to the prince of Orange, was not becauſe they were in king James's intereſt, but rather becauſe they had all along diſapproved that king's conduct, and, as ſuch, had the general approbation of the nation, and were moſt likely to be agreeable to his highneſs." However, the houſe voted an addreſs, to repreſent to the king the miſcarriages of Ireland and of the fleet, and to deſire, that he would diſcover the authors of them, that they might be brought to puniſhment. Mr. Hampden, with ſome others, being named to draw up this addreſs, gave ſome people occaſion to think that his principal aim was to have the earl of Nottingham removed, that he might himſelf ſtep into his place of ſecretary of ſtate.

This addreſs was accordingly preſented to the houſe on the 23d of December, by Mr. Hampden, and becauſe it contained a long detail of the miſcarriages, and ill ſucceſſes both at ſea and land; it was ſpoke againſt by ſeveral members, and even by his own father, who inſiſted to have it drawn up again. But others were of another opinion, and ſaid, inſtead of contracting, it ought to be enlarged. In this debate it was remarkable to ſee Mr. Hampden and ſir Edward Seymour, ſir John Guiſe and ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, ſir Francis Winnington and Mr. Francis Gwin, on the ſame ſide of the queſtion.

In December a queſtion was put in the houſe of commons, "Whether a perſon having a place at court, or any dependance on the king, ſhould be a member of that houſe?" The debate was warm and obſtinate; for, as it always happens on ſuch occaſions, the diſguſted and diſappointed joined with the enemies of the government, to keep others out of places, ſince they themſelves could not get into them. The queſtion was however carried for the place-men, and this reaſon given, "becauſe otherwiſe the fitteſt perſons for public employments would remain excluded, and be debarred the opportunity of ſerving either the king or the country."

During theſe proceedings in the parliament, the whigs began to loſe much of the king's good opinion, not only by the heat which they ſhewed in both houſes againſt their enemies, but by the coldneſs that appeared in every thing that related to the public, as well as to himſelf, and particularly in the affair of his revenue. For though he had expreſſed an earneſt deſire to have it ſettled for life, alledging, he was not a king till that was done, ſince without it the title of a king was only a pageant, the civil liſt was nevertheleſs granted but for one year [q]. For a jealouſy was now infuſed into many, that he would grow arbitrary in his government, if he once had the revenue, and would ſtrain for a high ſtretch of prerogative, as ſoon as he was out of difficulties and neceſſities. Thoſe of the whigs, who had lived ſome years at Amſterdam, had got together a great many ſtories, that went about the city, of his ſullenneſs and imperious way of dictating. The Scots likewiſe, who were now come up to give an account of the proceedings in parliament, ſet about many things, that heightened their apprehenſions [r]. One Simpſon, a Scots preſbyterian, was recommended to the earl of Port-

[q] He ſpoke of this with more than ordinary vehemence. So that ſometimes he ſaid he would not ſtay and hold an empty name, unleſs he had a revenue for life. He ſaid once to biſhop Burnet, that he underſtood the good of a commonwealth as well as of a kingly government; and it was hard to determine which was the beſt; but he was ſure, the worſt of all governments was that of a king, without treaſure and without power. Burnet, II. 34.

[r] The earl of Belcarras obſerves, that the ſeſſion of parliament "ended with ſo little ſatisfaction to all parties in it, that moſt of them ran to London, ſome to complain, that thoſe things had not been performed, that the prince of Orange promiſed, when he came to the crown; others to defend themſelves; for there were great animoſities among them, particularly againſt lord S—r, who, though he always had been a fanatic, yet was generally abhorred among them, as they ſaid, being a man neither of land, as a man, whom he might truſt; and who would bring him good intelligence; upon which account he was often admitted, and was entertained as a good ſpy. But he was in a ſecret confidence with one Nevill Payne, the moſt active and dextrous of all king James's agents; who had indeed loſt the reputation of an honeſt man entirely; and yet had ſuch arts of management, that even thoſe who knew what he was, were willing to employ him. Simpſon and he were in a cloſe league together, and Payne diſcovered ſo much of the ſecret intelligence of his party to Simpſon, that he might carry it to the earl of Portland, as made him paſs for the beſt ſpy the court had. When he had gained a conſiderable ſhare of credit, he made uſe of it to infuſe into the earl of Portland jealouſies of the king's beſt friends; and as the earl hearkened too attentively to theſe, ſo by other hands it was conveyed to ſome of them, that the court was now become jealous of them, and was ſeeking evidence againſt them.

Sir James Montgomery, who had been very inſtrumental in ſettling the crown of Scotland upon king William, was eaſily poſſeſſed with theſe reports; and he and ſome others, by Payne's management, entered into a correſpondence with king James's party in England. They demanded an aſſurance for the ſettlement of Preſbytery in Scotland, and to have the chief poſts of the government ſhared among them. Princes in exile are apt to grant every thing that is aſked of them; for they know, that, if they are reſtored, they ſhall have every thing in their power. Upon this they entered into a cloſe treaty for the way of bringing all this about. At firſt they only aſked money for furniſhing themſelves with arms and ammunition; but afterwards they inſiſted on demanding three thouſand men, to be ſent over from Dunkirk; becauſe by duke Schomberg's being poſted in Ulſter, their communication with Ireland was cut off. In order to the carrying on this deſign, they reconciled themſelves to the duke of Queenſberry, and the other lords of the epiſcopal party; and on both ſides it was given out, that this union of thoſe, who were formerly ſuch violent enemies, was only to ſecure and ſtrengthen their intereſt in parliament; the epiſcopal party pretending, that ſince the king was not able to protect them, they, who ſaw themſelves marked out for deſtruction, were to be excuſed for joining with thoſe, who could ſecure them. Simpſon brought an account of all this to the earl of Portland, and was preſſed by him to find out witneſſes to prove it againſt ſir James Montgomery. He carried this to them, and told them that the whole buſineſs was diſcovered, and that great rewards were offered to ſuch as would merit them by ſwearing againſt them. With this they alarmed many of their party, who did not know what was at the bottom, and thought, that nothing was deſigned but an oppoſition to lord Melvill and the elder Dalrymple, now created lord Stair; and they were poſſeſſed with a fear, that a new bloody ſcene of ſham-plots and ſuborned witneſſes was to be opened. And when it began to be whiſpered about, that they were in treaty with king James, that appeared to be ſo little credible, that it was ſaid by ſome diſcontented men, what could be expected from a government, that was ſo ſoon contriving the ruin of its beſt friends? Some feared, that the king himſelf might too eaſily receive ſuch reports: and that the common practices of miniſters, who ſtudy to make their maſters believe, that all their own enemies are likewiſe his, were like to prevail in this reign, as much as they had formerly done. Montgomery came to have great credit with ſome of the whigs in England, particularly with the earl of Monmouth and the duke of Bolton; and he employed it all, to perſuade them not to truſt the king, and to animate them againſt the earl of Portland. This wrought ſo much, that many were diſpoſed to think, that they would have good terms from king James; and that he was now ſo convinced of his former errors, that they might ſafely truſt him. The earl of Monmouth intimated this to biſhop Burnet twice, but in ſuch a manner, as if he was afraid of it, and endeavoured to prevent it; but he ſet forth the reaſons for it with great advantage, and thoſe againſt it very faintly. Matters were truſted to Montgomery and Payne; and Ferguſon, who had been very deeply engaged with the enemies to the court in the two preceding reigns, was taken into it, as a man, who naturally loved to embroil things. Thus a deſign was formed, firſt to alienate the city of London ſo entirely from the king, that no loans might be advanced on the money-bills, which, without credit upon them, could not anſwer the end for which they were given. It was ſpread about, that king James would give a full indemnity for all that was paſt; and that, for the future, he would ſeparate himſelf entirely from the French intereſt, and be contented with a ſecret connivance at thoſe of his own religion. It was ſaid, that he was weary of the inſolence of the French court, and ſaw his error in truſting to it ſo much as he had done. The corrupted party had gone ſo far, that they ſeemed to fancy, that the reſtoring him would be not only ſafe, but happy to the nation. Biſhop Burnet owns, that it was long before he could ſuffer himſelf to think, that the matter was gone ſo far; but he was at laſt convinced of it. He received a letter from an unknown hand, with a direction, how to anſwer it. The ſubſtance of it was, that the writer of it religion, nor honour: beſides he had complied with all governments, and had taken all oaths and engagements, that were a going for fifty years before, and was the contriver of ſeveral of them, yet never was faithful to any party. The favours done by the prince of Orange, to the lord S—r and his ſon, and thoſe other things not done in parliament, which were expected, made many diſſatisfied. But to take off the odium of the laſt, and to ſhew he was not to blame for their not having all they deſired in parliament, he cauſed to be printed all his inſtructions to duke Hamilton, and laid all the fault on him, which he moſt patiently ſuffered, and might very well have juſtified it, ſince all he neglected to do was to ſatisfy the moſt bigoted fanatics, in not ſettling religion, as they would have it, and whereabout they could not agree, among themſelves; ſo it was delayed. The next thing was the not reſtoring the forefaulted eſtates, which indeed duke Hamilton thought unjuſt, but not the leſs, that his ſon and brother were ſo much concerned, being in poſſeſſion of two of the beſt of them by a gift from your majeſty. But to do him juſtice, he was not for going ſuch a length of extravagances and cruelty, as thoſe inraged fanatic rebels, who came over with the prince of Orange, which made the moſt part of his enemies, untill they took a general hatred at the lord Melvill. This made them join together more for their intereſt than inclination; others went up to get the rewards of their ſervices; but finding themſelves diſappointed of thoſe employments, which they thought due to their merit, quite broke off from the reſt, though to cover their deſign the better, they continued ſtill the moſt bigoted of the party. The chief of theſe were ſir James Montgomery, earl of A——e, lord R——s, Mr. William Hamilton, and Mr. James O———e, who at firſt in the convention had behaved himſelf very well, but by great promiſes made him by duke Hamilton, he went over to him; and finding himſelf diſappointed, joined again at London in all, that was propoſed to him for your majeſty's ſervice by ſir James Montgomery, who managed the reſt as he pleaſed, and having got acquainted with Mr. Ferguſon, Mr. Payne, capt. W———n, and ſome others, that were in your intereſt, engaged not only for himſelf, but for the others without their knowledge, truſting to his power over them. The firſt of his own ſett he propoſed his deſign to, was the earl of A—e, his brother in-law, whom he found very frank, as he always was, when the change of a party was offered, then the lord R———s; and laid before them two the ingratitude of the prince of Orange in not giving them employments, and the great offers made by your friends, if they would return to their duty. He wanted not encouragement to ſay ſo, for Mr. Payne had promiſed him all that his ambition, vanity, or avarice could ſuggeſt; nor were there ever two better matched than Mr. Payne and ſir James Montgomery; for Mr. Payne made him believe, that he could diſpoſe both of titles of honour, employments and money, as he pleaſed; and the other impoſed ſo far upon him, as to make him believe, he was able to turn the whole nation with a ſpeech, to do whatever he propoſed.

"After they had conferred their affairs together, and diſpoſed of every thing according to their fancy, they propoſed their reſolutions of ſerving you to the earl of A———n, then priſoner in the Tower of London, who embraced it moſt willingly, judging it, that to get thoſe, who had been moſt eminent againſt you, to come over, could not but make a conſiderable intereſt. The next ſtep they made was to ſend one over to your majeſty, with the offer of their ſervice, and adviſe how all things ſhould be diſpoſed. Though they found a meſſenger fit for their affair, called Mr. J———s, yet they had great difficulty, how to get their commiſſions, titles of honour, and inſtructions to the parliament, worded according to form; for none of them knew any thing of the matter. But ſir Andrew F———r, gave doubles of all they deſired, to Mr. Ferguſon, without knowing any thing of them, believing it could not be but for your majeſty's ſervice, ſince the earl of A——n was concerned in it. After they had diſpatched their meſſenger with all his inſtructions, and having nothing to do till his return, ſir James and Mr. Ferguſon being openly declared enemies to the lord Melvill, wrote a pamphlet, which they called, 'The Grievances.' It gave great offence, and broke ſir James Montgomery for ever with the prince of Orange and all his favourites; in which was laid open all their follies and breach of promiſes, with all the bitterneſs, which Mr. Ferguſon's pen was capable of, who had been in conſtant uſe of ſuch undertakings for many years.

"The winter 1689 was thus ſpent at London in their private councils, which made the prince of Orange ſo weary of both ſides, that he told duke Hamilton, that he was ſo much troubled about their debates, that he wiſhed he were a thouſand miles from Scotland, and that he were never king of it. Duke Hamilton, though he was extremely both the lord Melvill's and lord Stair's enemy, who were the chief cauſe of thoſe debates, yet went not publicly to the meetings of your enemies, which was then called 'the club,' but lived in outward civility with all, till the ſpring that lord Melvill came down commiſſioner.

"While they were thus hot upon their debates at London, the council of Scotland, where the earl of Crawford conſtantly preſided, without any commiſſion, was very buſy with the epiſcopal clergy, who had not prayed for the prince of Orange, as was ordered by the laſt ſeſſion of parliament. A great many were ſummoned before the council; and upon their refuſal turned out. Others, who would have complied, and alſo made it appear by their defences, that it was impoſſible for them to be informed of the order in ſo ſhort a time, were likewiſe turned out. His zeal carrying all things before him, and the reſt complying with all that he propoſed; ſo that by the council, the rabble, and the new levied dragoons the worſt of either, there were but very few in their churches before the next ſpring, ſave ſome, that were willing to comply with every thing; which rendered them contemptible even to their enemies. Acc. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 114.

As

could diſcover a plot deeply laid againſt the king, if he might be aſſured not to be made a witneſs, and have his friends, who were in it, pardoned. That prelate, by the king's order, engaged for the firſt; but as an indefinite promiſe of pardon was thought too much, the informer was told that he might, as to that, truſt to the king's mercy. Upon this he came to the biſhop, who found him to be ſir James Montgomery's brother. He acquainted the biſhop, that a treaty was ſettled with king James; that articles were agreed on; and an invitation ſubſcribed by the whole cabal, to king James to come over, which was to be ſent to the court of France, both becauſe the communication was eaſier and leſs watched when it went through Flanders than with Ireland; and to let that court ſee, how ſtrong a party he had, and by that means to obtain the ſupplies and force that was deſired. He ſaid, that he ſaw the writing, and ſome hands to it; but that he knew many more were to ſign it; and he undertook to put the biſhop in a method to ſeize on the original paper. The king could not eaſily believe the affair had gone ſo far; yet he ordered the earl of Shrewſbury to receive ſuch advices, as the biſhop ſhould bring him, and immediately to do what was proper. A few days after this, Montgomery told the biſhop that one Williamſon was that day gone to Dover with the original invitation. The biſhop found the earl of Shrewſbury inclined enough to ſuſpect Williamſon, who had for ſome days ſollicited a paſs for Flanders, and had got ſome perſons, of whom it was not proper to ſhew a ſuſpicion, to anſwer for him. A perſon was therefore ſent poſt after him, with orders to ſeize him in his bed, and to take his clothes and portmanteau from him, which were ſtrictly examined, but nothing found. Yet upon the news of this, the party was extremely affrighted, but ſoon recovered themſelves; the true ſecret of which was afterwards diſcovered. Simpſon was it ſeems, to go over with Williamſon, but firſt to ride to ſome houſes, which were in the way to Dover; whereas the other went directly in the ſtage-coach. It was thought ſafeſt for Simpſon to carry thoſe papers, for there were many different invitations, as they would not truſt their hands to one common paper. Simpſon came to the houſe at Dover, where Williamſon was in the meſſenger's hands; upon which he went away immediately to Deal, and hired a boat, and got ſafe to France with his letters. Montgomery finding that nothing was diſcovered by the way, which he had directed biſhop Burnet to, imagined, that he ſhould be deſpiſed by king William's friends, and perhaps ſuſpected by his own party; and therefore went over to France ſoon after, and turned papiſt. The fear of this diſcovery went preſently off; and Simpſon came back with large aſſurances; and twelve thouſand pounds were ſent to the Scots, who undertook to do great matters.

All pretended diſcoveries were laughed at, and looked upon as fictions of the court; and upon this the city of London were generally poſſeſſed with a very ill opinion of the king.

In this ſituation of affairs, the whigs diſcovered that the tories were treating with the court about the diſſolution of the parliament. Though the commons had granted the ſupplies that were demanded for the reduction of Ireland, and for the quota to which the king was obliged by his alliances, yet the remoteneſs of the funds making it neceſſary to offer great premiums to thoſe who advanced the money upon a ſecurity that was thought ſo hazardous, ſince few believed the government would laſt ſo long, the ſupplies, though ſeemingly great, brought not in the half of what they were eſtimated at. This the tories perceived, and ſeeing the whigs grow ſullen, and that they would make no advance of money, they applied to the court, and promiſed great advances of money, if the parliament might be diſſolved, and a new one ſummoned. Upon this the commons prepared a bill, "for reſtoring corporations to their ancient rights and privileges," by which they hoped to have made ſure of all future parliaments; for in it was inſerted the following clauſe, "That every mayor, recorder, ſheriff, common-council-man, town-clerk, magiſtrate, or officer, who did take upon him to conſent to, or join in the ſurrender of any charters, or inſtrument purporting ſuch ſurrender, did ſolicit, procure, proſecute, or did pay or contribute to the charge of proſecuting any ſcire facias, quo warranto, or information in the nature of quo warranto, by this act declared unlawful, ſhall be, and is declared, adjudged, and enacted to be, for the ſpace of ſeven years, incapable and diſabled to all intents and purpoſes, to bear or execute any office, employment, or place of truſt, as a member of ſuch reſpective body corporate, or in or for ſuch reſpective city, town, borough, or cinque-port, whereof or wherein he was member at or before the time of making ſuch ſurrender or inſtrument purporting ſuch ſurrender, or the ſuing out, or proſecuting ſuch ſcire facias, quo warranto, or information in the nature of quo warranto; any thing in this act contained, or any other caſe, ſtatute, or any ordinance, charter, cuſtom, or any thing to the contrary, in any wiſe notwithſtanding." This was oppoſed in the houſe by the whole ſtrength of the tory party; for they ſaw, that the carrying of it would be the total ruin of their intereſt through the whole kingdom. They ſaid a great deal againſt the declaratory part of the bill; but whatever there might be in that, they urged, that ſince the thing had been ſo univerſal, it ſeemed hard to puniſh it with ſuch ſeverity: and that by this means the party for the church would be diſgraced, and the corporation caſt into the hands of diſſenters. And now both parties made their court to the king. The whigs promiſed every thing, that he deſired, if he would help them to get this bill paſſed; and the tories were not wanting in their promiſes, if the bill ſhould be ſtopped, and the parliament diſſolved. The bill was carried in the houſe of commons by a great majority. When it was brought up to the lords, the firſt point in debate was upon the declaratory part, Whether a corporation could be forfeited or ſurrendered. The lord chief-juſtice Holt, and two other judges, were for the affirmative, but all the reſt for the negative. No precedents for the affirmative were brought higher than the reign of king Henry VIII, in which the abbies were ſurrendered; which was at that time ſo great a point of ſtate, that the authority of theſe precedents ſeemed not clear enough for regular times. The houſe was ſo equally divided, that it went for the bill only by one voice. After which, little doubt was made of the paſſing the act. But now the applications of the tories were much quickened: they made the king all poſſible promiſes; and the promoters of the bill ſaw themſelves expoſed to the corporations, which were to feel the effects of this bill ſo ſenſibly, that they made as great promiſes on their part. The matter was now at a critical iſſue: the paſſing the bill put the king and the nation in the hands of the whigs; and the rejecting it, and diſſolving the parliament upon it, was ſuch a truſting to the tories, and ſuch a breaking with the whigs, that the king was long in ſuſpence what to do. He was once very near a deſperate reſolution, he thought he could not truſt the tories, and he reſolved he would not truſt the whigs. He imagined, however, that the tories would be true to the queen, and confide in her, though they would not in him. He therefore reſolved to go over to Holland, and leave the government in the queen's hands.

Upon this he called together the marquis of Carmarthen, the earl of Shrewſbury, and ſome few more, and told them, that he had a convoy ready, and was reſolved to leave all in the queen's hands, ſince he did not ſee how he could extricate himſelf out of the difficulties, into which the animoſities of parties had brought him. They preſſed him vehemently to lay aſide all ſuch reſolutions, and to comply with the preſent neceſſity. Much paſſion appeared among them; and the debate was ſo warm, that many tears were ſhed. In concluſion, the king reſolved to change his firſt deſign into another better reſolution, of going over in perſon into Ireland, to put an end to the war there. The queen knew nothing of the firſt deſign, ſo reſerved was the king to her in a matter, that concerned her ſo nearly. The king's intention of going to Ireland appeared by the preparations that were ordered; but a great party was formed in both houſes to oppoſe it. Some really apprehended, that the air of that country would be fatal to ſo weak a conſtitution; and the jacobites had no mind, that king James ſhould be ſo much preſſed, as he would probably be, if the king went againſt him in perſon. It was by concert propoſed in both houſes on the ſame day, to prepare an addreſs to the king againſt this voyage: So the king, to prevent the addreſs, came to the parliament, and acquainted both houſes with his reſolution of going in perſon to Ireland, "and as I have (ſays he) already ventured my life for the preſervation of the religion, laws and liberties of this nation, ſo I am willing again to expoſe it, to ſecure you the quiet enjoyment of them."

When the king had ended his ſpeech, the parliament was prorogued to the 2d of April, but on the 6th of February was diſſolved by proclamation. At the ſame time a new one was ſummoned to meet the 20th of March [s].

In this ſeſſion was paſſed the declaration of rights and act

[s] As to the honours and perferments conferred this year, his majeſty, at the beginning of November, was pleaſed to create Richard lord Coote, baron of Coloony in Ireland, an earl of that kingdom by the name of the earl of Bellamont; and about the middle of that month, he appointed Thomas of ſettlement, of which an account has already been given.

The affair likewiſe of the princeſs of Denmark's revenue was now completed, which had been left unfiniſhed the laſt ſeſſion. A motion being made for ſettling part of the public revenue on the princeſs, the houſe was divided into three parts. The lord Eland, ſon of the marquis of Hallifax, Mr. Finch and Mr. Godolphin, who ſpoke in favour of the princeſs, inſiſted that 70,000l. a year was as little as could be allowed her, as it had been repreſented the former ſeſſion. Others were for reducing that ſum to 50,000l. and others again, who knew the king's inclination, would have the matter left entirely to his diſcretion. Mr. Hampden, in particular, alledged the danger of ſettling a revenue on a princeſs, who had ſo near a claim to the crown, independently of the king, whoſe title was diſputed by many malecontents; and ſupported his argument, by the example of the queen, on whom it had been lately propoſed to ſettle 100,000 pounds a year, but which was thought improper, and therefore rejected, though her majeſty had no ſeparate intereſt, from that of her royal conſort. This debate being adjourned to the next day, the king, who was unwilling ſuch an affair ſhould be thus canvaſſed in parliament, ſent the earl of Shrewſbury to the counteſs of Marlborough, lady of the bed-chamber to the princeſs, who told her "that he came from his majeſty who promiſed to give the princeſs 50,000 pounds a year, if ſhe would deſiſt from ſolliciting the ſettlement by parliament; and that he was confident the king would keep his word: That if he did not, he was ſure, he would not ſerve him an hour after he broke it." The counteſs anſwered, "that ſuch a reſolution might be very right as to him; but that ſhe did not ſee it could be of any uſe to the princeſs." The earl, to convince her of the reaſonableneſs of what he propoſed, added a great deal, which had no effect, and ſhe deſired him to attend the princeſs herſelf, to which he conſented. The counteſs went to the princeſs to acquaint her of the earl's coming, and her anſwer to him was, "that ſhe could not think herſelf in the wrong to deſire a ſecurity, for what was to ſupport her; and that the buſineſs was now gone ſo far, that ſhe thought it reaſonable to ſee what her friends could do for her." This anſwer was taken very ill both by the king and queen. More particularly the queen complained, that ſuch a motion was made before the princeſs had tried in a private way, what the king intended to aſſign her. The princeſs, on the other hand, ſaid, ſhe knew the queen was a good wife, ſubmiſſive and obedient to every thing that the king deſired; ſo ſhe thought, the beſt way was to have a ſettlement by act of parliament. The cuſtom indeed had always been, that the royal family (a prince of Wales not excepted) was kept in dependance on the king, and had no allowance but from his mere favour and kindneſs; yet in this caſe, in which the princeſs was put out of the ſucceſſion, during the king's life, it ſeemed reaſonable that ſomewhat more than ordinary ſhould be done in conſideration of that. Accordingly, the commons addreſſed the king to ſettle 50,000 pounds a year on the prince and princeſs of Denmark, to which he conſented. The blame of this motion was caſt on the counteſs of Marlborough, as moſt in favour with the princeſs: and it is thought, this greatly contributed to alienate the king from the earl her huſband, who was ſome time after diſmiſſed from all his employments, as will hereafter be ſeen.

Whilſt the parliament was ſitting, Ludlow, who upon the reſtoration, was excepted out of the general pardon in 1661, for having been one of the judges of king Charles I, on ſome encouragement given him came into England to offer his ſervice in the reduction of Ireland, where he had formerly commanded under Cromwell. Many were ſurpriſed at his coming, whilſt there was an act of attainder againſt him, which he could not reaſonably expect would be diſpenſed with in his favour. But no one was more alarmed at it than ſir Edward Seymour; for his ſeat and eſtate at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltſhire, where he lived, had belonged to Ludlow, and came to him by a grant. It is no wonder therefore that he ſo ſtrongly repreſented to the commons, "how highly it reflected on the honour of the nation, that one of the parricides of that king, whoſe death the church of England had juſtly dignified with the title of martyrdom, ſhould not only be ſuffered to live here, but alſo entertained with hopes of preferment." Upon this the commons, at his motion, voted an addreſs to the king to iſſue out a proclamation for apprehending colonel Ludlow, and propoſing a reward for ſuch as ſhould take him. Not content with making the motion, ſir Edward took care to preſent the addreſs himſelf the next day [t], which, though the king complied with, it was obſerved that the proclamation was not publiſhed, till it was known that Ludlow was ſafely arrived in Holland with the Dutch embaſſadors [u]. From Holland he returned to Vevay in the county of Vaux in Switzerland, which he had choſen for his retirement after he had left Geneva and Lauſanne. He had been warned out of Geneva by the magiſtrates at the ſollicitation of the ducheſs of Orleans, as the death of his friend Liſle (who was aſſaſſinated by three Iriſhmen) made him quit Lauſanne. His life alſo had been attempted more than once, which probably made him chuſe to live at Vevay, as a place of great ſafety, it being eaſy to know what ſtrangers are in the town by reaſon of its ſituation [w]. Here he lived to the 73d year of his age, and then died after a thirty-two years exile. He has left two volumes of memoirs, by which it appears that he acted upon a very different foot from Cromwell, whoſe uſurpation he always deteſted, and to whom he was as much an enemy as to king Charles, his ſole view being the eſtabliſhment of a free republic. He was a man of great courage and conduct, and unſhaken in his principles.

During theſe proceedings in England, the rebels in Scotland having laid hold of the act of oblivion, and colonel Cannon, with thoſe under his command, retired to the iſland of Mull, ſeveral regiments were ſent into Ireland to reinforce duke Schomberg's army. The Highlanders upon this were encouraged to renew their excurſions, burning and plundering wherever they came, and having gathered into a body of eight hundred men, under the laird of Lochelly, they marched out of Inverlochly, thinking to have ſurprized Inverneſs, but were timely prevented. Mean while thoſe under colonel Cannon, though not otherwiſe conſiderable for their ſtrength than by the inacceſſible holds, in which they lurked, continued ſtill in a body, and being preſſed by hunger and want, made frequent depredations in the low lands, more like robbers than regular troops. To ſtop their progreſs, the council of Scotland ordered general Mackay and ſir Thomas Levingſton to march northward with a proper force; and the nobility, and all the reſt of the inhabitants of the countries moſt expoſed to their incurſions, to put themſelves in a poſture of defence. On the other hand, Cannon endeavoured to engage in the rebellion ſeveral perſons in Edinburgh, to whom he ſent letters and a pardon from king James. But theſe being intercepted, and moſt of thoſe, to whom they were directed, being already confined, they were immediately put under a cloſer reſtraint, and orders diſpatched to ſecure the reſt. This diſappointment obliged Cannon to retire into Ireland, as finding his intereſt and authority ſinking among the Highlanders, who immediately choſe ſir Hugh Cameron for their leader, and he being born amongſt them, and acquainted with their genius, knew how to govern them. Under this new chief the rebels renewed their incurſions, which obliged king William to ſend duke Hamilton into Scotland, to keep a vigilant eye over them, but notwithſtanding all precautions, they received a conſiderable ſuccour from without; for king James depended ſo much upon them, that though he had neither ammunition nor proviſion to ſpare, he cauſed two frigates to be fitted out at

On the 13th of February, ſir Henry Goodrick knight and baronet, lieutenant-general of their majeſties ordnance, was ſworn of the privy council; and on the 19th of March, a commiſſion for the lord high-treaſurer's place was given to ſir John Lowther, of Lowther-Hall, bart. [t] It would have been doubtleſs, more decent for ſir Edward to have got ſome friend to make the motion and preſent the addreſs; but the doing it himſelf made people ſay, "He had a great deal of reaſon to do it, as well for Ludlow's crime as for his eſtate."

[w] The houſe he lived in had over the door an inſcription conſiſting of part of a verſe in Ovid, with an addition of his own:

Omne ſolum forti patria——
——quia patris.

He lies buried in the beſt of the churches, with an epitaph, which the reader may ſee in Addiſon's travels, p. 265. Ludlow (ſays Addiſon) was a conſtant frequenter of ſermons and prayers: but would never communicate with thoſe either of Geneva or Vevay.

Dublin, laden with clothes, arms and ammunition, and ſent them to his friends in Scotland, having beſides on board them colonel Buchan, colonel Wauchop, and about forty officers more, who all got ſafe into the iſle of Mull. This reinforcement ſo encouraged the Highlanders, that ſome time after they ventured, to the number of fifteen hundred, to march as far as Strathſpage in the county of Murray, where they expected to be joined by the other malecontents, whoſe number was conſiderably increaſed by the late prorogation of the parliament of that kingdom. To prevent this junction, ſir Thomas Levingſton took with him eight hundred foot, ſix troops of dragoons, and two troops of horſe, and fell ſo unexpectedly upon the rebels, that they betook themſelves to flight, leaving near five hundred of their men killed upon the ſpot, and one hundred taken priſoners, and amongſt them four captains, with other inferior officers. After this exploit, Sir Thomas advanced immediately to the caſtle of Lethinday, commanded by colonel Buchan's nephew; and having lodged a mine under it, quickly brought the garriſon to ſurrender at diſcretion. Neither was major Fergulon leſs ſucceſsful in the iſle of Mull, where he landed, and deſtroyed ſeveral places poſſeſſed by the enemy, forced them to abandon the caſtle of Dewart, and betake themſelves to the hills. This broke all the meaſures, which had been taken for king James's intereſt in Scotland; and upon this, thoſe who had engaged in ſir James Montgomery's plot, looked upon that deſign as deſperate; yet reſolved to try what ſtrength they could make in parliament. The earl of Melvill carried down powers, firſt to offer to duke Hamilton, if he would join in the common meaſure heartily with him, to be lord high commiſſioner in parliament; or, if he ſhould prove intractable, as he really did, to ſerve in that poſt himſelf. He had full inſtructions for the ſettlement of preſbytery; for he aſſured the king, that, without this, it would be impoſſible to carry any thing. But his majeſty would not conſent to the taking away the rights of patronage, and the ſupremacy of the crown. Yet lord Melvill found theſe ſo much inſiſted on, that he ſent a perſon to the king, then in Ireland, for fuller inſtructions in thoſe points. Theſe inſtructions were enlarged, but in ſuch general words, that the king did not underſtand, that they could warrant what lord Melvill did; for he gave them both up; and his majeſty was ſo offended with him for it, that he loſt all credit with him, though the king did not think fit to diſown him, or to call him to an account for going beyond his inſtructions.

The parliament of Scotland, which had been adjourned to the 27th of March, and from thence to the 15th of April, being met accordingly at Edinburgh [x], the earl of Melvill, as lord high commiſſioner, made a ſpeech to them, wherein he informed them of his majeſty's great regret, that he could [x] "The ſpring, ſays the earl of Belcarras, being far advanced, and the money that was laid on in the then laſt ſeſſion of parliament exhauſted, this put the prince of Orange to great difficulties, either to grant the extravagant demands urged by ſir James Montgomery and thoſe of his party; or to let all the army, which conſiſted of near ten thouſand men, be abſolutely ruined for want of pay. The more the club party ſaw him ſtrained, the more they augmented their pretenſions; and being in this neceſſity, he ſeemed to yield to their demands, ſending my lord Melvill down with inſtructions to grant thoſe things; yet only in caſe he could do no better, and ſaw imminent danger from your friends; which gave a pretext for yielding to ſeveral things in parliament above his inſtructions, and contrary to the prince of Orange's intentions, (this was after the treachery of ſome of our number, that had ruined all) and for which he would have been in diſgrace, if the villainy of thoſe, who made the diſcovery of what was intended for your ſervice had not brought him off, ſerving as a piece of abſolute neceſſity for what he did. For ſeveral months before, the parliament had been adjourned from time to time. This put the fanatics, and thoſe, who were to have their eſtates reſtored, in a mighty rage, that they began to doubt of his intentions, either to eſtabliſh their religion, or to reſtore their eſtates to them. But ſeeing the lord Melvill was named commiſſioner, and prepared to go down, they all took leave, moſt part very diſcontent, the prince of Orange not having it in his power to ſatisfy the third part of theſe pretenders. Having ended their affairs at London, both ſides haſted down to Scotland, to ſecure their party. Such members as had ſtaid there was only ſir James Montgomery, who was the chief manager of this party, who for ſome weeks ſtaid behind, and imparted his deſign to ſeveral of your friends there, who ſo believed him, and truſted ſo much to his underſtanding, that he had 1100 guineas given him by Mr. A———n to advance your intereſt. But the marquis of A———l, to whom ſir James had imparted all his intentions, got the carrying of them down, and made his own uſe of them, as ſhall be made appear. Of all that had paſſed among the club party at London, and of their intentions to ſerve your majeſty, nothing was known in Scotland among your friends, until the earl of Annandale and lord Roſs came down. They openly exclaimed againſt the uſage they had met with from the prince of Orange; but there was little notice taken of it, conſidering the unfitneſs of their tempers, until the whole ſet did the ſame. Their diſcourſes made your friends hope ſome uſe might be made of their diviſions; and ſo made them live more friendly with them than formerly. The earl of Annandale, as he was always the moſt forward of his party, ſo in this he was the firſt, that propoſed the whole affair to the earl of D———e and me, then in the caſtle of Edinburgh. He ſaid, that I, of all men living, had leaſt reaſon to believe what he was about to tell me, conſidering how he had uſed me in the convention, in leaving us abruptly, and becoming the moſt violent againſt us. He acknowledged his fault, and wiſhed, that the blood of his body could waſh off the ſtains of his paſt miſcarriages both to his king and friends; and hoped, that theſe misfortunes ſhould for the future ſerve as ſo many beacons to warn him to avoid the like in time coming: with a great deal more of this ſort; which he ſpoke with ſo much paſſion and appearance of ſincerity, that we were but too ſoon taken with it, and were the more eaſily deceived, as being glad to find any returning to their duty. He told us likewiſe, that he entirely confided in us, and put his life and fortune in our hands, without pretending any truſt from us: only deſired we might live in friendſhip, until the marquis of Athol, duke of Queenſberry, earl of Arran, viſcount Tarbat, and ſir James Montgomery, ſhould come to town, who would inform us of all that had paſſed at London; and ſince they had received your majeſty's pardon for what was paſſed, and now venturing their lives to ſerve you, they expected all your friends would join in the common cauſe to ruin the prince of Orange, and reſtore your majeſty.

"A few weeks after the lord D——— and I had our liberty, my lord Melvill came down, and all the parliament members met, but were adjourned for a fortnight. This gave time to the club-party to be induſtrious with your friends, to come in and join with them for ſettling the peace of the nation, as they pretended; for any deſign for your majeſty's ſervice was to be kept ſecret amongſt a few. The difficulties were extraordinary, how to reconcile ſuch different intereſts, tempers, and perſuaſions, as were that of your friends and the club-party; for they, both in the convention and parliament, had been the moſt violent againſt your majeſty and your friends. Beſides, their whole deſign at the bottom was for the height of violence and oppreſſion; for their greateſt quarrel at the prince of Orange was, for not ſuffering them to go to all the extravagancies of their religion and revenge; which is ſo mingled together, that it is hard to know the one from the other. And they were likewiſe divided among themſelves; for none, except James lord Roſs, earl of Annandale, and Mr. O——e were to know of any reſolution to ſerve your majeſty; and duke Hamilton and his followers had no deſign but the ruin of the lords Melvill and Stair, and to get the ſeſſion filled with his own creatures, having at that time many law-ſuits in hand. But though they had all different deſigns, yet they all agreed in this, 'that nothing could be done, except your friends could be perſuaded to join;' without which they ſaw lord Melvill's and Stair's party would be too ſtrong for them, having all the profitable employments and ſeſſion in their hands.

"Sir James Montgomery undertook to manage this affair, pretending he knew the inclination of a great many of your friends, who would join with any party to ruin the lords Melvill and Stair, and keep public burdens to be employed in parliament, and to oblige the prince of Orange to eſtabliſh the ſeſſion according to the claim of right voted in the convention, and to have an Habeas Corpus and freedom of ſpeech in parliament. Theſe were the pretexts he made uſe of, which were ſo taking with the moſt bigoted part of them, that they doubted not to get theſe acts paſſed if we would join with them in all other demands; which were to have the preſbyterian government eſtabliſhed at its height of power, the king's ſupremacy, and the committee of parliament called the articles (which was already voted in the convention a grievance) taken away. This by the majority of them was believed at firſt to be all deſign, without knowing in the leaſt, that it was only to make them diſobliged at the prince of Orange, if he ſhould refuſe their demands; and to try next, if your majeſty would grant them; for all kings, juſt, or unjuſt, are alike to them.

"To all your friends it was very evident, how great an advantage might be had by joining with the violent party; for by that we thought ourſelves ſure of breaking their army, which conſiſted of about ten thouſand men, and which muſt immediately be diſbanded, when they ſaw the parliament eſtabliſh no fund, either for paying their arrears or ſubſiſtence. And all having gone in confuſion, and your majeſty being then in Ireland, and the Highlanders in a better condition to riſe, it were eaſy to make a good uſe of their diſorders.

"Sir James, in the firſt meeting we had with him, laid out the great advantages your intereſt would obtain, if this ſucceeded; the ſtrength of his own party, and all the influence he had over them. He told us likewiſe of their ſending a meſſenger to your majeſty, with aſſurances of their returning to their duty; but ſaid nothing of the inſtructions, commiſſions, and pernicious advices he had ſent along with them, believing undoubtedly it would have hindered us from joining with them; for by this we ſhould have clearly ſeen it was only trying to make a better bargain for themſelves, that made them change parties, and not out of any ſentiments of conviction for having done amiſs. But though it was evident to us, what diſorders we ſhould make among our enemies, and what profit to your party by going into the parliament; yet to join with our mortal enemies, only to make the one half ruin the other, and to take the oath of allegiance to an uſurper, and to comply with them in things, that had always been againſt our principles, were ſo hard to get over, that ſome of us had great difficulties to overcome them; nor even could any thing have done it but the great deſire we had to be inſtruments of your majeſty's reſtoration, and ruin of your enemies.

"There were two things, that made us very willingly join with them, the marquis of Athol and the earl of Arran aſſerted your majeſty's knowing the deſign, and approving of it, ſo far as to be convinced at that time you thought it the greateſt piece of ſervice could be done you. Next the viſcount of Tarbat aſſuring us particularly, that the prince of Orange was fully reſolved never to grant any of thoſe demands, which he knew the club-party intended to propoſe in parliament, and being ſure of their firm reſolution never to grant any thing, except they obtained all they deſired, we could not doubt to obtain all we pretended, which was the diſſolution of the parliament. Nor could it be imagined but lord Tarbat wiſhed it as well as we, though on different motives; for then he was entirely in the prince of Orange's intereſt, and truſted more by him than any of the nation, inſomuch that at his coming from London he had a truſt given him, that few ſubjects ever had the like; for he had a full power to make a ceſſation of arms or peace with the Highlanders, and to diſpoſe of twenty thouſand pounds ſterling, as he thought fit, for the prince of Orange's ſervice, and three titles of honour to whom he pleaſed; and was to give account of all that paſſed in parliament, and had full power to adjourn or diſſolve as he thought fit. But though he had all this truſt, and might diſſolve the parliament when he pleaſed; yet he durſt not venture it; and though he had more enemies that were more afraid of its ſitting than of any of your ſervants; yet he thought he could get it eaſier done, and with leſs hazard to himſelf, by the high hand not be preſent at their meeting, according to their deſires, and his own wiſhes; and after having laid before them what his majeſty had done, to deliver them from the yoke, under which they groaned, he deſired an aſſiſtance of money anſwerable to the expences, which his majeſty had been, and was ſtill obliged to be at, to ſecure their religion and liberty;

of the club-party, which would have the ſame effect to ſecure himſelf, and enrage the prince of Orange at his enemies. Theſe conſiderations made him take more pains under-hand than any, to engage your friends with the club-party, and to get them to come to the parliament. To ſome, who believed him, he ſaid he deſigned nothing but your ſervice; but to others, that it was for the good of the nation, by obtaining acts, that would be ſo beneficial to it. Being thus made believe, that your majeſty liked the propoſition and hopes of doing what he deſigned, made us reſolve, notwithſtanding all our ſcruples, not only to join with the club-party, but to uſe all our endeavours to perſuade our friends and all thoſe we had any influence upon, to do the like; which ſucceeded as we could wiſh; for moſt part of all, who had continued firm to your intereſt, reſolved to follow our example, without deſiring to know the bottom of that ſecret correſpondence we had with the club-party. Some there were, that made difficulty, the earl of H——e, the earl of L——e, lord O——d, lord S——t, and the maſter of B——e; but their reaſons were rather or more out of apprehenſions of betraying and yielding to the prince of Orange, than any other ſcruples; though I doubt not ſome of them had their reaſons, and ſo might they very juſtly, conſidering how nice a point it was. Others appeared reſolved, and engaged fairly, but when the time of the ſitting down of the parliament drew nigh, they abſented themſelves; which gave great encouragement to lord Melvill and all his party to meet in parliament, who were in ſuch apprehenſions of ſucceſs before, that ſeveral times he was reſolved to diſſolve it, and to take a venture of another. But when they ſaw, that ſeveral of your friends drew back, and had ſecured to themſelves ſeveral votes, by dividing the office of every regiſter into ſix, and giving each a vote, and one for a treaſurer deputy, and by giving money to ſome, and promiſes of employment to others, they ſo ſtrengthened their party, that they again took heart, and reſolved to begin their parliament, which ſate down the 15th of April, 1690. But notwithſtanding all the ſiniſtrous courſes, that were taken to procure votes, never were men in ſuch apprehenſions and fears, as were lord Melvill and all his friends; for they not only ſaw the danger of their whole party, if they ſucceeded not, but immediate ruin to themſelves from the prince of Orange, to whom they had ſo fairly undertaken. After that he had read over the ſpeech, that he had got made for him, and that his preſident, the earl of Crawford had made another, all taken from the old prophets, which he applied to the occaſion, as of Ezra and Nehemiah's building again the temple of Jeruſalem, they brought in a vote about the election of a burgh, only to know their ſtrength, which they found above their expectation. They carried it but by ſix or ſeven, which makes a demonſtration, that if thoſe of your friends, which engaged to us, had not failed, we had outvoted them in that, and ſo conſequently had gained all our deſign; for it was firmly reſolved among them, that if they had loſt that vote, though of no conſequence, they would have adjourned the parliament next day: but gaining it, they took heart. And that which befell your friends in the convention, happened juſt again; for ſeveral who pretended to be our friends, when they thought us ſtrongeſt, left us immediately, and joined with the other party. Sir James Montgomery alſo failed, and ſeveral alſo he had engaged; he believing his intereſt far greater with them, than truly it was. So from that minute we loſt hopes of doing any good; but ſeeing we had once made ſuch a ſtep, we reſolved to ſtay in the houſe, though it ſhould be for nothing, but to hinder them from going on ſo faſt in their deſign of forfeiting all thoſe who had appeared for your majeſty, and the giving money as ſoon as they intended, to ſupport their forces and government. But never men made a more miſerable figure in any meeting, than your friends did in this. After they ſaw themſelves abandoned and outvoted in every thing, they had nothing to do but ſit and hear duke Hamilton baul and bluſter, according to his uſual cuſtom, and then acquieſced to all that was propoſed; and ſir James Montgomery and ſir John Dalrymple ſcolded like kail-wives, that rogue, villain, and liar were their uſual terms. Theſe two were the chief managers of both ſides; ſir John pretending to maintain the king's prerogative, ſir James the liberty of the ſubject and claim of right. And though he was never bred for ſuch undertakings, yet with abundance of confidence and eloquence he managed the affair, and he undoubtedly put them to great ſtraits; for the things he urged were very popular and agreeable to the inclinations of many of the members. Notwithſtanding all diſappointments, we were ſtill to make them break among themſelves, by propoſing what we thought never would be granted. But in this alſo, we were diſappointed. For my lord Melvill, to juſtify what he and his party had ſo great a deſire to do, but durſt not adventure before, having got the pretext of the imminent danger of the prince of Orange, by the ſecret plots and contrivances of your majeſty's friends, yielded to all that was demanded in his inſtructions; he was allowed to paſs what acts of parliament he ſhould think fit, and eſtabliſh what form of government they liked beſt.

"Several days paſt without daring to mention preſbytery, though moſt there deſired it; knowing, that it was contrary to the prince of Orange's inclinations, who feared the conſequence it might have in England. Beſides, he liked beſt to have it undetermined, till his affairs were better eſtabliſhed, that he might keep both parties in hopes. But ſir James in a fair ſet ſpeech ſpoke out what they all wiſhed generally, but feared to name; and that he knew there were inſtructions for ſettling religion; and he ſaid he thought it was a ſhame for that meeting, that it was not done. But the reaſon was well known, for ſome among them, to flatter the court, againſt their own principles, had delayed it. He knew, likewiſe, ſome were for one kind of government, ſome for another; ſome were for a kind of preſbytery, called Eraſtianiſm, like that of Holland. But he told them, there could not, nor ought there any to be eſtabliſhed in Scotland, but the preſbyterian as it was in 1648, which was the government in the world, not only according to the word of God, but beſt to diſturb the extravagant power of kings and arbitrary government, under which they had groaned many years. This ſpeech to us, that knew his ſecrets, ſeemed a little extraordinary; but he excuſed himſelf by being obliged to do ſo; otherwiſe he ſhould loſe all credit with his party; and that it ſignified nothing, ſince he knew, that lord Melvill never durſt paſs it, though it came to be approved. This ſpeech was approved by the houſe, and a committee appointed to receive all the forms of government, that ſhould be brought before them, and to report their opinion of them; and till this was ready, they adjourned ſome days, during which ſir James received from Ireland a return of his meſſage with Mr. J——s. The firſt night he opened alone a great black box with papers, where all the commiſſions and inſtructions were; and then ſent for the earl of A————e, Arran, and my lord Roſs, and told them the return of all was come, but that he believed there were ſeveral things among them would be improper to let the duke of Queenſberry, earl of L————w, B————ne, and me ſee, though we were only thoſe of your friends, whom they had truſted with their meſſage theſe four times. After they had conſidered them all, they made up another box of ſuch as they thought fit to ſhew, and ſealed it, to make us believe it never had been opened, and in a great haſte ſir James deſired us to meet in the marquis of A————le's lodging; and after a formal diſcourſe of his endeavours to ſerve your majeſty ever ſince he went up with an offer of the crown to the prince of Orange, and of the meſſage he had ſent to your majeſty, ſaid, he was now deſired to meet with us to tell us, he had got a return; and that there was a great bundle of papers come over; but conſidering we were all of one intereſt, he would not open it nor look on any thing till we did it all together, and entreated we might meet that afternoon; and to ſhew the entire truſt he had in us, he would keep nothing that he knew from us, but would ſhew what he received from the king. The earl of Arran excuſed himſelf from meeting, pretending he was obliged to go out of town; but the true reaſon was, he thought they had cheated him in not ſending for his commiſſion to be general, as was agreed among them at London. The duke of Queenſberry alſo excuſed himſelf, ſo that none came but the marquis of Athol, L————w, Roſs, B————ne, and myſelf; ſir James brought in a black box, which was a burthen for him to carry, which I looked upon and conſidered the ſeals, becauſe I always expected a trick from him. He told us, he had brought all except a letter from your majeſty to himſelf, without knowing, as he ſhall anſwer to Almighty God, what was in the box, which none of us believed; for he did quite change the packthread, and clapped on his own ſeal, after he had opened the box, and ſhewn what he thought fit to bring. We were all in a great confuſion, to find, that we had joined ourſelves to ſuch a crew that had ſo much knavery to impoſe things on your majeſty, and ſo much weakneſs to think they could bring about all your enemies to declare for you without any force. They were in no leſs confuſion than we; finding we ſaw their folly in undertaking things they had not the leaſt ſhadow of power to perform. They had promiſed to get all the parliament to declare for your majeſty, and immediately meet in your name, and the earl of A——le commiſſioner, who was made a marquis, and ſir James made earl of A————r, lord Roſs likewiſe an earl, and all employments of church and ſtate, and army entirely put into their hands, and thoſe of their friends, who were generallythe greateſt enemies to monarchy.

"There were likewiſe great bundles of letters not directed, but left to their direction to be given to any of your friends they thought fit to truſt; which indeed we thought a little hard to be put into their hands, who had been for fighting your majeſty, and alſo endeavouring to ruin us on your account. Beſides what we ſaw, there were many other commiſſions, patents, and remiſſions that were made public by themſelves, after they made their diſcovery to the lord Melvill. But though they were fond to get theſe commiſſions, when they came, they were confounded what to do with them. To keep them, they ſaw there would be no uſe for them, and they put them into a continual hazard: ſo it was reſolved, that they ſhould all be burnt, but their patent. Next, how to diſpoſe of their meſſenger put them in a great diſorder, which made the earl of L————w carry him to his houſe ſome miles from Edinburgh, where, after he had ſtaid ſome nights, he got from him all that ſir James had concealed. Notwithſtanding ſir James wrote to Mr. J————s not to truſt any of us with his meſſage, but as far as he had already ſhewn; yet all was out before the letter came to his hands. Beſides Mr. J————s had been but a few years in Edinburgh, yet he plainly ſaw all ſir James's projects were miſerably founded; which made him beg to be employed back again to your majeſty. But few of us deſired any more to do with ſir James or his meſſenger; for afterwards we had little meddling with them, though they extremely deſired it, and that we ſhould ſend back Mr. S————s with a blank ſheet of paper, ſubſigning to be filled up when he came to your majeſty with our advice; which the duke of Queenſberry, L————w, B——w, and myſelf abſolutely refuſed; which almoſt broke us entirely with them; and the more becauſe ſome of our number complied with their deſires. For the earl of Arran not only did it himſelf, but alſo got the lord M——y to do it alſo, though he had not been engaged with us in any of your concerns, but, on the contrary, we looked upon him as one of the principal deſtroyers of your affairs, both in the Highlands, and at the beginning of the revolution.

"In the Highlands your affairs had no better ſucceſs than in parliament; for general Buchan having come too near the enemy, ſir Thomas Levingſton, with a party of dragoons, ſurpriſed him at Cromdell, killed about an hundred, made ſeveral priſoners, and diſperſed his whole party. When this news came to Edinburgh of a defeat, your friends repented their not embracing the offer of a ceſſation of arms made them by the prince of Orange, which Tarbat had the management of; but not being deſirous to appear above board himſelf in ſuch a tranſaction, he propoſed it to the earl of B——e with the offer of five thouſand pound ſterling if he could accompliſh it; for the prince of Orange was extremely deſirous to have all ſettled before he went to Ireland. But the earl of B——e would not meddle in ſuch an affair without the conſent of your friends at Edinburgh, who at that time would not hear of it. So the earl of B——e very generouſly gave it over, though, beſides the five thouſand pounds ſterling, he had other conſiderable rewards offered him. So after this defeat we were all willing a treaty might be brought on again, conſidering, at leaſt, it would gain time, until the Highlanders put themſelves in a poſture of defence. The prince of Orange was juſt then going to Ireland, which made the earl of B——e endeavour to meet him, to get the ceſſation ended; but he was gone before he got to him; by which the Highlanders were left to the mercy of their enemies, who might have ruined them, if they had purſued the victory at Cromdell.

"Your friends at Edinburgh were in no better condition, being forced to ſit in a meeting in the middle of their enemies, and hear them eſtabliſh preſbytery, and reſcind all acts, that had been any ways made for your intereſt, reſtoring all forefaulters and fines, (though tranſacted for) that was granted by your brother or your majeſty, for thoſe, that ſerved you againſt them; and above all, their forefaulting thoſe, who appeared for you in arms, except ſir William W————e, who was overlooked, though they had as full probation againſt him as any of the reſt. And to finiſh our misfortunes, the moſt conſiderable of that party we had joined, not only left us, and laſtly, he exhorted them to lay aſide all animoſities and private intereſts, and jointly to labour the ſettlement of the public affairs.

The jacobites perſuaded all their party to go to this parliament, and to take the oaths; for many of the nobility had before refuſed them, and would not own the king. Great pains were taken by archbiſhop Patterſon, to induce them to take the oaths, though with a deſign to break them; for he thought by that means to have a majority in the parliament; which they failed in, ſome of the laity being too honeſt to agree to ſuch advices. The party being therefore diſappointed in this and other ſchemes, ſaw a neceſſity of deſiring a force to be ſent over from France. But this appeared ſo odious and ſo deſtructive to their country, that ſome of them refuſed to concur in it; others were not pleaſed with the anſwers, which king James had returned to the propoſitions they had made him. He had indeed granted all they had aſked upon their own particular intereſts, and had promiſed to ſettle preſbytery; but he rejected all thoſe demands, that imputed a diminution of his prerogative, in as firm a manner, as if he had been already placed on the throne again. Finding this anſwer of his ſo little to their ſatisfaction, they propoſed to ſend him a ſecond meſſage. Upon this the earls of Argyle, Annandale and Braidalbin withdrew from them. The earl of Annandale came up to the Bath, pretending ill health; and the earls of Argyle and Braidalbin went to Cheſter, pretending, as they ſaid afterwards, that they intended to diſcover the whole matter to the king; but he had paſſed over to Ireland, before they got to Cheſter. Montgomery, upon this looked on the deſign as broken; and ſo he went, and reconciled himſelf to earl Melvill, and diſcovered the whole negotiation to him. Upon which the earl preſſed the king to grant a general indemnity, and gave Montgomery a paſs to go to London, and wrote to the queen in his favour. But the king was reſolved to know the bottom of the plot, and particularly how far any of the Engliſh were engaged in it. So Montgomery abſconded for ſome time in London, ſince he ſaw no hopes of pardon, but upon a full diſcovery. A warrant was ſent to the Bath for the earl of Annandale, of which he had notice given him, and went up privately to London. Montgomery ſent Mr. Ferguſon to him, aſſuring him that he had diſcovered nothing, and deſiring him to continue firm and ſecret. But when he had certain notice that Montgomery had diſcovered all the negotiation among the Scots, he caſt himſelf on the queen's mercy, aſking no other conditions, but that he might not be made an evidence againſt others. He himſelf had not treated with any in England; ſo that, as to them, he was only a ſecond-hand witneſs. Only he informed againſt Nevil Payne, who had been ſent down to Scotland, to manage matters among them. Payne was taken there, but would confeſs nothing. Upon the earl of Annandale's information, which he gave upon oath, the earl of Nottingham wrote to the council of Scotland, that he had in his hands a depoſition upon oath, containing matter of high treaſon againſt Payne. Upon which it was pretended, that, according to the law of Scotland, he might be put to the torture; and that was executed with rigour. He reſiſted a double queſtion, yet was ſtill kept a priſoner; and this was much cried out againſt as barbarous and illegal. Montgomery lay hid for ſome months at London; but when he ſaw, that he could not have his pardon, but by making a full diſcovery, he choſe rather to go beyond ſea; ſo fatally did ambition and diſcontent hurry a man to ruin, who ſeemed capable of greater things. His art in managing ſuch a deſign, and his firmneſs in not diſcovering his accomplices, raiſed his character as much as it ruined his fortune. He continued in perpetual plots after this to no purpoſe. He was once taken, but made his eſcape; and at laſt, ſpleen and vexation put an end to a turbulent life.

The earl of Melvill had now a clear majority in parliament by the diſcovery of the plot. Some abſented themſelves; and others, to redeem themſelves, were compliant in all things. The main point, by which he deſigned to fix himſelf and his party, was the aboliſhing of epiſcopacy, and the ſetting up preſbytery. The one was ſoon done by repealing all the laws in favour of epiſcopacy, and declaring it contrary to the genius and conſtitution of that church and nation; for the king would not conſent to a plain and ſimple condemnation of it. But it was not ſo eaſy to ſettle preſbytery. If they had followed the pattern ſet them in the year 1638, all the clergy, in a parity, were to aſſume the government of the church; but thoſe being epiſcopal they did not think it ſafe to put the power of the church in ſuch hands. It was therefore pretended, that ſuch of the preſbyterian miniſters, as had been turned out in the year 1662, ought to be conſidered as the only ſound part of the church. And of theſe there happened to be then threeſcore alive.

us, but betrayed us ſo ſoon as they ſaw probability of effectuating their own deſigns, which was the only thing they had ſtill and all along aimed at, and not your ſervice, as they pretended.

"Some days before the prince of Orange went to Cheſter, I had notice given me by Mr. O——e that the lord Roſs deſigned to go to meet him, and make a diſcovery of all he knew; which made us ſend the earl of L——w to him, to try if he had ſuch inclinations. But he proteſted to the contrary with great oaths. Some were inclined to believe him, and others were for taking a ſure way to hinder his diſcovery, ſince their own lives and eſtates depended on your affairs. But it was of ſo dangerous a conſequence, and ſo unjuſt, unleſs we had great proof of ſuſpicion, that moſt of us abhorred the motion.

"A few days after, though he gave over his journey to Cheſter, believing by what the earl of L——w ſaid to him, that we ſuſpected him, and ſo might have way-laid him: yet notwithſtanding all his renewed oaths he ſent for one Mr. D——p, a fanatic miniſter, and revealed all to him, and alſo told him that he was under great troubles of conſcience, and deſired his prayers to enable him to open his heart to him. After long prayers, and many ſighs and tears, he told him all he knew. God was thanked, as being the effect, Mr. D——p's prayers being heard. The next morning he ſent the miniſter to lord Melvill, to tell him, that he had buſineſs of great importance to tell the queen, for which he deſired a paſs, and immediately had it; and before he went, he told Melvill in general, that there were dangerous matters againſt the king and government, in which he had too great a ſhare, and for which he ſought God's pardon, but was denied, and was now going to ſeek it from the queen, to whom he would diſcover all he knew when at London.

"The firſt meeting he had with the princeſs of Orange, he told her the the whole affair, and laid the blame on ſir James Montgomery. When ſhe had heard all the hiſtory, ſhe ſent for the earls of D——h and Nottingham, that he might tell it all over again before them. But when they came in, he denied all he had ſaid to the princeſs; he never thought ſhe would make any other uſe of it, than to prevent the danger ſhe and the king were in; but nothing ſhould ever force him to give evidence againſt thoſe he had been in friendſhip with. For this he was immediately ſent to the Tower, where he lay for eight or ten months; nor could any thing ever induce him to ſay more, though he had both threatenings and all arguments to inforce him.

"It was no ſooner known, that lord Roſs was gone, but his errand was made public. Mr. D——p (according to the cuſtom of his profeſſion) made no ſecret of his confeſſion; which ſo much alarmed ſir James Montgomery, that he reſolved not to be long behind him; for he ſaw himſelf ruined by his violent party. He had been profeſſing to all of them all along principles ſo far to the contrary; but to make a confeſſion to his mortal enemy lord Melvill, to ſeek mercy from the prince and princeſs of Orange, who, he knew, abhorred him, were a hard ſtep; yet with a good ſhare of confidence and aſſurance of making a fine ſtory of it to their advantage, he doubted not to ſucceed with lord Melvill. He inſinuated ſo far as to be truſted to go to London, to tell his buſineſs himſelf; and to gain the greater credit with Melvill, he put into his hands what letters he had received from the queen, which was a joyful ſight to him, he ventured to touch all the acts, (which was believed he could never do) which were diſpleaſing to the prince of Orange, though he was forced to pleaſe the club-party to put them in his inſtructions, and ſeveral for which he had no warrant, making the imminent dangers they were in an excuſe of all. In theſe letters were ſeveral promiſes of aſſiſtance from France, of men, money, and arms. He likewiſe gave up the inſtructions, ſent to the earl of A——t, when he ſhould be commiſſioner to the parliament. There was never a word mentioned of their patents, and remiſſions, which were ſent to duke Hamilton and others of their friends.

When ſir James Montgomery came to London, he was ſo cautious, as not to go near the princeſs of Orange, till he had aſſurance, that, in caſe they would not agree in their terms, he ſhould not be detained, which was granted. But though he confeſſed moſt of all that paſſed of his tranſactions with your majeſty; yet he would neither promiſe to be an evidence, nor give his advice how things might be prevented, (in which, to magnify himſelf, he made the hazard much greater than it was) unleſs he were ſecure of a full pardon of all the crimes he ſhould name, and then have a good employment; pretending the lowneſs of his eſtate, which was drained by the ſeverity of the laſt government. The princeſs of Orange would have willingly granted all he demanded, and wrote to the prince of Orange in his favour, into Ireland. But ſome things had paſſed betwixt the prince of Orange and ſir James in private, which made the prince to have ſuch an abhorrence of him, that he could not hear of employing him. A remiſſion he would have granted, upon condition of his being an evidence; but that could not do ſir James's buſineſs. So he abſented, and a few months after did all he could again to juſtify himſelf to your friends; which took not with a few. The earl of A——e quickly followed ſir James, yet went not to London, but lived privately at the Bath; which when it was known, there was a warrant ſent down to bring him up; but one Mr. * * who had been mayor of the town, helped him to eſcape. When he was come to London, Mr. Ferguſon maintained him privately for ſeveral weeks. At laſt he, wearied of lurking, ſent for Mr. L——t, whom lord Melvill kept then at London to do buſineſs in his abſence, and told him of the mayor of Bath, and of Mr. Ferguſon, that had entertained him; and ſigned a confeſſion the moſt ſcandalous, that any thing of the name of a gentleman ever did; for he not only told what had paſſed among us in public, but the private converſation he had with ſeveral of your friends, and likewiſe of Payne, all that had paſſed between them at their firſt meeting; for which Mr. Payne was put to the torture, and endured it with great courage and conſtancy. And that which made his part more baſe, was, after Mr. Payne had eſcaped out of priſon, and fled to Scotland, thinking he ſhould be ſecure with the earl of A——le, he came to a country-houſe, and was taken there by A——le's own ſervants, and brought to Edinburgh, where, upon the earl of A——le's confeſſion againſt him in England, he ſuffered the utmoſt barbarity. The treachery of theſe three made all our friends at Edinburgh ſo concerned, though they were not fully informed of their hazard, that moſt of them left it." Account of the affairs of Scotland, p. 122.

The

The government of the church was therefore lodged with them; and they were impowered to take to their aſſiſtance, and to a ſhare in the church-government, ſuch as they ſhould think fit. Some furious men, who had gone into very frantic principles, and all thoſe, who had been ſecretly ordained in the preſbyterian way, were preſently taken in. This was like to prove a fatal error at their firſt ſetting out. The old men among them, who by reaſon of their age or their experience of former miſtakes, were diſpoſed to more moderate councils; but the taking in ſuch a number of violent men, put it out of their power to purſue them. Theſe men broke out therefore in a moſt extravagant way of proceeding againſt ſuch of the epiſcopal party, as had eſcaped the rage of the former year. Accuſations were raiſed againſt them: ſome were charged for their doctrine, as guilty of arminianiſm; others were loaded with more ſcandalous imputations, but theſe were only thrown out to defame them; and where they looked for proof, it was in a way more becoming inquiſitors than judges; ſo apt are all parties, in their turns of power, to fall into thoſe very exceſſes, of which they did formerly make ſuch tragical complaints. All other matters were carried in the parliament of Scotland, as the lord Melvill and the preſbyterians deſired. In lieu of the king's ſupremacy, his majeſty had chimney-money given him; and a teſt was impoſed on all in office, or capable of electing or being elected to ſerve in parliament, declaring the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful ſovereigns, and renouncing any manner of title pretended to be in king James.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed in Scotland, the different parties in England were buſy in influencing the elections of Parliament men. There was a great ſtruggle all over the kingdom. The tories had taken care to publiſh a liſt of thoſe who had voted for the corporation-bill, in order to exaſperate the perſons that were to have been diſgraced by it; and by that and other means they became by far the greater number in the new parliament. One thing was a part of the bargain, which the tories had made, that the lieutenancy of London ſhould be changed; for upon the king's coming to the crown, he had given a commiſſion, out of which the tories were all excluded; which was ſuch a mortification to them, that they ſaid, they could not live in the city with credit, unleſs ſome of them were again brought into that commiſſion. The king recommended it to the biſhop of London, to prepare a liſt of thoſe, who were known to be churchmen, but of the more moderate, and of ſuch as were liable to no juſt exception, that ſo the two parties in the city might be kept in a balance. The biſhop brought in a liſt of the moſt violent tories in the city, who had been engaged in ſome of the worſt things, that paſſed in the end of king Charles's reign. A committee of council was appointed to examine the liſt; but it was ſo named, that they approved of it. This was done to the great grief of the whigs, who ſaid, that the king was now putting himſelf in his enemies hands, and that the arms of the city were now put under a ſet of officers, who, if there was a poſſibility of doing it without hazard, would certainly uſe them for king James. This matter was managed by the marquis of Carmarthen and the earl of Nottingham; but oppoſed by the earl of Shrewſbury, who was much troubled at the ill conduct of the whigs, but much more at this great change in the king's government. It was alſo a farther mortification to the whigs, when the commons in the next parliament made an addreſs to the king, thanking him for the alterations he had made in the lieutenancy of London.

The elections of parliament went generally for men, who would probably have declared for king James, if they could have known how to manage matters for him. The king made a change in the miniſtry, to give them ſome ſatisfaction; the earls of Monmouth and Warrington were both diſmiſſed. Other leſſer changes were made in inferior places, ſo that whig and tory were now pretty equally mixed.

The parliament being met on the 20th of March, the commons, by the king's order, proceeded to the choice of a ſpeaker; and ſir John Trevor was pitched upon for that office. He was a bold and dextrous man, and knew the moſt effectual ways of recommending himſelf to every government. He had been ſpeaker to king James's parliament, and in great favour with that prince, by whom he was made maſter of the rolls; and if Jefferies had ſtuck at any thing, he was looked upon as the likelieſt man to have had the great ſeal. He now got himſelf to be choſen ſpeaker; and was made firſt commiſſioner of the great ſeal. Being a tory in principle, he undertook to manage that party, provided he was furniſhed with ſuch ſums of money, as might purchaſe ſome votes; and by him began the practice of buying off men, in which the king had hitherto kept to ſtricter rules. But the king, though he hated the practice, ſaw it was not poſſible to avoid it, ſuch was the corruption of the age, unleſs he would endanger the whole.

The ſpeaker being choſen, and preſented the next day to the king, his majeſty made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I AM reſolved to leave nothing unattempted on my part, which may contribute to the peace and proſperity of this nation. And finding my preſence in Ireland will be abſolutely neceſſary for the more ſpeedy reducing of that kingdom, I continue my reſolution of going thither as ſoon as may be; and I have now called you together, for your aſſiſtance to enable me to proſecute the war with ſpeed and vigour, in which I aſſure myſelf of your chearful concurrence, being a work ſo neceſſary for your own ſafeties.

In order to this I deſire you will forthwith make a ſettlement of the revenue; and I cannot doubt but you will herein have as much regard to the honour and dignity of the monarchy in my hands, as has been lately ſhewed to others. And I have ſo great a confidence in you, that if no quicker or more convenient way can be found for the raiſing of ready money, (without which the ſervice cannot be performed) I ſhall be very well content for the preſent to have it made ſuch a fund of credit, as may be uſeful to yourſelves, as well as me, in this conjuncture; not having the apprehenſions, but that you will provide for the taking off all ſuch anticipations, as it ſhall happen to fall under. It is ſufficiently known, how earneſtly I have endeavoured to extinguiſh, or, at leaſt, compoſe all differences amongſt my ſubjects; and to that end, how often I have recommended 'an act of indemnity' to the laſt parliament. But ſince that part of it, which related to the preventing of private ſuits, is already enacted; and becauſe debates of that nature muſt take up more of your time, than can now be ſpared from the diſpatch of thoſe other things which are abſolutely neceſſary for our common ſafety; I intend to ſend you an 'act of grace,' with exceptions of ſome few perſons only, but ſuch as may be ſufficient to ſhew my great diſlike of their crimes, and at the ſame time my readineſs to extend protection to all my other ſubjects, who will thereby ſee, that they can recommend themſelves to me by no other methods, than what the laws preſcribe, which ſhall always be the only rule of my government.

"A farther reaſon, which induceth me to ſend you this act at this time, is, becauſe I am deſirous to leave no colour of excuſe to any of my ſubjects for raiſing of diſturbances in the government, and eſpecially in the time of my abſence. And I ſay this, both to inform you, and to let ſome ill-affected men ſee, that I am not unacquainted, how buſy they are in their preſent endeavours to alter it.

"Amongſt other encouragements, which I find they give themſelves, one of the ways, by which they hope to compaſs their deſigns, is by creating differences and diſagreements in your councils; which, I hope, you will be very careful to prevent. For be aſſured, that our greateſt enemies can have no better inſtruments for their purpoſes, than thoſe, who ſhall any way endeavour to diſturb or delay your ſpeedy and unanimous proceedings upon theſe neceſſary matters.

"I muſt recommend alſo to your conſideration an union with Scotland. I do not mean, it ſhould be now entered upon: but they having propoſed this to me ſometime ſince, and the parliament there having nominated commiſſioners for that purpoſe, I ſhould be glad, that commiſſioners might alſo be nominated here to treat with them, and to ſee, if ſuch terms could be agreed on, as might be for the benefit of both nations, ſo as to be ready to be preſented to you in ſome future ſeſſion.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I have thought it moſt convenient to leave the adminiſtration of the government in the hands of the queen during my abſence; and if it ſhall be judged neceſſary to have an act of parliament for the better confirmation of it to her, I deſire you will let ſuch a one be prepared to be preſented to me.

"I have this only to add, that the ſeaſon of the year, and my my journey into Ireland, will admit but of a very ſhort ſeſſion; ſo that I muſt recommend to you the making ſuch diſpatch, that we may not be engaged in debates, when our enemies ſhall be in the field. For the ſucceſs of war, and the more thrifty management of it, will both principally depend upon your ſpeedy reſolutions. And I hope it will not be long before we ſhall meet again, to perfect what the time will not now allow to be done."

Purſuant to this ſpeech, the commons immediately proceeded to ſettle the revenue, and make it a fund of credit for the ſupplies which were ſtill wanted for the next campaign [y]. They began with voting a ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds, between that time and Michaelmas, of which two hundred thouſand pounds was to be raiſed by a poll, and a million by a clauſe of credit in the revenue bills. Though the whigs now as well as the tories ſtudied to court the king, by making advances upon the money-bills, yet he could not prevail to have the revenue ſettled for life, which he moſt earneſtly deſired. All he could obtain was to have the hereditary exciſe ſettled for life, and the cuſtoms to be continued only for four years, from the 24th of December next enſuing [z]. The ſettling the revenue thus for a term of

2. Poundage, payable in ready money upon all goods, and merchandiſes imported, (except wines) according to the rate of twelve pence a pound, or five per cent. for the Engliſh, and two ſhillings a pound, or ten per cent. for Aliens. And alſo, for every piece of broad cloth exported by Engliſh three-ſhillings and four-pence, by Aliens ſix-ſhillings and eight-pence.

Upon the model of this old ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, there have (as ſhall be remembered in the proper places) been granted by ſubſequent acts of parliament, for defraying the expences of war, &c. ſeveral additional ſubſidies, impoſitions and new duties; which being to be levied after the manner of the old ſubſidy, are uſually, though improperly comprehended under the general title of cuſtoms. As 'the new ſubſidy, one third ſubſidy, two thirds ſubſidy, &c.'

By this means the cuſtoms are now really become a perfect ſcience, there having been no leſs, than thirty additional branches, or particular duties, impoſed ſince the reſtoration.

The next branch of the revenue, ſettled on king Charles II, was the hereditary exciſe, which was given him in lieu of the courts of wards and liveries, and by an act entitled "A grant of certain impoſitions upon beer, ale, and other liquors for the increaſe of his majeſty's revenue during his life." The rates were,

Strong water imported per gall.	0	0	4
Coffee made and ſold per gall.	0	0	4
Chocolate, ſherbet, and tea, per gall.	0	0	8

The collecting the exciſe in this manner upon coffee, tea and chocolate, being found very troubleſome, it was repealed by king William, and a duty laid upon thoſe commodities, to be paid at the cuſtom-houſe.

About the ſame time, the poſt-office was eſtabliſhed, which had been firſt erected under Cromwell, and the wine-licences were alſo granted. After which, another branch of the revenue was ſettled for life on king Charles II, namely, the chimney money, or two ſhillings a year upon every fire-hearth. This was aboliſhed by king William. Theſe branches were then valued in the following manner,

The cuſtoms were farmed at about	350,000
The hereditary and temporary exciſe farmed at	275,000
Wine licences	7,000
Hearth-money	100,000

The ſmall branches	£.

Foreſt of Dean	5,000	—130,000
Courts of juſtice	6,000
Firſt-fruits	18,000

The crown-lands were ſold in 1670, for about 1,300,000 pounds, by which means the ſmall branches were reduced to about 60,000 pounds a year.

The hereditary exciſe only was now ſettled upon king William for life, with a clauſe to make it a ſecurity for raiſing 250,000 pounds. The old ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, or the cuſtoms, were continued for four years, with a clauſe to make it a ſecurity for raiſing 500,000 pounds. In the bill for the hereditary revenues a clauſe was added, 'that theſe revenues having been much encumbered by letters-patents in the late reigns, all penſions or ſums of money granted hereafter by letters-patents, out of any part of the hereditary-exciſe, poſt-office, or wine-licences, ſhall ceaſe at the death of the king or queen who ſhall make any ſuch grant. Pro. H. C. II. 381.

[y] Sir Charles Sidley, a gentleman of great wit, made the following ſpeech on this occaſion againſt penſions and ſalaries, which is inſerted here, not ſo much becauſe it is thought very a propos at that juncture, but becauſe it is mentioned with applauſe by moſt of the hiſtorians; "Mr. Speaker, we have provided for the army; we have provided for the navy; and now at laſt a new reckoning is brought us, we muſt likewiſe provide for the liſts. Truly, Mr. Speaker, it is a ſad reflection, that ſome ſhould wallow in wealth and places, whilſt others pay away in taxes the fourth part of their revenues for the ſupport of the ſame government. We are not upon equal terms for his majeſty's ſervice; the courtiers and great officers charge, as it were, in armour; they feel not the taxes by reaſon of their places, whilſt the country gentlemen are ſhot through and through by them. The king is pleaſed to lay his wants before us, and, I am confident, expects our advice upon it. We ought therefore to tell him what penſions are too great; what places may be extinguiſhed, during the time of the war and public calamity. His majeſty ſees nothing but coaches and ſix and great tables, and therefore cannot imagine the want and miſery of the reſt of his ſubjects. He is a brave and generous prince, but he is a young king, encompaſſed and hemmed in by a company of crafty old courtiers. To ſay no more, ſome have places of three thouſand pounds, ſome of ſix thouſand pounds, and others of eight thouſand ſix hundred pounds per annum, and I am told, the commiſſioners of the treaſury have one thouſand ſix hundred pounds per annum a piece. Certainly public penſions, whatever they have been formerly, are much too great for the preſent war and calamity, that reigns every where elſe. And it is a ſcandal, that a government ſo ſick at heart as ours is, ſhould look ſo well in the face. We muſt ſave the king's money wherever we can; for I am afraid the war is too great for our purſes, if things be not managed with all imaginable thrift. When the people of England ſee all things ſaved, that can be ſaved; that there are no exorbitant penſions nor unneceſſary ſalaries, and all this applied to the uſe, to which they are given; we ſhall give, and they ſhall pay whatever his majeſty can want, to ſecure the proteſtant religion, and to keep out the king of France, and king James too; whom, by the way, I have not heard named this ſeſſion, whether out of fear, diſcretion, or reſpect, I cannot tell. I conclude, Mr. Speaker, let us ſave the king what we can; and then let us proceed to give what we are able."

[z] In order to have a diſtinct notion of the revenue, it muſt be obſerved, that the duties upon the exportation and importation of merchandizes croſſing the ſeas, (for protection of trade &c.) were the moſt antient tribute paid to our kings, and diſtinguiſhed by two different names, cuſtoms and priſes, or priſage.

Priſage was a duty payable for foreign commodities imported, not at any certain ſum of money, but by taking ſuch a part in ſpecie, as the kings thought ſufficient for their own uſe, paying ſuch a price as they thought reaſonable, which was called the king's price. For wines it was the practice to take one tun in ten, or two in twenty; paying twenty ſhillings a tun, and the price of the priſage of other goods, was doubtleſs in proportion. This duty was remitted by the mercatorial charter, granted by king Edward I, to all merchant ſtrangers, who in lieu of it gave him a duty of three pence in the pound (commonly called petty-cuſtom,) upon all native commodities exported over and above the great cuſtoms, and alſo upon all merchandizes imported, except wines; and upon all wines imported, two ſhillings for every tun; being the duty ſince called butlerage.

Cuſtoms were the duty payable for native commodities exported, particularly wool, wool-fells and leather, after certain rates; and from their antiquity were called 'great and ancient cuſtoms.' But now, the word cuſtoms is uſed to ſignify the ſeveral duties which are payable on the importation, as well as exportation of all goods, and merchandizes whatſoever, and are always compoſed of two parts, tonnage and poundage.

Tonnage was payable upon all wines imported after the particular rates, and according to the methods preſcribed by the laws which granted this duty, being at firſt, no more than two ſhillings a ton, though in ſucceeding reigns it was very much increaſed.

Poundage was payable on all other merchandiſes imported and exported, according to the rates and values preſcribed by the ſeveral laws, by which this duty was granted, being at firſt no more than ſixpence in the pound of the particular rates and values, though afterwards advanced to twelve pence in the pound. To this ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, there was likewiſe, in the latter reigns, annexed,

A ſubſidy of woollen cloths or old drapery which was payable upon all woollen cloths exported, according to certain rates and proportions.

Theſe ſubſidies after having undergone various regulations, were after the reſtoration ſettled on the foundations they now ſtand, and granted to king Charles II, for life. The firſt act paſſed for that purpoſe, was entitled "a ſubſidy granted to the king of tonnage and poundage, and other ſums of money, payable upon merchandiſe exported and imported, referring to and enforcing 'a book of rates of merchandiſe,' and according to which, the ſaid duties were to be levied and collected."

This ſubſidy is called 'the old ſubſidy, or ſubſidy inwards' conſiſting of two diſtinct parts.

1. Tonnage, payable in ready money upon all wines, except priſage-wines after the following rates.

years, made it, as they ſaid, a ſurer fund for borrowing money upon than if given for life: the one was ſubject to accidents, the other was more certain. Beſides it was taken up as a maxim, that a revenue for a ſhort term was the beſt ſecurity that the nation could have for frequent parliaments. However the king did not like this, and thought it ſtrange that a jealouſy ſhould be entertained of him, who came to ſave religion and liberty, and king James ſo much truſted, who intended to deſtroy both. But being told that it was not of him but of his ſucceſſors that the jealouſy was entertained, and if he would accept the gift for a term of years, and ſettle the precedent, he would be reckoned the deliverer of future ages as well as of the preſent, he was perſuaded to take the grant as it was made him. In all probability king James would never have run into thoſe counſels that ruined him, had he not obtained the revenue for life. The commons granted likewiſe the poll-bill, with ſome other ſupplies, which they thought would anſwer all the occaſions of the year. But as what they gave did not quite come up to what was demanded; ſo when the ſupply was raiſed, it came far ſhort of what it was eſtimated at; ſo there were great deficiencies to be taken care of in every ſeſſion of parliament, which run up every year, and made a great noiſe, as if the nation was, through miſmanagement, running into a great arrear.

The firſt great debate aroſe in the houſe of lords, upon a bill that was brought in acknowledging the king and queen to be their rightful and lawful ſovereigns, and declaring all the acts of the convention-parliament to be good and valid. The firſt part paſſed with little contradiction, though ſome excepted to the words rightful, and lawful, as not at all neceſſary. But the other article, declaring the acts of the laſt parliament to be good and valid, bore a long and warm debate. The tories offered to enact, that theſe ſhould be all good laws for the time to come, but oppoſed the doing it in the declaratory way. They ſaid, that it was one of the fundamentals of our conſtitution, that no aſſembly could be called a parliament, unleſs it was called and choſen upon the king's writ. On the other hand it was ſaid, that whatſoever tended to the authority of that parliament in queſtion, tended likewiſe to the weakening of the preſent government, and brought the king's title into queſtion. That a real neceſſity, upon ſuch extraordinary occaſions, muſt ſuperſede forms of law; otherwiſe the preſent government was under the ſame nullity. That forms were only rules for peaceable times; but in ſuch a juncture, when all that had a right to come, either in perſon, or by their repreſentatives, were ſummoned and freely elected; and when, by the king's conſent, the convention was turned into a parliament, the eſſentials, both with relation to the king and people, were ſtill maintained in the conſtitution of that parliament. After a long debate the act paſſed in the houſe of lords with this temper, declaring and enacting that the acts of the convention-parliament were and are good and valid. Many lords, at the head of whom was the earl of Nottingham, entered the following proteſts againſt it:

"1ſt. Becauſe we conceive, that ſaying, 'It is enacted by the authority of the preſent parliament, that all and ſingular the acts made in the laſt parliament were laws,' is neither good Engliſh nor good ſenſe.

"2dly, If it were good ſenſe to enact for the time paſt, it muſt be underſtood, on this ſubject, to be the declaring of laws to be good, which were paſſed in a parliament not called by writ in due form of law; which is deſtructive of the legal conſtitution of this monarchy, and may be of evil and pernicious conſequence to our preſent government under this king and queen [a]."

But theſe reaſons of diſſent were ordered to be expunged out of the journal of the houſe of lords, againſt which another proteſt was entered as againſt an unprecedented thing.

The bill being paſſed and ſent down to the commons, it was expected that it would have occaſioned long and great debates. But to the wonder of all men it paſſed that houſe in two days, without any debate or oppoſition. The truth was, the tories had reſolved to commit the bill; and in order to that, ſome trifling exceptions were made to ſome words, that might want correction; for bills are not committed, unleſs ſome amendments are offered; and it was reſolved to oppoſe it, when it ſhould be committed. But one of the party diſcovered this deſign too early, for he queſtioned the legality of the convention, ſince it was not ſummoned by writ. Mr. Sommers, the ſolicitor-general, anſwered this with great ſpirit, declaring, if that was not a legal parliament, they who were then met, and had taken the oaths, enacted by that parliament, were guilty of high-treaſon: That the laws repealed by it were ſtill in force; and therefore they muſt preſently return to king James; and that all the money levied, collected, and paid, by virtue of the acts of that parliament, made every one, who was concerned in it, highly criminal. This he ſpoke with much zeal, and ſuch an aſcendant of authority, that none were prepared to anſwer it; ſo the bill paſſed without any more oppoſition. This was a great ſervice, done in a very critical time, and contributed not a little to raiſe Mr. Sommers's character.

The greateſt debate in this ſeſſion, was concerning a bill that was brought into the houſe of commons, requiring all their majeſties ſubjects to abjure the late king James under pain of impriſonment. Some of the tories were at firſt for it, as were all the whigs. The clergy were excepted out of it, to ſoften the oppoſition that might be made. But ſtill the main body of the tories declared, they would never take any ſuch oath; and therefore oppoſed every ſtep, that was made in it with a great vehemence: They inſiſted much on this, 'That when the government was ſettled, oaths were made to be the ties of the ſubject to it; and that all new impoſitions, were a breach made on that, which might be called the original contract of the preſent ſettlement. That things of that kind ought to be fixed and certain, and not mutable and endleſs. That by the ſame reaſon, that the abjuration was now propoſed, another oath might be prepared every year; and every party, that prevailed in parliament, would bring in ſome diſcriminating oath or teſt, ſuch as could only be taken by thoſe of their own ſide; and thus the largeneſs and equality of a government would be loſt, and contracted into a faction.' On the other ſide it was urged, 'that this was only intended to be a ſecurity to the government during the war; for in ſuch a time it ſeemed neceſſary, that all, who were employed by the government, ſhould give it all poſſible ſecurity. That it was apparent, that the comprehenſive words in the oaths of allegiance had given occaſion to much equivocation; many who had taken them, having declared, as ſome had done in print, that they conſidered themſelves as bound by the oaths only while the king continued in peaceable poſſeſſion; but not to aſſiſt or ſupport his title, if it was attacked or ſhaken. That it was therefore neceſſary, that men in public truſts ſhould be brought under ſtricter ties.' The abjuration was debated in both houſes at the ſame time. The whigs preſſed the king to ſet it forward; alledging, that every one, who took it, would look on himſelf as unpardonable, and ſo would ſerve him with the more zeal and fidelity; whereas thoſe, who thought the right to the crown to be ſtill in king James, might perhaps ſerve faithfully as long as the government ſtood firm; but as they ſtill kept meaſures with the other ſide, to whom they knew they would be always welcome, ſo they will never act with that life and zeal, which the preſent ſtate of affairs required. At the ſame time the tories were as earneſt in preſſing the king to ſtop the farther progreſs of thoſe debates; that much time was already loſt in them; and it was evident, that much more muſt be loſt, if it was intended to carry it on; ſince ſo many branches of this bill, and ſo many incidents, that aroſe upon the ſubject of it, would give occaſion to much heat and conteſt; and it was a doubt, whether it would be carried, after all the time, which was beſtowed upon it, or not: That thoſe, who oppoſed it, would grow ſullen, and oppoſe every thing elſe that was moved for the king's ſervice; and that, if it ſhould be carried, it would put the king again into the hands of the whigs, who would immediately return to their old practices againſt the prerogative; and that it would drive many into king James's party, who might otherwiſe adhere firmly to his majeſty, or at leaſt be neutral. Theſe reaſons prevailed with the king to order an intimation to be given in the houſe of commons, that he deſired they would let that debate fall, and go to other matters, that were more preſſing [b].

This gave a new diſguſt to the whigs, but was very ac-

[b] When this bill was read the third time, a motion was made to have it committed; which paſſed in the negative, a hundred and ſeventy-eight for it, and a hundred and ninety-two againſt it. This, in great meaſure, ſhews how the houſe was divided at that time as to tories and whigs. Pr. H. C. II. 378.

ceptable to the tories; and it quickened the advances of money upon the funds, that were given. It had indeed a very ill effect abroad; for both friends and enemies looked on it as a ſign of a great declenſion of the king's intereſt with his people. And his majeſty interpoſing to ſtop further debates in the matter, was repreſented as an artifice only, to ſave the affront of its being rejected. The earl of Shrewſbury was at the head of thoſe, who preſſed the abjuration moſt; and therefore, upon this change of counſels, thought he could not ſerve the king longer with reputation or ſucceſs. He ſaw the whigs, by uſing his majeſty ill, were driving him into the hands of the tories; and he thought, that theſe would ſerve the king with more zeal, if he left his poſt. Beſides, the credit, that the marquis of Carmarthen gained, was not eaſy to him. For theſe reaſons he reſolved to deliver up the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate [c].

The king ſent Dr. Tillotſon, and all thoſe, who had moſt credit with the earl, to divert him from his reſolution; but all was to no purpoſe. The agitation of mind, which this gave his lordſhip, threw him into a fever, that almoſt coſt him his life. The king preſſed him to keep the ſeals, till his return from Ireland, though he ſhould not act as ſecretary; but he could not be prevailed upon.

The debate upon the abjuration laſted longer in the houſe of lords. It had ſome variation from that, which was propoſed in the houſe of commons, and was properly an oath of a ſpecial fidelity to the king in oppoſition to king James. The tories offered, in bar of this, a negative engagement againſt aſſiſting king James, or any of his inſtruments, knowing them to be ſuch, with ſevere penalties on ſuch as ſhould refuſe it. In oppoſition to this, it was ſaid, that this was only an expedient to ſecure all king James's party, whatever ſhould happen, ſince it left them the entire merit of being ſtill in his intereſts, and only reſtrained them from putting any thing to hazard for him. The houſe was ſo near an equality in every diviſion, that what was gained in one day, was loſt in the next; and by the heat and length of thoſe debates the ſeſſion continued till June.

The king having declared in his ſpeech, his intention to leave the adminiſtration of the government in the hands of the queen, and propoſed the having it confirmed by an act, if judged neceſſary, a bill was accordingly prepared for that purpoſe, by which the queen was inveſted with the adminiſtration of affairs, not only during the king's being in Ireland, but whenever he ſhould be called out of the kingdom; with this reſtriction however, "that the queen might be controlled by an order from his majeſty, while he was abroad." During the debates, the queen ſeemed to take no notice of the matter, nor of thoſe that had appeared for and againſt it. When this bill received the royal aſſent, an act was alſo paſſed for reverſing the judgment on a quo warranto, againſt the city of London, and reſtoring it to its ancient rights and privileges. This bill had been projected by the tories, and was intended to change the hands which then governed the city: But through haſte or weakneſs of thoſe, who drew it, the court of aldermen was not comprehended in it. So that by this act, the city was fixed in their hands, who were generally whigs.

The bill of indemnity which had cauſed ſo many debates in every ſeſſion, and had been ſo conſtantly and ſo earneſtly recommended by the king, did at laſt paſs both houſes. Of all the late inſtruments of popery and arbitrary power, thirty-five only were expreſsly excepted, and of them few or none were made examples of the juſtice of the nation [d].

The king thought fit to put an end to the ſeſſion with this act of grace, and coming to the houſe of peers for that purpoſe, made the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have had ſuch aſſurance of your good affections to me, that I come now to thank you particularly for the ſupply you have given me. The ſeaſon of the year is ſo far advanced, that I cannot longer delay my going into Ireland; and therefore I think it neceſſary to have an adjournment of the parliament. And though it ſhall be but to a ſhort day, yet unleſs ſome great occaſion require it, (of which you ſhall have due notice) I do not intend you ſhall ſit to do buſineſs until the winter; and, I hope, by the bleſſing of God, we ſhall then have a happy meeting."

"In the mean time I recommend to you the diſcharge of your duties in your reſpective counties, that the peace of the nation may be ſecured by your vigilance and care in your reſpective ſtations."

Then the lord chief baron Atkyns ſignified his majeſty's pleaſure, that both houſes ſhould adjourn to the 7th of July; after which the parliament was twice prorogued, twice adjourned, and then prorogued again [e].

To prevent any attempt againſt the peace of the nation, during his majeſty's abſence, the deputy-lieutenants were authoriſed to raiſe the militia in caſe of neceſſity, and all papiſts ordered to the places of their abode, and not ſtir above five miles from thence without leave. A proclamation was likewiſe publiſhed, for the apprehending of ſeveral diſaffected perſons, who, as his majeſty was informed, had conſpired to raiſe a rebellion, and for that purpoſe had made proviſion of arms, and had liſted themſelves into ſeveral regiments.

[c] Biſhop Burnet was the firſt perſon, to whom the earl diſcovered this; he had the ſeals in his hand, when he told that prelate of his reſolution, who prevailed with him not to go that night. The earl was in ſome heat; and the biſhop was afraid, that he might have ſaid ſuch things to the king, as would have provoked him too much. The biſhop therefore ſent the king word of it; who was very much troubled at it. He loved the earl; and apprehended, that his leaving his ſervice at this time might alienate the whigs more entirely from him; for now they, who thought the earl before of too cold a temper, when they ſaw, how firm he was, came to conſider and truſt him more than ever.

When the bill of indemnity was ſent down to the commons, Mr. baron Turton brought this meſſage from the lords:

"Mr. Speaker, his majeſty hath been pleaſed to ſend this bill, which the lords have accepted and paſſed 'nemine contradicente,' and now ſend it down to this houſe." Though the commons immediately paſſed the bill; they demanded a conference, in which they intended to acquaint their lordſhips, "that it is unuſual for either houſe to acquaint the other by what number any bill before them do paſs, and the introducing any alteration in the uſual method of proceeding may be of dangerous conſequences." But a ſtop was put to this affair by the adjournment.

[e] In this ſeſſion were paſſed,

1. An act for enabling the ſale of goods diſtrained for rent, in caſe the rent be not paid in a reaſonable time.
2. An act for diſcouraging the importation of thrown ſilk, except of the growth of Italy, Sicily, or Naples.
3. An act to declare the right and freedom of election of members, to ſerve in parliament for the Cinque Ports. Before this act, the wardens of the Cinque Ports, claimed a right of nominating to each of the Cinque Ports one perſon to ſerve as a baron or member of Parliament.

The honours and promotions about this time, were as follows: The king created April 17, Richard lord viſcount Lumley, earl of Scarborough in the county of York; Henry lord Delamere, earl of Warrington, in the county of Lancaſter; Henry lord de Grey of Rothen, a viſcount by the name and ſtile of viſcount de Longueville; and on the 21ſt of that month, the lord Willoughby of Ereſby, Chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter, was, by virtue of his majeſty's writ of ſummons, called up to the houſe of peers. About the ſame time his majeſty named admiral Torrington, ſir Ralph Delaval vice-admiral, and Mr. Rook rear-admiral, to command the red ſquadron of his fleet; and appointed Mr. Ruſſel admiral of the blue, with ſir John Aſhby vice-admiral, and ſir Cloudeſley Shovel rear-admiral under him. On the 30th of May he conſtituted Richard Pyne, eſq: ſir Richard Reeves, knt. and Robert Rochford, eſq; commiſſioners of the great ſeal of Ireland, as alſo commiſſioners of over and terminer, and general goal delivery within the ſaid kingdom; and on the 3d of June, ſir John Trevor, knt. ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, ſir William Rawlinſon, knt. and ſir George Hutchins, knt. were ſworn lords commiſſioners of the great ſeal of England, ſir Anthony Peck, who had been deſired to continue in that poſt, having declined it; and on the ſame day the marquis of Wincheſter, chamberlain to the queen, was ſworn of the privy council.

MS. Letter

But though many diſcoveries were made of the practices from St. Germains and Ireland, few were apprehended upon them, and thoſe were too inconſiderable to know more than that many were provided with arms and ammunition; and that a method was projected for bringing men together upon a call. However, on the fifth of June, Sir John Cockran and Mr. Ferguſon were ſeized on ſuſpicion of high-treaſon and treaſonable practices; Ferguſon having returned to his old habits of diſturbing the government, though he had been preferred by his majeſty to the place of houſe-keeper to the exciſe-office, worth near five hundred pounds per annum, with little trouble [f].

The day before the king ſet out for Ireland, he called biſhop Burnet into his cloſet, and ſeemed to have a great weight upon his ſpirits from the ſtate of his affairs, which were then very cloudy. He ſaid, that for his own part, he would either go through with his buſineſs, or periſh in it. He only pitied the poor queen, repeating that twice with great tenderneſs, and wiſhed, that thoſe who loved him, would wait much on her, and aſſiſt her. He lamented the factions and the heats, that were in the nation, and that the biſhops and clergy, inſtead of allaying them, did rather foment and inflame them. He declared, that going to a campaign, was naturally no unpleaſant thing to him; and he was ſure he underſtood that better than how to govern England. He added, that though he had no doubt or miſtruſt of the cauſe he went on, yet the going againſt king James in perſon was hard upon him, ſince it would be a vaſt trouble both to himſelf and to the queen, if he ſhould be either killed or taken priſoner. Then he diſmiſſed the biſhop, deeply affected with what he had ſaid [g].

The king ſet out for Ireland on the 4th of June, and on the 14th landed at Carrickfergus, being attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Mancheſter, and many other perſons of diſtinction; and the ſame evening went to Belfaſt, where he was met by duke Schomberg, the prince of Wirtembergh, major-general Kirk, and other general officers.

As to the affairs of Ireland before the king's arrival, the camp at Dundalk was not the only place which proved fatal to the Engliſh army; for both officers and ſoldiers died in great numbers in their winter-quarters; ſo that about the beginning of the new year, ſeveral regiments were broken into others, and the officers continued at half pay, till proviſions could be made for them in other regiments, whilſt others went over to England to raiſe recruits. However, the ſickneſs by degrees abating, duke Schomberg, who took a fatherly care of ſuch as ſurvived, found them very much refreſhed by the good proviſions he had procured for them, and rather inclined boldly to encounter death in the field, than languiſh in their quarters. About the beginning of February, the duke being informed that the enemy was drawing down ſome forces towards Dundalk, and that they had provided magazines with a deſign to diſturb his frontier garriſons, ſent a conſiderable body of horſe and foot that way, and marched himſelf, on the 11th towards Drummore to obſerve the enemy's motion. But the deſigns of the Iriſh lay, at this time, another way; for while the duke was upon this expedition, colonel Wooliey was informed, that they intended to fall upon Belturbat, a town, which that colonel had taken from them not long before. Upon this Wooliey marched with great diligence from Belturbat with ſeven hundred foot and three hundred horſe and dragoons, towards the enemy; but being unacquainted with their numbers, and they having had notice of his approach, inſtead of ſurprizing them, he was himſelf ſurprized, finding them nine thouſand ſtrong, and in a poſture to receive him. However there being no way to retreat either with honour or ſafety, he made his men ſenſible of their common danger, and ſo animated them by his own example, that having engaged the Iriſh, he defeated them with conſiderable loſs; purſued them as far as Cavan where they had a little fort; ſet that town on fire; and in his return to Belturbat, took the caſtle of Killiſhandra with a great booty of cattle. In the mean time ſir John Lanier, with a party of one thouſand horſe, foot, and dragoons, made an attempt upon Dundalk, took Bedloe caſtle, and about fifteen hundred cows and oxen; and ſir Cloudeſly Shovel on Good Friday, took the only frigate king James had in his poſſeſſion, in that prince's own ſight in Dublin Bay, notwithſtanding all the oppoſition, that could be made againſt him by ſea and land. But what afflicted king James more ſenſibly was the loſs of the caſtle of Charlemont, a ſtrong place, chiefly by nature, as being ſeated upon a piece of ground in the middle of the bay; and only acceſſible by two ways, which the Iriſh had partly broke down. This poſt being of great importance, duke Schomberg reſolved to make himſelf maſter of it, and ſucceeded in his attempt, partly by a ſtratagem. The garriſon of that place, which for ſome time had been blocked up by the French regiments of La Caillemote and Cambon, being put to great ſtraits for want of victuals, king James ſent a ſtrong detatchment under Mac Mahone with proviſion to relieve it. Duke Schomberg being informed of this, ordered the blockade to let Mac Mahone paſs with his convoy after a ſlight reſiſtance, but to drive back all that returned from the caſtle. By this means the garriſon, which had received but a ſlender ſupply of proviſions, and were forced to feed their new gueſts as well as themſelves, were ſoon reduced to greater exigencies than before; and by a vigorous proſecution of the ſiege forced at laſt to capitulate on the 13th of May. The next day they marched out to the number of eight hundred men; and the duke, who was come to view them, ſeeing many women and children among them, aſked the reaſon of it, ſince they could not but conſume their proviſions. He was anſwered, that the Iriſh were naturally very hoſpitable, and that they all fared alike. But the greateſt reaſon was, that the ſoldiers would not ſtay in the garriſon without their wives and miſtreſſes; the duke replied, that 'there was more love than policy in it.' There were found in the place good ſtore of ammunition, ſeventeen pieces of braſs cannon, and two mortars; ſo that the enemy might have held out longer, if they had not wanted either courage or proviſions. The ſame day that Charlemont ſurrendered, colonel Wooliey, who had been conſiderably reinforced by a party of Danes, made himſelf maſter of the ſtrong caſtle of Balingargy near Cavan. Upon the loſs of theſe conſiderable poſts, the Iriſh quitted and burnt ſeveral caſtles on that ſide, and prepared to abandon Dundalk, Ardee, Caſtle-Blaney, and Carichmarh-Croſs.

In this ſituation was Ireland, when the king arrived there, who two or three days after he came to Belfaſt marched to Liſburn, where duke Schomberg kept his head quarters, and from thence to Hilſborough, where on the 20th of June he publiſhed an order, forbidding the preſſing of horſes, and the committing of any violences on the country people; and having ſome cautious advices propoſed to the general officers, he declared, that 'He did not come there to let the graſs grow under his feet,' but would purſue the war with the utmoſt vigour. He ordered therefore the whole army to encamp at a place called Loughbritland, where upon an exact review he found them to conſiſt of thirty ſix thouſand Engliſh, Dutch, French, Danes, and Germans, all well appointed in every reſpect. From Loughbritland the king marched his army to Dundalk, where he did not ſtay long, but upon advice, that the enemy had abandoned Ardee, immediately directed his march thither.

King James and his court had been ſo much elated with the news of the debates in the Engliſh parliament, and of the diſtractions of the city of London, that they had flattered themſelves with falſe hopes, that the king durſt nor leave England, nor venture over to Ireland; and the king had been ſix days landed, before they knew any thing of it [h]. But no ſooner had king James certain intelligence of his arrival, but [f] MS. letter of Mr. Richard Warre to ſir William Colt, from Whitehall, June 1690. Ferguſon (ſays Burnet) was a hot and bold man, and naturally given to plotting; always unquiet and ſetting people on to ſome miſchief. He was concerned in the plots in king Charles IId's time; one of thoſe that preſſed the duke of Monmouth to invade England, ſaying, it was a good cauſe, and God would not leave them unleſs they left him. He was afterwards, as will be ſeen, in plots both againſt king William and queen Anne. He was at firſt among the preſbyterians, but being caſt out, he went among the independents, where his boldneſs raiſed him to ſome figure, though he was an empty man.

[g] How tender the king was of king James's perſon, appears from this inſtance. A propoſition was made to him, that a third rate ſhip, well manned by a faithful crew, and commanded by one, who had been well with king James, but in whom he might truſt, ſhould ſail to Dublin, and declare for king James. The perſon, who told biſhop Burnet this, offered to be the perſon, who ſhould carry the meſſage to king James, (for he was well known to him) to invite him to come on board, which he ſeemed to be ſure he would accept of; and, when he was aboard, they ſhould ſail away with him, and land him either in Spain or Italy, as the king ſhould deſire, and ſhould have twenty thouſand pounds to give him, when he ſhould be ſet aſhore. The king thought this a well formed deſign, and likely enough to ſucceed, but would not hearken to it, declaring, that he would have no hand in treachery; and alledging, that king James would certainly carry ſome of his guards and of his court aboard with him, who probably would make ſome oppoſition, and in the ſtruggle ſome accident might happen to king James's perſon, in which he would have no hand. The biſhop acquainted the queen with this, who ſhewed great tenderneſs for her father's perſon, and was much touched with the anſwer, which the king had made. Burnet II. 47.

[h] A party of two hundred foot and dragoons, June 19, going from Newry towards Dundalk, to diſcover the enemy; fell into an ambuſcade at a place called four-mile-houſe, and captain Farlow being taken priſoner, was the firſt who gave king James a certain account of king William's being in Ireland, for till then he would not believe it. Story's Cont. of the wars in Ireland, p. 19.

he began to ſtir, committing the guard of Dublin to a body of militia, under the command of colonel Lutterel, marched with about ſix thouſand French foot (old experienced ſoldiers lately come from France) to join the reſt of his forces, which now amounted to almoſt an equal number with the king's, beſides fifteen thouſand, which remained in garriſons. After the junction, a council of war was held, wherein both French and Iriſh were of opinion, that though they had a very advantageous poſt on the Boyne, yet their army being inferior both in number and in every thing elſe, they ſhould put too much to hazard, if they ſhould venture on a battle. They propoſed therefore the ſtrengthening their garriſons, and marching off to the Shannon with the horſe and a ſmall body of foot, till they ſhould ſee how matters went at ſea; for the French king had ſent them aſſurances, that he would not only ſet out a great fleet, but that, as ſoon as the ſquadron, which lay in the Iriſh ſeas, to guard the tranſport fleet, and to ſecure the king's paſſage over, ſhould ſail into the channel, to join the grand fleet of England, he would then ſend into the Iriſh ſeas a fleet of ſmall frigates and privateers to deſtroy the king's tranſports. This would have proved fatal, if it had taken effect; and the execution of it ſeemed eaſy and certain. It would have ſhut up the king in Ireland, till a new tranſport fleet could have been brought thither, which would have been the work of ſome months; ſo that England might have been loſt, before he could paſs the ſeas with his army.

The deſtruction of his tranſports muſt have likewiſe ruined his army; for his ſtores both of bread and ammunition were ſtill on board, and they ſailed along the coaſt, as he advanced on his march; nor was there in that coaſt a ſafe port to cover and ſecure them. The king indeed reckoned, that by the time the ſquadron, which lay in the Iriſh ſeas, ſhould be able to join the reſt of the fleet, they would have advanced as far as the mouth of the channel, where they would guard both England and Ireland. In expectation of this fleet of ſmaller veſſels, to deſtroy the king's tranſports, it was that king James's officers were againſt bringing the war to a ſpeedy concluſion. But in oppoſition to all their opinions, king James himſelf was poſitive, that they ſhould ſtay and defend the Boyne. If they ſhould abandon Dublin, they would ſo loſe their reputation, that the people would leave them and capitulate, and all their friends in England be alſo diſpirited. Therefore he reſolved to maintain the poſt he was in, and ſeemed pleaſed to think, that he ſhould have one fair battle for his crown. He had all the advantages he could deſire. The river was deep, and roſe very high every tide: There was a moraſs to be paſſed after the river, and then a riſing ground. But with all theſe advantages, he thought fit to order ſir Patrick Trant, the commiſſioner of the Iriſh revenue, to prepare him a ſhip at Waterford, that in caſe of a defeat, he might ſecure his retreat to France.

On the 30th of June the king being informed, that the enemy had repaſſed the Boyne, ordered his whole army to move by break of day in three lines towards the river, which was about three miles diſtant from them; whereupon the advanced guards of horſe, commanded by ſir John Lanier, moved in very good order, and by nine of the clock got within two miles of Drogheda. The king, who marched in the front of them, obſerving, that there was a hill to the eaſt of the enemy, and north from the town, rode thither to view their camp, which he found to be all along the river in two lines. Here the king held a long conſult with the prince of Denmark, the dukes of Schomberg and Ormond, count Solmes, major-general Scravenmore, the lord Sidney, and other great officers, who made all their obſervations upon the enemy. Among the reſt Scravenmore ſeemed to deſpiſe them, ſaying, they were but an handful of men, for he could not reckon above forty-ſix battalions, that lay encamped. But the king and prince George juſtly anſwered, that they might have a great many men in the town; and that there was alſo a hill to the ſouth-weſt, beyond which part of their army might be encamped. "However," added the king, "we ſhall ſoon be better acquainted with their numbers." From this place the king rid on to the paſs at the Old-bridge, and ſtood upon the ſide of the bank within muſket-ſhot of the ford, to take there a nearer view of the enemies ſituation; and ſome time after rid about two hundred paces up the river, nigh the weſt of all the enemies camp. Whilſt the army was marching, he alighted from his horſe, and ſate down upon a riſing ground, where he refreſhed himſelf for about an hour; during which time a party of about forty horſe advancing very ſlowly, made a ſtand upon a plowed field over againſt the king, and brought two field-pieces with them, which they planted at the corner of a hedge undiſcovered. The king was no ſooner re-mounted, but the Iriſh fired at him, and with the firſt ſhot killed a man and two horſes very near him. This bullet was preſently ſucceeded by another, which having firſt grazed on the bank of the river, did in its riſing ſlant upon the king's right ſhoulder, took out a piece of his coat, and ſtruck off the ſkin, and afterwards broke the head of a gentleman's piſtol. Mr. Coningſby, afterwards earl Coningſby, rid up and clapped his handkerchief upon the wound, while the king himſelf mounted again and kept on his pace, and only ſaid, 'There was no neceſſity the bullet ſhould have come nearer.' The enemy ſeeing ſome diſorder among thoſe, who attended the king, concluded, that he was killed, and immediately ſet up a ſhout all over their camp, and drew down ſeveral ſquadrons of their horſe upon a plain towards the river, as if they meant to paſs and purſue the Engliſh army. Nay, the report of the king's death flew preſently to Dublin, and from thence ſpread as far as Paris, where the people were encouraged to expreſs their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

The king having got his ſlight wound dreſſed, mounted again on horſeback, and ſhewed himſelf to the whole army, in order to diſſipate their apprehenſions. He continued on horſeback, without the leaſt concern, till four in the afternoon, when he dined in the field, and in the evening mounted again, though he had been up from one in the morning. About nine at night he called a council of war, and declared his reſolution to paſs the river the next day; which duke Schomberg at firſt oppoſed; and finding the king poſitive, adviſed, that part of the army, horſe and foot, ſhould be ſent that night towards Slane-bridge, in order to paſs the Boyne there, and ſo get between the enemy and the paſs at Duleck. This advice, which if followed, would perhaps have ended the war in one campaign, ſeemed at firſt to be reliſhed; but being afterwards oppoſed by the Dutch generals, duke Schomberg retired to his tent, where not long after the order of battle was brought him, which he received with diſcontent and indifference, ſaying, 'It was the firſt that ever was ſent him.' Lieutenant-general Douglas was to command the right wing of foot, and count Maynard de Schomberg the horſe, who were to march on early towards Slane-bridge, and other fords up the river, to flank the enemy, or get between their camp and Drogheda, whilſt a body of foot were to force their way at the paſs at Old Bridge.

On the other ſide, king James having alſo called a council, Lieutenant general Hamilton adviſed him to ſend a party of dragoons to the ford, which was below the town of Drogheda, which the Engliſh either knew not of, or elſe did not regard; and all the reſt, being eight regiments, towards the bridge of Slane. But king James ſaid, he would ſend fifty dragoons up the river, which juſtly put Hamilton into great amazement, conſidering the importance of the place to be defended.

Towards the cloſe of the evening the cannon ceaſed on both ſides, when the king gave orders, that every ſoldier ſhould be provided with a good ſtock of ammunition, and all to be ready to march at break of day, with every man a green bough or ſprig in his hat, to diſtinguiſh him from the enemy, who wore pieces of white paper in their hats. The word that night being 'Weſtminſter,' the king rode in perſon about twelve at night with torches quite through the army, and then retired to his tent, impatient of the approaching day.

The expected day being come, about ſix in the morning lieutenant-general Douglaſs marched towards the right with ſome foot, as did count Schomberg with the horſe; which the enemy obſerving, drew out their horſe and foot to oppoſe them. King William's right wing was at firſt ordered to paſs all at Slane; but upon better information from the guides, ſeveral regiments were commanded to go over at other fords between the camp and that place. When the horſe approached the river, a regiment of the enemies dragoons made a ſhew of oppoſing their paſſage; but being ſoon forced to retire with loſs, the Engliſh got over, and advanced towards the enemy's main body, which they found drawn up in two lines. Hereupon Douglaſs drew up his detachment in two lines alſo; but having ſix battalions of foot to twenty-four ſquadrons of horſe, he ſent for more foot; and in the mean time, according to the earl of Portland's advice, the horſe and foot were intermixed for their greater ſecurity. More foot being come up, this figure was immediately altered, and all the horſe drawn to the right, whilſt the foot moved towards a bog on the left, which lay between them and the enemy, and through which it was impoſſible for the horſe to march. The Iriſh obſerving their motion, retreated in ſome haſte towards Duleck, but were vigorouſly purſued by count Schomberg.

Though the king was ignorant of what had paſſed between his men and the enemy, yet ſuppoſing, that by this time they were over the river, ordered three attacks to be made; the firſt at a good ford before a ſmall village, where the Iriſh were advantageouſly poſted. The Dutch regiment of foot-guards took the river firſt at Old Bridge, wading to the middle, and being got over amidſt the enemy's fire, without making halt, drew up in two files, and then fired upon the Iriſh, who not bearing the charge abandoned their intrenchments. But before the third battalion of that regiment had paſſed the ford, five battalions of the enemy advanced very boldly within piſtol-ſhot of the Dutch, who received them ſo warmly, that they retreated with the loſs of ſome men and one pair of colours. Upon this the Dutch marched beyond the village, and repulſed a ſquadron of king James's horſe, that would have ſtopt their progreſs.

At the ſame time a ſquadron of general Hamilton's horſe rode briſkly to the very brink of the river, in order to oppoſe ſir John Hanmer's and count Naſſau's regiments in paſſing it; and though they failed in that attempt, yet in their retreat they fell upon the French foot with ſuch reſolution, that part of them broke through La Caillemote's and Cambon's regiments, which wanted pikes to ſtem their furious career. But the Iriſh wheeling about through the village, to recover their own men, they were intercepted by the Dutch and Iniſkillin foot, and moſt of them, after a ſtout reſiſtance, cut in pieces. By this time the Dutch guards being advanced as far as the hedges into the open field, the Iriſh horſe came down upon them again with greater numbers and redoubled fury; but the Dutch remained ſo firm and cloſe, and other regiments coming to their aſſiſtance, that the Iriſh were forced to retire. Upon this a freſh ſquadron of horſe advanced to ſupport them, but were vigorouſly repulſed by the French proteſtants and Inniſkilliners. In the firſt of theſe onſets monſieur la Caillemote received his mortal wound, and as he was carried back by four ſoldiers to the Engliſh camp, he encouraged thoſe, who were croſſing the river, by theſe words, "A la gloire, mes enfans, a la gloire; "To glory, my boys, to glory."

In the mean time the Danes came up to the left, as did the brigades of Hanmer and La Melloniere on the right. The firſt were ſo valiantly attacked in front by Hamilton's horſe, that they were obliged to give way, and ſome of them to repaſs the river. Duke Schomberg perceiving this diſorder, and ſeeing the French proteſtants were alſo left expoſed without a commander, immediately paſſed the river, in order to head them, with ſo much hurry, that he could not be perſuaded by monſieur Foubert, one of his aids de camp, to put on his armour. He was no ſooner on the other ſide, but he encouraged the French proteſtants by this ſhort harangue, "Allons, meſſieurs, voila vos perſecuteurs; "Come on gentlemen; behold your perſecutors," pointing to the French papiſts in the enemy's army. Theſe words were ſcarce out of his mouth, when fifteen or ſixteen of king James's guards, who were returning full ſpeed to their main body, after the ſlaughter of their companions, and whom the French refugees ſuffered to paſs, thinking them to be of their ſide, fell furiouſly upon the duke, and gave him two wounds on the head, which however were not mortal. Upon this the regiment of Cambon acknowledged their error, by committing a greater; for firing raſhly on the enemy, they ſhot the duke through the neck, of which wound he inſtantly died; and monſieur Fouber alighting to relieve him, was ſhot in the arm. Not long before Dr. Walker, ſo famous for the defence of Londonderry, received a wound in the belly, which he ſurvived but ſome few minutes.

The king during all theſe actions might be ſaid to be every where, ſince he directed all by his conduct; but now his courage was likewiſe to have a ſhare in the honour of the day. His majeſty, accompanied by the prince of Denmark, paſſed the river with the left wing of horſe, and that with ſome difficulty; for his horſe was bogged on the other ſide, and himſelf forced to alight, till one of his attendants helped him to get his horſe out, and remount. As ſoon as his troops were over, and put in ſome order, the king drew his ſword, (though the wound, which he had received the day before, made it uneaſy for him to wield it) and marched at the head of them towards the enemy, who were coming on again in good order towards the Engliſh foot, that had now got over the paſs, and were advancing bravely towards the Iriſh, though they were double their number. When theſe two bodies were come almoſt within muſket ſhot of one another, the enemy diſcovered the left wing of the Engliſh horſe moving towards them; at which they made a ſudden halt, faced about, and retreated up the hill to a little village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs. The Engliſh marching in good order came up with them at this village, where the enemy reſuming courage, faced about, and made the Engliſh horſe give way, though they had the king at their head. The king ſhocked at this, rid up to the Inniſkilliners, and aſked them 'what they will do for him? Their chief officer telling them, that it was the king who was doing them the honour to head them, they boldly came forward, and at the head of them the king received the enemy's fire, and then wheeling to the left to fetch up his own men again, the Inniſkilliners, through a miſtake, retired after him above an hundred yards. This made the king move to the left, to put himſelf at the head of ſome Dutch troops, that were advancing; while in the mean time the Inniſkilliners growing ſenſible of their error, went on again ſucceſsfully to the charge. In this place, duke Schomberg's regiment of horſe, compoſed of French proteſtants, and ſtrengthened by an unuſual number of officers, behaved with undaunted reſolution, like men, who fought for a nation, amongſt whom themſelves and their friends had found ſhelter againſt the perſecution of France. At the ſame time another party, commanded by lieutenant general Ginckle, charged in a lane to the left, but was ſoon overpowered by the Iriſh, and forced to give way. This being obſerved by a party of ſir Albert Cunningham's dragoons, and another of colonel Leviſon's, the officers ordered the men to alight and line a hedge, as alſo a ruined houſe, that flanked the lane, from whence they fired upon the enemy. Ginckle continued in the rear of his men, endeavouring to make them maintain their ground, and was in ſome danger from the Engliſh dragoons; for the enemy being cloſe upon him, they could not well diſtinguiſh. However the dragoons did a great piece of ſervice by ſtopping the enemy, who came up very boldly; and the Dutch horſe having the opportunity of rallying, as they did to the right, the enemy, after half an hour's ſharp diſpute, were beat back again with conſiderable loſs.

On the other ſide lieutenant-general Hamilton finding, that his foot did not anſwer his expectation, put himſelf at the head of the horſe, which was likewiſe routed, and himſelf taken priſoner. When he was brought to the king, he was aſked by him, whether the Iriſh would fight any more? 'Yes, Sir, (anſwered Hamilton) upon my honour, I believe they will.' When he pronounced the word honour, the king looked diſdainfully at him, and then turned about, repeating once or twice, 'Your honour:' intimating that what he affirmed upon his honour was not to be regarded, ſince that was forfeited before by his ſiding with Tyrconnel; and this was all the rebuke the king gave him for his breach of truſt.

In the mean time, count Schomberg, who was now informed of his father's death, purſued the enemy with that zeal and ſpirit, which a noble and juſt reſentment inſpires, and drove them ſeveral miles beyond the village of Duleck, covering the ground with the ſlaughtered enemies. Nor did he deſiſt, till the earl of Portland, by the king's expreſs command, obliged him to return to the place where the foot made an halt, and where they remained under their arms all night.

The king had reaſon not to regard what Hamilton told him; for, that general was no ſooner taken, but the fight ceaſed on the ſide of the Iriſh; and count Lauzun making up to king James, (who, during the whole action, ſtood with ſome ſquadrons of horſe upon the hill called Dunmore,) repreſented to him how near he was being ſurrounded; adding, that he ought to think of nothing but a retreat, which he doubted not to make good with many brave officers then about him, and the remains of his French and Swiſs troops. This advice king James was very inclinable to take; and therefore being attended by the regiment of Sarsfield, marched off to Duleck, and from thence in great haſte to Dublin; whilſt count Lauzun, Sheldon, and ſome other officers, diſpoſed all things for a retreat, which they performed in very good order.

King James's whole loſs in this battle was generally computed at fifteen hundred men, amongſt whom were the lord Dongan, the lord Carlingford, ſir Neile O Neile, the marquis D'Hocquincourt; and ſeveral priſoners, the chief of of whom was lieutenant general Hamilton, who to do him juſtice, behaved with great courage, and kept the victory doubtful doubtful till he was taken priſoner. On the ſide of the Engliſh, fell about five hundred; an inconſiderable loſs for the gain of ſo important a battle, had not the renowned duke Schomberg been one of the number.

This great man was deſcended of a noble family in the Palatinate, and ſon of count Schomberg by his firſt wife, an Engliſh lady, daughter of lord Dudley (which count was killed at the battle of Prague in Bohemia in 1620, with ſeveral of his ſons). The duke was born about the year 1608, and had for his godfather the unfortunate Frederic, elector Palatine, who was afterwards king of Bohemia, and deprived of all his dominions. Forced by the calamities of his country, the duke retired to Holland, where he ſerved firſt in the army of the United Provinces, under Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, and afterwards became the particular confident of his ſon William II. after whoſe death in 1650 he retired into France, where he gained ſo high a reputation, that, next to the prince of Condé and Turenne, he was eſteemed the beſt general in that kingdom, though, on account of his firm adherence to the proteſtant religion, he was not for a conſiderable time raiſed to the dignity of marſhal. In November 1659 he offered his ſervice to king Charles II. for his reſtoration to the throne of England; and the year following, the court of France being greatly ſolicitous for the intereſts of Portugal againſt the Spaniards, he was ſent to Liſbon, and in his way thither paſſed through England, in order to concert meaſures with king Charles II. for the ſupport of Portugal. He adviſed king Charles to ſet up for the head of the proteſtant religion, which, he ſaid, would keep the princes of Germany in great dependance, and make him umpire of their affairs, and alſo by gaining him great credit with the Hugonots, keep France in continual fear of him. He adviſed him likewiſe to employ the military men, that had ſerved under Cromwell, whom he thought the beſt officers he had ever ſeen. But above all he adviſed him to keep Dunkirk, which would be a check both upon France and Spain. But in all theſe things his advice was rejected. When he came to Portugal he did ſuch eminent ſervices there that he was created a grandee of that kingdom, and count of Mertola, with a penſion of five thouſand pounds ſterling to himſelf and his heirs. In 1673 he came over again into England, to command the army; but the French intereſt being then very odious to the Engliſh, though he would at any other time have been very acceptable to them, he was at that criſis conſidered as one ſent from France to bring our army under a French diſcipline, and ſo grew obnoxious to the nation, and at the ſame time not much loved by the court, as being found unfit for their purpoſes, for which reaſon he ſoon returned to France. In 1676 he was left by the king of France, upon his return to Paris, with the command of his army in Flanders, and ſoon after obliged king William then prince of Orange to raiſe the ſiege of Maeſtricht, and was made a marſhal of France. But when the perſecution againſt thoſe of the reformed religion was begun in that kingdom, he deſired leave to return into his own country; which was denied him, and all the favour he could obtain was to go to Portugal. And though he had preſerved that nation from falling under the yoke of Caſtile, yet now when he came thither for refuge, the inquiſition repreſented the giving harbour to an heretic ſo odiouſly to the king, that he was forced to ſend the marſhal away. He went from thence to England, and paſſing through Holland, entered into a particular confidence with the prince of Orange; and being invited by the elector of Brandenburgh to Berlin, was made governor of Pruſſia, and ſet at the head of all the elector's armies. He was treated likewiſe by the young elector with the ſame regard, that his father had ſhewn him, and in 1688 was ſent by him to Cleves, to command the troops, which were raiſed by the empire for the defence of Cologn. When the prince of Orange was almoſt ready for his expedition into England, the marſhal obtained leave of the elector of Brandenburgh to accompany the prince in that attempt; upon whoſe advancement to the throne of England he was made a duke. He was a man of great calmneſs, application, and conduct, and thought much better than he ſpoke; of true judgment, exact probity, and of an humble and obliging temper. He had a thorough experience of the world; knew men and things better than anyman of his profeſſion ever did; and was as great in council as at the head of an army. In his declining years his memory very much failed, but his judgment remained true and clear to the laſt. He appeared courteous and affable to every perſon, and yet had an air of grandeur, that commanded reſpect from all. He was eighty-two years of age, when he was killed. And as monſieur Caillemotte had followed him in all his fortunes while alive, ſo did he in his death, for he did not long ſurvive his wounds.

As for the king himſelf, he received no manner of hurt in the action, though he was in all the height of it; only a cannon ball carried away a piece of his boot. His majeſty did all that the greateſt of generals could do upon the occaſion. He choſe the field, diſpoſed the attacks, drew up his army, charged the enemy ſeveral times, ſupported his forces when they began to ſhrink, and behaved throughout with that conduct, courage, reſolution, and preſence of mind, and was ſuch a poiſe for the inclining victory to his own ſide, that the Iriſh themſelves declared, "That if the Engliſh would change kings with them, they would fight the battle over again." However, both kings have been equally blamed for not improving, the one the advantage of his victory, and the other that of his retreat. Thoſe, who have written in favour of king James, ſay, that king William might have marched directly to Dublin, a place open and unfortified on every ſide; and prevented the Iriſh from aſſembling any more, and ſecuring Limerick, Galway, and ſeveral other important places. And ſuch as are partiſans of king William, cenſure both king James for leaving Ireland with ſo much precipitation, and thoſe he left behind, for not having collected the remains of a defeat, that had coſt them but few men.

King James being arrived at Dublin, and having immediately aſſembled the magiſtrates and council of the city, told them, "That his army in England having made a total defection againſt him, when he had the greateſt occaſion for them, he retired into France, where he was kindly received by that king, and had all the aſſurance imaginable of being re-eſtabliſhed on his throne. That ſometime after he came to this kingdom of Ireland, and found all his Roman Catholic ſubjects as well equipped and prepared to defend his cauſe, as their ability would bear. And though he had been often told, that when it came to the touch, they would never bear the brunt of a battle, he could never credit the ſame till that day, when having a good army, and all preparations fit to engage a foreign invader, he found the fatal truth of what he had been ſo often precautioned about; and though the army did not deſert him, as they did in England, yet when it came to the trial, they baſely fled the field, and left it a ſpoil to his enemies; nor could they be prevailed upon to rally, though the loſs in the whole defeat was but inconſiderable, ſo that henceforward he determined never more to head an Iriſh army, and now reſolved to ſhift for himſelf, as they themſelves muſt do. That it had been often debated, in caſe ſuch a revolution ſhould happen, 'Whether upon deſerting the city of Dublin, the ſame might not be fired?' He did therefore charge them on their allegiance, that they ſhould neither rifle it by plunder, nor deſtroy it by fire; which in all kingdoms would be judged very barbarous, and muſt be believed to be done by his orders; and if done, there would be but little mercy to be expected from an enraged enemy." He concluded, "that he was neceſſitated to yield to force, but would never ceaſe to labour their deliverance as long as he lived."

Having ſtaid at Dublin one night, the next morning attended by the duke of Berwick, Tyrconnel, and the marquis of Powis, he poſted away to Waterford, where he arrived the ſame day, taking care to have the bridges broken down behind him, for fear of being purſued. There he went on board a veſſel, called the Count de Lauzun, that was ready to receive him; but the ſieur de Foran, who commanded the ſquadron, meeting him at ſea, deſired him to go on board one of his frigates for his quicker paſſage; and by this means he got over once more into France, and fixed his reſidence at St. Germains.

As ſoon as king James was gone, all the conſiderable papiſts fled from Dublin, and the proteſtants were releaſed, who poſſeſſed themſelves of the militia arms; and with the aſſiſtance of the biſhops of Meath and Limerick, formed a committee to take care of things, and ſent letters to king William, to give him an account of what had paſſed, and to pray him to honour that city with his preſence.

In the mean time the queen ſuſtained the weight of affairs in England with great prudence. This was a new ſcene to her. She had for above ſixteen months before, made ſo little figure in buſineſs, that thoſe, who thought that every woman of ſenſe loved to be meddling, concluded, ſhe had but a ſmall proportion of it, becauſe ſhe lived ſo abſtracted from all affairs. Her behaviour was indeed very exemplary; ſhe was exactly regular both in her private and public devotions.

tions. She was much in her cloſet, and read a great deal; ſhe was often buſy at work, and ſeemed to employ her time and thoughts in any thing rather than matters of ſtate. Her converſation was lively and obliging; every thing in her was eaſy and natural. She was ſingular in great charities to the poor, of whom, as there are always great numbers about courts, ſo the crowds of perſons of quality, that had fled over from Ireland, drew from her liberal ſupplies. But all this was nothing to the public. If the king talked with her of affairs, it was in ſo private a way, that few ſeemed to believe it. The king had indeed, upon many occaſions, ſaid to the earl of Shrewſbury, that though he could not hit on on the right way of pleaſing England, he was confident the queen would; and that the nation would be happy under her. He named a cabinet council of nine perſons, on whoſe advice her majeſty was chiefly to rely [1]. Of theſe, the lord preſident and the earl of Nottingham, had the chief ſway in the management of affairs, which made the whigs not ſatisfied with the nomination. But the queen balanced all things with an extraordinary temper, and became univerſally beloved and admired by all about her. She had a vaſt weight of cares upon her; the danger of her royal conſort in Ireland; the imminent appearance of an invaſion from France; and at home a divided people, ſome profeſſedly owning an allegiance to king James, and even others, who had taken the oaths, waiting for an opportunity to renounce them. Under all theſe apprehenſions ſhe betrayed no fear, and loſt no time. As ſoon as ſhe heard the king was ſafely landed in Ireland, ſhe began to exerciſe the power veſted in her by parliament, in two ſeaſonable proclamations, one "commanding all papiſts, and reputed papiſts, forthwith to depart the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and from within ten miles of the ſame;" the other "for the confinement of popiſh recuſants within five miles of their reſpective dwellings." And there was great need of the utmoſt vigilance and care to prevent the ruin of the nation; for king James's adherents, who by this time began to be diſtinguiſhed by the name of jacobites, being furniſhed by the king's abſence with a promiſing opportunity to attempt the reſtoring of their abdicated monarch, were concerting meaſures with France to put their deſigns in execution. It was agreed, that while part of the French fleet ſhould bear up the Thames, to countenance the jacobites in London, who were grown very bold and numerous by the flocking thither of a great number of that party, from all parts of the country, they ſhould make an inſurrection, and ſeize the queen and her chief miniſters. Which done, certain perſons were to take upon them the adminiſtration of affairs till the return of king James, who was to leave the command of the army to his generals, and haſten with all ſpeed to England. The other part of the French fleet, having joined their gallies, was to have landed eight thouſand men at Torbay with arms for a greater number; after which the gallies and men of war were to ſail into the Iriſh ſeas, to hinder the return of the king and his forces; and the diſcontented Scots were to have revolted at the ſame time, in ſeveral parts of that kingdom.

The French fleet entered the channel, as before concerted; at a time when the Engliſh were ill-prepared to receive them, occaſioned chiefly by an unhappy compliment paid to the king of Spain, who having married Mariana of Newburgh, (ſiſter to the empreſs and the queen of Portugal) deſired of king William, a convoy to conduct her from Holland to the Groyne. Accordingly admiral Ruſſel was ordered to attend her with a ſquadron, which was partly to conſiſt of ſome ſhips belonging to a fleet that was going to the Mediterranean under Killigrew, to watch the motions of the French at Toulon. The admiral was ſo delayed in this voyage by contrary winds, that though he ſailed to Zealand, the 24th of November 1689, he did not return from the Groyne to England, till the latter end of April, when the ſquadron put into Plymouth to refit, and he himſelf went on to Spithead. By this means, not only the deſign of blocking up Toulon was loſt, (for the French were ſailed before the Engliſh arrived there) but the ſquadron at Plymouth joined by that which came from the Iriſh ſeas, (in all thirty ſhips of the line) were prevented from coming to the main fleet at Spithead, by the French entering the channel, while they lay thus divided. It is alſo ſaid, the earl of Torrington, (who had the chief command) did not make the haſte that was neceſſary to join the fleets, which, perhaps, was owing to his not believing the French were in ſuch forwardneſs. For ſo little did he expect them, that he had ordered no ſcouts to the weſtward, to obſerve their motion; and they came with ſo fair a wind, that they were near the Iſle of Wight, before he had notice of their being in the channel, and in all probability would have ſurprized him, had not the wind turned upon them. Another reaſon of the fleet's lying ſo long at Spithead, was, the Dutch ſquadron not coming ſo ſoon as was promiſed. Admiral Torrington was with the fleet at St. Helen's when he received advice from Weymouth, that the French were entered the channel, whereupon it was debated what was fitteſt to be done. The admiral as he could not be joined by the Plymouth-ſquadron, thought he was not ſtrong enough, and adviſed going in till ſome ſhips he expected from the eaſt were come up. But poſitive orders being ſent to him from the queen to fight, notwithſtanding the enemy's ſuperiority of above ſeventy ſail to fifty, the two fleets came to an engagement near Beachy, in Suſſex.

On the 30th of June, the day after the battle of the Boyne, at eight in the morning the ſignal was made for battle; when the French bracing their head-ſails to the maſt, lay by; and about an hour after the Dutch ſquadron, which led the van, began to engage part of the van of the enemy; half an hour after which our blue ſquadron encountered their rear; but the greateſt part of the red, which were in the center, could not engage till near ten; and as they were then at a conſiderable diſtance from the enemy, ſo was there a great opening between them and the Dutch. It was obſerved, that as the Engliſh bore down on the French, they laſhed away, though probably that might be only to cloſe their line; and afterwards ſeveral of their ſhips towed round with their boats till they were out of ſhot, ſo that it was hoped the advantage would have fallen on our ſide. But it was not long before it appeared, that the Dutch had ſuffered very much; and chiefly by their being, for want of a neceſſary precaution, weathered and ſurrounded by thoſe French ſhips, which they left ahead of them, when they began to engage. No ſooner did the admiral perceive their condition, than he ſent them orders to come to an anchor; and with his own ſhip, and ſeveral others, driving between them and the enemy, anchored about five in the afternoon, at which time it was calm; but judging it not ſafe to renew the fight at ſo great a diſadvantage, he weighed at nine at night, and retired eaſtward with the tide of flood. On the 1ſt of July in the afternoon he called a council of war, in which it was reſolved to endeavour to preſerve the fleet by retreating, and rather to deſtroy the diſabled ſhips, if they ſhould be preſſed by the enemy, than hazard another engagement by protecting them.

The French very indiſcretely purſued in a formal line of battle, whereas, had they left every ſhip to do her utmoſt, the Engliſh would undoubtedly have been more roughly treated, eſpecially the ſhips which were diſabled in the fight. But each ſhifting for herſelf, as it is natural to do in ſuch caſes, and caution being had in anchoring moſt advantageouſly with regard to tides, which the French took little or no notice of, the Engliſh got ground conſiderably of them. However, they purſued as far as Rye Bay; and one of the Engliſh ſhips called the Anne, of ſeventy guns, was run on ſhore near Winchelſea, having loſt all her maſts, where two French ſhips attempting to burn her, the captain ſaved them that labour by ſetting fire to her himſelf. The body of the French fleet ſtood in and out near Bourne and Peinſey in Suſſex, while about fourteen more lay at anchor, near the ſhore, ſome of which attempted to deſtroy a Dutch ſhip of ſixty-four guns, that lay dry at low water in Peinſey Bay; but her commander ſo well defended her every high water, when they made their attacks, that they at laſt thought it convenient to deſiſt; ſo that this ſhip was got off, and ſafely carried to Holland. But it fared not ſo well with three others of that nation, which were on ſhore on that coaſt; for their officers and men not being able to defend them, they ſet them on fire; ſo that with the three ſhips deſtroyed by the French in the action, the States General loſt ſix of the line of battle.

On the 8th of July the French fleet ſtood towards their own coaſt, but were ſeen the 27th following near the Berry-Head, a little to the eaſtwards of Dartmouth, and then the wind taking them ſhort, they put into Torbay. There they

[1] Theſe were the lord preſident, the lord ſteward, the lord chamberlain, the earls of Pembroke, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Marlborough, ſir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain, and firſt commiſſioner of the Treaſury, and Mr. Edward Ruſſel. MS. Letter of Mr. Warre to ſir W. Colt, June 6, 1690.

This

lay not long, for they were discovered the 29th near Plymouth, at which place very good preparations were made by platforms and other works, to give them a warm reception. The 5th of August they appeared again near the Ram-Head, in number between sixty and seventy, when standing westward, they were no more seen in the channel this year [k].

The news of this advantage gained by the French at sea had no sooner reached London, but the fears of a descent created a general consternation, which immediately spread itself through the whole kingdom. The queen was not ignorant of the danger, but did all that was possible to conceal her own apprehensions, and to inspire her subjects with resolution. The lord mayor and aldermen, and lieutenancy of the city of London were not wanting in this critical juncture to express their zeal and affection for the government. For attending her majesty in council, they declared the unanimous resolution of the city to defend and preserve their majesties and their government with the hazard of their lives, and to the utmost of their powers; representing to the queen and council, that the several regiments of the militia of the city, consisting of about nine thousand men, were compleat in their numbers, well armed, and well appointed, and ready to be raised immediately, and ready to proceed in their majesties service. That the lieutenancy also had resolved, that six regiments of auxiliaries should be raised for the service; and that the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council would, by the voluntary contribution of themselves and other citizens, forthwith raise a large regiment of horse, and one thousand dragoons, and maintain them at their own charge in the service for a month or longer, if there should be occasion. And they desired her majesty to nominate officers to command them. All which the queen most graciously accepted, and was pleased to thank them for their readiness, loyalty, and zeal on this occasion; and to the last part answered, that 'she would consider of it, and appoint officers to command according to their desire.'

[k] This is Mr. Burchet's representation of the affair, but other accounts speak of it in a less favourable manner. Some original letters to sir William Colt, then envoy extraordinary from king William at the court of Hanover; reflect on it as follows:

Lord Paget, envoy extraordinary to the Emperor, from Vienna, Aug. 10, 1690, N. S.

"I hope the late good news of the king's success in Ireland has made amends for the misfortune of our fleet. It is hard at this distance to guess where the fault lay; but if we may believe the secretary of state, my lord Torrington must be very criminal, since his printed letter to my lord Dursley, (which I suppose is come to your hands,) has published him as such, almost all the world over."

From Mr. R. Molesworth, envoy extraordinary to the king of Denmark, from Copenhagen, July 12, 1690, O. S.

"I am satisfied the Dutch have been most soundly beaten, and the French have gotten an entire, though bloody victory, let us put what disguises on the matter we please."

From the same, July 22, 1690.

"My trouble at our unfortunate sea-fight was so great, and my confusion to that degree, that I had not the courage either to go to court, or to set pen to paper. And I think, if the news of the king's conquest of Ireland had not raised my spirits, I should have continued a drooping recluse for many weeks. I hope the Englishmen in our country will be touched with as much shame for their miscarriage, as those here, who durst not shew their faces; and then they will endeavour to repair this great loss of honour and reputation; which God grant may be soon. But this I can tell you, if some people's heads do not fly now, no foreign prince or state will believe there is a king or queen in England, no more than our subjects do, as it seems."

From sir Paul Rycaut, envoy extraordinary at Hamburgh, July 16, 1690.

"I cannot but condole with you the unfortunate success of the late sea-fight against the French, which turned not much to our damage, unless so far as concerns the honour of the nation, but greatly to the detriment and ruin of our allies, who were beaten to pieces, whilst we stood spectators of their destruction. What loss they sustained you will best see in the letter, which admiral Evertson writes to the states, and what was the cause, that our fleet in general did not fight was, (as this admiral writes) upon examination by the earls Pembroke and Devonshire, who were going from ship to ship to make inquiry into this matter, to discover where the treachery lay; for nothing but that could keep our fleet from engaging; and where to charge that, a letter written from my lord Nottingham to my lord Dursley, translated with the consent of my lord Dursley into Dutch, and inserted in the Courant for the better quieting and satisfaction of the people, doth plainly declare, and on whom the treachery is to be charged. All I have to comfort myself and all others in this matter is, that Mr. Warre writes me under the 4th instant, that we should speedily have a better fleet at sea than before. And Dr. Aglionby writes me on the 22d instant from the Hague, that by this letter to my lord Dursley, and the assurance, that Mr. Harbord was coming over from the queen to the states, the minds of the people were much settled; and that the government loses no courage, for the states of Holland on the 19th instant, and so did the states general on the 21st, resolve, that a new squadron with all expedition be put to sea; until which was done, all commerce was to be suspended. The states of Holland unanimously, and without so much as consulting their principals, came to this resolution. God grant that we may correspond in like manner with them in England, God grant also, that there may be no treachery in Ireland, from whence we expect to receive great and good news by the next post."

From the same, July 19th, 1690.

"Now I am to congratulate and rejoice with you for the seasonable victory obtained in Ireland; which I hope will set all things right; and when our fleet is again repaired, and recruited, and set out once more to sea, we shall then assert again the sovereignty and dominions of the seas, which might have been done by the last battle, had not treachery defeated us."

Bishop Burnet's account is as follows.

"On the day before the battle of the Boyne, the two fleets came to a great engagement at sea. The squadron that lay at Plymouth, could not come up to join the great fleet, the wind being contrary. So it was under debate, what was fittest to be done. The earl of Torrington thought he was not strong enough, and advised his coming in, till some more ships, that were fitting out, should be ready. Some began to call his courage in question, and imputed this to fear. They thought, this would too much exalt our enemies, and discourage our allies, if we left the French to triumph at sea, and to be masters of our coast and trade; for our merchants richest ships were coming home; so that the leaving them in such a superiority would be both very unbecoming and very mischievous to us. The queen ordered Russel to advise both with the navy-board, and with all that understood sea-affairs; and upon a view of the strength of both fleets, they were of opinion, that though the French were superior in number, yet our fleet was so equal in strength to them, that it was reasonable to send orders to our admiral to venture on an engagement. Yet the orders were not so positive, but that a great deal was left to a council of war. The two fleets engaged near Beachy in Sussex. The Dutch led the van; and to shew their courage, they advanced too far out of the line, and fought in the beginning with some advantage, the French plying before them. And our blue squadron engaged bravely; but the earl of Torrington kept in his line, and continued to fight at a distance. The French seeing the Dutch come out so far before the line, fell on them furiously both in front and flank, which the earl of Torrington neglected for some time; and when he endeavoured to come a little nearer, the calm was such, that he could not come up. The Dutch suffered much, and their whole fleet had perished, if their admiral Calembourg had not ordered them to drop their anchors, while their sails were all up. This was not observed by the French; so they were carried by the tide, while the others lay still; and thus in a few minutes the Dutch were out of danger. They lost many men, and sunk some of their ships which had suffered the most, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands. It was now necessary to order the fleet to come in with all possible haste. Both the Dutch and the blue squadron complained much of the earl of Torrington; and it was a general opinion, that if the whole fleet had come up to a close fight, we must have beat the French; and considering how far they were from Brest, and that our squadron at Plymouth lay between them and home, a victory might have had great consequences. Our fleet was now in a bad condition, and broken into factions; and if the French had not lost that night's tide, but had followed us close, they might have destroyed many of our ships. Both the admirals were almost equally blamed; ours for not fighting, and the French for not pursuing his victory."

Mr. Boyer tells us, "That the Dutch having the van-guard, began the fight, as also did some of the English; but not being seconded by the rest of the English fleet, which unexpectedly stood away, several of the Dutch ships were either burnt, sunk, or disabled. And the English fared but little better, for such as engaged were very much battered. The fight continued from morning to evening, the Dutch maintaining their stations with so much resolution and obstinacy again the whole French fleet, which consisted of eighty two men of war, that they had much ado to escape being all destroyed. In this unequal fight they lost, among other officers, rear admiral Jan Dick, rear admiral Brackel, and captain Nordel; and the English captain Botham, captain Pomeroy, with two captains of the marine regiments.

A Dutch author of the history of king William asserts, "That in this action the French gained the victory, the Dutch the honour, and the English the shame; and adds, that the court martial was far from being unanimous in their opinions about the earl of Torrington, some thinking him guilty of treachery, and others of cowardice only; though they all at length agreed to acquit him; and that the king was extremely dissatisfied with their sentence, and for that reason discarded some of the members of that court from the service, together with two and forty officers of the navy, who were suspected to have been influenced by the earl."

But the French writers give a different account of this action. Monsieur Fourbin in his memoirs allows, "The English and Dutch fleets to have been but eight and fifty ships of the line of battle; whereas the French had eighty; and observes, that though the English did not seem to have had so great a share in the action as the Dutch, it may be said, that for above three hours, the two fleets shewed a great deal of valour, and performed exploits worthy to be recorded in history." Father Daniel affirms, "That seventeen of the English and Dutch ships, which were unmasted, were run ashore upon the coast and burnt;" and adds, "that to leave no doubt of the greatness of the victory gained by the French, monsieur de Tourville, the admiral of the French fleet, returning to sea, sent a detachment of ships and gallies, with about fifteen hundred men on board, under the command of the count D'Estrees to make a descent upon England, and to burn twelve ships in Tinmouth bay. These troops," continues he, "being landed, forced an intrenchment defended by three pieces of cannon, plundered several houses, and burnt the vessels in the bay, four of which were men of war, and the rest merchant-men richly laden. This done, the troops were reimbarked without the loss of a man, and they carried off three pieces of cannon with other booty:" But these four men of war, and eight merchant-men richly laden, are said by our writers to be only three small vessels.

About the ſame time, to ſuppreſs the fears of a revolt in the weſt, an addreſs was preſented to the queen by Shadrach Vincent, Eſq; from above ten thouſand tinners of Cornwall, giving all aſſurances of fidelity and obedience, "and faithfully promiſing (notwithſtanding the artifice and ill deſigns of diſaffected men to withdraw them from their loyalty) an unalterable allegiance to their majeſties, owning and acknowledging their majeſties alone to be their lawful and rightful king and queen, and diſclaiming all allegiance to the late king James, or to the pretended prince of Wales after him."

Within a few days after, the deputy lieutenants and officers of the militia for Middleſex and Weſtminſter made a ſolemn addreſs and declaration, "That they perceived there were many miſchievous and dangerous practices, conſultations, and contrivances of papiſts, and many others diſaffected to their majeſties and their government; and that it was moſt notorious, that the French king, by confederacy with the late king and his adherents, had made a bold invaſion of their majeſties dominion of the narrow ſeas, deſigning to deſtroy their royal fleet, and in conſequence to bring the proteſtants of this kingdom under his tyranny and cruel yoke of bondage. And therefore they hold themſelves bound in duty to declare upon this occaſion their deep ſenſe, hatred, and abhorrence of the vile ingratitude of thoſe papiſts, and profeſſed proteſtants, who, notwithſtanding their majeſties pardoning and protecting them, had by conſpiracies with the late king's adherents, or by their murmurings againſt their majeſties and the preſent government, or by the refuſal of the oaths of fidelity and obedience to their majeſties, aſſiſted or abetted the late king in his claims and pretences of any right and title to the government of theſe realms, &c."

Under theſe encouragements the queen forgot nothing, that the moſt active prudence could ſuggeſt, as fit to be done in ſuch a juncture, without hurry or a too viſible concern. She publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all ſeamen and mariners to render themſelves to their majeſties, with ſuitable rewards for coming in, and penalties for abſenting. She gave out commiſſions to put the ſtanding forces in a condition to oppoſe the enemy; and ſhe ordered the militia in the weſtern parts to be in a readineſs of defending the coaſts, and aſſiſting the army. And to ſtrike a terror into the conſpirators with France, ſhe publiſhed a proclamation for apprehending Edward Henry earl of Lichfield, Thomas earl of Ayleſbury, William lord Montgomery, Roger earl of Caſtlemain, Richard viſcount Preſton, Henry lord Bellaſis, ſir Edward Hales, ſir Robert Thorold, ſir Robert Hamilton, ſir Theophilus Oglethorpe, colonel Edward Sackvile, lieutenant colonel William Richardſon, major Thomas Soaper, captain David Lloyd, William Pen, Edmund Elliot, Marmaduke Langdale, and Edward Rutter; being perſons who had conſpired with divers other diſaffected perſons, to diſturb and deſtroy the government, and for that purpoſe had abetted and adhered to their majeſties enemies in the preſent invaſion.

Nor was the queen's care of affairs confined within her own dominions; for while ſhe put herſelf in a poſture of defence at home, ſhe diſpatched Mr. Harbord to the ſtates-general, to let them know, how much her majeſty was concerned at the misfortune, which had befallen their ſquadron in the late engagement, and at their not having been ſeconded as they ought to have been, which matter ſhe had directed to be examined into, in order to recompenſe thoſe, who had done their duty, and to puniſh ſuch as ſhould be found to have deſerved it: That her majeſty had given orders for refitting the Dutch ſhips, that were diſabled, at her own charge; and commanded, that all poſſible care ſhould be taken of the ſick and wounded ſeamen; and that rewards ſhould be given to the widows of thoſe, who were killed, behaving themſelves bravely in the fight, to encourage others to do well for the future. Mr. Harbord likewiſe told the ſtates, that the queen had ordered twelve great ſhips to be immediately fitted out; and hoped the ſtates would alſo do their utmoſt to reinforce their fleet in the conjuncture. And, laſtly, he acquainted them with the king's happy ſucceſs in Ireland. The ſtates received this meſſage with great ſatisfaction, and unanimouſly reſolved to fit out immediately thirteen capital ſhips and ſix frigates.

During theſe tranſactions, the fleet was refitting with all poſſible diligence. The earl of Torrington was ſent to the tower; and three of the beſt ſea-officers, ſir Richard Haddock, Henry Killigrew, and ſir John Aſhby were appointed joint-admirals to command the fleet. But it was a month before they could be ready. And in all that time the French were maſters of the ſea, and our coaſts open to them. If they had followed the firſt conſternation, and had fallen to the burning of the ſea-towns, they might have done much miſchief, and put affairs in great diſorder, for there were not then in England above ſeven thouſand men. The militia was raiſed; and though the harveſt drew on, ſo that it was not convenient for people to be long abſent from their labour, yet the nation expreſſed more zeal and affection to the government than was expected; and the jacobites, all England over, kept out of the way, for fear of being inſulted by the rabble. There were no great loſſes at ſea, for moſt of the merchant-men came ſafe to Plymouth. The French ſtood over, for ſome time to their own coaſt; and there were many falſe alarms of their ſhipping troops in order to a deſcent. But the French had ſuffered ſo much in the Netherlands, in the battle of Flerus, that they were forced, for all their victory, to lie upon the defenſive, and were not able to ſpare ſo many men as were neceſſary for an invaſion. It was thought ſtrange that the French ſhould hover ſo long and ſo quietly on the coaſt of England without making any farther attempts; but it appeared afterwards, that they were ſtill in expectation of the effects of the conſpiracy which was to have broke out the 18th of June. But the jacobites excuſed their failing in that, becauſe their leaders were generally ſeized, and they began to boaſt all over England, that it was viſible the French meant no harm to the nation, but only to bring back king James, ſince now, though the coaſts lay open to them, they did the country no hurt. This might have made ſome impreſſion, if the French had not effectually refuted it. For they made a deſcent on a poor village called Tinmouth, which happened to belong to a papiſt, and burnt it with a few fiſher-boats, but the inhabitants got away, and as a body of militia was marching thither, the French made great haſte to their ſhips. The French publiſhed this in their gazettes with as much pomp, as if it had been a great trading-town, that had many ſhips, with ſome men of war in port. This both rendered them ridiculous, and ſerved to raiſe the hatred of the nation againſt them, for every town on the coaſt ſaw what they muſt expect if the French prevailed [1].

The earl of Torrington continued priſoner in the tower till the next ſeſſion, when he was brought to his trial. Several perſons of quality, as the duke of Devonſhire and the earl of Pembroke had been ſent to Sheerneſs, to exa-

[1] About this time a remarkable pamphlet was publiſhed, under the title of "A modeſt inquiry into the cauſes of the preſent diſaſters in England, and who they are that brought the French fleet into the channel, deſcribed." The author charges the diſaffected clergy (whom he calls 'the Lambeth holy club),' with being the principal managers of the jacobites plot for bringing the French into the channel. He alledges, "That the firſt ſtep the clergy made, was the writing againſt the taking the new oaths to their majeſties injoined them by act of parliament; and the buzzing into the ears of their votaries the unlawfulneſs of theſe oaths, and the continuing right of king James to the crown. That there being very few of the diſaffected clergy, that had the courage to lay down their places for the oaths, the next ſtep of the plot was to cheat the world and their own conſciences, with the ridiculous diſtinction of taking the oaths to a king 'de facto,' and not 'de jure;' which was as much as to ſay, that their majeſties were not lawful and rightful king and queen of England, but 'de facto' only, that is in Engliſh, 'downright uſurpers.' That this diſtinction did not only give ſcope to take the oaths to their majeſties, but alſo to pray for them by name in their pulpits; though ſome of more ſincerity than the reſt would not pray for them by name at all; and yet, to prevent any trouble from the law, they wiſely prayed in general terms for 'the king and queen' which might be taken either for king James and queen Mary, or king William and queen Mary; and others of a more nice ſtomach yet would not pray for the king and queen, but 'for the king and royal family.' That the plot being lame, becauſe the machines, that moved it, were debarred from the pulpit, it was found out, that the act of parliament injoining the oaths to their majeſties, admitting of ſome favourable interpretation in law, upon the part of thoſe, that only preached, but had no cure of ſouls: thereupon Dr. S. one of the greateſt champions mounted the chair firſt, with the loud acclamations of the party, and, as an introduction to his ſermon, gave his auditors an account of the happy diſcovery he had made of ſo great a bleſſing, 'as his having liberty to preach to them, notwithſtanding the act of parliament about taking the oaths.' That he was followed by a great many, both in London and in the country, who partly by ſtealth, and partly by the pious zeal of ſome of their own ſort of church-wardens, got up into the pulpit to trumpet up the people to a diſſatisfaction with the government. That all theſe ſteps of the plot were backed with the 'Hiſtory of Paſſive Obedience' which was handed about in triumph among the party. That in this pamphlet are muſtered a great many expreſſions of Engliſh divines both antient and modern, although moſt of the citations be far wide of the queſtion, and refer only to obedience to magiſtracy in general, and the unlawfulneſs of private perſons riſing up againſt the government upon every frivolous pretence. That the next engine of the plot was the happy reſult of a kind of oecumenic council of the whole party: the liturgy of the church of England muſt be laid aſide, and a new one muſt be calculated for the meridian of king James's tottering fortune. That in this new liturgy they prayed thus; 'reſtore us again the public worſhip of thy name, the reverend adminiſtration of ſacraments; raiſe up the former government both in church and ſtate, that we may be no longer without king, without prieſt, and without God in the world.' That when they came to pray for king mine into the whole affair upon oath, in order to diſcover where the treachery lay. The earl was permitted to make a ſpeech in the houſe of commons in defence of himſelf, in which he inſiſted on theſe three things; that the preparations for the fleet were very late; that the fleet itſelf was much inferior to the French, and ill-manned; and that he laboured under great want of intelligence. He excuſed his fighting, by alledging the orders, which he had received; and ſaid, that it was againſt his judgment, and the judgment of the council of war. He gave the houſe a draught of the line of battle, for explaining his arguments in juſtification of his conduct in the fight, and deſired leave to deliver what he had to ſay in writing, which was granted. He reflected upon the counſellors, and in a manner named the earl of Nottingham as the perſon, who had ſuppreſſed ſome intelligence, or not ſent it to him ſo timely as was neceſſary [m].

The earl's affair was long diſcuſſed in the houſe of lords. The form of his commitment was judged to be illegal; and the martial law, to which, by ſtatute, all, who ſerved in the fleet, were ſubject, being lodged in the lord high admiral, it was doubted, whether the admiralty being now in commiſſion, that power was lodged with the commiſſioners. The judges were of opinion, that it was; yet ſince the power of life and death was too ſacred a thing to paſs only by a conſtruction of law, it was thought the ſafeſt courſe to paſs an act, declaring, that the power of a lord high admiral did veſt in the commiſſioners. The ſecret enemies of the government, who intended to embroil matters, moved that the earl ſhould be impeached in parliament, proceedings in that way being always ſlow, and incidents being alſo apt to fall in, that might create diſputes between the two houſes, which ſometimes ended in a rupture. This the king was apprehenſive of, and though he was much incenſed againſt the earl, and had reaſon to believe, that a council of war would treat him very favourably, yet he choſe rather to let it go ſo, than to diſorder his affairs. The commiſſioners of the admiralty named a court to try the earl, in which ſir Ralph Delaval preſided, who had acted as vice-admiral of the blue in the engagement. The earl is ſaid to be tried with ſo groſs a partiality, that it reflected much on the juſtice of the nation; ſo that if it had not been for the great intereſt, which the king had in the ſtates-general, it might have occaſioned a breach of the alliance between them and England. The earl eſcaped with his life and eſtate, but much loaded in his reputation, ſome charging him with want of courage, while others imputed his ill conduct to a haughty ſullenneſs of temper which made him, ſince orders were ſent him contrary to the advices he had given, to reſolve indeed to obey them, and fight, but in ſuch a manner, as ſhould caſt the blame on thoſe, who ſent him orders, and give them cauſe to repent it.

The king was greatly offended with his acquittal; whereof one mark immediately appeared in determining the earl's commiſſion; and it was expected, ſays Warre, "That his majeſty would expreſs his reſentment againſt thoſe captains of the council of war, who ſhewed their partiality by their behaviour at his tryal." [n]

Nothing put a greater check to the proceedings of the jacobites, than the news of the victory at the Boyne, which was obtained the day after the misfortune at ſea. There has been a notion ſpread among many people, that king William would not have hazarded a battle, but upon an expreſs received that morning of the defeat of the fleet, which he kept ſecret till the action was over. But this is impoſſible to be reconciled to the circumſtances of the time and place. However this be, the news of the king's preſervation from the cannon-ball, and then of the victory gained the day after, was a great comfort under the agitations cauſed by the misfortunes at ſea. When the earl of Nottingham carried the news to the queen, and acquainted her in a few words that the king was well, and had gained an entire victory, and that the late king had eſcaped, he obſerved her looks, and found that the laſt article made her joy compleat, which ſeemed in ſome ſuſpence, till ſhe heard her father was ſafe. The queen and council, upon this ſent to the king, preſſing him to come over with all poſſible haſte, ſince, as England was of more importance, ſo the ſtate of affairs required his preſence here. But theſe letters were ſoon followed by others of a very different ſtrain, as will preſently appear.

Upon the defeat of the Iriſh at the Boyne, the king having reſted his forces, ſent, the next day after the battle, monſieur la Mellioniere, brigadier-general, with five battalions of foot and four ſquadrons of horſe, to inveſt Drogheda, where was a great magazine of ſtores. The governor at firſt ſeemed reſolute to defend the place, and received monſieur la Mellioniere's ſummons with great contempt; but the king ſending him word, "that if he was forced to bring his king James, the jacobite club had exhauſted their rhetoric and zeal in the following words; "protect and defend thy ſervant our ſovereign lord the king; ſtrengthen his hands, and the hands of all that are put in authority under him, with judgment and juſtice, to cut off all ſuch workers of iniquity, as turn religion to rebellion, and faith into faction; that they may never prevail againſt us, or triumph in the ruin of thy church among us. To this end, defend the king, bind up his ſoul in the bundle of life, and let no weapon formed againſt him proſper. Be unto him an helmet of ſalvation, and a ſtrong tower of defence againſt the face of his enemies. Let his reign be proſperous, and his days many. Make him glad according to the days, wherein thou haſt made him ſuffer adverſity. Give him the necks of his enemies, and alſo every day more and more the hearts of his ſubjects. As for thoſe that are implacable, clothe them with ſhame, but upon himſelf and his poſterity (that is, the prince of Wales) let the crown flouriſh." That the general council having compoſed this new liturgy, there were above ten thouſand of them printed and diſperſed up and down among the party, which they uſed in their cabals, laying aſide a great part, and ſome times all the old liturgy. That there were many of the 'holy club' detached up and down to perſuade monied people, who wiſhed well to the cauſe, to contribute for the ſubſiſtence of king James's caſhiered officers. That king William being reſolved to venture his perſon once more for the ſafety of theſe kingdoms, his journey to Ireland concluded upon, and the moſt and better diſciplined part of the army to attend his majeſty, it was impoſſible to leave any conſiderable force behind him in his abſence; and that the tranſportation of the queen of Spain, and the convoy of the Straits merchant-men under admiral Killigrew, had carried a conſiderable part of our fleet to the Mediterranean; and another part of it commanded by ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, was to attend his majeſty and the army to Ireland; ſo that the grand fleet was not to have been ſo conſiderable as otherwiſe it would have been. That all theſe circumſtances raiſed the courage of the plotters, who thought this the only time to put their deſign in execution. That in order to that, at one of their general meetings in London, where it was neceſſary that ſome of the clergy ſhould be preſent to bleſs ſo pious a work, it was concluded to preſent a memorial in the name of the 'loyal and diſtreſſed ſubjects of England,' (for ſo they named themſelves) to his moſt chriſtian majeſty, humbly inviting him out of his unparallelled goodneſs, and for the affection he always bore to oppreſt virtue, that he would aſſiſt them in reſtoring their lawful king, his antient ally and confederate, to his throne, and, in breaking the yoke of uſurpation, under which theſe three nations were at this time ſo heavily groaning. That there had been two or three memorials preſented to the French king before this, beſides a conſtant correſpondence betwixt the French miniſter of ſtate, monſieur de Croiſſy and them. And the clergy, who were the great contrivers and managers of this, and who by their profeſſion are, for the moſt part, extraordinarily credulous of any thing they incline to, did really believe, that immediately upon the appearing of the French fleet, and the burning of ours, (which they thought as ſure) there would certainly be a general inſurrection through a great many places in the kingdom, in order to join them at their landing, and, to declare for king James."

This pamphlet reflecting ſo highly on the non-juring clergy, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhops of Norwich, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough, both in their own, and in the name of their abſent brother the biſhop of Gloceſter, publiſhed a paper, wherein they ſolemnly, and in the preſence of God, proteſted and declared, "I. That theſe accuſations caſt upon them were all of them malicious calumnies and diabolical inventions. II. That they knew not who was the author of the new liturgy, nor had any hand it, neither did they uſe it at any time. III. That they never held any correſpondence, directly or indirectly, with monſieur de Croiſſy, or with any other miniſter or agent of France; and if any ſuch memorial had been preſented to the French king, they never knew any thing of it; and that they did utterly renounce both that and all other invitations ſuggeſted to be made by them, in order to any invaſion of the kingdom by the French. IV. That they utterly denied and diſowned all plots charged upon them, as contrived or carried on in their meetings at Lambeth; the intent thereof being to adviſe how in their preſent difficulties, they might beſt keep their conſciences void of offence towards God and towards man. V. That they were ſo far from being the authors and abettors of England's miſeries, that they did, and ſhould to their dying hour, heartily and inceſſantly pray for the peace, proſperity, and glory of England; and ſhould always, by God's grace, make it their daily practice to ſtudy to be quiet, to bear their croſs patiently, and to ſeek the good of their native country. They concluded, that as the lord had taught them to return good for evil, the unknown author of the pamphlet having endeavoured to raiſe in the whole Engliſh nation ſuch a fury, as might end in De-witting them, (a bloody word, but too well underſtood) they recommended him to the divine mercy, humbly beſeeching God to forgive him. And as they had, not long ſince, either actually or in full preparation of mind, hazarded all they had in the world, in oppoſing popery and arbitrary power in England; ſo they ſhould, by God's grace, with greater zeal again, ſacrifice all they had, and their very lives too, if God ſhould be pleaſed to call them thereto, to prevent popery, and the arbitrary power of France, from coming upon them, and prevailing over them, the perſecution of their proteſtant brethren there being freſh in their memories." State. Tracts II. 95. Though the biſhops thus ſtrongly aſſerted their innocence and reſolution of bearing their croſs, patiently, yet before the year was at an end, a plot was diſcovered in which they were deeply engaged as will be ſeen preſently.

[m] "But if, ſays Mr. Warre, under-ſecretary to that earl, he has no better arguments for himſelf than this laſt, they will not do much ſervice; my lord having not neglected one moment to diſpatch ſuch public buſineſs, as belonged to him, ſince the time he came into the office. And of this I am confident, that the greateſt part of the members of both houſes are well ſatisfied, that my lord has not been at all remiſs in the diſcharge of his duty." MS. letter to ſir William Colt, envoy at Hanover, Nov. 14. 1690.

[n] Boyer ſays, that ſeveral French officers in 1697, who had been in the engagement, coming over into England after the peace, when they could not be ſuſpected of any partial deſign, did loudly juſtify the earl's conduct, and ſaid, he deſerved rather to be recompenſed than cenſured, ſince he had preſerved the beſt part of the fleet from being totally deſtroyed. II. 193.

cannon before the place, he muſt expect no quarter;" the governor conſidering, that king James's army being defeated, he could expect no relief, accepted of the conditions offered him, and marched out with the garriſon, which conſiſted of three regiments and ſome odd companies, having their baggage only, but leaving all their arms and ſtores behind them.

On the 3d of July the duke of Ormond and monſieur Auverquerque here and elſewhere, were detached with nine troops of horſe to ſecure the quiet of Dublin. The next day the king, with the whole army, marched the ſame way, and on the 5th encamped at Finglas, within two miles of that city, where he was informed, that king James was embarked at Waterford with the duke of Berwick, Mr. Fitz-James, the lords Powis, Tyrconnel, and the French brigadier, the marquis de Lery: that ſome French ſhips being arrived at Kinſale, many, who had fled from the battle, were gone thither to embark for France: that the greateſt body of the Iriſh were marched towards Athlone: that within ſix and twenty miles of Dublin there was not an enemy in arms; and that there could not be any where above five thouſand together, whereof the French might be ſuppoſed to make three thouſand five hundred: that three hundred of the Swiſs or Germans had deſerted the enemy: that the town of Wexford had declared for his majeſty; and that Sligo was abandoned by the Iriſh.

On Sunday July 6th king William rode in a triumphant manner into Dublin, and went directly to St. Patrick's church, the cathedral of that metropolis, attended by the biſhops of Meath and Limerick; and after the public ſervices were ſolemnly performed, Dr. King, afterwards archbiſhop of Dublin, preached a ſermon upon the power and wiſdom of the providence of God in protecting his people, and defeating their enemies. The mayor and aldermen waited on his majeſty, and the people endeavoured by all demonſtrations of joy to expreſs their juſt ſenſe of their great and happy deliverance. In the afternoon the king returned to the camp, where the next day he publiſhed his royal declaration, "promiſing both his pardon and protection to all the people of the kingdom of Ireland, who either remained at home, or having fled from their dwellings, ſhould by the firſt day of Auguſt next repair to their uſual places of abode, ſurrendering up what arms they had to ſuch juſtices of the peace, as his majeſty ſhould appoint. But as for the deſperate leaders of the preſent rebellion, who had violated thoſe laws, by which the kingdom of Ireland is united and inſeparably annexed to the imperial crown of England, who had called in the French, who had authorized all violences and depredations againſt the proteſtants, and who rejected the gracious pardon, which his majeſty offered them in his proclamation of the 22d of February 1688-9, as his majeſty was now in condition to make them ſenſible of their errors, ſo he was reſolved to leave them to the event of war, unleſs by great and manifeſt demonſtrations he ſhould be convinced they deſerved his mercy, which he ſhould never refuſe to thoſe, who were truly penitent."

The king, as he had received the news of the battle of Flerus, the day after the victory at the Boyne; ſo on the day he entered Dublin, he had the news of the misfortune at ſea to temper the joy, his own ſucceſſes might give him. He had taken all the earl of Tyrconnel's papers in the camp, and found all king James's papers left behind him at Dublin. By theſe he underſtood the deſign, which the French had of burning his tranſport-fleet; and among the earl of Tyrconnel's papers, there was one letter written to queen Mary at St. Germain's, the night before the battle, but not ſent. In this letter the earl declared, that he looked on all as loſt; and ended it thus, 'I have now no hope in any thing but in Jones's buſineſs.' The marquis of Carmarthen, ſome weeks before the king went to Ireland, had received an advertiſement, that one Jones, an Iriſhman, who had ſerved ſo long in France and Holland, that he ſpoke both languages well, was to be ſent over to murder the king. And ſir Robert Southwell, who was ſecretary of ſtate for Ireland, found among lord Tyrconnel's letters to queen Mary, two remarkable ones; in the former of which he writes, that Jones was come; that his propoſition was more probable, and more likely to ſucceed, than any yet made; but that his demands were high, 'if any thing can be high for ſuch a ſervice.' In the latter he writes, that Jones had been with the king, who did not like the thing at firſt; but he added 'We have now ſo ſatisfied him both in conſcience and honour, that every thing is done that Jones requires.' Deagle, the attorney-general of Ireland, had furniſhed this Jones with money and a poignard of a particular compoſition; and they ſought long for a bible bound without a common-prayer, which he was to carry in his pocket, that ſo he might paſs, if ſeized on, for a diſſenter. Some perſons of great quality waited on him to the boat, that was to carry him over. He was for ſome time delayed in Dublin, and king William had paſſed over to Ireland, before he could reach him; but he was never heard of more, ſo that it is probable, that he went away with his money. A paper was drawn up of all this matter, and deſigned to be publiſhed; but, upon ſecond thoughts, the king and queen had that tenderneſs for king James, that they ſtopped the publiſhing to the world ſo ſhameful a practice.

On the 9th of July the king decamped from Finglas, and divided his army into two bodies; with the greater of which he marched to Crumlin three miles on the ſouth of Dublin; and the other conſiſting of four regiments of horſe, two of dragoons, and ten of foot, was ſent towards Athlone, under the command of lieutenant general Douglaſs. The next day the king iſſued out a proclamation, to eaſe his ſubjects of "the great oppreſſions and abuſes committed by his enemies in his kingdom of Ireland, by coining and making current braſs money of copper or mixed metal, and raiſing the value of it to an extravagant price, and to reduce the value of the ſaid copper money to the value or ſtandard of the like copper money formerly current in Ireland." The king having left brigadier Trelawney to command at Dublin with five regiments of foot and one of horſe, advanced as far as Inchiquin, twenty two miles beyond Dublin, in his way to Kilkenny.

Douglaſs, with his detachment, having reached Athlone on the 17th of July, ſent a drummer to ſummon it. But colonel Grace, the governor, a reſolute man, fired a piſtol at the meſſenger, ſaying, 'that ſuch were the terms he was for.' Upon this anſwer, Douglaſs reſolved to attack the place, though, it being ſtrong by ſituation, and defended by a caſtle, his force was not anſwerable to his undertaking. However, he immediately planted two field pieces to prejudice the enemy's guns, and ordered faſcines to be made in order to fill up the ditch. Having finiſhed a battery of ſix guns the beſiegers made a breach in the caſtle, but it being both too ſmall and too high for an aſſault, it was prudently laid aſide. Notwithſtanding this the firing continued very briſk on both ſides; but the beſiegers having loſt Mr. Nelſon their beſt gunner, and the cavalry ſuffering very much for want of forage; and at the ſame time it being reported, that Sarsfield was advancing with fifteen thouſand men to relieve the place, Douglaſs held a council of war, wherein it was thought fit to raiſe the ſiege, which he accordingly did on the 25th, having loſt near four hundred men before the town, the greateſt part of whom died of ſickneſs.

The king in the mean time moving weſtward reached Kill-Kullen bridge on the 11th of July; and that morning paſſing by the Neſs, and ſeeing a ſoldier robbing a poor woman, he was ſo enraged at it, that he firſt gave the fellow ſeveral blows with his cane, and then commanded, that both he, and ſome others guilty of the like crimes, ſhould be hanged. Some people reflected on this action of the king, as mean in a ſovereign at any time to lay hands upon his ſubject, and cruel to inflict a capital puniſhment on one, whom he had already corrected for his fault. But this ſeverity ſtruck the ſoldiers with ſuch a terror, that the country was freed from all violence during the whole march to Commalin, Caſtle-Durmont, and ſo beyond Carlow; from whence the king detached the duke of Ormond with a party of horſe to take poſſeſſion of Kilkenny, and ſo to ſecure the proteſtants and other inhabitants of the adjacent countries from being plundered by the enemy, who by this time began to look behind, and committed great depredations. From Carlow the army marched on to Kells, thence to Lough-land-bridge, and ſo to Bennet-bridge; and on the 19th of July his Majeſty was ſplendidly entertained at dinner by the duke of Ormond at his caſtle of Kilkenny, which had the good fortune to be preſerved by count Lauzun with all the goods and furniture, and a cellar well ſtored. On the 21ſt the army encamped at Carrick, from whence major general Kirk, with his own regiment, and colonel Brewer's, as alſo a party of horſe, was ſent towards Waterford. Kirk being arrived before the place, diſpatched a trumpet to ſummon the town, which at firſt refuſed to ſurrender, there being two regiments then in garriſon. However, their anſwer was ſo civil, that their inclinations were eaſily underſtood, ſtood; for ſoon after they ſent out to know what terms they might have, which were the ſame with Drogheda. But not liking theſe, they propoſed ſome of their own, which were rejected, and the heavy cannon drawn down that way, and ſome more forces ordered to march. The Iriſh being informed of theſe preparations, thought it adviſeable not to put themſelves to extremities, and thereupon agreed to march out with arms and baggage on the 25th, and ſo were conducted to Mallow. The fort Duncannon, a place of ſtrength, which commands the river of Waterford, was alſo ſurrendered to the king upon the ſame articles with Waterford; which laſt place was viewed by the king the day it was given up. Here he took care, that no perſons ſhould be moleſted: And among the reſt the lord Dover was admitted to a more particular protection as having formerly applied himſelf, when the king was at Hillſborough, by Kirk's means, to deſire a paſs for himſelf and his family into Flanders. The lord George Howard likewiſe embraced the king's mercy.

On the 27th of July the king left the camp at Carrick, and went to Dublin, intending, as he was adviſed, to go over to England, but he found letters there of another ſtrain. Things were in ſo good a poſture and ſo quiet in England, that they were no more in any apprehenſion of a deſcent, ſo the king went to Chapel-izod, and ſpent there ſome time to hear divers complaints, and redreſs ſeveral grievances. Here he likewiſe ordered a weekly faſt, and publiſhed on the 1ſt of Auguſt a ſecond declaration, to confirm the former, in favour of all poor labourers, common ſoldiers, country farmers, ploughmen, &c. and declaring withal, "that if thoſe of ſuperior rank and quality, and alſo ſuch as had borne office under his majeſty's enemies, whether military or civil, ſhould by the 25th day of that month of Auguſt ſurrender themſelves to his obedience, and ſhould be content, during the rebellion of that kingdom, to betake themſelves to ſuch town or city as ſhould be aſſigned them, they ſhould be ſecure of their lives, and have the liberty of ſuch town or city; and, if they were deſtitute and in want, ſhould alſo have a ſubſiſtence allowed them, according to their reſpective qualities. As to ſtrangers of what nation ſoever, who had taken ſervice in that kingdom againſt him, he did further declare, that if they ſhould forſake the enemy, and come into his quarters within the time aforeſaid, they ſhould not only receive his protection, whilſt they were in the kingdom, but forthwith have paſſports given them to go directly home into their reſpective countries. But if theſe manifeſtations of his grace and favour ſhould not be valued as they deſerved; or if any ſhould perſiſt in that barbarous and unchriſtian way of burning and deſolation, which in ſome places had of late been practiſed, he ſhould hold himſelf diſcharged of thoſe conſequences and calamities, which muſt inevitably follow, ſince thoſe who were obſtinate againſt his mercy, became the authors of their own confuſion." It was hoped, that the fulneſs of the pardon of the commons in this and the former declaration might have ſeparated them from the gentry; and that by this means the latter would be ſo forſaken, that they would accept of ſuch terms as ſhould be offered them. The king had intended to have made the pardon more comprehenſive, hoping by that to bring the war ſoon to an end. But the Engliſh in Ireland oppoſed this, thinking that the preſent opportunity was not to be loſt of breaking the great Iriſh families, upon whom the inferior ſort would always depend. In compliance with them the indemnity now offered was ſo limited, that it had no effect; for the prieſts, who governed the Iriſh with a very blind and abſolute authority, prevailed with them to try their fortunes ſtill; and the news of the victory, which the French had gained at ſea, was ſo magnified among them, that they made the people believe that the French would make ſuch a deſcent upon England, as muſt oblige the king to abandon Ireland.

About this time the king having a further account from England, that the deſigns of the mala-contents were diſcovered and prevented, the loſs at ſea repaired, and that the French had only burnt one ſmall village in the weſt of England, and ſo gone off again; he returned to the army, which on the 4th of Auguſt he found encamped at Golden-Bridge, and by the 7th reached Carrickelliſh, a place within five miles of Limerick, where he was joined by Douglaſs. The next day the earl of Portland and brigadier Stuart were detached towards Limerick with nine hundred horſe, and twelve hundred foot, who advanced within cannon-ſhot of the town with little oppoſition from the enemy; and in the evening the king himſelf, accompanied by prince George, monſieur Overkirk, lieutenant-general Ginckle, and ſeveral other great officers, went to view the poſture of the enemy and the avenues to the town. On the 9th the whole army decamped at five in the morning, and made their approaches in good order, two hundred horſe and dragoons, with a thouſand choſen foot, leading the van. The country being full of hedges and ditches, the pioneers were immediately employed to cut down the one firſt, and fill up the other; which being done the army advanced, and drove the enemy before them till they came to a narrow paſs between two bogs, within half a mile of the town, which was not above an hundred and fifty yards, aud this likewiſe full of hedges and other incumbrances. In this paſs were lanes leading to the town, in the middleſt of which, being the broadeſt, ſtood the Iriſh horſe, and to the right and left of it the hedges were lined with muſketeers. The detached party of Engliſh foot was upon the advance towards the centre; the horſe a little to the right of them, the Danes to the left, and the blue Dutch, with ſeveral Engliſh regiments, upon the right. Whilſt theſe things were going on thus, the king ordered two field-pieces towards the left, where they could bear upon the enemy's horſe, and fired from thence with ſo good ſucceſs, that the enemy ſoon quitted that poſt. At the ſame time colonel Earle led on his foot, who marched with ſo much bravery, though the enemy made a great fire through the hedge, that they forced them to retire, and continued their hedge-fight for two hours; driving the Iriſh under the very walls of the town, poſſeſſing themſelves of two advantageous poſts, called Cromwell's Fort, and the Old Chapel, and being hardly ſtopped there by the orders, which his majeſty ſent them. The Iriſh upon this plied the Engliſh forces with their great guns, that killed ſome few men as they marched in, which the whole army did by five in the afternoon, and moſt of them encamped within cannon-ſhot. The Danes, according to their poſt, encamped to the left, where they found an old fort built by their anceſtors, of which they were not a little proud, and from whence they fired three or four field-pieces upon the Iriſh, who lay entrenched between them and the town. Orders were alſo given forthwith to plant four field-pieces on Cromwell's fort to play upon the town from the out-works.

The army being poſted, Auguſt the 9th, the king ſent a trumpeter with a ſummons to the town. A great many of the garriſon were for capitulating; but monſieur Boiſſeleau the governor, the duke of Berwick, and colonel Sarsfield, oppoſed it with much vehemence, ſaying, that there were great diviſions, and even an actual inſurrection in England; that the dauphin was landed there with a great army; and that the prince of Orange would quickly be obliged to withdraw his forces thither. Upon this Boiſſeleau ſent the trumpeter back with a letter directed to ſir Robert Southwell, ſecretary of ſtate, (to avoid the rudeneſs of addreſſing himſelf directly to the king without giving him the title of majeſty) importing, "That he was ſurprized at the ſummons; and, that he thought the beſt way to gain the prince of Orange's good opinion was by a vigorous defence of the town, which his majeſty intruſted him withal." About eight in the evening the king went to his camp, a little mile from the town, having been on horſeback from five in the morning, giving the neceſſary orders, and expoſing himſelf amidſt the greateſt dangers, which the prince of Denmark ſhared all along with him. The cannon played from both ſides, and ſeveral of the enemy's ſhot fell near the king's tent, or flew over it. The ſame evening a party of dragoons was ſent to the ford at Annaghbeg, about two miles above the town, where ſix of the enemy's regiments of foot, three of horſe, and two of dragoons, were poſted on the other ſide of the river with a breaſt-work to cover them, who all fired upon the Engliſh, but neither killed nor wounded one of them. The advantage, which the enemy had, was ſuch, that the Engliſh expected to have met with great difficulties in paſſing the river, which is very rapid, and the bottom ſtony; but in the night the Iriſh abandoned their ſtation; ſo that Ginckle, who was commanded with a detachment to force his way over it, performed it the next morning, with about five thouſand horſe and foot, without any oppoſition. Two or three hours after the king himſelf went over the Shannon, and poſted there three regiments of foot, with ſome pieces of cannon. Neither were the beſieged idle; for all this while they were raiſing forts between the aſſailants and the Iriſh town; one to the ſouth gate, and the other towards the eaſt, which proved very ſerviceable to them, though not ſo great a diſadvantage to the Engliſh, as the ſurpriſing of their train of artillery, which was coming up to join the army.

Some deſerters, and amongſt them a gunner, who got into Limerick, having given the enemy an account where the king's tent ſtood, and of thoſe guns and other things, that were upon the road from Kilkenny, under a ſmall guard, they played very briſkly towards the king's tent, which he was at laſt prevailed with to remove. Nor was this all, for on the 11th one Manus O'Brian, a country gentleman came to the camp, and gave notice, that Sarsfield, with a body of five or ſix hundred horſe and dragoons had paſſed the Shannon in the night, nine miles above Limerick, and deſigned ſomething extraordinary. Though ſeveral concurring circumſtances, and Sarsfield's activity and reſolution, which fitted him for ſuch an enterprize, rendered this gentleman's relation at leaſt probable, yet little heed was given to it at firſt; and a great officer, inſtead of inquiring more particularly into the matter, interrogated O Brian concerning a prey of cattle in the neighbourhood; of which the gentleman could not forbear complaining afterwards, ſaying, he was ſorry to ſee general officers mind cattle more than the king's honour. However, after he had met with ſome acquaintance, he was brought to the king, who, to prevent the worſt, gave order, that ſir John Lanier, with five hundred horſe, ſhould march to meet the train. But wherever the fault lay, it was one or two in the morning before the party ſet out, and even then they advanced very ſlowly, till after they ſaw a great light in the air, and heard a ſtrange rumbling noiſe, which ſome juſtly conjectured to be the train blown up. For the artillery having the day before marched beyond Cullen to the little old ruinous caſtle of Ballenedy, not ſeven miles from the camp, Sarsfield lurked all that day in the mountains; and having notice where and how the men, who attended it, lay, he took with him guides, that brought him to the very ſpot, where he fell in among them, before they were aware, and killed ſeveral of them, with many of the waggoners, and ſome country people, who were carrying proviſions to the camp. The noiſe of the ſlaughter having awaked the officer, who commanded in chief, he ordered his men to get to their horſes, that were a grazing, and put themſelves in a poſture of defence. But moſt of thoſe, who endeavoured to fetch them, were cut to pieces, and the reſt obliged to ſhift for themſelves, ſo that there were in all about ſixty men killed. The convoy being thus totally routed, the Iriſh gathered the carriages and waggons, with the bread and ammunition, and as many of the guns, as the ſhortneſs of the time would permit them, into one heap, and having filled the guns with powder, and placed their mouths into the ground, that they might thereby certainly ſplit, they, at their going off, ſet fire to the heap, which was blown up into the air, with a moſt aſtoniſhing noiſe. The Iriſh got ſome booty on this occaſion, but took no priſoners; only a lieutenant of colonel Earle's being ſick in a houſe in the neighbourhood, was ſtript and brought to Sarsfield, who uſed him with civility, and told him, "If he had not ſucceeded in that enterprize, he would have gone for France." The party of horſe, that was ſent from the camp, came up in ſight of the enemy's rear, after the buſineſs was over; but wheeling to the left to intercept them in their retreat over the Shannon, the Iriſh paſſed another way and got ſafe into Limerick.

The unwelcome news of this adventure occaſioned great murmurings in the camp, and ſome warm words paſſed between duke Schomberg, ſon to the late duke, and the earl of Portland, as if the latter, and count Solmes, had neglected to ſend in time a detachment of ſufficient ſtrength to ſecure the train. Others ſaid, that the king was altogether unconcerned at this accident, as having no real deſign to make an end of the Iriſh war, but only to keep the enemy cantoned towards Limerick, and preſerve the conqueſt he made this ſummer [o]. But theſe were ill grounded conjectures; and the ſiege was purſued. The trenches were opened on the 17th of Auguſt, and ſome great guns being arrived from Waterford, a battery was raiſed below the fort to the right of the trenches, which diſmounted ſome of the enemies cannon. The ſame day the prince of Wirtembergh, with the major generals Kirk and Tetteau, and brigadier Bellaſis, with ſeven battalions, entered the trenches, advanced near three hundred paces, and made themſelves maſters of the redoubts. On the 18th, the trenches were relieved by lieutenant general Douglas, the lord Sydney, and count Naſſau, and brigadier Stuart, who approached towards another ſtrong redoubt of the enemy. Nor was the king leſs in danger than the reſt; for in the thickeſt of the enemy's fire he rid up to Cromwell's fort, and as his horſe was juſt entering the gap, he was ſtaid by a gentleman, who came to ſpeak to him, when, in the ſame moment there came a cannon-ball, that ſtruck in the very place, and covered the king with duſt. He took little notice of it, but alighting, came and laid himſelf down on the fort. On the 19th the trenches were relieved by the prince of Wirtembergh, who advanced farther towards the ſaid redoubt, which the king ordered to be attacked the 20th. Douglaſs, Sydney, Naſſau and Stuart, being then again on the guard, and the ſignal given about two in the afternoon, the Engliſh, to the number of one hundred and fifty, beſides officers, and ſeveral reſolute French volunteers, attacked the fort with undaunted bravery, and after an obſtinate fight drove out the enemy, killing forty of them. About half an hour after the Iriſh made a great ſally with near two thouſand horſe and foot, but were vigorouſly repulſed. The 21ſt, the trenches were carried on and finiſhed, ſo as to hinder any more ſallies. The next day the beſiegers battered the enemy's high towers, from whence they fired into the trenches, and quite levelled them; and in the night threw ſeveral bombs and carcaſſes into the town, as they did the day following red-hot bullets, which ſet ſeveral houſes and a magazine of hay on fire. All the batteries being finiſhed and thirty pieces of cannon mounted on them, the trenches by the 25th were advanced within thirty paces of the ditch; a breach was made in the wall near St. John's gate, and part of the paliſadoes on the counterſcarp beaten down. On the 26th the engineers having aſſured the king, that there was a ſufficient breach, and there being an impoſſibility to make it wider for want of bullets, he reſolved, to take the town by mines; and in order to that, commanded the covered way or counterſcarp (which here was almoſt the ſame with the ditch,) and two towers that were on each ſide the beach, and contiguous to the wall, to be attacked the next day, and that the men ſhould go no further, but lodge themſelves there. Accordingly Douglaſs detached monſieur de la Barthe, a brave experienced French lieutenant colonel, with nine companies of grenadiers, ſtrengthened by an hundred French officers and volunteers, to begin the attack; which was performed with ſuch bravery and ſucceſs, that the enemy was ſoon diſlodged from the covered way and the two forts. The aſſailants purſuing their good fortune, entered the breach with the runaways; and de la Barthe, with ſome bold adventurers, and above half the earl of Drogheda's grenadiers, were actually on the rampart, and others, ſtill more eager than the reſt, went into the very place. This action had been deciſive, if the engineers had made a lodgement in time, of if the counts Solmes and Naſſau would have ſuffered the detachment, that was to ſecond the grenadiers, to go further than the counterſcarp; for the Iriſh were all running from the walls quite over the bridge into the Engliſh town; but ſeeing that few of the Engliſh had entered the town; they rallied again, faced the aſſailants, and plyed them ſo warmly, that ſeveral of them were killed, and many mortally wounded. Elated with this ſucceſs, the Iriſh ventured upon the breach again, and the reſoluteneſs of their women was ſo great, that they inceſſantly pelted the Engliſh with ſtones, broken bottles, and all ſuch other inſtruments of deſtruction, as came next to their hands. The men, on their part, could not for mere ſhame be leſs valorous; ſo that after three hours unequal fighting, the Engliſh were forced to retire to their trenches. But this was not all; for during the heat of the action a Brandenburgh regiment being with great bravery got upon the enemy's black battery, the powder happened to take fire, which blew up a great many of them. Beſides, though colonel Cuts, who was commanded by the prince of Wirtembergh to march towards the Spur at the ſouth gate, beat in the Iriſh, who appeared on that ſide, yet he loſt ſeveral of his men, and was himſelf wounded; for he boldly advancing within half muſket ſhot of the gate, all the men lay expoſed to the enemy's ſhot, who lay ſecure within the Spur and the walls. The French proteſtants, the Dutch, and the Danes behaved themſelves very gallantly in their reſpective poſts; and the whole action, which laſted from three till ſeven, was very briſk every where, and coſt the beſiegers ſix hundred men killed upon the ſpot, and as many mortally wounded.

This diſappointment, and the approaching ill weather,

[o] Lanier, whom the king had ſent to ſecure the convoy, might have overtaken Sarsfield; but the general obſervation made of him (and of moſt of the officers who had ſerved king James, and were now on the king's ſide) was, that they had a greater mind to make themſelves rich, by the continuance of the war of Ireland, than their maſter great and ſafe by the ſpeedy concluſion of it. occaſioned the raiſing of the ſiege of Limerick [p]; for on the 30th of Auguſt the heavy baggage and cannon were ſent away, and the next day the army decamped and marched towards Clonmel. The king, after he had conſtituted the lord Sidney and Thomas Coningſby, lords juſtices of Ireland, and intruſted count Solmes with the command of the army, who ſoon after reſigned it to lieutenant general Ginckle, he embarked at Duncannon fort with prince George of Denmark, and ſome other perſons of diſtinction, on the 5th of September, and arrived ſafe next day in King's road near Briſtol, and on the 9th at Windſor, where he was received by the queen with that joy, which none but his own could equal.

Beſides Limerick, there were ſtill other towns in the poſſeſſion of the Iriſh: and their army was yet very numerous, which gave king James's friends ſome hopes of the reſtoration of that kingdom to his obedience. But they were not a little ſurprized to hear, that the Engliſh fleet was arrived before Cork harbour the 21ſt of September, with ſome forces under the command of the earl of Marlborough. When the Engliſh fleet was refitted, and the French retired to Breſt, the earl of Marlborough had propoſed, during the ſiege of Limerick, that five thouſand men who had lain idle all the ſummer in England, ſhould be ſent into Ireland, and with the aſſiſtance of ſuch men as the king ſhould order to join them, they ſhould try to take Cork and Kinſale. The king approved of this, and ordered the earl to come over with them, and left orders for about five thouſand more under the command of the duke of Wirtembergh, and major-general Scravenmore to join him. Accordingly the earl immediately acquainted them with his arrival. The next day, in entering the harbour, he was oppoſed by the enemy, who had a battery of eight guns there; but he having ſent three armed boats aſhore, they by their quick firing obliged the Iriſh to quit their guns. On the 23d, the greateſt part of the land forces were ſent up the paſſages, headed by the duke of Grafton, ſix miles from Cork, and being come by the 24th within a mile of the town, they began to mount their cannon, having near ſix hundred ſeamen, gunners, and carpenters, who did them conſiderable ſervice. There being a report, that the duke of Berwick deſigned to raiſe the ſiege, Scravenmore ſent a meſſenger to haſten the duke of Wirtembergh's march; and on the 25th ordered a party of horſe to go and cover the duke's foot. The ſame afternoon Tetteau, with a party of one thouſand men, having drawn ſome cannon to the Fair-Hill, reſolved to attack one or both of the new forts and new Shannon caſtle; but the Iriſh no ſooner obſerved his men poſted in order to that deſign, but they ſet fire to the ſuburbs between him and them, and quitting both the forts and caſtles, retired in haſte into the town. Upon this the Engliſh poſſeſſed themſelves of Shannon caſtle, and planted there ſome guns. Scravenmore came about that time with twelve hundred horſe and dragoons, and took up his quarters at Kill-Abbey. On the 26th the duke of Wirtembergh with his Danes, and brigadier la Mellioniere with ſome French and Dutch foot, arrived and encamped before the town. Wirtembergh and Marlborough being both lieutenant-generals, there happened a warm diſpute betwixt them about the chief command; Wirtembergh bluntly claiming it, becauſe he was a prince; and Marlborough with more temper, alledging, that the general command properly belonged to himſelf, both as the elder officer, and becauſe he led the troops of his own nation; whereas the duke of Wirtembergh was only at the head of auxiliaries. But la Mellioniere interpoſing, the earl was contented to ſhare the command with the duke, leſt his inſiſting on his full right ſhould retard the king's ſervice. Accordingly the earl commanded the firſt day, and gave the word, Wirtembergh; and the duke commanded the next, and gave the word, Marlborough.

This difference being adjuſted, and the enemy on the 27th having abandoned their works at the Cat-Fort, without a blow ſtruck, the Engliſh forces took poſſeſſion of it; and having raiſed a battery there, they threw their bombs into the city, and played their guns upon the fort, from the Fryars Garden, and from another battery above the fort near the abbey. Beſides, being maſters of a church, Scravenmore ordered a party of men into it, who from thence galled the Iriſh within the fort. All which, together with another battery ſet up by Red-Abbey, ſoon made a breach in the city wall, and brought the beſieged to demand a parley. Hoſtages were thereupon exchanged, and a truce granted till next morning; when the beſieged not accepting the terms offered, the beſiegers began to play again very furiouſly with their cannon. A conſiderable breach being made, the Danes from the north, and four regiments of Engliſh from the ſouth, under brigadier Churchill, paſſed the river up to the arm-pits into the Eaſt Marſh, in order to ſtorm the town. The grenadiers under the lord Colcheſter led the van, and marched forward with incredible bravery, though all the while expoſed to the enemy's fire, being encouraged by the duke of Grafton, and ſome other reſolute volunteers; but in the approach the duke of Grafton received a wound in the ſhoulder, of which he ſoon after died [q]. The van immediately poſted themſelves under the bank of the marſh, which was, as it were, a counterſcarp to the city wall; and at the ſame time the Salamander and another veſſel came up with the tide, and lay at the end of the marſh, directly before the city wall, played their cannon at the breach, and threw their bombs likewiſe into the city. All things being now ready, on the 28th of September, for a general aſſault, the beſieged thought fit to prevent it by beating a ſecond parley; and at laſt the earl of Tyrone and colonel Ricaut, being ſent from colonel M'Ellicut, who commanded in the place, agreed to the earl of Marlborough's conditions; which were, "That the garriſon, conſiſting of four thouſand men, ſhould be all priſoners of war, both officers and ſoldiers: That no prejudice ſhould be done to them, or to the inhabitants: That the general would uſe his endeavours to obtain his majeſty's clemency towards them: That all the arms, as well of the garriſon as inhabitants, ſhould be ſecured: That all the proteſtant priſoners ſhould be ſet at liberty: That the old fort ſhould be delivered up within an hour, and the two gates of the city the next morning: And that an exact account ſhould be given of the warlike ammunitions and proviſions in the magazines." The priſoners of note taken at Cork were the earls of Clancarty and Tyrone, the governor of the place, colonel Ricaut, and ſeveral other officers.

Animated with this ſucceſs, the ſame day the earl entered Cork, he ſent a detachment of horſe and dragoons, under the command of brigadier Villiers, to ſummon the town and forts of Kinſale. Upon his approach the Iriſh were ready to ſet the town on fire; but being prevented by the ſudden arrival of the Engliſh, they retreated in haſte to the old and new forts. The earl of Marlborough ſet out from Cork on the 1ſt of October, arrived at Five-mile Bridge the ſame day, and the next before Kinſale; and having formed his camp in the evening gave directions to make his approaches towards the new forts, while Tetteau was ordered to attack the old. The next morning early, Tetteau having paſſed the river in boats made a feint of ſtorming the fort in the weakeſt place, where moſt of the beſieged were ready to receive him; but in the mean while another detachment made a bold aſſault upon another place, where the enemy leaſt expected them, and by that means were ſoon maſters of a baſtion. At the ſame time ſeveral barrels of powder happening to take fire, whereby near forty of the Iriſh were blown up, the reſt retired into an old caſtle in the midſt of the fort, and immediately ſubmitted to be priſoners of war,

[p] Mr. R. Warre, under ſecretary to the earl of Nottingham, in a letter from Whitehall, Septemb. 9, 1690, to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at the court of Hanover, gives the following account of the raiſing the ſiege of Limerick. "Nothing induced the king to quit the ſiege but the ſeaſon of the year, and the nature of the country, which in thoſe parts is ſo ſubject to be overflowed, that the ſoldiers could no longer remain in the trenches in wet weather; and no art nor induſtry could remedy this miſchief. The deſerters do agree, that if the weather would have permitted the king to remain there a few days longer, the neceſſities and deſpair of the people in the town would have forced the officers to ſurrender, if they had not been diſpoſed to it of themſelves. The enemy had ſo little ſhare in obliging the king to retire, that he did not meet with the leaſt diſturbance from them in decamping or in his march. The proteſtants thereabouts are by this means left to the mercy of the Iriſh, but moſt of them withdraw to places within the army's protection.——Though this diſappointment is the more unhappy for coming at the end of the campaign, yet the progreſs the king has made towards reducing that kingdom, is ſo conſiderable, as would have been eſteemed at firſt ſufficient for one yea., and enough to render it a glorious campaign." And in another letter dated October 21, the ſame gentleman writes thus: "I have endeavoured to inform myſelf of the number of perſons loſt before Limerick, but cannot give you a diſtinct nor juſt account. I ſpoke with a gentleman, who was at the ſiege all the time, and had the beſt opportunity of being informed herein. He tells me, the greateſt loſs to our men was, in gaining the redoubt, and aſſaulting the counterſcarp; the reſt happening in the trenches, where about ten men a day might be killed. He computes the whole at a thouſand or twelve hundred at the moſt. He obſerved a thing not unworthy your notice, that where a colonel or captain was deficient in his full number of men, if he was ordered on ſervice, he would deliver in his loſs, as if his regiment or company had been compleat; which made ſome judge our loſs greater than it was; but at that rate it was not much greater than what I tell you." MS. p. 396.

[q] The duke of Grafton was the more lamented, as being, of all king Charles's children, the perſon of whom there was the greateſt hope. He was brave, and probably would have become a great man at ſea. Burnet, II. 60.

The

having loſt about two hundred men out of four hundred and fifty. This buſineſs being over, the earl of Marlborough ſent to ſummon the new fort, which was much more conſiderable than the other; but ſir Edward Scot, the governor, reſolutely anſwered, "that it would be time enough to capitulate a month hence." Upon this the Engliſh on the 5th of October opened their trenches, and on the 9th had advanced them to the counterſcarp; but the ill weather hindered the coming up of the cannon till the 11th when part of it arrived. The 12th in the morning ſix pieces were mounted at the Danes attack, and two mortars at the Engliſh, which fired all that day. The 13th two twenty four pounders were placed on the ſame battery; and the next day the reſt of the cannon arrived, three of which were mounted on the Engliſh battery. And the Danes, commanded by Wirtembergh, having made a conſiderable breach, the night following, to diſturb the enemy, they made a falſe attack. The 15th the cannon continued to play all the morning; and all things were preparing for a ſtorm, when the enemy beat a parley. Hoſtages being exchanged, the articles were agreed on and ſigned about midnight, by which the middle baſtion was to be delivered up the next morning, and the garriſon, conſiſting of about one thouſand one hundred men, was to march the next day after, with arms and baggage, and be conducted to Limerick. The loſs of the Engliſh before this place was little leſs than three hundred men killed or wounded; which yet was of no moment, conſidering the great advantage they gained by ſubduing this ſea-port town, and that of Cork; for by this means a ſtop was put to all ſupplies from France, at leaſt on this ſide of Ireland; and the Iriſh were almoſt confined to the province of Ulſter, where they had great difficulty to ſubſiſt. The earl of Marlborough having performed this glorious expedition in thirty ſeven days, embarked again for England, and arrived at Kenſington the 28th of October, where he was received with great civility by their majeſties; and the king was heard to ſay, 'that he knew no man ſo fit for a general, who had ſeen ſo few campaigns.' Aboard the ſhips which came back with the earl of Marlborough, were brought priſoners, the earls of Clencarty and Tyrone, the lord Carne, colonel M'Eilicut, and other officers of note.

During theſe proceedings, count Lauzun with the French troops, lay about Galway, without attempting any thing. He ſent over to the court of France an account of the deſperate ſtate of their affairs, and deſired, that ſhips might be ſent for the tranſporting of their forces. This was done, yet the ſhips came not till the ſiege of Limerick was raiſed; and probably if the court of France had known how much the ſtate of affairs was altered by that event, they would have ſent contrary orders. But Lauzun was weary of the ſervice, and was glad to get out of it; and therefore ſailed away without ſtaying for new orders, leaving the general command of the Iriſh forces to the duke of Berwick, which was afterwards given to monſieur St. Ruth. By this conduct count Lauzun loſt the little reputation, which he was beginning to recover at the court of France. Tyrconnel went over with him, and gave full aſſurances, that though the Iriſh were like to ſuffer great hardſhips the next winter, yet they would continue firm, if they were ſtill ſupported by France. And as it had appeared on many occaſions, that the French and Iriſh ſoldiers did not agree well together, he propoſed, that no more ſoldiers, but only a number of good officers, together with arms, ammunition, and clothes, might be ſent over to them.

In the mean while the Iriſh formed themſelves into many bodies, which by a new name were called 'Rapparees;' who knowing all the ways and the bogs, and other places of retreat in Ireland, and being favoured by the Iriſh, that had ſubmitted to the king, robbed and burnt houſes in many places of the country; while the king's army ſtudied their own eaſe in their quarters, more than the protection of the inhabitants. And many of them were ſuſpected of robbing in their turn, though the rapparees bore the blame of all. However, between them, the inhabitants were dreadfully harraſſed, and their ſtock of cattle and corn was almoſt quite deſtroyed in many places.

Thus ended the campaign in Ireland. With reſpect to foreign affairs; the grand alliance, to which the king had acceded, was alſo ſtrengthened by the acceſſion of the duke of Savoy[1]. He had, ſince the kindling of the war, profeſſed a neutrality, with which the French appeared the leaſt ſatisfied, though they ſeemed to have moſt reaſon to be ſo. For though the duke had been ſo complaiſant to the king of France, as to impriſon, baniſh, and at laſt deſtroy by the ſword his own proteſtant ſubjects, the miſerable Vaudois; yet nothing was able to continue him in that king's favour, but his receiving a French garriſon into the citadels of Turin and Verceil, for the ſecuring of his pretended neutrality. Theſe propoſals could not but appear harſh to a court, which was ever uſed rather to gain than loſe by the diviſion of her neighbours. However the duke, who, even at four and twenty years of age, challenged a place amongſt the ableſt

[1] The author of the 'French Continuation of Monſieur Rapin's hiſtory' ſays, that king William had for a long time courted that duke, who being weary of the long ſlavery, under which he had been retained by France, heard with pleaſure every thing, that tended to reſcue him from that yoke. The houſe of Auſtria had no leſs intereſt to gain him; and it is ſaid, that this houſe ever ſince the firſt infractions of the treaty of Nimeguen, in order to revenge itſelf, formed a project, of which the two principal articles were the raiſing of king William to the throne of Great Britain, and the making a league with Victor Amadeus II. duke of Savoy. This latter article was negotiated, as it was ſaid, in 1685, a little after the truce for twenty years; and there was a perſon, who having learned this at Rome, from the mouth of Chriſtina of Sweden, then upon ill terms with Lewis XIV, came to Turin, to diſcover that ſecret to the abbé d'Eſtrades, the French miniſter at that court. But the latter having refuſed the private audience, which the other deſired of him, this important diſcovery was buried in ſilence.

Two years afterwards, in 1687, it was found by means of two hundred thouſand livres given to a monk, who was a private agent of the duke, that under pretence of diverting himſelf at the carnival of Venice, he had concluded there an alliance with the emperor and ſeveral of the German princes, upon the plan of the famous league of Augſbourg; and a copy of this treaty was likewiſe procured. This ſtep ought to have given ſome uneaſineſs to the court of Verſailles. But, whether proſperity had accuſtomed that court to deſpiſe its enemies, or whether it imagined that the duke would deceive his new allies, the French miniſters intereſted themſelves ſo much the leſs in that affair, as they flattered themſelves at all adventures with the notion of being able to take their revenge whenever they ſhould think proper.

The duke taking advantage of this ſecurity of theirs, concluded his treaty with the emperor and his allies. By the firſt article, the duke obliged himſelf not to enter into any treaty of alliance, peace, or truce with France, without the conſent of the emperor, to whom he promiſed a faithful and inviolable attachment. He engaged by the ſecond and third articles to act in concert with the emperor, Spain, and their allies, and to employ his forces in conjunction with theirs againſt France. The abbé Vincent Grimani on the other hand promiſed in the name of the emperor and empire, not to enter into any treaty of peace or truce with France without including the duke in it. 2. To take ſuch order, that the governor of Milan ſhall employ all the forces of that ſtate for the preſervation of the duke's territories; and that the Spaniſh fleet ſhould take care to ſecure the city and country of Nice. 3. That his imperial majeſty ſhould immediately ſend ſix thouſand of his choiceſt men to join the duke's forces, which his imperial majeſty engaged to pay without their pretending to any winter quarters in Piedmont. 4. That his imperial majeſty ſhall endeavour to the utmoſt of his power, that the Vaudois, the French refugees, and the eight thouſand men, which the marquis of Borgomanero, embaſſador of Spain, had promiſed ſhould be ſent into Piedmont, ſhould join the troops of the duke; the emperor leaving to him the care of employing all thoſe forces jointly with the governor of Milan, as they ſhould find moſt convenient. 5. That the emperor and the confederates ſhould endeavour the reſtoration of Pignerol into the hands of the duke, either by force of arms, or by a treaty, without laying any claim to Montferrat, which his imperial majeſty ſhould renounce, notwithſtanding the antient treaties. 6. That his imperial majeſty ſhould lay no claim to any thing; that may happen to be won from France on that ſide, but would leave the duke and the governor of Milan to agree that point together.

The time was now paſſed, when the French inſulted their enemies with a haughty and contemptuous indifference. They had then an extreme attention to every thing that was doing. They had diſcovered, that the duke of Savoy had practiſed upon the Vaudois, and maintained a private correſpondence with England and Holland; that theſe three powers were projecting a diverſion into Breſſe, and Dauphine, and deſigned to employ in that attempt the troops of the Milaneſe, thoſe of Savoy, the Vaudois who had retired into Wirtemberg, the French refugees, and the new converts, whom they would try to engage in an inſurrection. Lewis the XIV, who was now in the train of diſcoveries, was informed ſoon after of the engagements, which the duke was entered into, and therefore ſent twelve thouſand men into Piedmont, under the command of the brave and able Monſieur Catinat, afterwards marſhal of France, with orders, to demand of the duke as a pledge of his fidelity, that he would deliver up to France his troops, together with Verrue and the citadel of Turin. The Duke, confounded with this unforeſeen ſtroke, endeavoured to amuſe his enemy by ſubmiſſions and offers, till he could procure aſſiſtance from the emperor and Spain. But Lewis XIV. was not to be deceived, and therefore reinforced his army in Piedmont, and declared to the duke, that he expected of him the delivery of Verrue and the citadel of Turin, or, inſtead of the latter, Carmagnola, Suza, and Montmelian, to be reſtored to the duke after the peace under the guaranty of the pope and the Venetians. He added in a kind of manifeſto, "That if the duke choſe rather to truſt in the hands of the republic of Venice, during the courſe of the war, the citadel of Turin and Verrue, and to receive a Venetian garriſon, he would withdraw his troops upon theſe two conditions: Firſt, that if this prince, contrary to the promiſes which he ſhould be obliged to give, ſhould join his troops to thoſe of the allies, or give them a paſſage into his territories, the Venetians ſhould in that caſe be obliged to put into the hands of France the two places entruſted to them. Secondly that the emperor and Spain ſhould oblige themſelves not to attempt any thing in Italy againſt the princes who were neutral or allies of France, and that the Pope, Venice, and the Grand Duke ſhould be guaranties of that convention."

The duke was then too much engaged on both ſides, to be able to give a faithful promiſe. But at laſt he declared himſelf on the 2d of June; his treaty with the king of Spain was ſigned the next day, and that with the emperor the day following; and hoſtilities were begun at the ſame time by the French in Piedmont and Savoy.

politicians, prudently amuſed the king of France with civil meſſages, and at the ſame time endeavoured to make the emperor buy his alliance with the acknowledgment of his claim to the kingdom of Cyprus, and the giving him the title of 'Royal Highneſs,' which at laſt the emperor conſented to. This conceſſion being made public, the French began to ſuſpect the conſiderations, upon which his imperial majeſty had made it, and expoſtulated the matter with the duke; who thereupon declared to the king of France by his miniſter, that he had no deſign to abandon his friendſhip, or to do any thing derogatory to the treaties, that were between that crown and himſelf. But this general anſwer not ſatisfying the French, monſieur Catinat, who was to command the French troops on that ſide, paſſed the mountains, and arrived at Turin in the ſpring, leaving his army of about eighteen thouſand men in Dauphiné, with orders to follow him by eaſy journies into the duke's territories. The preſence of this military envoy ſomewhat diſcompoſed the duke of Savoy, who, to rid himſelf of a troubleſome gueſt, before the arrival of his more troubleſome retinue, offered to furniſh the king of France with two thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe. The pope's nuncio at Turin endeavoured likewiſe to ſend away Catinat in good humour; but that general not ſatisfied with any offers that were made him, poſitively demanded Verceil for a place of arms, proteſting, that he would not hearken to any accommodation but upon theſe terms. Though the duke had by this time made choice of his ſide, yet it had been great imprudence in him to declare his intentions, ſince the French were ready to attack him, and the Spaniards from the Milaneſe not in a condition to aſſiſt him. He therefore made uſe of all imaginable addreſs to protract the affair, which produced theſe new propoſals from France, "That the king was willing to refer his concerns to the pope and the republic of Venice, upon condition, that the duke would conſign Verceil, Carmagnola, and Suza into the pope's hands, until the end of the war." The duke being preſſed ſo far, and conſidering, that it was to no purpoſe to conceal a thing, which was already but too much ſuſpected, and muſt neceſſarily be known, boldly declared, "That he was engaged with the emperor, and could not go from his word. However, in regard the alliance he had made with his imperial majeſty, tended no farther than to oppoſe the unjuſt deſigns of France, if his moſt chriſtian majeſty would put Caſal and Pignerol into the hands of the republic of Venice till the end of the war, he would lay down his arms, and for the ſame put into the pope's hands one of his towns, as a pledge for the obſervation of a neutrality." It will be eaſily imagined how France reliſhed this anſwer, which, at beſt, was but a civil declaration of war; the conſequence of which was, the immediate liberty and recalling of the Vaudois, and the encouragement given them to arm themſelves againſt France; and the public avowing of the duke's treaties, firſt with the emperor, and then with the king of Spain, whereby they reſpectively engaged themſelves to join their forces againſt France, and never to make a ſeparate treaty with that crown, without their joint conſent. Beſides, by the firſt article of the treaty with Spain, made on the 3d of June, his catholic majeſty promiſed to make the duke of Savoy to be comprehended in the alliance with the emperor, king William, the ſtates general, and all his other allies.

Catinat being by this time at the head of his army in the duke's territories, the duke gathered what force he could to drive him out; and joining himſelf with the troops of the Milaneſe, earneſtly fought an opportunity of ſignalizing his courage. But the count de Lovigniez, who commanded the Spaniſh troops, continually repreſented to him, that Catinat could not receive ſupplies but with great difficulty, and that his army waſted every day by deſertion or diſeaſes; whereas the duke's forces had plenty of every thing, and increaſed daily with new reinforcements; and therefore he ought to expect victory rather from time than the ſucceſs of a battle, which he could not try without diſadvantage, the French being not only ſuperior in number, but alſo better diſciplined.

Theſe reaſons prevailed for ſome time with the duke of Savoy, to content himſelf with obſerving the enemy; but being elated with the ſucceſs of ſome of his troops, which had repulſed the French from before Carignan, and drove them out of the vallies and town of Lucerne, he advanced towards Catinat, who made a ſhew of attacking Saluſſes, and offered him battle. The French general gladly accepted the challenge; and having obſerved, that the enemy's left wing was covered by a moraſs, he cauſed the ſame to be ſounded, and finding it had a firm bottom, ordered his men to begin the attack that way. The duke's left wing was ſo ſurprized at this unexpected charge, that they made no long reſiſtance; but the right wing ſtood firm for above three hours, till being overpowered they betook themſelves to flight. The duke himſelf retired with his broken remains to Carignan, and Catinat purſuing his victory, the very next day made himſelf maſter of Saluſſes, and not long after of Savillana, Villa Franca, and ſeveral other places, and then marched his army towards Carignan. The duke not finding himſelf in a condition to wait his coming, left a ſtrong garriſon both in that place and in Carmagnola, and retreated to Moncalier to recruit his army, and to ſtay for the Germans, that were coming to his aſſiſtance. With this reinforcement, beſides ſome Milaneſe troops, being nearly twenty thouſand ſtrong, he decamped from Moncalier, and marched towards Catinat; who having likewiſe been ſtrengthened with ſome regiments from France, had formed a deſign upon Suza, a town conſiderable for its ſituation, as being the key of Dauphiné into Piedmont. To ſecure this place the duke ſent the count de Lovigniez with ſix battalions of foot and ſome horſe; of which Catinat having received information, left the common road, and marched his men with great expedition for ſix days together over the mountains. Upon this motion of Catinat, the duke imagined, that the ſiege of Suza was only a feint, and that the true deſign of the French was to give him battle; and therefore ſent orders to Lovigniez to leave Suza, and forthwith to join him with all his forces. This was no ſooner done, but the French immediately inveſted the town, where there was only ſix or ſeven hundred men in garriſon, who not thinking themſelves able to defend ſuch a weak poſt againſt a numerous army, ſurrendered upon honourable terms. With this action the campaign ended in Piedmont, for Catinat divided his army, ſending part of it into Provence, and the other into Savoy; which dukedom (the town of Montmelian excepted) monſieur St. Ruth had not long before reduced to his maſter's obedience. The duke of Savoy finding how little he ought to depend either upon the emperor or the king of Spain, who had made him great promiſes of aſſiſtance, in which they were never wanting, when their affairs required it, though they totally failed in the performance, he wiſely bethought himſelf of making application to the ſtates general, and eſpecially to king William, the head and ſupport of the grand alliance, by the count De la Tour, preſident of his finances, one of his privy council, and a man of great parts. That envoy extraordinary having diſpatched his buſineſs at the Hague, came immediately over into England, and at his firſt public audience delivered himſelf to the king in the following terms:

SIR,

"HIS royal highneſs, my maſter, does by me congratulate your ſacred majeſty's glorious acceſſion to the crown. It was due to your birth, and deſerved by your virtue, and is maintained by your valour. Providence had deſigned it for your ſacred head, for the accompliſhment of his eternal decrees, which, after long patience, do always tend to raiſe up choſen ſouls to repreſs violence, and protect juſtice. The wonderful beginnings of your reign are moſt certain preſages of the bleſſings, which heaven prepares for the uprightneſs of your intentions; which have no other ſcope than to reſtore this flouriſhing kingdom to its firſt greatneſs, and break the chains which Europe groans under.

"This magnanimous deſign, worthy of the heroe of our age, filled his royal highneſs with inexpreſſible joy; but he was conſtrained to conceal it in the ſecret of his heart; and if at laſt he has been free to own it, he is obliged to the very name of your majeſty for it, ſince that alone has made him conceive ſome hopes of liberty, after ſo many years of ſervitude.

"My words, and the treaty which I have ſigned at the Hague, with your majeſty's miniſters, do but faintly expreſs the paſſion, which my maſter has to unite himſelf by the moſt inviolable ties to your ſervice. The honour, Sir, which he has to be related to you, has tied the firſt knots of this union. The infinite reſpect, which he has for your ſacred perſon, has, as it were, knit them faſter; and the generous protection, which you are pleaſed to grant him, will, without doubt, make them indiſſoluble. Theſe are the ſincere ſentiments of his royal highneſs; to which I dare not add any thing of mine; for how ardent ſoever my zeal may be, and how profound the veneration, which I bear to your glorious atchievements, I think I cannot better expreſs either, than by a ſilence full of admiration."

The king was not diſpleaſed with ſo agreeable a compliment, and at the ſame time readily embraced this opportunity to engage the duke of Savoy in the intereſts of the confederates, by promiſing him ſpeedy aſſiſtance; in which he fulfilled his engagements.

As the enemies of France increaſed, ſo ſhe ſeemed proportionably to increaſe in power, being very formidable this year, not only by ſea, of which the confederate fleet felt the effects, but alſo by land. The allies being ſenſible of this, it was agreed, that the army of the ſtates under prince Waldeck ſhould oppoſe in Flanders that of France, commanded by the duke of Luxemburg, while the elector of Brandenburg ſhould, upon the Moſelle, obſerve the marquis de Boufflers. But the French, according to their uſual forwardneſs, having taken the field early, the Dutch were conſtrained to draw out their garriſons to attend the enemy, before thoſe of Brandenburg were come to the poſt aſſigned them; which gave Boufflers an opportunity to encamp between the Sambre and the Meuſe, from whence he maintained a free communication between his army and that of Luxemburg.

The Dutch, under theſe circumſtances, encamped near the river Pieton, in one of the moſt advantageous poſts in all Flanders, waiting till the Brandenburgers took the field, and thereby cauſed the enemy to divide their forces; but in the mean time the duke of Luxemburg drew near the Sambre, with a deſign to croſs that river between Namur and Charleroy, and then to waſte the Spaniſh countries or put them under contribution. Prince Waldeck knowing of what importance it was to keep the French beyond the Sambre, and being likewiſe thoroughly ſollicited by the Spaniards to oppoſe the deſigns of the enemy, decamped from the Pieton, and the next day detached the count of Berlo with fifteen hundred horſe, to obſerve whether the French endeavoured to paſs the Sambre or not. This detachment was, in caſe of neceſſity, to be ſupported by four or five regiments of cavalry, commanded by the count de Flodrop; and the count of Webbenum, with another party of horſe, was poſted on this ſide a narrow lane, which was to be paſſed through before they could come to the enemy.

Berlo being advanced as far as the village of Flerus, found, that a good part of the French army had already paſſed the Sambre, and poſted themſelves againſt the village, which they kept to their backs; of all which he inſtantly informed prince Waldeck, who was poſted between Mellin and Fleurs. On the other hand the enemy having notice of Berlo's approach, marched directly towards him. And at the ſame time the duke of Luxemburg diſpatched away ſeveral troops privately through by-ways to fall upon him in the rear. Upon this Berlo ſent for a reinforcement, eſpecially of foot; but inſtead of ſending him more force, they gave him orders to retreat. Yet he not receiving thoſe orders till he was almoſt ſurrounded on every ſide, was obliged to put himſelf in a condition to defend a narrow lane, which he had before poſſeſſed by his dragoons. The enemy charged him very vigorouſly, and there he loſt his life, as did alſo major Caſtleman, and ſome other officers. The count de Flodrop was likewiſe advanced too far to retire without fighting; and indeed his party ſtood their ground very ſtoutly for a while, but being oppreſſed by numbers, they were forced to retreat to count Webbenum, who commanded the third detachment, and was poſted on the other ſide the hedge. Some ſquadrons of the French boldly purſued Flodrop through the hedge, but were ſo vigorouſly repulſed, that they were conſtrained to retreat. When this was over, Flodrop and Webbenum joined their main army, which was drawn up in order of battle, and continued in that poſture all night. The next morning the Dutch underſtood by a deſerter, that Luxemburg was reſolved to fight; but two ſpies, who made it their buſineſs to betray both armies, reported preſently after, that he was repaſſing the Sambre. Prince Waldeck continued in this uncertainty till eight in the morning, when he ſaw the French drawn up in battle-array, and that there was a neceſſity of engaging.

The Dutch army conſiſted only of about five and twenty thouſand men; the Spaniards and Brandenburgers, who ſhould have reinforced them, not being yet come up; ſo that the prince could not make above two lines, which extended from Flerus to St. Arnand. The French army was above forty thouſand ſtrong, Luxemburg having almoſt drained the French frontier towns, and having been reinforced three days before by eighteen battalions of foot, forty five ſquadrons of horſe from Boufflers's army, and the flying camp of the count de Gournay. The fight being reſolved upon, prince Waldeck gave the command of his right wing to the prince of Naſſau, general of the horſe, accompanied by lieutenant general d'Huby, a Spaniard, and the prince of Birkenfield with his brigadiers; and aſſigned the charge of the left wing, and the main battle, to the prince of Naſſau, governor of Friezeland, and mareſchal de camp, and the lieutenant generals d'Alva and Webbenum. He likewiſe, before the fight began, ſent ſome horſe to line the right wing of the army, which was advantageouſly poſted. But whether none were ſent to line the left, or that thoſe, who were commanded thither did not perform their duty, the enemy, without being perceived, ſlipped ſeveral troops behind a riſing ground and a ſmall wood near the Sambre, who poſted themſelves behind the ſecond line of the left wing. This conſtrained that line to face about, and turn their backs to the firſt; whereby being very much weakened, ſome battalions of the right wing were ſent to ſecure their flank, and aſſiſt them to maintain their ground. Luxemburg no ſooner obſerved that motion, but he told the duke de Mayne, who was then near him, 'See what the enemy are doing; I foretell they will be beaten.' Which being ſaid, he ordered the left wing to be attacked at the ſame time in the front, rear, and flank. The firſt line being already weakened to reinforce the ſecond, was ſoon compelled to give way; upon which the enemy marched on to the ſecond, to fall upon their rear. By this time that line was advanced to make head againſt the cavalry, which they had before them, and which they had driven back in diſorder upon the French infantry; but the enemy having three lines, no ſooner was one overthrown, but freſh battalions renewed the fight, by which means they at laſt repulſed the Dutch, quite tired with the onſets they had already ſuſtained. Prince Waldeck obſerving the left wing in a ſtaggering condition, and that the horſe had, for the moſt part given ground, ſent to their relief the horſe of the ſecond line of the right wing, from whence the foot had already been drawn for the ſame purpoſe, While this was doing on that ſide, the firſt line of the right wing was alſo engaged with the enemy, and had bravely repulſed and routed them ſeveral times, being ſupported by the Spaniſh horſe, who had made themſelves maſters of ten pieces of the enemy's cannon, and kept them a conſiderable time. But the French having three lines on that ſide alſo, and being continually ſupplied with freſh men, the Dutch cavalry was diſperſed and broke to that degree, that the whole body could never be rallied again. Count Flodrop indeed with great difficulty, aſſembled about twelve hundred horſe, after an hour's riding from the field of battle, and brought them on again; but then it was too late, for the infantry was retreated.

From this time, during the whole courſe of the war, the Dutch horſe had the misfortune to be accounted the worſt among the confederates; and indeed, had they behaved themſelves as well as the infantry on this occaſion, the victory would certainly been on their ſide, notwithſtanding the inequality of numbers. As for the foot, never did any troops perform greater wonders; for after they were abandoned by the horſe, they alone ſuſtained the charge of the French cavalry and infantry, and being attacked in front, flank, and rear, all at once, yet remained firm, unbroken, and impenetrable. They let the enemy's horſe approach within piſtol ſhot of them, and made their diſcharge with ſuch an unconcerned and ſteady aim, that the whole ſquadron together ſeemed to ſink under the ground, ſcarce thirty of the whole number eſcaping; and this courſe they ſo accuſtomed themſelves to obſerve, that at length they laughed at their enemies, and challenged them to advance. The French, on the other ſide, were ſo confounded with the execution done upon them, that they fled as ſoon as the Dutch began to preſent their muſkets; nor durſt they any more come near them, but ſuffered them to retreat in good order without offering to purſue them. This unparallelled firmneſs and bravery made the duke of Luxemburg ſay in their commendation, "That they had ſurpaſſed the Spaniſh infantry at the battle of Rocroy," where the Spaniards had greatly ſignalized themſelves; adding withwithal, "That prince Waldeck ought ever to remember the French horſe, and himſelf never to forget the Dutch infantry." [s]

This action was very bloody on both ſides, the Dutch themſelves owning the loſs of four thouſand ſix hundred men killed upon the place, and a great many wounded; above four thouſand priſoners, and the greateſt part of their artillery taken. The moſt remarkable perſons among the ſlain were the prince of Saxe-Merſburg, the count of Stirum, one of the young counts of Naſſau, the baron de Hyde, and ſeveral colonels, captains, and inferior officers. As for the French, excepting the priſoners and the field of battle, they had no reaſon to boaſt of any advantage, the number of ſlain being at leaſt equal with that of the Dutch. And though prince Waldeck might have committed an error in not avoiding the battle, after the informations, which were given him concerning the conjunction of the French forces; yet it is certain, he did all that could be expected from an experienced general.

The French were not able to draw any advantage from this ſucceſs; for the Dutch repaired their loſſes with admirable diligence, ſo that prince Waldeck being reinforced by the five Engliſh regiments, which were not in the action, eight or nine thouſand men from Hanover, and ten thouſand more of the Biſhopric of Liege, Brandenburgers and Hollanders, under count de Tilly, he joined the elector of Brandenburg with all his forces. By this conjunction the confederate army being reckoned fifty-five thouſand ſtrong, bent their march to Genap, and ſo to Bois-Seigneur-Iſaac. And though Luxemburg had been likewiſe conſiderably reinforced, yet he ſat contented with the glory of having gained a ſignal victory this ſummer, and fortified his camp ſo, as not to be obliged to fight without conſiderable advantage. On the other hand, the States General ſent poſitive orders to prince Waldeck not to hazard another engagement till the fleet ſhould be again at ſea; and this reſtrained the elector of Brandenburg, who, in conjunction with the Dutch, was ſuperior in numbers to Luxemburg. And afterwards, when the ſtates ſuperſeded thoſe orders, he did not think fit to hazard his army. Such is the fate of confederate armies, when under a different direction, that when the one is willing, or at leaſt ſeems to be ſo, the other ſtands off. So there was no further action in Flanders this campaign.

Though the emperor, towards the latter end of the preceding year, was very preſſing with the proteſtant electors to meet at Augſburg, yet neither letters nor meſſages were were able to prevail with them. However, the electoral college being met, together with envoys of ſuch as were abſent, the emperor made a ſpeech to them upon the occaſion, for which they were aſſembled, conſiſting of three principal heads: The firſt was the ſecurity of the empire againſt the deſigns of France: the next, the neceſſity of chuſing a king of the Romans: and, laſtly, he earneſtly recommended to them to caſt their eyes upon his ſon Joſeph, archduke of Auſtria, and king of Hungary, to advance him to that dignity. Whatever the electoral college reſolved in relation to France, they proved unanimous in the choice of his ſon, juſtly ſuppoſing, that there could be no better method for obviating the deſigns of France upon Germany, than to continue the Imperial dignity in the Auſtrian family. Thus archduke Joſeph was choſen and crowned king of the Romans, to the great ſatisfaction of the emperor, and moſt of the empire, and the no leſs diſappointment of the king of France, whoſe enemies ſtill increaſed in this very conjuncture. For the memorial, which the duke of Lorrain preſented to the diet at Ratiſbon towards the cloſe of the laſt year, about his being reſtored to his duchy, was now ſucceeded by a manifeſto from the ſame prince, in which he declared war againſt France, alledging how unjuſt it was in Lewis XIV. to detain his territories from him under frivolous pretences; promiſing to himſelf to enter into Lorrain the approaching ſummer at the head of forty thouſand men, and exhorting all his ſubjects to ſhake off the yoke of France, and all the nobility and gentry to aſſiſt him to regain his ancient patrimony, under the pain of being degraded and deprived of all their privileges. But this brave prince, who in all probability might have given a very conſiderable ſhock to the power of France, upon the road to Vienna, at a ſmall village called Wells near Lintz, was ſeized with a quinſey, which ſoon deprived him of the uſe of his ſpeech, ſo that he was obliged to write down part of his confeſſion; and perceiving himſelf near his end, he wrote the following letter to the emperor:

"I departed from Inſpruck, in order to come and receive your orders; God calls me hence, and I am going to render him an account of a life, which I had devoted to you. I humbly beſeech your majeſty to remember my wife, who is nearly related to you, my children, whom I leave without any fortune, and my ſubjects, who are oppreſſed."

He expired ſoon after, aged forty ſeven years. It was reported, that his death was occaſioned by poiſon, and imputed

[s] The marquis de Feuquieres tells us, that the duke of Luxemburg, by the ſuperiority of his genius over the prince of Waldeck, completed the deciſion of this great battle of Flerus, the ſucceſs of which was owing to the ſeaſonable time, in which the duke ordered the left wing of his horſe to form a motion, of which the enemy could have no knowledge, becauſe it was entirely effected out of their view, though it happened to be made very near them. This was ſuch a maſterly expedient, as could only be conceived by a truly great man, whoſe admirable penetration could ſingle out the critical moment for directing ſuch a motion, and concealing it from the enemy's obſervation; ſince it would have been too hazardous to have attempted it had the enemy diſcovered his proceeding. The prince of Waldeck had drawn up his troops on a tract of land, which roſe a little to his right, and formed a ſlope on the other ſide, which was unobſerved by the extremity of the right wing, and continued in an eaſy declivity to the level, on which the duke of Luxemburg was marching to his enemy. When the front of the French army arrived at the place, where this elevation was high enough to conceal the left wing of their horſe from the prince of Waldeck in the continuation of their march, the duke improved the important moment with a ſurpriſing capacity, and ordered monſieur de Gournai, a very expert officer of the horſe, to take the advantage of the oppoſite ſide, which prevented the enemy from diſcovering the motion he was to purſue, and to pour all the left of his horſe upon the enemy's right flank, with a peculiar caution to order his march ſo, that the right of his left might rejoin the left of the foot, at the inſtant they were preparing to charge the front of the enemy's foot. This motion, which would have proved ſo hazardous, had the enemy diſcovered it, but which decided the battle in favour of the French, was executed with a capacity equal to the judgment that formed it. All the left wing of the French horſe was diſpoſed into a kind of rectangular form on the flank of the enemy's right wing, though they extended to the French line of foot. And thus the Dutch ſaw themſelves aſſaulted in flank by a front equal to that, which they poſſeſſed: when they therefore found their right charged in flank, at the ſame time their centre and left were attacked by the centre and right of the French army, it was impoſſible for the prince of Waldeck to remedy the diſorder on his right; which was ſoon communicated to the centre and left, and ended in their precipitate retreat from the field of battle with the loſs of all their artillery, and the greateſt part of their foot; becauſe the prince had poſted too large a body of infantry in the village of Ligni, and could not draw them out, after they were abandoned by the horſe. "The relation of theſe particulars, adds monſieur de Feuquieres, makes it evident, that a field of battle choſen with great attention by a general, who determines to await his enemy there, can never be ſo level, ſo open, or ſo equal in all the advantages of ſituation, as to prevent a more expert general from improving ſome little conveniences in the diſpoſition of the ground, that frequently afford him an opportunity of bringing the battle to a glorious deciſion. This action may be juſtly ranked among the nobleſt atchievements of the duke of Luxemburg, when we conſider the admirable capacity and profound judgment he diſcovered in the art of war, as well as the peculiar vivacity, with which he accompliſhed his deſigns. This great commander formed in one moment the plan of his march againſt the enemy, and completely executed his whole ſcheme with ſo much vigour, as made it impoſſible for the enemy to avoid the fatal blow he was preparing to give them."

Another French writer, the marquis de la Farre, gives the following account of that battle. He obſerves, that monſieur de Louvois, who was an enemy to the duke of Luxemburg, not being able to hinder that duke from commanding the principal army in Flanders, found means however to procure a detachment of a great part of it to compoſe another for marſhal d' Humieres towards the ſea coaſts, and at the ſame time ſent poſitive orders to the duke, who was between the Sambre and the Maeſe, to paſs the former of thoſe rivers; which expoſed that general to a blow almoſt inevitable, if the prince of Waldeck had been as vigilant a commander as he. But though the prince was an experienced general, he was not very enterprizing; and ſtopping too long at Flerus, which is not above two or three leagues from the Sambre, the greateſt part of the French army was actually paſſed that river, before he ſtirred to oppoſe their paſſage. The firſt body of horſe, which he detached for that purpoſe, was engaged by the gens d' armes, and, after a vigorous fight was purſued till they came in ſight of their own camp. The prince of Waldeck had a great army poſted to conſiderable advantage. But the duke of Luxemburg, who could not avoid repaſſing the Sambre before the enemy, without engaging them, ſpent all the night in preparing to attack them the next day. The front of their main body was covered with a brook, ſo that there was no poſſibility of attacking them except on their left. In this ſituation, the Grand Prior, who was near the duke of Luxemburg, made all his right paſs over, one after another, and fell upon the flank of the left, while we charged their right; which determined the conflict, and routed their cavalry: Yet their infantry rallied again, and made a great fire. The duke of Maine had an horſe there killed under him; and near him monſieur Suſſal, (who was his governor, as he had been alſo to the duke of Vendôme) was ſlain. Some afterwards blamed the duke of Luxemburg for having ſeparated his army in ſight of the enemy, who might have taken advantage of it; but the ground being ſuch, that they could not perceive the ſeparation, "I am (ſays monſieur de la Farre) of opinion, that this general thereby merited great praiſe. This battle happily won was the ſource of all the other good ſucceſs, which France had during this war. The duke of Luxemburg was for marching forward, and making the advantage of this victory; but the orders of the court, or to ſay better, thoſe of monſieur de Louvois, ſuſpended that action; and he was put upon beſieging Charleroy, which made ſo brave and long a defence, that the taking of it at laſt was the only fruit of this battle, which might have had more advantageous conſequences." Memoir. du Regne de Louis XIV. Cap. X.

puted to the court of France. To ſupport this opinion, it was urged, that his death had been mentioned in the papers printed in France, fifteen days before it happened, and that many of the circumſtances, which accompanied it, were likewiſe foretold. And it was affirmed, that one of the firſt miniſters of that kingdom laid a wager, that the duke would never command the Imperial army again. Beſides, it was ſaid, that the Jeſuits of Straſburg having drawn up publicly in their ſchool an horoſcope, which threatened him with death in the ſpace of three weeks, he died fifteen days after; and that the phyſicians, who opened him by order of the emperor, found his body corrupted in ſuch a manner, as could only be the effect of a violent poiſon. To which were added the duke's own ſuſpicions, who was reported to have written to the emperor in theſe terms, "I am dying. I know not, whether I am paying by my death the ordinary debt of nature, or whether I am ſacrificed to the unjuſt and ambitious deſigns of a crown, which has declared itſelf an implacable enemy of my family."

The duke was one of thoſe indolent geniuſes, who never exert themſelves but from mere neceſſity. The melancholy ſituation, in which he ſaw himſelf, when he began to reflect, and the diſgraces, which his delicacy in point of honour drew upon him in France, Poland, Rome, and Auſtria, were but too capable of depreſſing and extinguiſhing the courage of a young prince, who had nothing before him but the moſt gloomy proſpect. For even at Vienna, where his ſervices and alliance with the emperor ought to have put him in a ſituation of diſplaying his abilities, the jealouſy of the miniſters obliged him to contract himſelf, and by a politic indolence conceal his talents and inclinations for war and government. This ſtruck Europe with amazement, upon ſeeing him in his firſt campaigns diſtinguiſh himſelf by actions worthy an old experienced general. But every one recovered from this ſuprize, when they ſaw him maintain and even ſurpaſs the firſt attempts by new victories. Nor was his valour only admired, but the depth and ſolidity of his judgment, and the extent and juſtneſs of his views were likewiſe acknowledged; and nothing contributed more to perſuade people, that France had recourſe to poiſon, to remove ſo formidable an enemy.

His ſudden death, as it damped the rejoicings of the court of Vienna upon the marriage of the princeſs Dorothea Sophia of Neuberg with the prince of Parma; ſo it allayed the ſorrow at Verſailles upon the death of the Dauphineſs, which happened two days after the duke of Lorrain's, though it did not retard the journey of the Dauphin to Straſburg, from whence he put himſelf at the head of the French army, that lay near Landau.

The command of the Imperial army was given to the elector of Bavaria, with whom, at length, joined a body of Saxons headed by the elector himſelf with his two ſons. Theſe four held a conference at Eppinghen, together with the field-marſhals Caprara and Sereni; after which there were great expectations, that the principal part of the army would have fallen upon Hunninghen; bnt there was nothing put in execution on that ſide, nor indeed any where elſe worth relating. For the Imperialiſts having for ſome time encamped in the marquiſate of Baden Durlach, it was thought very ſurprizing, that inſtead of marching on towards the upper Rhine, they fell down on a ſudden towards Mentz; the elector of Saxony at the ſame time being poſted near Phillipſburg, general Dunewaldt commanding a flying camp towards fort Louis, and general Souches keeping his former poſt on Hunninghen ſide. The Dauphin was no ſooner informed of theſe motions, but he paſſed the Rhine at fort Louis to maintain his army in the enemy's country, and that in order of battle, as expecting ſome oppoſition in his march. On the 16th of Auguſt he encamped in the plain of Stolhoffen, having the mountains on one ſide, the Rhine on the other, and a large moraſs before him, being about forty thouſand ſtrong, and in expectation of being conſiderably reinforced. His deſign was to have taken ſome forts, that opened him a paſſage into Wirtembergh, a province yet untouched by either army, and which conſequently would have afforded plentiful ſubſiſtence for his men. The duke of Bavaria prevented the accompliſhment of his project, for returning back with long marches, and joining the Saxons, the two electors marched directly towards the Dauphin, who by hard and cautious marches avoided an engagement; and the rather, becauſe the Imperialiſts were ſuperior to him in force, upon his detaching twelve thouſand of his men towards the Moſelle, to obviate the deſigns of the Lunenburgers and Heſſians, who were got near Coblentz, on purpoſe to paſs the Rhine, and fall on the archbiſhopric of Triers, and ſo drive the French out of their country. And thus ended the campaign on the German ſide without any remarkable action.

An inſurrection happened in Catalonia towards the beginning of this year, which created no ſmall trouble to the viceroy and court of Spain. The pretence was, that the Spaniards kept too great a number of troops in that province, and overcharged it with taxes contrary to it's antient privileges, of which the Catalans were always extremely jealous. The revolt began in this manner; two wealthy countrymen had intereſt enough to draw togther about a thouſand more; and with that body they ſtopt up all the avenues to Barcelona, where the duke de Villa Hermoſa the viceroy reſided; ſeized upon two troops of horſe, that lay in the neighbouring villages, and committed ſome ſpoil. But upon the viceroy's ſending a party of the garriſon of Barcelona againſt them, they immediately fled to the mountains, and from thence in a ſhort time after ſent to beg pardon, which was granted them. This ſedition, which ſeemed entirely extinguiſhed, was only ſuppreſſed for a time to break out in a greater flame, for the rebels upon the firſt ſally had ſhewn themſelves too ſoon, by reaſon the French, who were to have ſupported them, were not within reach to do it; ſo that the Catalans kept fair for a time, 'till they had aſſurance of protection from France, when they threw off their maſks more daringly than before, and increaſed in numbers every day; ſo that the court of Spain was obliged, beſides the forces, that were already in that province, to ſend for more out of Navarre to ſuppreſs them. By this means the rebels were reduced to ſo great neceſſity, that though the duke de Noailles haſtened with all expedition to Perpignan, and uſed all the induſtry imaginable to draw his army together to countenance them, yet they had before in a manner dwindled into nothing. However he reaped this advantage from their revolt, that he anticipated the Spaniards in the field, as he did the year before, when he took Campredon from them, which ſpent them this whole campaign in retaking it, though they could not prevent the demoliſhing of it. Thus the duke de Noailles had the opportunity of taking San Juan de Abadeſſas, a ſmall fort two leagues beyond Campredon, and ſix from Gironne, which encouraged him to proceed: and ſo poſſeſſing himſelf of divers caſtles, that embarraſſed his progreſs, he advanced as far as Foulen, about four ſmall leagues from Gironne, upon which laſt town he ſeemed to bend his thoughts; but finding himſelf not ſtrong enough for ſuch an enterpriſe, and yet being deſirous to take the advantage of the ſlowneſs of the Spaniards, he left Gironne upon the left hand, and advanced near the city of Vich, maintaining his army at the expence of the Catalans, and deſtroying all he could not make uſe of. As for the Spaniards, Auguſt was come before they had between ten or twelve thouſand men together, with which the duke of Villa Hermoſa marched towards the enemy. But the French army being now weakened by a detachment ſent into Dauphiné, Noailles prudently declined fighting, and retired by the way of Rouſillon, and ſo ended the campaign on that ſide.

After this view of the foreign tranſactions which have any relation to king William, as head of the confederacy againſt France; it is time to return to England. The king at his coming from Ireland was ſo little wearied with that campaign, that he intended to have gone over to his army into Flanders. But it was too late, for they were going into winter quarters. Wherefore, he reſolved to hold the ſeſſion of parliament early, that ſo the funds being ſettled for the next year, he might have an interview with the German princes, who intended to meet at the Hague, and concert meaſures for the enſuing campaign.

Accordingly on the 2d of October the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"SINCE I laſt met you, I have uſed my beſt endeavours to reduce Ireland into ſuch a condition this year, as that it might be no longer a charge to England. And it has pleaſed God to bleſs my endeavours with ſuch ſucceſs, that I doubt not but I ſhould have been fully poſſeſſed of that kingdom by this time, had I been enabled to have gone into the field as ſoon as I ſhould have done, and as is more eſpecially neceſſary in Ireland, where the rains are ſo great, and begin ſo early.

" I think myſelf obliged to take notice, how well the army there have behaved themſelves on all occaſions, and borne great hardſhips with little pay, and with ſo much patience and willingneſs, as could not but proceed from an affectionate duty to my ſervice, and a zeal for the proteſtant religion.

" I have already made it evident, how much I have preferred the ſatisfaction of my ſubjects before the moſt ſolid advantages of the crown, by parting with ſo conſiderable a branch of it's inheritance. And it is no leſs apparent, that I have aſked no revenue for myſelf but what I have readily ſubjected to be charged to the uſes of the war.

" I did at my departure give orders for all the public accounts to be made ready for me againſt my return; and I have commanded them to be laid before the houſe of commons, by which they will ſee, that the real want of what was neceſſary beyond the funds given, and the not getting in due time that for which funds were aſſigned, have been the principal cauſes, why the army is ſo much in arrear of their pay, and the ſtores both for the navy and the ordnance not ſupplied as they ought to be.

" Now as I have neither ſpared my perſon nor my pains to do you all the good I could; ſo I doubt not, but if you will as chearfully do your parts, it is in your power to make both me and yourſelves happy, and the nation great. And, on the other hand, it is too plain, by what the French have let you ſee ſo lately, that if the preſent war be not proſecuted with vigour, no nation in the world is expoſed to greater danger.

" I hope therefore, there will need no more upon that ſubject, than to lay before you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, the ſtate of what will be neceſſary for the ſupport of the fleet and armies, which cannot poſſibly admit of being leſſened in the year enſuing; and to recommend to your care the clearing of my revenue, ſo as to enable me to ſubſiſt, and maintain the charge of the civil liſt; the revenue being ſo engaged, that it muſt be wholly applied, after the firſt of November next, to pay off the debts already charged upon it. And therefore a preſent conſideration muſt be had of the arrears of the army, which ſhall likewiſe be laid before you, and for all which I muſt deſire a ſufficient and timely ſupply.

" It is farther neceſſary to inform you, that the whole ſupport of the confederacy abroad will abſolutely depend upon the ſpeed and vigour of your proceedings in this ſeſſion. And here I muſt take notice, with great ſatisfaction, of the readineſs, which my ſubjects of all degrees have ſhewn both in this city, and in their ſeveral counties, by given their aſſiſtance ſo chearfully as they did in my abſence, while the French fleet was upon our coaſts. And beſides this ſo convincing mark of the good inclinations of my people, I have found through all the counties, where I paſſed, both at my going into Ireland, and in my return from thence, ſuch demonſtration of their affection, that I have not the leaſt doubt, but I ſhall find the ſame from their repreſentatives in parliament.

" I cannot conclude without taking notice alſo, how much the honour of the nation has been expoſed by the ill conduct of my fleet in the laſt ſummer's engagement againſt the French. And I think myſelf ſo much concerned to ſee it vindicated, that I cannot reſt ſatisfied till an example has been made of ſuch, as ſhall be found faulty upon their examination and trial, which was not practicable, while the whole fleet was abroad, but is now put into the proper way of being done as ſoon as may be.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I look upon the future well-being of this kingdom to depend upon the reſult of your councils and determinations at this time; and the benefit will be double by the ſpeed of your reſolutions, inſomuch that I hope you will agree with me in this concluſion, that whoever goes about to obſtruct or divert your application to theſe matters, preferably to all others, can neither be my friends, nor the kingdom's."

Both houſes began with addreſſes of thanks and congratulation to the king and queen, in which they ſet forth the ſenſe they had of their great care of their people; of their courage and good government, in the higheſt expreſſions that could be conceived, with promiſes of ſtanding by them, and aſſiſting them with every thing that ſhould be found neceſſary for the public ſervice [t].

The ſame day theſe addreſſes were preſented, the commons, to make good their aſſurances of affection to the government, and their promiſes of aſſiſtance [u], voted, purſuant to an eſtimate laid before them of the next year's charges, a

[t] As theſe addreſſes ſeem not only to expreſs the ſenſe of the houſes, but of the whole nation (except the diſaffected) at that time, the ſubſtance of them is here inſerted. The lords began with their addreſs to the king, wherein they expreſſed, " How extremely ſenſible they were of the great benefit and advantage his late expedition into Ireland had procured to all his ſubjects in general, and alſo the ſucceſs of his arms in that kingdom; which was, under God, owing to his majeſty's perſonal valour and conduct. Wherefore they thought it their duty to return him their humble and hearty thanks for all thoſe ſignal evidences he had given of his extraordinary affection for his people, which had carried him, on ſo many occaſions, to venture a life, that was ſo dear to them, and to deſpiſe all hazards to procure the ſettlement of his kingdoms, the peace and quiet of his ſubjects, and the eſtabliſhment of their religion. And as it was not poſſible but ſo much bravery of mind, ſuch an undaunted courage, and an heart ſo exalted above any apprehenſions in the midſt of all dangers, muſt gain his majeſty the admiration and reverence of all the world, and even of his enemies themſelves, who had felt the effects of ſo great virtues; ſo they did not doubt, but that ſuch extraordinary qualities muſt unite the hearts of all his people in ſuch a tenderneſs, as well as duty, for his royal perſon, as was neceſſary for the finiſhing what his majeſty had ſo gloriouſly begun."

The next day their lordſhips alſo acknowledged, " the great advantage which the nation had received by the eminent reſolution, as well as prudence, which her majeſty had ſhewn in the abſence of the king, and in ſuch circumſtances of difficulty, as would have diſcompoſed a mind, that had not been raiſed above them, as her majeſty had approved her's to be, by this undeniable evidence. And they declared, that her majeſty having preſerved the quiet and peace of the kingdom, by her prudent adminiſtration, againſt the dangers threatened by a powerful enemy, the remembrance of ſuch extraordinary virtue muſt ever dwell in their minds, and engage them in juſtice, upon all occaſions, to expreſs their gratitude, as became her Majeſty's moſt dutiful ſubjects."

The commons likewiſe on the 9th of October repreſented to the king, " their grateful ſenſe of that unparallelled goodneſs and tender affection to his people, which for the reſcuing his kingdom of Ireland from a tyrannous and foreign yoke, and eaſing his ſubjects of this kingdom of the exceſſive charge of a lingering war, had induced his majeſty to undertake an hazardous voyage, and too freely to expoſe to all the dangers of war that invaluable life, upon which the whole proteſtant intereſt, and the common liberty of Europe did ſo much depend. That it was, next under God, to his conduct and example, that they muſt aſcribe the ſucceſs of the expedition, and to which they muſt owe their hopes of the ſpeedy and entire reduction of that kingdom, and of ſeeing themſelves in a condition to make his enemies ſenſible of the ſtrength and power of England under a king, who knew and purſued it's intereſt. They moſt heartily congratulated his majeſty's ſucceſs and ſafe return to his people, who were unanimouſly perſuaded, that their peace, ſecurity, and happineſs, were bound up in his ſafety. And they did in the name of all the commons in England aſſure him, that they would be ever ready to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power; and, as the beſt and trueſt way of expreſſing their gratitude, would endeavour effectually to ſupport his government againſt all his enemies."

In their addreſs to the queen, on the ſame day, they expreſſed the " deep ſenſe they had of that goodneſs, wiſdom, and courage, which her majeſty had manifeſted in the greateſt difficulties and preſſing dangers, during the king's abſence, at a time when a potent enemy was upon the coaſt, when the nation was weakened in that part, which was it's proper ſtrength, and deprived of the ſecurity of his majeſty's preſence. They declared, that the reſolution, which her majeſty ſhewed in the adminiſtration, gave life to her ſubjects, and made them exert a ſtrength and force unknown to the former reigns: That her zeal for the public encouraged them to ſhew ſuch chearfulneſs in their duty, as diſappointed the hopes and deſigns of all the open and ſecret enemies of the government; and that the grateful remembrance of this, which renewed the memory of the moſt happy times, would for ever remain in the hearts of her people, and could never fail to be expreſſed in all inſtances of loyalty and obedience from themſelves and all the commons of England."

[u] This favourable diſpoſition of the commons and the poſture of affairs at that time, will appear from the following original letter of biſhop Burnet to his couſin Mr. Johnſton, envoy extraordinary at the court of Berlin, dated from London, October 14, 1690.

" I have been now a week in town, and have had leiſure and opportunities to inform myſelf of our affairs, and of the temper of people's minds among us; and I muſt freely own to you, that I was never more ſurprized in my whole life than I am, to ſee the houſe of commons in ſuch a temper. All that I know, ſay plainly, they dare not go back into their country, if they do not give money liberally. So they have already voted above four millions for the fleet, the land-army, and the ordnance; and they ſeem to be in a diſpoſition to give what is neceſſary for clearing the revenue of anticipations. The article of the fleet met with no oppoſition; and there were only two noes to that of the land-army, which were Seymour and Clarges. There will probably be a land-tax of eighteen months in the old way of aſſeſſment, but double at one hundred and forty thouſand pounds a month, and a poſt-bill; but how the reſt will be raiſed, is not yet ſo viſible; for they ſeem ſtill extremely averſe to any thing, that looks like an exciſe. In a word, the French fleet, by lying ſo long on our coaſt, as it then did us no harm, ſo now produces ſuch effects, as if we had brought them thither; ſince it has both united and animated the nation to a degree beyond any thing, that the moſt ſanguine could every have promiſed themſelves. And the king's behaviour in Ireland, as well as king James's meanneſs, has made ſo wonderful a change in all men's minds with relation to them both, that we ſeem now not to be the ſame people, that we were a year ago, and the nation ſeems reſolved to ſupport the king in the war, to the utmoſt, to which it can poſſibly ſtretch itſelf. I pray God give us ſuch ſucceſs next year againſt France, as we have had this year in Ireland; and then we may hope quickly to ſee happy days.

" The buſineſs of the earl of Torrington will now be, as I believe, ſpeedily diſpatched; for our houſe has already voted that a peer has no privilege to exempt him from being tried by a court martial. But there is ſome difficulty ſupply of four millions, (the largeſt ſum that ever had been aſked by a king of England) for the maintenance of the navy and army[w]. The funds propoſed for raiſing this ſum were agreed to and ſettled[x], but proving deficient, it was reſolved, 'That the ſum of one million be raiſed, upon the credit, or by the ſale of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to command the commiſſioners in Ireland, to make a return of the names of the perſons in rebellion in that kingdom, and of their eſtates and value thereof; and that the ſame might be tranſmitted to the houſe of commons.' This addreſs was drawn up and reported to the houſe by ſir Thomas Clarges, but upon the queſtion it was rejected. However, it was reſolved, that a bill be brought in for attainting the perſons, that had been in rebellion in England or Ireland, and for confiſcating their eſtates, and applying the ſame to bear the charge of the war. Near ſix weeks paſſed before any progreſs was made in this bill; but it being at laſt preſented to the houſe, a clauſe was brought in to impower the king to grant away a third part of thoſe confiſcated eſtates, to ſuch as had ſerved in the war; and to give ſuch articles and capitulations, to thoſe who were in arms, as he ſhould think fit. But this clauſe was rejected, and upon the bill many petitions were offered, by the creditors of ſome, and the heirs of others, who had continued faithful to the government, and deſired proviſos for their ſecurity. But the houſe ſeeing, that there was no end of petitions for ſuch proviſos, rejected them all, imitating in this too much the parliament, which king James held at Dublin, in which about three thouſand perſons had been attainted without proof or proceſs, only becauſe ſome of them were gone over to England, and others were abſconded or informed againſt in Ireland. At length the bill, with ſeveral amendments, being paſſed, was ſent up to the lords, who thought themſelves bound in juſtice to hear all petitions; upon which the bill was like to be clogged with many proviſos; and the matter muſt have held long. But to ſtop this, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons, and ſpoke to the ſame purpoſe afterwards from the throne to both houſes. He promiſed that he would give no grants of any confiſcated eſtates, but would keep that matter entire, for the conſideration of another ſeſſion of parliament. By this declaration the king intended only to aſſure them, that he would give none of thoſe eſtates to his courtiers or officers; but he thought he was ſtill at liberty to paſs ſuch acts of grace, or grant ſuch articles to the Iriſh, as the ſtate of his affairs ſhould require.

About this time captain James Campbell, a Scots gentleman, brother to the earl of Argyle, aſſiſted by Archibald Montgomery and ſir John Johnſton, forcibly ſeized on Mrs. Mary Wharton, a rich heireſs of about thirteen years of age, and carried her away from her parents in Great Queen-ſtreet, and married her againſt her will. Upon this a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending captain Campbell and his abettors.

Not long before there had been a bill brought into the houſe of commons, to prevent clandeſtine marriages; and it was imagined, that the paſſing of it would have been forwarded by the violence committed by Campbell. But upon conſideration, that this bill was attended with many inconveniencies, and might hinder younger brothers from making their fortunes, it was dropped in ſilence. However, another bill was brought in, for making void the marriage between Mrs. Wharton and Mr. Campbell; which, notwithſtanding the earl of Argyle's petition in his brother's behalf, paſſed through both houſes[y].

As there were no grievances to inflame the houſe, (by which in former reigns the moſt promiſing beginnings of ſome ſeſſions had often miſcarried) great diſpatch had been uſed in granting the ſupplies, for which the king gave them thanks, aſſuring them that he would take care to ſee the money diligently and ſtrictly applied to the uſes for which it was given; and deſiring them at the ſame time, to finiſh with the utmoſt expedition what buſineſs remained to be done, becauſe the poſture of affairs abroad required his preſence at the Hague.

However, ſome began to complain of a miſmanagement of the public money: but the miniſtry put a ſtop to that, by moving for a bill for appointing and enabling commiſſioners for examining into the public accounts, giving them authority to bring all perſons, whom they ſhould have occaſion for, before them, and to tender them an oath to diſcover their knowledge of ſuch things, as they ſhould aſk of them. This was like the power of a court of inquiſition; but how unuſual ſoever ſuch a commiſſion was, it ſeemed neceſſary to grant it for the ſilencing all ſcandalous reports. In the houſe of commons the method of appointing theſe commiſſioners was, that the ſeveral members put into glaſſes at the table the ſeveral liſts of nine perſons names; and the choice fell upon ſir Peter Rich, ſir Thomas Clarges, Mr. Paul Foley, colonel Robert Auſten, ſir Matthew Andrews, ſir Benjamin Newland, ſir Samuel Barnadiſton, ſir Peter Colleton, and Mr. Robert Harley. When the bill was carried up to the houſe of lords, it was moved, that ſince the commons had named none but members of their own houſe, the lords ſhould add ſome of their number. This was done difficulty in this, whether the commiſſioners of the admiralty have the power of a lord admiral, ſince the act for a court martial ſpeaks only of a lord admiral; and it is probable the matter cannot be legally ſettled without naming a lord admiral pro tempore.

"I do not ſee any other thing, that is like to give the houſe any great diſturbance this ſeſſion; ſo by all appearance, it will be a calm and by conſequence a ſhort one.

"Dr. Sherlock's taking the oaths has very much diſturbed the jacobite party, for they had ſet him up in their thoughts as the chief writer of their party. The biſhops, who had hitherto ſtood out, ſeem ſtill more poſitive than ever; and I make no doubt but that matter will be ſettled as ſoon as the ſeſſion of parliament is at an end. All the accounts we have from Ireland ſeem to aſſure us, that the rebels will be forced to ſubmit long before the winter is done, or periſh for want of all things. There begins to be already both a face of trade and juſtice there, and that Ireland, by the total depreſſion of the Iriſh, will be, within four or five years in a better condition than ever.

"The feebleneſs of the motions of the confederates all this year has much exalted France, but I hope we ſhall ſee another ſcene next year. The king intends to go over to Holland as ſoon as his affairs here will admit of it. I have now told you every thing relating to our affairs, that occurs to me, and have not writ to you as to a miniſter, that muſt lie for his country, but with the plain ſimplicity of truth. I am with all poſſible affection and eſteem, &c.

'The conſpiracy in Scotland has been a baſe and foul one; and I doubt very many have been concerned in it. Every thing is confeſſed and known, though I do not yet hear, that there are legal proofs and diſcoveries, that will be witneſſes. But that matter will be laid open as ſoon as the money bills are in good forwardneſs. There is alſo another diſcovery will be made, of which I know no particular; but I am fully aſſured from good hands, that it will give a full ſatisfaction concerning the impoſture of the pretended prince of Wales.

'The preſbytery of Scotland proceeds with ſo blind a fury, that as they are turning out all the epiſcopal clergy, ſo they will raiſe a flame here, which may obſtruct the king's buſineſs in England, and may very much increaſe the animoſities, that are amongſt us.

'Every body is moſt highly pleaſed with my lord Sidney in Ireland.

'I have now brought Mr. Allix to Saliſbury, who is hard at work upon an edition of the councils, in four volumes.

[w] For the navy and building of new ſhips was granted the ſum of 1,791,695l. and for the maintenance of an army of 69,636 men, the ſum of 2,294,560l.

[x] The money bills were,

1. An act for doubling the duty of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, during the ſpace of one year, ending November 17, 1691.

2. An act for certain impoſitions on all Eaſt India goods and manufactures, and upon all wrought ſilks, and ſeveral other goods to be imported after the 25th of December, 1690, to November 10, 1695.

3. An act for granting an aid of 1,651,702 l. 18 s.

4. An act for the continuance of ſeveral former acts therein mentioned, for the laying ſeveral duties upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco. The acts continued here, are that of the duties upon wines and vinegar, and that of tobacco and ſugar, both 1 James II. namely,

	£.	s.	d.
For every tun of French wine and vinegar imported	8	0	0
For every tun of Spaniſh wines imported	12	0	0
For every pound of tobacco from our plantations	0	0	3
——— of Spaniſh or foreign tobacco	0	0	6

Theſe duties were granted to king James, from June 24, 1685, to June 24, 1693, and now continued from that time to the 20th of June, 1696.

5. An act for encouraging the diſtilling of brandy and ſpirits from corn, and for laying ſeveral duties on low wines or ſpirits of the firſt extraction, viz.

Every gallon of low wines of the firſt extraction drawn from foreign materials	0	0	8
From brewers waſh or tilt	0	1	0

This act begins December 24, 1690, and was to end December 25, 1695.

6. An act for ſeveral additional duties of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for four years, to begin when the act for doubling the exciſe ends.

A ſupply of 570,000 l. was voted to be raiſed on theſe additional duties, for building ſeventeen third rate ſhips of ſixty guns each, beſides the ſhips already provided to be built. Pr. H. C. II. 387.

by ballot; and the earl of Rocheſter having made the motion, the greateſt number of ballots were for him. But he refuſed to ſubmit to this with ſo much firmneſs, that the other lords who were named with him, ſeemed to think they were in honour bound to do the ſame; and therefore as no peer woud ſuffer himſelf to be named, the bill paſſed as it was ſent up.

Many complaints were made of the illegal commitments of perſons ſuſpected of high-treaſon, though there was nothing ſworn againſt them. But the danger was ſo apparent, that the houſe of commons made a precedent for ſecuring a miniſtry, that ſhould do the like upon the like neceſſity, and yet maintained the Habeas Corpus act, for they indemnified the miniſtry for all that had been done contrary to that act.

Great complaints were brought over from Ireland, where the king's army was almoſt as heavy on the country, as the rapparees. There was a great arrear due to them; for which reaſon, when the king ſettled a government in Ireland of three lords juſtices, he did not put the army under their civil authority, but kept them in a military ſubjection to their officers; for he ſaid, that ſince the army was not regularly paid, it would be impoſſible to keep them from mutiny, if they were put under ſtrict diſcipline, and puniſhed accordingly. The under-officers, finding that they were only anſwerable to their ſuperior officers, took great liberties in their quarters, and inſtead of protecting the country, oppreſſed it.

The king had brought over an army of ſeven thouſand Danes, under the command of a very gallant prince, one of the dukes of Wirtemberg; but they were cruel friends, and thought they were maſters. Nor were the Engliſh troops much better. The Dutch were the leaſt complained of. Ginckle, who had the chief command, looked ſtrictly to them; but he did not think it convenient to put thoſe of other nations under the ſame ſevere meaſures. But the pay due for ſome months, being now ſent over, the orders were changed; and the army made ſubject to the civil government. Yet it was underſtood, that inſtructions were ſent to the lords juſtices, to be cautious in the exerciſe of their authority over them; ſo that the country ſtill ſuffered much by theſe forces.

There was an important debate moved in the houſe of lords, by thoſe, who intended to revive the old impeachment againſt the marquis of Carmarthen, namely, 'Whether impeachments continued from parliament to parliament; or whether they were not extinguiſhed by an act of grace.' Some antient precedents were brought to favour this by thoſe, who intended to keep them up; but in all thoſe precedents there had been an order of one parliament to continue them on to the next. For this reaſon they did not come up to the preſent caſe; and how doubtful ſoever it was, whether the king's pardon could be pleaded in bar to an impeachment, yet ſince the king had ſent an act of grace, which had paſſed in the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, it ſeemed very unreaſonable to offer an impeachment againſt an act of parliament. All this diſcovered a deſign againſt the marquis, who was believed to have the greateſt credit both with the king and queen, and was again falling under an univerſal hatred. In a houſe of commons every motion againſt a miniſter is apt to be well entertained: ſome envy him; others are angry with him; many hope to ſhare in the ſpoils of him; and a love of change, a wantonneſs of mind, make the attacking a miniſter a diverſion to the reſt. This ſcheme was well formed, and fourteen leading men had undertaken to manage the matter againſt the marquis; in which the earl of Shrewſbury had the chief hand, who had a very bad opinion of the marquis, and thought his advices would, in concluſion, ruin the king and his affairs. But a diſcovery being at this time made of lord Preſton's plot, and managed chiefly by the marquis's means, it put an end to the deſigns againſt him for the preſent.

[1690-1] The king being impatient to be at the congreſs in Holland, came January 5, to the houſe of lords, and having paſſed all the bills that were ready, made this ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"HAVING only told you, that it would be neceſſary for me to go into Holland much about this time, I am very glad to find that the ſucceſs of your endeavours to bring this ſeſſion to a happy concluſion has been ſuch, that I am now at liberty to do it. And I return you my hearty thanks for the great diſpatch you have made in finiſhing the ſupplies you have deſigned for carrying on the war, which it ſhall be my care to ſee duly and punctually applied to that ſervice, for which you have given them. And I do likewiſe think it proper to aſſure you, that I ſhall not make any grant of the forfeited lands in England and Ireland, 'till there be another opportunity of ſettling that matter in parliament in ſuch manner, as ſhall be thought moſt expedient.

My lords and gentlemen,

'As I have reaſon to be very well ſatisfied with the proofs you have given me of your good affections in this ſeſſion of parliament, ſo I promiſe myſelf the continuance of the ſame at your returns into your ſeveral countries. And as every day produces ſtill freſh inſtances of the reſtleſſneſs of our enemies, both at home and abroad, in deſigning againſt the proſperity of this nation, and the government eſtabliſhed; ſo I cannot doubt, but that the union and good correſpondence between me and my parliament, and my earneſt and conſtant endeavours on the one hand, joined with the continuance of your zeal and affection to ſupport me on the other, will, by the bleſſing of God, be at all times too ſtrong for the utmoſt malice and contrivance of our common enemies.'

And then the lord chief baron Atkyns ſpeaker of the houſe of lords, declared to both houſes, 'that it was his majeſty's pleaſure, that they ſhould adjourn themſelves unto the 31ſt of March next; and that if his majeſty ſhould think fit, that the parliament ſhould then ſit, he would give them timely notice thereof by proclamation[z].'

On the 15th of November the king ordered a new commiſſion to paſs the great ſeal, conſtituting the lord Godolphin, ſir John Lowther, Mr. Richard Hampden, ſir Stephen Fox, Mr. Thomas Pelham, commiſſioners of their Majeſties treaſury. About a month after, his majeſty diſpoſed of the vacant biſhoprics of Ireland, and appointed ſir Charles Porter to be lord chancellor of that kingdom, and one of the lords juſtices, in the room of lord viſcount Sidney, who was recalled to be made one of the ſecretaries of ſtate on the 26th of December; in the beginning of which month colonel John Cuts was made baron Cuts of Gowran, in the kingdom of Ireland.

On the 30th of the ſame month George William, duke of Zell, eldeſt prince of the houſe of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, was made a knight of the garter; an honour which juſt a year before had been conferred upon the elector of Brandenburg, afterwards king of Pruſſia. And on the 1ſt day of January 1690-1, ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and firſt commiſſioner of the great ſeal, was admitted into the privy council.

The king having ſettled affairs at home, began his voyage

[z] Beſides the acts mentioned, others paſſed this ſeſſion were:

1. An act for reviving a former act for regulating the meaſures and prices of coals for ſeven years, from December 1, 1690. Sea coals by this act are to be ſold by the chaldron of thirty-ſix buſhels. Other ſorts of coals by the hundred weight Averdupois. The lord mayor of London and the court of aldermen, and the juſtices of peace of the ſeveral counties, or any three of them, are empowered to ſet the prices of coals as ſhall be ſold by retail, as they ſhall judge reaſonable.

2. An act for paving and cleanſing the ſtreets in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and other places within the weekly bills of mortality, and for regulating the markets therein.

3. An act for raiſing the militia for the year 1691.

4. An act for preventing vexatious ſuits againſt ſuch as acted for their majeſties ſervice in the cauſe of the kingdom. This act was paſſed, becauſe the privy council, and other lords and gentlemen being magiſtrates and officers, had, whilſt the French were upon the coaſt, apprehended ſeveral ſuſpected perſons, and raiſed the militia, otherwiſe than was authoriſed by the laws.

By a private act the proprietors of the water-works in York-buildings were incorporated.

Beſides the acts that were paſſed, there were ſeveral bills, as well as that for the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, which were left unfiniſhed, particularly 'a bill to regulate trials in caſes of treaſon,' which was much talked of in the houſe of commons, and yet was deferred from time to time: another 'to oblige the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury to take the like oaths as the lord treaſurer:' another 'relating to the African trade:' another 'againſt robbers on the highway:' another 'for the ſpeedier determining elections of members of parliament:' another 'to charge the eſtate of the late lord Jeffreys in Leiceſterſhire with the ſum of 14,760l. and intereſt, to Edmund Prideaux:' another 'for regulating and licenſing hackney coaches:' and another 'for the enabling chirurgeons to adminiſter inward medicines in caſes of chirurgery;' which was petitioned againſt by the phyſicians and apothecaries. A bill was alſo brought in 'for reducing intereſt money from ſix, to four per cent.' which after a ſecond reading was rejected.

for Holland on the 6th of January, notwithſtanding the rigour of the ſeaſon, and lay that night at Sittingborne; intending to embark the next evening at Margate. But finding, upon his arrival at Canterbury, that the wind was ſet in eaſterly with a hard froſt, he returned to Kenſington on the 9th, and ſeven days after he ſet out again from Whitehall, and embarked at Graveſend, with a numerous retinue under a convoy of twelve men of war, commanded by rear admiral Rooke. On the 18th in the morning, the veſſels that attended his majeſty, being come up with the Goree, he was informed by a fiſherman, that they were within a league and a half of the ſhore, whereupon being weary of the ſea, he left his yacht, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earl of Devonſhire lord ſteward, the earl of Dorſet lord chamberlain, the earl of Portland, the earl of Monmouth, Monſieur Overkirk, and Monſieur Zuleſtein, and went into a ſhallop.

The ſeamen themſelves were afraid, as the froſt had been very ſevere, and the ice near the ſhore was ſo great, as made it dangerous to attempt landing; and all the perſons of quality about his majeſty would have diſſuaded him from that attempt. But nothing being able to move him from his reſolution, they put away from the fleet, and quickly loſt ſight of it. Night came on, and the king remained for eighteen hours expoſed to the injuries of the air and cold, to the mercy of the ſea, and the chance of privateers, having nothing but his cloak to cover him; and the ſea ran ſo high, that he and all his company were waſhed with the waves; tho' neither he nor any of them were the worſe for all this cold and wet weather; and when the ſeamen ſeemed apprehenſive of their danger, he ſaid in a very intrepid manner, 'What are you afraid to die in my company?' At laſt the ſhallop, by break of day, came near the iſle of Goree, where the king went aſhore, and got a little refreſhment in a fiſherman's cottage. Then he went into the boat again, and about two in the afternoon landed at Oranien-Haak, not far from Maeſlandſluys. At Houndſlardyke he was received by Van Opdam, Belard, Witzen, and Uryberg, appointed by the ſtates for that purpoſe; and about ſix in the evening he arrived at the Hague. The States General, the ſtates of Holland, the council of ſtate, the other colleges, the congreſs of foreign miniſters, and all the perſons of diſtinction at the Hague, made their compliments to him upon his ſafe arrival; and becauſe he was come ſo ſuddenly, as to prevent the ſolemn reception that was intended by the magiſtrates of that place, he was prevailed upon to make his public entry on the 26th, which was performed with great ſolemnity, ſeveral triumphal arches having been erected to repreſent his atchievements, and all the burghers appearing in arms with unuſual magnificence. In the evening the fire-works were played, and the cannon diſcharged on the Viverberg oppoſite to his palace, and bonfires lighted through the whole town. Two days after the king went to the aſſembly of the States-General, then to the States of Holland, and laſtly to the council of ſtate: He made a ſpeech to each of thoſe aſſemblies. He told the States-General that the laſt time he was with them, he had declared his intention of going over to England, to deliver that kingdom from the evils with which it was threatened. That God had ſo bleſſed his juſt intentions, that he had met with ſucceſs even beyond his hopes. That the Engliſh having offered him the crown, he had accepted it, as God was his witneſs, not out of ambition, but ſolely to preſerve the religion and laws of the three kingdoms, and to be able to aſſiſt his allies, and eſpecially the United Provinces againſt the power of France. That he could have wiſhed to have aided them ſooner, but was prevented by the affairs of Ireland, which being now in a better condition, he was come to concert meaſures with the allies, and to exerciſe the functions of ſtadtholder. The reſt of his ſpeech conſiſted of expreſſions of his zeal and affection for the republic. He was anſwered with the reſpect and acknowledgement due to a prince, who was looked upon as the father of his country, the deliverer of Europe, the preſerver of the proteſtant religion, and the ſoul of the grand alliance.

After this was opened the moſt glorious congreſs that ever yet appeared of Chriſtian princes and miniſters, who were aſſembled at the Hague, to concert meaſures with king William, for the defence of the liberties of Europe, againſt the encroachments of France.[a] King William in a very pathetical ſpeech repreſented to them, "that the imminent dangers, wherein they found themſelves, ſufficiently diſcovered the errors that had been committed; ſo that he needed not uſe many arguments to ſhew them the neceſſity of taking juſter and better meaſures. That in the circumſtances they were in, it was not a time to deliberate, but act. That the enemy was maſter of all the chief fortreſſes, that were the barrier of the common liberty; and that he would quickly poſſeſs himſelf of all the reſt, if a ſpirit of diviſion, ſlowneſs, and particular intereſt, continued among them: That every one ought to remain perſuaded, that their reſpective particular intereſts were compriſed in the general one. That the enemy's forces were very ſtrong, and that they would carry all things, like a torrent, before them. That it was in vain to oppoſe complaints, and fruitleſs clamours, or unprofitable proteſtations againſt injuſtice.

"That it was neither the reſolution of a barren diet, nor the hopes of ſome men of fortune, ariſing from frivolous foundations, but ſoldiers, ſtrong armies, and a prompt and ſincere union between all the forces of the allies, that muſt do the work; and that theſe too muſt be brought to oppoſe the enemy without any delay, if they would put a ſtop to his conqueſts, and ſnatch out of his hands the liberty of Europe, which he held already under an heavy yoke. And that as for himſelf, he would not ſpare his credit, forces, or perſon, to concur with them in ſo juſt and neceſſary a deſign; and would come in the ſpring at the head of the troops faithfully to make good his royal word, which he had ſo ſolemnly engaged to them."

This ſpeech from a prince, in whom they all confided, had ſo good effect, that they came to a reſolution of employing two hundred and twenty-two thouſand men againſt France; of which the king of England was to furniſh twenty thouſand, and the reſt of the princes and ſtates in proportion.[b]

But notwithſtanding the large quotas promiſed by divers princes and ſtates of Germany, England and Holland were forced to pay them, and to bear the burthen of the war. The congreſs determined likewiſe the operations of the next campaign; and though the duke of Savoy was then reduced very low, king William took ſuch care of him, and both furniſhed, as well as procured him ſuch ſupplies, that his affairs had quickly a more promiſing aſpect. Things were concerted among the princes themſelves, and were kept ſo ſecret, as they did not truſt them to their miniſters; at leaſt, the king did not communicate them to the earl of Nottingham, as he proteſted ſolemnly to biſhop Burnet,

[a] Theſe all aſſiſted at the congreſs. The electors of Brandenburg and Bavaria; the dukes of Lunenberg, of Zell, and of Wolfenbuttle; the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel; prince Chriſtian Louis of Brandenburg, prince Waldeck; the prince of Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friesland, the prince of Naſſau Saarbrug, governor of Bois-le-duc, the prince of Naſſau Dillemburg, the prince of Naſſau Idſtein, the duke adminiſtrator of Wirtemberg; the two princes of Anſpach, the landgrave of Heſſe D'Armſtadt, the prince his brother; the duke of Saxe-Eyſenach, prince Philip Palatine, the duke of Zulſback, the prince of Wirtemberg Neuſtadt, the prince of Wirtemberg, and the prince his brother; the duke of Courland, and prince Ferdinand his brother; the prince of Anhalt Zeerbonſt, the landgrave of Homburg, three princes of Holſtein-Beck, the duke of Holſtein, prince of Commerci, the prince Palatine of Birkenfelt; to which we may add the princeſs of Naſſau Friſeland, the princeſs of Radzeville, the counteſs of Soiſſons, the princeſs of Saxe Eyſenach, and other illuſtrious perſons. The moſt remarkable of the counts, were the counts of Horn, Erbauh, Tirimont, de Brocay, de Gryal, d'Arco, de Rivera, de Sanfra, de Lippe, d'Eſpenſe, de Fugger, de Denhof, de Carelſon: with the barons of Pallant, and Spaein; the Rhinegrave and his brother; the marquiſſes of Caſhlemonlayo, and Caſtanaga, governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands; and the generals Chauvert, d'Elwicht, Barfus, d'Autel, Palſi, &c. The embaſſadors and foreign miniſters preſent, were, thoſe from the emperor, the count de Windiſgratz, and Berka, with the chevalier de Campecht; from the king of Spain, Don Emanuel de Colonna; from the king of Denmark, the count of Rebenklau and M. Centhe; from the king of Sweden, the count of Oxenſtern; from the king of Poland, M. Moreau; from the elector of Bavaria, the baron of Boomgarden and M. Prielmeyere; from the elector of Brandenburg, M. Van Dieſt and Smettau; from the elector of Saxony, M. Haxhauſen; from the elector of Treves, the baron de Leyon and M. Champagne; from the elector of Mentz, M. Talberg and Meyers; from the elector of Cologne, the general and baron Beruſaw and M. Soelmaker; from the elector Palatine, M. Hertermans; from the duke of Savoy, the count de Pielat and the preſident de la Tour; from the duke of Zell, M. Zieger; from the biſhop of Munſter, M. de Nort; from the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, the baron Gorts and M. Reppelaar; from the duke of Wolfembuttel, the baron Croſck; from the duke of Hanover, M. Klekk; from the duke of Holſtein Gottorp, M. Tourken; and from the prince of Liege, counſellor Mean. Of king William's own ſubjects, who attended him to this ſolemnity, were the dukes of Norfolk and Ormond, with the earls of Devonſhire, Dorſet, Eſſex, Nottingham, Scarborough, and Selkirk, the biſhop of London, the lord Dramlendrits, the lord Durſley, the earls of Portland and Monmouth, the duke of Schomberg, and his brother count Meinhard, &c.

[b] The emperor was to furniſh twenty thouſand; the king of Spain in Flanders twenty thouſand; the States-General thirty-five thouſand; the duke of Savoy and the troops of Milan twenty thouſand; the elector of Bavaria eighteen thouſand; the elector of Saxony twelve thouſand; the landgrave of Heſſe eight thouſand; the circles of Swabia and Franconia ten thouſand; the duke of Wirtemberg ſix thouſand: the elector of Brandenburg twenty thouſand; the prince of Liege ſix thouſand; the biſhop of Munſter ſeven thouſand; the elector Palatine four thouſand; and the Prince of Lunenberg ſixteen thouſand.

The

when he returned to England. The princes ſhewed the king all the reſpects that any of their rank ever paid to a crowned head; and they lived together in ſuch an eaſy freedom, that points of ceremony occaſioned no diſputes among them, though thoſe are often, upon leſs ſolemn interviews, the ſubjects of much quarrelling, and interrupt more important debates [c].

The congreſs broke up about the beginning of March; but the early and unexpected motions of the French, not only put a ſudden ſtop to king William's journey for England, but likewiſe convinced the confederates of the truth of what he had ſaid to them in his ſpeech, 'that it was not a time to deliberate, but to act;' a maxim which the king of France knew beſt how to practiſe. For on the 5th of March a detachment of French cavalry inveſted the ſtrong city of Mons, before which place his moſt chriſtian majeſty arrived himſelf ſix days after, accompanied by the dauphin, the duke of Orleans, and the duke of Chartres. The next day the trenches were opened; and the beſiegers raiſed large batteries, and with threeſcore pieces of cannon, and five and twenty mortars, made prodigious havock in the town. The garriſon within conſiſted of about ſix thouſand horſe and foot, commanded by the prince de Bergue, who was not wanting in his duty; but notwithſtanding the vigorous reſiſtance of the beſieged, the French were advanced ſo far by the 22d of March, that having filled up the ditch of an imperfect horn-work on the ſouth ſide of the town towards the gate of Barlemont, they boldly aſſaulted that out-work, and after the loſs of a great number of men, began to make a lodgement upon it. Upon this the beſieged, headed by ſome of their braveſt officers, attempted to beat them off, and in effect obliged the workmen, and the grenadiers, that ſupported them, to give way; but at laſt the aſſailants regained their poſt, drove the enemy into the town, and puſhed on the ſiege with ſo much the more vigour, as they were informed, that the king of England was advancing to raiſe it.

The king, upon the news of the ſiege, return from Loo to the Hague, from whence he diſpatched prince Waldeck to Hall near Bruſſels, where the forces, that were drawing together for the relief of Mons, had their general rendezvous. From thence the king went to Breda, having before his departure named the general officers, who were to command in the army; and on the 27th of March arrived at Hall, where though he had an army of near fifty thouſand men, yet he found that, through the neglect of the Spaniards, there was nothing provided for his expedition, not ſo much as even the neceſſary carriages.

[1691] In the mean time the ſiege of Mons was carried on with indifferent ſucceſs; for the French had only gained an horn-work, and there ſtill remained two half-moons for them to take before they could come to the counterſcarp of the place; and in the attack, which they made upon one of theſe half-moons, they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. But the burghers being terrified by the enemy's bombs, which had burnt part of the town, and their fears being improved by the influence of their prieſts, the principal of them with two abbots went to the governor, and preſſed him to capitulate. The governor, who was confident, that he might hold out eight or ten days longer, having had but three or four men killed during the ſiege, and wanting neither ammunition nor proviſions, refuſed to comply with their demands. Upon this they ſent a drum of their own to beat a parley, and threatened to open the gates, and deliver both him and the garriſon into the beſiegers hands. Things being brought to this extremity, the governor conſented at laſt to capitulate, and ſurrendered the town on very honourable conditions. Whereupon king William immediately left the army, returned to the Hague, embarked for England, and arrived ſafely at Whitehall on the 13th of April.

The chief tranſaction during the king's abſence, was the diſcovery of a plot. Towards the latter end of the year 1689, king James and his popiſh counſellors in Ireland laid the foundation of the Lancaſhire plot, having ſent over commiſſioners into that and other northern counties to raiſe an army, which that king engaged himſelf to head in perſon in Auguſt 1690. But the plot being diſcovered by ſome of the confederates, and ſoon after effectually ſuppreſſed by his defeat at the Boyne; another project was ſet on foot by the jacobites in England, who thought the opportunity of the king's going to the congreſs at the Hague was not to be loſt. They fancied it would be eaſy, in his abſence, to bring about the reſtoration of king James, now that there was ſo ſmall a force left in the kingdom, and the nation ſo incenſed at a burthen of four millions in taxes. The men that laid this deſign were the earl of Clarendon, the biſhop of Ely, the lord Preſton, and his brother Mr. Graham, and Pen the famous quaker.

It was reſolved among them, that to prevent delays, ſome perſons of quality and known abilities ſhould go over to France, to tranſact the affair for the whole party. The lord Preſton, Mr. Aſhton, a ſervant of king James's queen, and Mr. Elliot, were pitched upon for that purpoſe, and to carry letters, from thoſe who had joined in the deſign, to king James and his queen. The biſhop of Ely's letters were writ in a very particular ſtile. He undertook both for his elder brother and the reſt of the family, which was plainly meant of Sancroft and the other deprived biſhops. In his letter to the queen he aſſured her of his and all their zeal for the prince of Wales, and that they would no more part with that than with their hopes of heaven.

The gentlemen thus appointed by the party having hired a veſſel of Mrs. Jane Prat, of Barking in Eſſex, went on board near Battle-Bridge on the 30th of December 1690; but Nicholas Prat, huſband of the woman and owner of the veſſel, being a man zealous for the government, had diſcovered all that he knew, which was only, that he was to carry ſome perſons over to France. The notice of this was brought to the marquis of Carmarthen, and the matter ſo ordered, that lord Preſton, Aſhton, and Elliot, were falling down the river as far as Graveſend, when captain Billop, who had been ordered to attend their motion, came on board on pretence of ſearching for and preſſing ſeamen, and drew the three paſſengers out of the hold, in which they were hid. Lord Preſton left his letters behind him in the hold, together with king James's ſignet; and Aſhton took them up with a deſign to have thrown them into the ſea, but they were taken from him, and both they and their papers were brought to Whitehall.

Lord Preſton's mind ſunk ſo viſibly, that it was concluded he would not die, if confeſſing all he knew would ſave him. Aſhton was more firm and ſullen; and Elliot knew nothing. There was among their papers one, that contained 'the heads of a declaration, to be prepared, in order to be publiſhed when the French have had ſucceſs at ſea, with aſſur-

[c] The following declaration was generally ſaid to have been agreed upon at the congreſs, though ſome of the articles ſeem doubtful: "Since we look upon the union, that is between us, as the work of God alone, it is but reaſonable that we ſhould make a ſolemn proteſtation to him, to deliberate nothing in this aſſembly, but what may be very juſt and equitable. We ſolemnly proteſt before God, that our intentions are, that we will never break off this union, nor make any peace with Lewis XIV, 'till the following articles be executed, to the execution of which we oblige ourſelves for ever.

'I. 'Till he has made reparation to the holy ſee for whatſoever he has acted againſt it; and 'till he has annulled and made void all thoſe infamous proceedings againſt the holy father Innocent XI.

'II. 'Till he has reſtored to each party concerned what he has taken ſince the peace of Munſter; and 'till he has demoliſhed Briſac, and delivered up the country of Ceay to the canton of Bern.

'III. 'Till he has reſtored to the proteſtants all their poſſeſſions and goods; and 'till there be an entire liberty of conſcience throughout the whole extent of the French dominions.

'IV. 'Till the eſtates of the kingdom be re-eſtabliſhed in their antient liberties, ſo that the clergy, the nobility, and the third eſtate, may enjoy their antient and lawful privileges; and 'till the kings, for the future, ſhall be obliged to call together the ſaid eſtates, when they deſire any ſupply, without the conſent of whom they ſhall not raiſe any money, after any manner, or for any pretence whatſoever.

'V. 'Till the tax upon ſalt, that upon the third eſtate, and an infinite number of other unreaſonable taxes and impoſitions, be aboliſhed for ever.

'VI. 'Till he has reſtored to the parliaments their antient and rightful authority; that ſo they might be enabled to diſtribute to every one juſtice freely, and without conſtraint, according to their conſciences.

'VII. 'Till all the towns of the kingdom be re-eſtabliſhed in their antient privileges, and till their revenues be reſtored, which had been taken from them with ſuch violence and injuſtice.

'God, who knows the intention of our hearts, knows that we bear no hatred againſt the French nation; and that we do not aſpire to have the lawful dominions of the kingdom of France. And if all thoſe, who are inhabitants, would join with us, we ſhould ſoon diſpatch this affair without effuſion of blood, and without deſolation of the kingdoms. And we promiſe all thoſe, that ſhall do it, that we will treat them as our particular friends, and preſerve their towns and poſſeſſions, as if they were our own. And as for thoſe, that ſhall not do it, we ſhall look upon them as perſons, that have approved and abetted all theſe perſecutions, burnings, and other devaſtations, that have been made; and we will make them feel, without mercy, thoſe pains and torments, which they have been the occaſion of, that ſo many poor people have ſuffered.

'We were willing, that the whole world ſhould have a perfect knowledge of our reſolutions, particularly the French gentlemen and perſons of honour, who are oppreſſed with the heavy load of the government, and can no longer endure the ſlavery, which they lie under; to the end they may be able to take ſuch meaſures, as may be aſſiſting to us in recovering for them their antient liberty, which has been ſo cruelly and ſo unjuſtly taken from them.'

ances of pardon, and promiſes to preſerve the proteſtant religion and the laws [d].

The moſt important of all was 'the reſult of a conference between ſome lords and gentlemen, both tories and whigs, in which it was undertaken to prove the poſſibility and method of reſtoring king James by a French power, without endangering the proteſtant religion and civil adminiſtration, according to the laws of this kingdom [e].' Beſides theſe there were ſome other papers and letters [f]; and particularly a paper, containing ſhort memorials in lord Preſton's own

[d] The heads of the declaration were as follow:

"That the king will return with a deſign of making an entire conqueſt of his people, is ſo ridiculous as well as difficult, that it needs not to be ſpoken to.

"That the king's declaration be worded in general terms, that he will govern by the laws, that they ſhall be the rule of his actions; that he will endeavour to ſettle liberty of conſcience by law, that whatſoever things were formerly done by him, which occaſioned jealouſies in the minds of his people, ſhall be left to the determination of a parliament, to be formally and regularly called as ſoon as is poſſible.

"That he has given ſufficient evidence of his unwillingneſs to bring an army of ſtrangers into his kingdom, by refuſing the ſuccours the king of France offered him, and which were even ready to be embarked upon the firſt notice of the prince of Orange's intended invaſion.

"That he brings with him ſuch an army only, as is neceſſary for his own defence, and for the ſecurity of his loyal ſubjects, who ſhall reſort to him: that he will diſmiſs them as ſoon as he ſhall have rid the nation of thoſe foreigners, who have invaded it, and trampled upon the laws and liberties of his people.

"The king's large exerciſing his diſpenſing power gave the great alarm to his people, and contributed moſt of all toward a general defection. Yet when that power came to be debated in the laſt convention, there appeared ſo many difficulties in the limiting of it, every body, even the preſent judges, believing it neceſſary, that a diſpenſing power ſhould be in the king, that it was let fall, and that point remains as it was. And without mentioning that or any other particular, the king can be in no danger by leaving all things, which have been the occaſions of jealouſies, to the determination of a parliament, where, beſides the king's profeſſed friends and ſervants, there will not want others, who will be glad of opportunity to ingratiate themſelves."

'The reſult of the conference was as follows:

"I. F. muſt either oblige or conquer us: If the laſt he will find few helps here, but a bloodier reſiſtance than ever the Romans, Saxons, or Normans found, it being incredible, how unanimous and obſtinate that very thought renders the people, ſo that it may make us a heap of ruins, but no nation that can ever help or import any thing to F.

"II. If K. L. deſires to oblige us, and make the work eaſy, that he may be at leiſure to ply the empire or Italy, or to have an advantageous peace, he muſt take off the frightful character we have of him, and ſhew us he has no ſuch deſign, as returning our offended K. a conqueror upon us, but that he can and will be our friend and mediator; upon which terms he will find, that many lords and gentlemen will ſpeedily ſhew themſelves to his ſatisfaction, eſpecially if he makes haſte, and loſes no approaching opportunity.

"III. If he incline to this ſort of ſenſe, he muſt over-rule the bigotry of St. G. and diſpoſe their minds to think of thoſe methods, that are more likely to gain the nation; for there is one ſilly thing or other daily done there, that comes to our notice here, which prolongs what they ſo paſſionately deſire.

"The methods thought upon are theſe:

"Firſt to prevent dangerous and fooliſh intelligence, by forbidding all in that court to write any news hither, and that king James only have his correſpondence, by whom to hear from, and ſpeak to people here; ſince letters ſo often miſcarry, and are filled with nothing but what we ſhould not hear, and what we have, are arguments for the moſt part againſt the king's reſtoration.

"Secondly, ſince there is a great body of proteſtants, that never defected, and that many thouſands are returning, and that they are the natural weight and power of theſe kingdoms, by having the heads, hands, and wealth of their ſide, to the odds and advantage of at leaſt two hundred proteſtants to one catholic; the K. may think of nothing ſhort of a proteſtant adminiſtration, nor of nothing more for the catholics, than a legal liberty of conſcience; for 'much e mutt' is againſt all other notions, to which all private paſſions and artificial frames in government muſt yield or break. He may reign a catholic in devotion, but he muſt reign a proteſtant in government. Cromwell could not, yet on a broader bottom, with a victorious army, ſubſiſt or keep what he had got.

"Thirdly, he muſt give us a model of this at St. G. by preferring the proteſtants that are with him, above the catholics; one being loyal upon leſſies of intereſt, and to tell the nation here what they are to hope for when he comes.

"Fourthly, he muſt give encouragement to lords and gentlemen here to come to him, at leaſt ſeven or nine for a ſtanding council, which will make us here think he is in ſome degree ours again, and that we have a relation to him, and ſome intereſt and ſhare in him, by the men of quality of our own religion, that are with him. This will incomparably facilitate the matter here; nor will they, when they come, come empty, and in their own names, which is ſtill better, and will be more ſatisfactory there.

"Fifthly, to induce this, Engliſh proteſtants ſhould be encouraged by an edict of liberty from the K. of F. to have chapels at their own coſt, in which to worſhip God after their reſpective ways, by which that king will make us reflect upon his conduct towards his huguenots, rather to flow from the hazard he thought himſelf in by their anti-monarchical and reſiſting principles, than a deſire of perſecution.

"Laſtly, all other requiſite meaſures depending upon the acceptance this finds, an anſwer hereunto is impatiently deſired by thoſe, that have diſcouſed the king's buſineſs to this maturity. So ended with an unanimous conſent both tories and whigs upon this occaſion, that are in a way of cloſing in his intereſt."

The following letters were directed in falſe names, and are moſt of them written under divers cants, as under the colour of trade, law-ſuits, mortgages, &c. yet evidently relate to king James's reſtoration. The two firſt were ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Turner, biſhop of Ely.

To Mr. Redding.

SIR,

'Though the bearer of this will do us the juſtice to aſſure you, we are as full of duty, as unfeignedly and unconcernedly yours, as yourſelf could wiſh; yet this gentleman has undertaken.—You will forgive the preſumption, if I do myſelf the honour to give you this freſh aſſurance in a few words, which I hope we do by our accounts. I ſhall omit no occaſions, not neglecting the leaſt, and making zealous wiſhes for the greateſt, to ſhew ourſelves ſuch as we ought to be. Sir, I ſpeak in the plural, becauſe I write 'my elder brother's ſentiments as well as my own, and the reſt of the family,' though leſſened in number, yet if we are not mightily out in our accounts, we are growing in our intereſt, that is, in yours. He that delivers this, will, I hope, entirely to your ſatisfaction, repreſent us, and me in particular, as with all the devotion imaginable and unchangeable affection, Yours, God grant the happieſt new year.'

To Mrs. Redding.

'As 'tis impoſſible for me to expreſs that extraordinary great ſatisfaction it gave me this time twelve-months when I had the honour to receive that mark of your favour and goodneſs under your own hand; ſo I have lived in ſome pain for an opportunity to write you my humbleſt acknowledgements and trueſt duty, from which, by the grace of God, I am no more capable of ſwerving, than of renouncing my hopes of heaven. I ſay this in behalf of my elder brother and the reſt of my neareſt relations, as well as for myſelf. You may entirely depend upon us, not only for a conſtant adherence to ſo well choſen a principle, but for our utmoſt activity to promote your intereſts, which are inſeparable from our own. I need come to no particulars by this bearer, who can and will tell you our whole hearts; and I wiſh you could ſee them, how ſincerely they are devoted to your ſervice. God grant you a moſt happy new year, and many, very many, and very happy. Our young maſter hath all our beſt wiſhes: he daily gains more friends, and we get ground of his adverſaries.

'New year's Eve.'

hand, in which many of the nobility were named g. On the 16th, 17th, and 19th, of January the lord Preſton, and Mr. Aſhton, were brought to their trials at the Old-Bailey.

A letter directed for Mrs. Charlton, Decem. 31. 1690.

'I muſt not let this bearer depart, madam, without aſſuring you of my beſt reſpects. I have written by him to a friend of yours, but depend upon you to give my note credit.

'Though my creditors were no friends to the match, which has been ſo long in treaty, for your relations have been very hard upon me this laſt ſummer, yet as ſoon as I could go ſafely abroad, I purſued the buſineſs, and do beg you to believe, that no endeavours of mine ſhall be wanting to perfect the ſettlement. You once put me in hopes of ſeeing you before this Chriſtmas. Your friends are ſorry for the diſappointment, pray loſe no more time than is of abſolute neceſſity. The bearer will tell you all things may now be eaſily ſettled, if the right way be taken. I long to hear how your young daughter does: ſhe will find many friends, and I hope her portion will be well ſecured. God ſend you a happy new year, and that I may be merry with you before it be far ſpent; and I beſeech you, keep me in the good opinion of your friend. I will always make good what I promiſed to you.'

A letter directed to Mr. Jackſon, Decem. 31, 1690.

'The bearer can give you ſo full an account of all things relating to your eſtate here, that I need not have troubled you at this time, but that I am deſirous to lay hold of any opportunity I think ſafe, to aſſure you of my ſervice; and that I will never quit your intereſt whatever the reſt of the freeholders do. Your adverſary has been ſo hard to his neighbours, that he has extremely diſobliged all the old tenants, and a little matter would redeem the whole eſtate, if you would appear in Weſtminſter Hall yourſelf: the beſt council have a good opinion of your title, and will zealouſly purſue your inſtructions. I only beg you would haſten them to us, and that you will appear yourſelf as ſoon as is poſſible. No time ſhould be loſt and the cauſe may be brought to a final hearing before the end of Eaſter-term, if it be well ſolicited. I heartily wiſh you a happy new year, and I beg you to tell Mr. Charlton, that I long to know wherein I may ſerve him, and that I will follow his directions to the utmoſt, while I live, God keep you and yours.'

Decem. 31.

'The interruption of the formet correſpondency had a very ill effect many ways, but for that reaſon no opportunity ought now to be loſt, and I hope this will prove a happy one.

'In trade, as well as in government, ſchemes muſt be laid; for there is no living from hand to mouth any more in commerce than in politics. Lay therefore your deſigns probably, and purſue them diligently, and with vigour; though it be a hazardous time, yet by venturing boldly where venturing is adviſeable, it often returns great profit.

'There is nothing more to be ſaid but to give the bearer fit and full ſeaſons to tell what he knows, both as to the goods fit for our market, and when and where to be ſent. The ſea will quickly grow ſo troubleſome, that unleſs you diſpatch what you intend for us, you will loſe a great opportunity of advantage. I hope the account he has to give of our negotiation here with the merchants, that deal with us, eſpecially thoſe, that have lately brought us their cuſtom, will both encourage a larger trade, and excite the utmoſt diligence. I will ſay nothing of myſelf: it ſhall be enough, that I can live in the good opinion of one I bear ſo great a reverence and affection for. But for this honeſt factor, I muſt own I can hardly ſay enough. Truth and boldneſs are excellent qualities in a ſervant, and he has ſhewn both, as occaſion has required him to ſhew them.

'I have but one word to add, and, pray, take it as the trueſt mark of unalterable reſpect. Chuſe well, but have to do but with a few; for a multitude may give, but can never keep counſel.

'I ſhall, with more impatience than becomes me, wait the reſult of this; and it will be a great mark of goodneſs to let us have the beſt and ſafeſt way.

'Once more, let not the ſeaſon ſpend unprofitably, for a more likely one can hardly come than between this and the firſt of March. Interpret this, I pray, as no private intereſt of my own, or partial motion of any other perſons. It is my ſenſe, my duty, and my friendſhip, which will not let me prevaricate, nor ſuffer thoſe I love and honour to loſe ſo happy and preſſing an occaſion of advantage. With the beſt wiſhes I cloſe up this, and am, &c.'

'It is a preſumption incident to thoſe, that are any where upon the ſpot, to think, that they know better than thoſe, that are not, what is fitteſt to be done in any occurrence. This makes me ſay, that now is the time to make large advantages by trading, the ſea being freer than two months paſt, or we can hope it will be two months hence. This gentleman is well inſtructed in our markets, and what the goods are we want, and when and where they ſhall be ſent. It is moſt earneſtly deſired, that this happy opportunity may not be loſt, eſpecially by the late undertakers; and I would not for much they ſhould receive the leaſt diſguſt. They are ſomwhat poſitive in their terms; but they alſo ſay, they will be good and conſtant cuſtomers; and I have more than once ſeen the miſchief of over-rating and over-ſtaying the market. Opportunities are to be uſed; they cannot be given by men.

'The bearer needs nothing from me to recommend him, but he is deſerving in our opinion here, and many will take their meaſures by the uſage he finds there. And indeed the preſſing poſture of our trading affairs will not permit more experiments.

'If the ſeveral parcels arrive not, that have been promiſed, before the 10th of March at furtheſt, (eſpecially the copper and linnen, of which the bearer will be more particular) I am ſatisfied we ſhall loſe this ſummer's profit. I am the more preſſing, becauſe I am well aſſured of what I write; and if ever I judged right, it is upon this occaſion.

'I have ſaid nothing of another gentleman, that takes this opportunity to ſee thoſe parts; but he has ſhewn a zeal and a ſincerity in this affair equal to moſt. Jo. is not yet gone, by a misfortune; but he will follow with a good poſtſcript in this affair. Of myſelf I will ſay nothing. I hope I need not, for nobody, without vanity, can be more ſincerely and affectionately a friend and ſervant to the company than myſelf. I writ at large yeſterday, and cannot write what the hand, that gives this, can ſay; and therefore will write no more, but that with the greateſt reſpect I am, &c.'

SIR,

'I vow to you, I do not repine at having loſt all for your ſake, which I got by your favour: but it grieves me extremely, that there is not that left, which can ſecure me from being troubleſome to you; for that is the thing in the world I would not be. I have told my lord my condition. What I deſire of you, he thinks very moderate; I hope you will. Pray, ſir, be not backward in ſettling my little affair, for I have deſerved your care. Your daughter and I muſt ſtarve, if this government can make us. I hope our intereſts are not divided; that is, you have an equal tenderneſs at leaſt for both. If you think fit to ſpeak what I would have you to this bearer, he will give me a juſt account of it. You know he is obliged to be my friend, and I believe him grateful, ſince he ventures ſo boldly for you. He brings with him ſome merry papers. Adieu, for I dare write no more, but pray ſend a meſſenger on purpoſe to me, that I may exactly know what you will do, and would have me do. If you ſend upon no other buſineſs, there will be no danger. Pray, ſir, aſk my lord, and he will tell you, how I have been uſed, and upon what account. I believe you know it not.

Decemb. 29.

'Your daughter is very well, very tall, and very pretty, as I am told.

Decemb. 31, 1690.

'Was my condition more deſperate and uneaſy than it is, I deſire no greater ſatisfacton than to have done my duty to ſo good a maſter. I wiſh it was of more uſe to him; that is not my fault, nor of thoſe I have acted with. Let it be looked into what has been foretold both as to England, Scotland, and Ireland, and ſee, if moſt of it is not come to paſs already, and the reſt will follow, if not prevented. I wiſh it may alſo be conſidered what uſage we have met with from men employed, and how they left your buſineſs and friends. How they managed it, you will know from all hands. Things they could not do, nor durſt not undertake, were better undone, than not done by them, men in this place, and in theſe times, muſt have ſome courage as well as ſenſe to do any thing with the people here. It is not my own ill uſage makes me ſay this, but my concern for one I wiſh the beſt in the world, and will give my proofs of this upon all occaſions. I need not enlarge, ſince all our grievances are known to him, that brings this. For my own part, I will ſtay here ſo long as I can be ſafe, if with never ſo great trouble; but it would be ſome comfort to know men (when driven from hence) may be ſo. Therefore the reports of the people's uſage are terrible, as well as of the indiſcretion of St. Germ. family. We feel the ſmart of it by ridiculous letters falling daily into the hands of the government. Their maſter and miſtreſs are little obliged by it no more than we. If there is any thing, ſir, you do particularly command me, or depend upon me for, let me know it. I cannot undertake much, nor furniſh more. I have ſtill helped every body, and paid to every thing I could; and if a twelvemonth ago my condition was what I then repreſented, you beſt know, if it has been mended. Uſe, and conſidering that of others, makes me grow more contented; and if the proſpect of miſery to us all was any ſatisfaction, that is now plainly ſeen.

'Pray God bleſs us all, by reſtoring every man his own, and you with long life.

'He, that gives you this, hath furniſhed for your uſe to me, &c. two hundred pounds, which I deſire may be repaid.

'I only beg, madam, no ill malicious report may take any place in your thoughts, in regard to me. I value your good opinion, and will endeavour to deſerve it. I can do little towards, but wiſh moſt heartily for your happineſs.

'I know no intereſt, madam, but my maſter's and your's, nor do I think they are to be made two. If you command me in any thing, I will faithfully obey you, as I ever have done him.

'We all depend here upon this bearer's accounts of us and condition, his faith and courage hath been enough experienced.'

Their deſign of going to France, and the treaſonable papers found upon them, were fully proved. Some of them were written in the Lord Preſton's, and ſome in Mr. Aſhton's hand. They alledged in their defence, that ſimilitude of hands was not thought a good proof in colonel Algernon Sidney's caſe. But this was now only a circumſtance: In what hand ſoever the papers were writ, the crime was always the ſame, ſince they were open, not ſealed; and conſequently they knew the contents of them, and thus were carrying on a negotiation of high-treaſon with the king's enemies. They were therefore found guilty and condemned.

Mr. Aſhton would enter into no treaty with the court, but prepared himſelf to die, and was accordingly executed at Tyburn on the 28th of January, the queen having remitted that part of his ſentence which related to his drawing and quartering. He ſuffered with great decency and ſerioufneſs. He left a paper behind him, in which he owned his dependance on King James, and his fidelity to him, and affirmed, that he was ſure the prince of Wales was born of that king's queen; but denied that he knew of the contents of the papers that were taken with him.[h] This made ſome conclude, that his paper was drawn up by ſome other perſon, and too

[h] The paper at large was as follows:

"Mr. Sheriff,

"Having obſerved, that the methods of making ſpeeches at the place of execution were not always attended with the deſigned ſucceſſes; and thinking it better to employ my laſt minutes in devotion and holy communion with my God, I have prepared this paper to leave in your hands, as well to aſſert my principles, as to teſtify my innocency.

"As to my religion, I profeſs by God's grace to die in the faith into which I was baptized, that of the church of England, in whoſe communion (nothing doubting of my ſalvation through the merits of my Saviour) I have always thought myſelf ſafe and happy. According to her principles, and late much eſteemed doctrine (though now unhappily exploded) I have regulated my life, believing myſelf obliged by my religion to look upon my rightful lawful prince (whatever his principles were, or his practices might be,) as God's vicegerent, and accountable (if guilty of mal-adminiſtration) to God only, from whom he received his power, and always believing it to be contrary to the laws of God, the church, and the realm, upon any pretence whatſoever, to take up arms againſt him. And let all the world take notice in this belief I die. But I have more particular obligations to the king, my maſter, whom I had the honour to ſerve, and received many ſignal favours from him for ſixteen years paſt; ſo that gratitude (a thing not much eſteemed at this time) as well as duty and religion, commanded the utmoſt ſervice I could pay him. And when I had theſe conſiderations, that we were born his liege ſubjects; that we had ſolemnly profeſſed our allegiance, and often confirmed it with oaths; that his majeſty's uſage, after the prince of Orange's arrival, was very hard, ſevere, and (I may ſay) unjuſt; and that all the new methods of ſettling this nation have hitherto made it more miſerable, poor, and more expoſed to foreign enemies; and that the religion we pretend to be fond of preſerving, is now much more than ever likely to be deſtroyed; there ſeemed to me no way to prevent the impending evils, and ſave theſe nations from poverty and deſtruction, but the calling home our injured ſovereign, who, as a true father of his country, has (notwithſtanding all his provocations and injuries) a natural love and tenderneſs for all his ſubjects. And I am ſo far from repining at the loſs of my life, that had I ten thouſand, I ſhould rather think myſelf obliged to ſacrifice them all, than omit any juſt and honeſt means to promote ſo good and neceſſary a work. And I adviſe and deſire all my fellow-ſubjects to think of their duty, and turn to their allegiance, before the ſevere judgments of God overtake them for their perjury and rebellion. But certainly the good and intereſt of theſe nations, abſtracted from all other conſiderations, will ere long convince them of the neceſſity of doing it.

"Having thus frankly declared my principles, I know the inference will be, that I have acted accordingly, and conſequently, that I am now juſtly condemned. But, as I ingenuouſly own the inference, ſo I as poſitively deny the conſequence; for whatever my inclinations or actings have been, yet as to the matter I was ſentenced to die for, I declare myſelf innocent. And I will appeal even to the judges themſelves, whether or no, upon my trial, there appeared the leaſt proof, that I knew a tittle contained in the papers. But preſumptions were with the jury thought ſufficient to find me guilty, though I am told I am the firſt man that ever was condemned for high-treaſon upon bare ſuſpicion or preſumption, and that contrary to my Lord Coke's and other eminent lawyers opinions. The knowledge of my own innocency, as to the indictment and charge againſt me, was that that armed me with ſo much aſſurance, and occaſioned my caſting my life upon the firſt twelve men of the pannel, without challenging any. But though I have, I think, juſt reaſon to complain of the ſevere charge given by the judges, and hard meaſure I have received; not to mention my cloſe impriſonment, the haſty and violent proceedings againſt me, nor the induſtry uſed in the return of fitting perſons to paſs upon me; the denying me a copy of the pannel, &c. yet as I beg pardon and forgiveneſs at the hands of God, I do moſt heartily pray for, and forgive them, and all my enemies, all the world, nay even that judge and juryman, who did ſo ſignally (contrary to common juſtice) expoſe themſelves to deſtroy me. But let the will of God be done; I rely wholly upon his mercy, and the merits of my bleſſed Saviour, for ſalvation. I do chearfully and entirely reſign myſelf into his hands, as into the hands of a faithful Creator, in ſure and certain hopes of a happy reſurrection. Bleſs, protect, and ſtrengthen, O Lord God, my good and gracious king and maſter; in thy due time let the virtue, goodneſs, and innocency of the queen my miſtreſs, make all her enemies bluſh, and ſilence the wicked and unjuſt calumnies that malice and envy have raiſed againſt her; make her and theſe nations happy in the prince of Wales, whom, from unanſwerable and undoubted proofs, I know to be her ſon. Reſtore them all, when thou ſeeſt fit, to their juſt rights, and on ſuch a bottom, as may ſupport and eſtabliſh the church of England, and once more make her flouriſh, notwithſtanding the wounds ſhe hath received of late from her prevaricating ſons.

"Forgive, forgive, O Lord, all my enemies; bleſs all my friends; comfort and ſupport my dear afflicted wife, and poor babes; be thou a huſband and a father to them: for their ſakes only I could have wiſhed to live; but pardon that wiſh, O good God, and take my ſoul into thy everlaſting glory." Amen.

JOHN ASHTON.

This paper was immediately followed by an anſwer to it, ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Edward Fowler, afterwards biſhop of Gloceſter, in which it is obſerved, that there was reaſon to ſuſpect that paper to have been drawn up by another hand than that of Mr. Aſhton; that the uncharitableneſs at leaſt of the paper was unbecoming a perſon going out of the world; that paſſive obedience was not the cauſe of Mr. Aſhton's ſuffering, but the want of it; that king William was our only lawful ſovereign then; that the meaſure of obedience is determined by law; that the revolution is to be juſtified by ſeveral conſiderations; that Mr. Aſhton had no hard meaſure, ſince treaſon was proved upon him. "The ſeverity of the charge, ſays the anſwerer, lay in applying the ſtatute 25 Edw. III. to his fact, which was, a deſign to carry into France a treaſonable ſcheme and project of an invaſion, in order to depoſing the king and queen. This laſt the judges declared had been always held to be high treaſon. All the queſtion then was, whether ſuch a fact were an overt act of ſuch a deſign; and ſo it was left to the jury, whether Mr. Aſhton intended to go over with ſuch a deſign or not. If there be any ſeverity here, it muſt be in the law; and that all thoſe, who ſuffer by a law, are apt to complain of.

"He particularly chargeth that judge and that juryman, who did, he ſaith, ſignally, contrary to common juſtice, expoſe themſelves to deſtroy him. This is a very hard charge from a dying man, and ought to have great evidence to reconcile it to common charity; but he offers none. The jury were to act according to their conſciences; and if they did ſo, how could they expoſe themſelves contrary to common juſtice to deſtroy him? But what evidence doth he give that they did not ſo? Some have told him that he was the firſt man that was ever condemned for high-treaſon, upon bare ſuſpicion or preſumption, and that contrary to my lord Coke, and other eminent lawyers opinions.

The main point as to the jury was, whether they were ſatisfied in their conſciences that Mr. Aſhton intended to go into France with ſuch a deſign. And where the fact lies in the intention, there can be no direct evidence, without ſeeing the heart, but it muſt be gathered from a concurrence of circumſtances ſtrong enough to determine an honeſt man's judgment; and ſuch the jury believed to be in his caſe. My lord Coke's words are on the caſe of treaſon, that 'the compaſſing, intent, or imagination, though ſecret, is to be tried by the peers, and to be diſcovered by circumſtances precedent, concomitant, and ſubſequent, with all endeavour evermore for the ſafety of the king.' It is true he ſaith afterwards, fol. 12. that 'conjectural preſumptions, or inferences, or ſtrains of wit, are not ſufficient,' but there muſt be 'good and manifeſt proof.' Yet ſtill this proof muſt be ſuch as the thing will bear; for there can be no 'direct and plain proof,' of a ſecret intention. Either therefore no man can be juſtly condemned for a ſecret intention, manifeſted by an overt act; or there muſt be ſuch a proof allowed, as is ſufficient to ſatisfy a man's conſcience, although it come not up to plain and direct evidence, as it is oppoſed to the higheſt degree of preſumption.

"But it may be ſaid, that 'the preſumption lies in judging the intention from the overt act; but that overt act muſt be manifeſtly proved.' The overt act in this caſe was 'the carrying over treaſonable papers into France, in order to an invaſion.' The ſole queſtion then was, whether there was manifeſt proof as to theſe papers. That the papers were found about him was manifeſtly proved; and he owns, fol. 110. that 'they were unfortunately found upon him,' but he ſaith, that 'he knew not the importance of them.' It was manifeſtly proved, that he had an extraordinary concernment to have theſe papers thrown overboard, which he ſaith 'was perfectly out of friendſhip;' and whether that was a true anſwer, was left to the conſciences of the jury, who were to judge of this by all the circumſtances antecedent, concomitant, and ſubſequent, by which they concluded him guilty. And I cannot ſee how they went againſt common juſtice therein, eſpecially ſince Mr. Aſhton well knew that one of the moſt material papers taken was of his own hand-writing, not the firſt draught, but the copy, which was ſhewed him in the court; and when it was ſo, he deſired, fol. 106.

haſtily copied over by himſelf, without making due reflection on this part of it; for biſhop Burnet compared this paper, which he gave the ſheriff, and which was written in his own hand, with thoſe found about him, and it was viſible, that both were written in the ſame hand.

The lord Preſton went backward and forward; he had no mind to die, and yet was not willing to tell all he knew. He acted a weak part in all reſpects. When he was heated by the importunities of his friends, who were violently engaged againſt the government, and after he had dined well, he reſolved to die heroically. But the next morning the heat went off, and when he ſaw death in full view, his heart failed him. The ſcheme he carried over was ſo fooliſh, ſo ill concerted, and ſo few engaged in it, that thoſe, who knew the whole ſecret, concluded, that if he had got ſafe to the court of France, the project would have been ſo deſpiſed, that he muſt have been ſuſpected as ſent over to draw king James into a ſnare, and bring him into the king's hands. He was therefore pardoned. And as for Mr. Elliot, there being no poſitive proof againſt him, he was not brought to a trial.

Soon after, on the 25th of February 1690-1, the queen iſſued out a proclamation for diſcovering and apprehending Dr. Turner, the late biſhop of Ely, William Penn, the famous quaker, and Mr. James Graham, as accomplices of the lord Preſton and Mr. Aſhton; and the earl of Clarendon was ſeized and committed to the tower on the ſame account; but after ſome months, the king, in regard to that earl's relation to the queen, would proceed to no extremities againſt him, but gave him leave to live confined to his houſe in the country. But the biſhop of Ely, Graham and Penn abſconded.

Four days before the king's arrival, a fire happened at Whitehall, which began about eight o'clock at night, by the negligence of a maid ſervant, (who, to ſave the pains of cutting a candle from a pound, burnt it off, and threw the reſt down careleſsly before the flame was out) at the lower end of the ſtone gallery, in thoſe lodgings which were the ducheſs of Portſmouth's, and burnt very violently till four the next morning; during which time almoſt all the ſtone gallery and buildings behind it, as far as the Thames, were conſumed, and one or two men killed by the buildings that were blown up[i].

The king, after having given the neceſſary orders for the reduction of Ireland, and for fitting out a large fleet which admiral Ruſſel was appointed to command, beſtowed his care on filling the vacant eccleſiaſtical dignities. He had ſuffered the deprived biſhops to continue, now above a year, in their ſees. They all the while neglected the concerns of the church, doing nothing, but living privately in their palaces. Biſhop Burnet had, by the queen's order, moved both the earl of Rocheſter and ſir John Trevor, who had great credit with them, to try, whether, in caſe an act could be obtained to excuſe them from taking the oaths, they would proceed to diſcharge their functions in ordinations, inſtitutions, and confirmations, and aſſiſt at the public worſhip, as formerly. But they would give no anſwer; only they ſaid, that they would live quietly, that is, keep themſelves cloſe, till a proper time ſhould encourage them to act more openly. Upon this all thoughts of this kind were laid aſide. One of the moſt conſiderable men of the party, Dr. Sherlock, upon king James's going out of Ireland, thought, that this gave the preſent government a thorough ſettlement; and in that caſe he thought it lawful to take the oaths, and therefore not only took them himſelf, but publicly juſtified what he had done; which expoſed him to very ſevere reproaches from thoſe, whom he had abandoned. The diſcovery of the biſhop of Ely's correſpondence and engagement in the name of the reſt, gave the king a fair opportunity of filling the vacant ſees, which he reſolved to lay hold of. He judged rightly, that it was of great conſequence both to his own ſervice, and the intereſts of religion, to have the ſee of Canterbury well filled, ſince the reſt would turn upon that. By the choice, which he was to make, all the nation would ſee, whether he intended to proceed with his firſt deſign of moderating matters, and healing the diviſions in religion; or whether he would go into the paſſions and humours of a high party, that ſeemed to court him as abjectly as they inwardly hated him.

Dr. Tillotſon had now been well known to him for two years; his ſoft and prudent councils, and his zeal for his ſervice, had begot both in the king and queen a high and juſt opinion of him. They had both for above a year preſſed him to come into this poſt; and he had ſtruggled againſt it with great earneſtneſs. As he had no ambition nor aſpiring in his temper, ſo he foreſaw what a ſcene of trouble and ſlander he muſt enter into now in the decline of his age. The prejudices, which the jacobites would poſſeſs all people with for his coming into the room of one, whom they called a confeſſor, and who began now to have the public compaſſion on his ſide, were well foreſeen by him. He likewiſe apprehended the continuance of that heat and averſion, which a violent party had always expreſſed towards him, though he had not only avoided to provoke any of them, but had, upon all occaſions, done the chief of them great ſervices, as often as it was in his power. He had large principles, and was free from ſuperſtition. His zeal had been chiefly againſt atheiſm and popery; but he had never ſhewn much ſharpneſs againſt the diſſenters. He had lived in a good correſpondence with many of them, and had brought ſeveral over to the church, by the force of reaſon, and the ſoftneſs of perſuaſion and good uſage, but was a declared enemy to violence and ſeverities on account of differences in religion. He laid before the king all the ill effects, which, as he thought, the promoting him would have on his ſervice; but all this ſerved only to increaſe the king's eſteem of him, and fix him in his purpoſe. Dr. Tillotſon, therefore, though with great uneaſineſs to himſelf, ſubmitted to his command. Dr. Simon Patrick, biſhop of Chicheſter, was likewiſe tranſlated to the biſhopric of Ely, in the room of biſhop Turner, and Dr. Beveridge rector of St. Peter's in Cornhill, was to be promoted to the biſhopric of Bath and Wells, in the room of biſhop Kenn; Dr. Fowler to the ſee of Glouceſter, in the room of biſhop Frampton; Dr. Cumberland to the ſee of Peterborough, in the room of biſhop White; Dr. Moor to the ſee of Norwich, in the room of biſhop Lloyd; and Dr. Grove to the ſee of Chiceſter, void by the tranſlation of biſhop Patrick; and Dr. Sherlock, maſter of the temple, to the deanery of St. Paul's; Dr. Comber to the deanery of Durham, in the room of Dr. Granville; Mr. William Talbot to the deanery of Worceſter, in the room of Dr. George Hickes; and Dr. Woodward to the deanery of Sarum. Not many weeks after their majeſties nominated Dr. John Sharp, dean of Canterbury, to the archbiſhopric of York, in the room of archbiſhop Lamplugh; Dr. Ironſide biſhop of Briſtol, to ſucceed Dr. Herbert Crofts, lately deceaſed, in the biſhopric of Hereford; Dr. John Hall to be biſhop of Briſtol; and Dr. Richard Kidder, dean of Peterborough, to be biſhop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Beveridge having declined that biſhopric[k], ſo that in two years time the king had named fifteen biſhops; and they were generally eſteemed as the moſt learned, the wiſeſt, and beſt

106. 'that the original may be read, and not the copy.' And he had good reaſon for it; for, as far as I can judge upon peruſal of both, it is the very ſame hand, in which this ſpeech was written. But what ſaid Mr. Aſhton to the jury to clear this matter? He ſaith, fol. 129, that 'his hand was not proved to any of the papers, and therefore there was nothing but ſuppoſition, or ſuſpicion againſt him.' It is true, there was no direct and plain proof of the hand, as there was in the caſe of my lord Preſton, and it is a wonder it was omitted, for that would have been plain proof of his 'knowing what was in thoſe papers.'

"However all the other circumſtances put together were a ſufficient proof of his privity to the contents of them. And I wonder how Mr. Aſhton could ſo confidently in his paper 'declare himſelf innocent as to the matter, for which he was ſentenced to die;' when he knew the paper was of his own hand-writing, and plain proof hath been ſince made of his own delivery of it to a third perſon. Can a man be innocent and guilty of the ſame thing?

"The only thing to be taken notice of, which remains, is a reflection on the government for his 'cloſe impriſonment, and the haſty and violent proceedings againſt him.' If there were any thing more than uſual in ſuch caſes, as to his impriſonment, he ought to have mentioned the particulars; for otherwiſe it is to arraign the common juſtice of the nation. As to the haſty and violent proceedings of his trial, it was then told him, that the greateſt advantage he had was in putting off his trial; for by that he knew how 'to lay the papers on my lord Preſton;' which yet could not clear him as to thoſe papers, which were not written with my lord's hand, nor related any ways to him; but one of them was written with his own hand."

[i] During the king's abſence, ſir Robert Cotton of Cambridgeſhire, and Mr. Thomas Frankland were made poſt-maſters general in the room of major Wildman, who was removed by the queen. And ſir Edward Villiers was on the 20th of March, created baron Villiers of Hoo, and viſcount Villiers of Hartford in Kent. He was maſter of the horſe to the queen.

[k] This gave great occaſion to a pamphlet, printed, May 1691, intitled, 'A vindication of their majeſties authority to fill the ſees of the deprived biſhops; in a letter out of the country, occaſioned by Dr. B————'s refuſal of the biſhopric of Bath and Wells. It was afterwards re-printed in 'the collection of ſtate tracts publiſhed on occaſion of the late revolution in 1688, and during the reign of king William III. The author of this piece begins with obſerving, that Dr. Beveridge's refuſal had occaſioned great talk, and different cenſures, as men were divided in their intereſts and opinions; and that though he could eaſily apprehend ſeveral reaſons, which might move wiſe and good men, where there were no greater and more preſſing obligations to the contrary, rather to chooſe an eccleſiaſtical preferment void by death or ceſſion, than by deprivation; yet 'our preſent circumſtances, ſays he, are ſuch, as ought to over-rule all niceties, the miſchief of ſuch a refuſal being ſo intolerable, as nothing can excuſe, much leſs juſtify it, but the abſolute men, who were in the church. And it was visible, that in all these nominations, and the filling the inferior dignities, which became void by their promotions, no ambition nor court-favour had appeared, but on the contrary men were sought for, and brought out of their retirements, and most of them very much against their own inclinations. They were remarkable for their moderate principles and calm tempers: and their promotions were such a discovery of their majesties designs with relation to the church, that it served greatly to remove the jealousies, which some other steps the king had made, were beginning to raise in the whigs, and very much softened the ill humour, which was spread among them.

On the last day of April the king, in pursuance of his resolution to command in person the confederate army in Flanders, set out from Kensington, embarked at Harwich on the 2d of May, set sail with a fair wind for Holland, attended by a squadron of men of war under rear-admiral Rooke, landed the next day near Maesland Sluice, went from thence to Hounsleardick, and arrived the same evening at the Hague; where we shall leave him for a while, to see how his orders were executed in Ireland.

After both armies had gone into winter-quarters the preceding year, they remained quiet on both sides for a time; and though several designs were formed by each party against the other, yet no considerable action happened between them[1]. The greatest mischief done to the English was by the Irish solute unlawfulness of succeeding in such preferments, while the deprived bishop lives; which would be very odd for them to pretend, who have submitted to the present government.' He then endeavours to shew, that friendship for the former incumbent is no good reason for refusing; and that such a refusal would give an unpardonable scandal both to the enemies and friends of the government, and to the government itself; and he states the doctor's case in this manner. 'He submitted to the government, and took the oath of allegiance as early as any man; and never, that I heard, had the least scruple about it; and yet this was the time to have been scrupulous, if he would have been so; for it seems a little of the latest, when he is become a sworn subject to king William and queen Mary, to question their authority to make a bishop: and if the former bishops were deprived, and new bishops made, by such an authority as he can swear allegiance to, I cannot understand, that it can be unlawful to accept a bishopric from the hands of those, whom he owns, by his swearing allegiance to them, to have authority to give it; for this is an authority, which belongs to the imperial crown of England. Besides this, Dr. B * * was one of those, who, by commission from the dean and chapter of Canterbury, hath exercised archiepiscopal authority, during the vacancy of the see by the deprivation of the archbishop, as it is expressed in the commission. And I take this to be altogether as unlawful (if either of them were unlawful) to seize upon the authority of the archbishop upon the account of his deprivation, as to take the character, and exercise the authority of a bishop in the see of a deprived bishop. To receive the consecration of a bishop, I suppose, is not the thing he accounts unlawful, nor to exercise the authority of a bishop; and, then there is nothing he can think unlawful but to exercise the authority of a bishop in the see of a deprived bishop. And it seems to me as unlawful for a presbyter to do this, as for a bishop to do it, unless a presbyter may do it without the revenues of the bishopric, but a bishop must not do it with them. But this can be no ecclesiastical scruple, as so great a canonist must needs know; for if the civil power cannot dispose of such temporal matters, it can do nothing.'

The author remarks, that in a Christian nation and government the church is incorporated into the state, and the sovereign power has a supremacy in all ecclesiastical causes; and that this supremacy, though it do not extend to the administration of holy offices or church censures, yet it reaches the persons and external jurisdiction of bishops and the other clergy, and the regulating and ordering the externals of religion; as the making and deposing bishops, when there is just cause for it, belongs to the supremacy; which authority was exercised by the Jewish kings over the high priest himself. That therefore, when a church is incorporated into the state, an offence against the state, is a just reason to depose a bishop from the exercise of his episcopal authority in such a state; especially if such a bishop wholly disowns the authority and government of the state, and refuses to submit to it. State Tracts I. 635—639.

[1] The most remarkable events, as well as the general state of Ireland, will appear from the following extracts of original letters written by Mr. John Pulteney, under secretary to the lord viscount Sidney, to sir William Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

SIR,

Whitehall, 24 February, 1690--1.

"Yesterday came in nine or ten mails, the last with letters of the 12th instant from Dublin. The news they bring is in substance that Tyrconnel arrived at Limerick about the 14th of January with three frigates and nine vessels laden with provisions, clothes, some arms and ammunition; but that notwithstanding the joy, which this supply occasioned among the Irish, the officers shew but melancholy countenances, looking upon themselves to be but in an ill condition. That since the repulse of the Irish at Fermoybridge, which they attacked the 24th of January last, and were beaten off with the loss of about twenty of their men, they had drawn together again about fourteen troops of horse and dragoons, and fifteen hundred foot, and moved towards Ballimagooly under the command of brigadier Carrol; and that thereupon major-general Tetteau having assembled about seven hundred horse and three hundred foot from Corke and the neighbouring garrisons, marched against the rebels, who would not stand an engagement, but upon the approach of our troops fled in great confusion towards Limerick. That since Tyrconnel's arrival the rebels had been likewise in motion towards Athlone, giving our troops an alarm, as if they intended to attack Mullingar, our principal garrison and magazine on that side; which occasioned the marching thither of colonel Foulke's regiment from Dublin. But the enemy stopped half way between Athlone and Mullingar at a place called Ballymore, and built there a small fort, which they will as soon quit, when our men think it worth their while to march thither. That the rapparees continue to commit great depredations in the country, and are very numerous; but that our parties often meet with them, and generally kill or take as many as they can come up with; and by the measures now taken it was to be hoped they would be soon reduced to a small number. Our parties had likewise had several rencounters with some of the enemy's formed troops with their usual success, killing divers of them, and taking some prisoners; but the particulars are not worth the mentioning here. That the [illegible] had put out two proclamations, one to prevent the robberies [illegible] of the soldiers; for which satisfaction is to be made out of [illegible] in the country, [illegible] according to [illegible] Johnston, [illegible] quires, or any [illegible] the army, and ascertaining all debts due to and from the said army, and examining all accounts of money whatsoever paid unto or disbursed by any person for the use of the army. That lieutenant-general Ginckle had likewise put out a declaration, wherein, after taking notice of the artifices made use of by the pensioners of France to delude the Irish, and to make them obstinate to their ruin, he declares, that an Irish Roman catholic gentleman, that came out of the enemy's quarters, upon humble application to their majesties, had been fully informed of the mercy and indulgence designed to such of the Irish army and inhabitants, as did submit to their government; but that he having been hitherto obstructed to make his message known, the said lieutenant-general had thought fit to take this way of making it public: that he had authority, and was ready to grant reasonable terms to them, who are willing to return to their duty, their majesties not desiring to oppress the Irish either by persecuting them for their religion, ruining them in their estates, or enslaving them in their liberties; their majesties having a greater regard to the preservation of the inhabitants of that kingdom, than to the just resentment, which their behaviour had deserved. Lastly, that the lords justices had held several consultations with lieutenant-general Ginckle, and the rest of the general officers, about the affairs of the army; and making the necessary preparations for an early campaign.'

Whitehall, 6. March, 1690-1.

'This day came in several letters by the common post, of the 3d instant, but all to private persons, and from one and the same hand, which is the mayor of Liverpool, who writes, that a master of a vessel from Dublin, put in there that day, reports, that on the 27th past there happened a very sharp engagement between our army and the rebels near Ballymore, in which we gave them an entire defeat, killing and taking prisoners between five and six thousand of them, and all their bag and bagage, with the loss of about two hundred on our side. That it was reported Sarsfield was mortally wounded; and that general Ginckle was brought to Dublin on Saturday night in a coach sorely wounded. This is the substance of the letters. There were other particulars, which I have omitted, because this account coming but after an odd manner, we must wait for a confirmation of it from a better hand.'

Whitehall, March 10. 1690-1.

'I have nothing to trouble you with this post, but to refer you to yesterday's Gazette, which you will receive from Mr. Le Pin; wherein you will find an account of a late engagement, with a defeat of the rebels in Ireland, which, though small in itself, yet will undoubtedly in its consequences prove very considerable, it being just upon the opening the campaign, and a fresh instance of their not daring to stand against an English force, though never so small. But to let you see, how little reason there is to apprehend any great danger from such an enemy, I cannot but take notice to you of a passage omitted in the Gazette, which is, that they had placed their palisadoes inwards; so that instead of hindering us from falling on them, they were a security to us from their breaking in upon our men. But I doubt not you will easily look upon this as an act of supererogation, or Irish understanding. In fine, that Sarsfield, this mighty hero, is highly dissatisfied; and that there are great factions and discontents amongst them upon the account of the French, and the great necessities and distresses they labour under, we have all the reason in the world to believe, from the frequent accounts we have from deserters and prisoners daily taken from them.'

Whitehall, March 13. 1690-1.

'This day came in letters from Dublin of the 7th instant, which say, that brigadier Stuart from his quarters near Beltarbat went out lately with a party of about seven hundred men towards James town, seventeen miles into the enemy's quarters, upon notice, that two regiments of the rebels were incamped there with fifteen hundred rapparees, and a very great prey of cattle; and that it not been for one of the protected Irish, who gave notice so early of our motion, that colonel Clifford had time enough to join two other regiments, one of horse, and another of dragoons, to their party, we had so surprized them, as in all probability had given them there a greater defeat than the other we lately did near Athlone, whereof the last Gazette gave you an account, and taken their cattle too. But the enemy, though above four times our number, flying before our men, as they came near them, little execution was done, our party killing only nine or ten of the enemy in their flight, without any loss on our side: That the lord justice Coningsby, who has been very ill of a fever, is now upon his recovery: That the Irish give no alarms, nor seem to be in a posture to do it: That a cornet and eight troopers, deserters, who came over from the rebels the day these letters bear date, report the consternation was so great at Athlone, that they shut the gates upon them, and left all to our mercy, and many of them perished: That, pursuant to the king's orders, the regiment of Derry foot commanded by colonel White, colonel Russel's regiment of horse, six troops of colonel Wooseley's regiment of horse, and four troops of the earl of Oxford's regiment, are forthwith to be broke.'

Whitehall, 20. March 1690-1.

'Our last letters from Dublin are of the 15th instant, which bring no account of any particular action in those parts, but in general, that several protestants, and men of very good sense, who made their escape lately from Limerick, do report there are great discontents in that place: that the [illegible] rapparees, who committed great cruelties and depredations, and then retreated to their bogs and faſtneſſes, where the regular forces could not reach them. Nor were the lords juſtices more ſucceſsful in their attempts to ſuppreſs them, either by offers of mercy to ſuch as ſhould ſubmit to their majeſties obedience, or by propoſing a reward for every head of a rapparee. But now the Engliſh army having taken the field about the beginning of June, the rapparees mixed themſelves with king James's forces, with whom they muſt wait the fortune of war. King William's forces being conſiderably augmented by the addition of thoſe troops, which under Mackay had compleated the reduction of the Scots Highlanders, lieutenant-general Ginckle, commanded in chief, and decamped from Mullingar, and next day came before Ballymore: the marquis de Ruvigny being ſent before with a detachment of horſe and dragoons to poſſeſs himſelf of a paſs between that place and Athlone. The batteries being raiſed, the general ſent a meſſage to colonel Burke, who commanded in the town, 'that if he and the garriſon would ſurrender within two hours, he would ſave their lives, and make them priſoners of war; if not, they were to expect no mercy.' To which the governor made an evaſive kind of anſwer, in hopes of obtaining better terms; but the cannon and bombs having made two breaches, the pontons being put into the water, and all things ready for ſtorming the place, it occaſioned ſo great a conſternation among the enemy, that the ſame evening the garriſon, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred and eighty men, beſides four field-officers, and two hundred and fifty-nine rapparees, laid down their arms, and ſubmitted at diſcretion.

The Engliſh having repaired the damage done to Ballymore, and put that town into a better condition for defence, they marched from thence on the 18th of June, and being joined the ſame day by the prince of Wirtemberg, encamped at Balymony's paſs, whilſt a ſtrong detachment of horſe advanced towards Athlone. On the 19th, very early in the morning, the vanguard marched from Balymony, and beat the enemy from ſeveral out-ditches of the Engliſh town of Athlone on this ſide the Shannon, and lodged themſelves there. The next day a battery of ten 18 pounders having ruined a baſtion near the water-ſide, looking towards Laneſborough, the general ordered an aſſault to be made; which was performed accordingly; and though the Iriſh made conſiderable reſiſtance, yet the Engliſh went on, and kept firing till they came to the breach, which a French captain of grenadiers firſt mounted, throwing his grenade, firing his piece, and ordering his men to do the ſame. His bravery ſo encouraged his party, that though he was killed in the action, yet the Iriſh were ſoon forced to quit their poſt, ſome retiring over the bridge to Connaught ſide, and the reſt leaping into the Shannon, where many were drowned.

After this ſucceſs, batteries were planted againſt the Iriſh town, which being finiſhed by the 22d, the cannon and mortars began to play very briſkly on the north-eaſt ſide of the caſtle, where it was weakeſt, and continued to do ſo the next day, when the pontons came up. The 25th was ſpent in raiſing batteries, one below, and another above the bridge, while a third was erected without the town-wall by the river-ſide, oppoſite to a baſtion, which the Iriſh had made on the other ſide the river. At the ſame time the general was contriving methods to march part of his army over the Shannon, at a ford towards Laneſborough; but that deſign being fruſtrated, he reſolved to force his way through Athlone, and therefore laboured hard to gain the bridge, wherein he found no ſmall difficulty. However, on the 27th in the evening, the Engliſh burnt the wooden breaſt-work, which the enemy had made on the other ſide of the broken arch; and the next morning had laid their beams over, and partly planked them; which a party of the beſieged endeavouring to deſtroy, they were all killed in the attempt. This did not deter another party of ten men from ſetting about the ſame work, which they reſolutely effected, throwing down the planks and beams into the river, notwithſtanding all the firing and ſkill of the Engliſh; which made the general reſolve to carry on the work by a cloſe gallery on the bridge, and to paſs the Shannon the next day; but they met with ſuch oppoſition, eſpecially by having their gallery burnt by the enemy, that the farther proſecution of the attack was deferred for that day. On the 30th a council of war being held, it was warmly debated, whether it were adviſeable to make another attempt, or to draw off. There were not wanting ſtrong reaſons for the latter; but the duke of Wirtemberg, the major-generals Mackay, Talmaſh, Ruvigny, and Tetteau, and colonel Cambon urged, 'That no brave action could be performed without hazard: that the attempt was like to be attended with ſucceſs;' and they proffered themſelves to be the firſt, who ſhould paſs the river, and attack the enemy. Their opinion having prevailed, the detachment drawn out the day before was ordered ſtill to be in readineſs, and the general gave command that they ſhould be brought down by ſix, the uſual hour of relieving the guards, that the enemy might not ſuſpect the deſign; which indeed they did not. All things being ready, the conjuncture favourable, and the ſignal given, captain Sandys and two lieutenants led the firſt party of ſixty grenadiers, all in armour, and twenty abreaſt, ſeconded by another ſtrong detachment of grenadiers, (which were to be ſupported by ſix battallions of foot) and with an unparallelled reſolution took the ford, that was a little to the left of the bridge, againſt a baſtion of the enemies, the ſtream being very rapid, and the paſſage very difficult by reaſon of ſome great ſtones, that were in the river. At the ſame time the Engliſh great and ſmall ſhot began to play from their batteries and works upon thoſe of the enemy on the other ſide, who fired as thick as poſſibly they could upon thoſe who paſſed the river. But at length theſe, by an incredible effort of bravery, forced their way through the enemy's bullets, fire and ſmoke, and having gained the oppoſite bank, the reſt laid planks over the broken part of the bridge, while the others were preparing the pontons. By this means the Engliſh paſſed over ſo faſt, that in leſs than half an hour they were maſters of the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the works, that remained entire towards the enemy's camp; the Iriſh being ſo amazed at the ſuddenneſs of the attack, and reſolution of the Engliſh, that they quickly abandoned the place, and fled to the army, though not without conſiderable loſs. The beſiegers had not above fifty men killed in this memorable action, which Mackay and Tetteau, and la Mellioniere conducted with great vigour, and to the good ſucceſs whereof Talmaſh, who went with the grenadiers as volunteer, the duke of Wirtemberg, count Naſſau, and brigadier Bellaſis, greatly contributed by their courage and preſence of mind. It would be difficult to ſhew in hiſtory ſo brave an enterprize, in which a fortified town was attacked acroſs a river by only three three thouſand men, in the face of the enemy's army, that were maſters of all the fords by the intrenchments, which they had caſt before them. And therefore it was but juſt, that general Ginckle ſhould entail on his family the honour of this atchievement by the title, which was afterwards beſtowed on him, of earl of Athlone.

ſum of money, that the lord Tyrconnel brought over with him from France, is applied to no other uſe than the works, and given to deſerters from us; of which ſort there are not any horſe or Engliſh, but of the Daniſh foot above two hundred are lately gone over thither, though they refuſe to take ſervice with the Iriſh, and are therefore to be tranſported to their own country: That the garriſon of Limerick has already begun to open the magazines of the laſt ſeaſon, the old being all ſpent: That they have no expectation of men from France, nor are they making any preparations for taking the field: That Sarsfield and Tyconnel do by no means agree together, the latter having ſent ſeveral times for Sarsfield to Limerick before he would go: That three Daniſh deſerters going towards the enemy were met by four deſerters coming from them; and the three being taken priſoners, and brought back to their quarters, were immediately executed: And, laſtly; that one Daily, a judge in the late king James's time, and others, have been ſecured upon ſuſpicion of deſigning to betray Galway into the Engliſh hands.

Whitehall, 27. March, 1691.

'We have had letters this morning of the 23d from Dublin, which ſay, that upon examination of the murder of colonel Foulke's men, though they had light enough to be verily perſuaded, that all the protected papiſts, who live near the place, where it was committed, were privy to the fact, or at leaſt well pleaſed with it, and that the whole kingdom over they are ready to do the like at the inſtigation of their prieſts that inſenſibly endeavour to weaken us; yet they had been only able to fix this murder upon one man, who was hanged, and at his execution owned, that he had buried them, but would not diſcover any of his accomplices; and on the 22d at night the lords juſtices were informed, that a conſiderable number of Iriſh deſigned to meet within two miles of Dublin, in order to ſome daring reſolution for the reſcue of their friends, who to the number of above eighty were priſoners there on that account; upon which a ſtrong party was ſent out to look after them, but they came back the next morning, without meeting any ſuch number of papiſts, as was mentioned in the information. The carriage of the protected papiſts, who on all occaſions ſhew their implacable hatred to the Engliſh, and contribute all they can to their diſturbance, will at laſt force the government to have recourſe to greater ſeverities than have yet been made uſe of. Theſe letters ſay likewiſe, that the French were ſending over ſome forces to make an attempt upon Cork and Kinſale; but it deſerves no credit, though this, I think, is taken for granted, that the French deſign thither another convoy of proviſions.'

Whitehall, April 3. 1691.

'While I am writing this, in come two packets from Dublin with letters of the 28th and 30th paſt, but without one word of news, except only the daily advantages the militia of that kingdom have over the rapparees, and the progreſs that has been made into the diſcovery of the perſons concerned in the murder of colonel Foulkes's ſoldiers, which is little more than what the Gazette has already given you an account of.'

This

St. Ruth, who commanded the French auxiliaries and the Iriſh army, did not, upon this occaſion, act ſuitable to the reputation, which he had formerly acquired. The Engliſh were no ſooner entered the river, but an expreſs was ſent to him from the town, to which he only made this anſwer, 'That it was impoſſible for the Engliſh to pretend to take a town, and he near with an army to ſuccour it; adding, That he would give a thouſand piſtoles they durſt attempt it.' Sarsfield replied, 'That he knew the enterprize was not too difficult for Engliſh courage to attempt; and therefore preſſed St. Ruth to ſend ſpeedy ſuccours to the town; which that general refuſing to do, and ſtill turning the undertaking to a jeſt, ſome warm expreſſions paſſed between him and Sarsfield, which bred a jealouſy amongſt them, that proved of fatal conſequence not long after. St. Ruth being ſoon convinced, that the Engliſh were in actual poſſeſſion of the place, ordered ſeveral detachments to drive them out again; but then he was ſenſible of a former overſight, in not leveling thoſe fortifications of Athlone, that were next his camp; for now the Engliſh uſed the enemies works againſt themſelves, ſo that they thought it adviſeable to decamp that very night.

General Ginckle having continued at Athlone till he had put it into a poſture of defence, marched on with his army and encamped along the river Suck upon Roſcommon ſide, which was a very good paſs, and which if the Iriſh had ſecured, they would have given the Engliſh a great deal of trouble. But they poſſeſſed themſelves of a far more advantageous poſt, for they lay on the other ſide of Aghrim caſtle, three miles beyond Ballinaſloe, and were extended from the church of Kilcommodon, on their right, to a church called Gourtnapori, about two miles in length. On their left run a rivulet, having ſteep hills and little bogs on each ſide; next to which was a large red bog almoſt a mile over, in the end of which ſtood the caſtle of Aghrim, commanding the way that led to their camp, paſſable for horſe no where but juſt at the caſtle, by reaſon of a ſmall river, which running through a moiſt ground made the whole a moraſs. This moraſs extended itſelf along to the right, where there was another paſs at Urachree, having a riſing ground on either ſide of it; and the Iriſh camp lay along the ridge of an hill, on the ſide of which ſtood two Daniſh forts about half a mile diſtance from the bog below, and this cut into many ſmall incloſures, which the Iriſh lined very thick with muſketeers, and managed a communication between them.—General Ginckle having viewed the enemy's camp, found it very difficult of acceſs; but conſidering that he was now advanced ſo far that he muſt either fight his way through, or retreat with loſs and diſgrace, ordered the army to march the next day towards the enemy. St. Ruth ſuppoſing by the countenance of the Engliſh, that they were reſolved to attack him, made a ſolemn ſpeech to the Iriſh, in which he told them, "How ſucceſsful he had been in ſuppreſſing hereſy in France, and bringing over a vaſt number of deluded ſouls into the boſom of the mother-church. That for this reaſon his maſter had made choice of him before others, to eſtabliſh the church in Ireland on ſuch a foundation, that it ſhould not henceforward be in the power of hell or heretics to diſturb it; and that all good Roman-catholics depended on their courage to ſee theſe glorious things effected. He confeſſed, that matters did not entirely anſwer his expectation ſince he came among them; but that ſtill all might be recovered. That he was informed, the prince of Orange's heretical army was reſolved to give them battle. That now or never was the time for them to recover their loſt honours, privileges, and eſtates of their anceſtors. That they ought now to remember, they were no mercenary ſoldiers; their all being at ſtake, and their deſign to reſtore a pious king to his throne, to propagate the holy faith, and extirpate hereſy. And laſtly, to animate their courage, he aſſured them of king James's love and gratitude, of Lewis the Great's protection, of himſelf to lead them on, of the church to pray for them, and of ſaints and angels to carry their ſouls into heaven." He cloſed his ſpeech with a ſtrict order, "to give quarter to none, eſpecially not to ſpare any of the French heretics in the prince of Orange's army."[m]

He took likewiſe the moſt effectual way poſſible to infuſe courage into the Iriſh, by ſending their prieſts about among them, to animate them by all the methods they could think of; and, as the moſt powerful of all, they made them ſwear on the ſacrament, that they would never forſake their colours.

On Sunday the 12th of July, the Engliſh army early in the morning prepared to advance towards the enemy; but the weather proving foggy, they moved not till about twelve o'clock, which was then done in as good order as the ground would permit. The general at the ſame time having viewed the poſture of the Iriſh, and ſeeing the neceſſity of making himſelf maſter of the paſs of Urachree, ſent a Daniſh captain with ſome horſe to force it; but they not ſucceeding, he ordered two hundred of Cunningham's dragoons to march to certain ditches nigh the ford, to keep the enemy from coming over, and in the mean time the Engliſh army marched forward. By this time it was two of the clock, and the general finding it neceſſary to gain that ford, and the other ways, that led to the right of the Iriſh camp, as the moſt proper means of attacking them, commanded Cunningham's dragoons at the ditch to advance towards a party of the enemy poſted on the other ſide; who upon their approach, with another party that ſuſtained them, all retired behind a hill nearer the camp, where was poſted a greater body. All theſe parties being ſtill reinforced by others, obliged the Engliſh dragoons to retreat; whereupon general Ginckle ordered Eppinger's dragoons to get between thoſe bodies and the enemy's camp. This motion was preſently diſcovered by the enemy, who had the advantage in pouring in ſo many men upon the Engliſh, that they would ſtill have been too hard for the dragoons, had they not been ſeconded by the earl of Portland's horſe, who behaved themſelves here with great bravery.

What was at firſt only a ſkirmiſh, had by this time engaged a conſiderable body on both ſides; yet the enemy retiring in ſome time brought the generals together to deliberate, whether it were not beſt to defer the battle till next morning; which was agreed on ſo far, that their tents were ordered to be ſent for. But when they perceived the enemy to be in ſome diſorder by what had already happened, it was reſolved not to delay the attack, leſt the enemy ſhould march off in the night, and ſo afford no more opportunities for a deciſive action: wherefore by the advice of Mackay, it was agreed to begin the fight on the enemy's right, thereby propoſing to draw part of their ſtrength from Aghrim caſtle, near to which their main body was poſted, that ſo the right wing of the Engliſh might have the eaſier paſſage over to attack their left; and then the whole Engliſh army might have the opportunity to engage, which was otherwiſe impoſſible. This advice had its deſired ſucceſs. About half an hour after four in the afternoon, a party of the Engliſh left wing moved towards the enemy, and by five the battle began. The ditches were ſtrongly guarded by Iriſh muſketeers, and their horſe advantageouſly poſted to ſuſtain them. And here the Iriſh behaved themſelves with undaunted courage, defending their poſts with unparallelled obſtinacy; nor would they ſtir from one ſide, till the Engliſh put their pieces over at the other; and then having lines of communication from one ditch to another, they would preſently poſt themſelves, and flank the Engliſh, which occaſioned great firing on both ſides, and continued on the left almoſt an hour and a half, before the centre and the right wing of the army began to engage.

In the mean time the Engliſh main army advanced, and Mackay and the reſt obſerving ſeveral bodies of the enemy's horſe and foot draw off from the left, and move towards their right, where the Engliſh preſſed them very hard, they laid hold of that advantage, and ordered the foot to march over the bog, which fronted the enemy's main battle. The regiments of Earle, Herbert, Creighton, and Brewer, going over the narroweſt place, where the hedges on the enemy's ſide ran fartheſt into the bog, they had orders to march to the loweſt of the ditches adjoining to the ſide of the bog, and there to poſt themſelves, till the horſe could come about by Aghrim caſtle, and ſuſtain them, and till the other foot had marched over the other bog below, where it was broader, and ſupported by Foulke's and Stewart's regiments. According to theſe orders, Earle's and the other three regiments advanced over the bog, moſt of them paſſing up to the middle in mud and water; and upon their near approach to the ditches, received the enemy's fire. But that did not hinder them from marching to the loweſt hedge, and to drive the Iriſh from thence, and ſoon from hedge to hedge, till they were got very near their main body.

On the other hand, the Iriſh had ſo well ordered the matter, that they had made an eaſy paſſage for their horſe among all thoſe hedges and ditches, by which means they poured in great numbers, both of horſe and foot, upon the Engliſh; which colonel Earle obſerving, animated his men, by telling them, that now their ſafety lay wholly in their courage.—However, being now both flanked and fronted, and expoſed beſides to all the enemy's fire from the adjacent hedges, the Engliſh were forced to quit their ground, and retreat to the bog again with conſiderable loſs; and among others the colonels Earle and Herbert were taken priſoners; Earle, after being twice taken and retaken, got free at laſt; but Herbert was barbarouſly murdered, after quarter given by the Iriſh, when they ſaw he was likely to be reſcued.

in

While theſe things paſſed on this ſide, colonel St. John's, colonel Tiffin's, the lord George Hamilton's, the French proteſtants in the Engliſh ſervice, and ſeveral other regiments, were marching over below the bog, while the Iriſh lay ſo cloſe in their ditches, that ſeveral were doubtful, whether they had any men at that place or no. But no ſooner were the French refugees and the reſt got within twenty yards of the ditches, but the enemy fired moſt furiouſly upon them, which the other ſuſtained with intrepidity, ſtill preſſing forwards, though they could ſcarce ſee one another for ſmoke, which the wind blew towards them. The battle ſeemed doubtful for ſome time, but now there was reaſon to believe, that victory was leaning on the ſide of the Iriſh; for they had driven the foot in the centre ſo far back, that they were almoſt got into a line with the great guns, planted near the bog, of which the Engliſh had no benefit in that conjuncture, becauſe the Iriſh were intermixed with their own men.

While the infantry was thus engaged, Ruvigny's regiment of French horſe, which had formerly been the duke of Schomberg's, and ſir John Lanier's, being poſted on the right, Lanier's was afterwards drawn to the left, where they did very great ſervice; and the right wing of the Engliſh horſe were in the mean time making the beſt of their way to ſuccour the foot, being ſenſible of their extreme danger, and that all lay at ſtake. The cavalry, beſides the ſhowers of bullets from a body of the enemy's dragoons and foot, that were conveniently poſted under a covert place, was likewiſe obliged to preſs and tumble over a very dangerous paſs; but having bravely ſurmounted all theſe difficulties, they lodged themſelves at laſt in a dry ditch, in the hotteſt of the enemy's fire from Aghrim caſtle, and ſome old walls and hedges adjoining.

The Engliſh foot all this while laboured under very great diſadvantage in the centre; which Talmaſh obſerving haſtened to their relief with ſome freſh men, and gave orders to the broken regiments to halt and face about; which they immediately obeyed, and bravely charged the Iriſh, who had advanced upon them to the centre of the bog, killed above three hundred of them, before they could retreat out of it, and then marched boldly up to their old ground again, from whence they had been ſo lately beaten. At the ſame time Mackay had fallen upon the enemy with a good body of horſe on their left; and among the reſt a French regiment of horſe had forced a regiment of Iriſh Dragoons from an advantageous poſt, and put to flight Tyrconnel's horſe. Whereupon Ruvigny, at the head of the earl of Oxford's regiment of horſe, ſupported by his own, went along the ſide of the bog, and bore down all before him. And now the horſe and foot of the Engliſh right and the Iriſh left being mixed, there was nothing but a continued fire, and a very hot diſpute all along the line, the Iriſh with great reſolution endeavouring to maintain their ditches, and the Engliſh with no leſs bravery to beat them from thence. However, the fight was not much longer doubtful; for though St. Ruth, when he ſaw the Engliſh foot in the centre repulſed, in a bravado told thoſe about him, that he would now beat the Engliſh army to the gates of Dublin; yet ſeeing, with great ſurprize, the regiments of Oxford, Ruvigny, Langſton, and Bierly, together with Leviſon's dragoons, preſſing over towards the caſtle, he ordered a brigade of his own horſe from the right wing to march up to the left; then riding to one of his batteries, and giving orders to the gunners where to fire, and afterwards leading on ſome horſe towards the place, where he ſaw the Engliſh endeavour to go over, he was killed by a cannon-ball, as he rode down the hill of Kilcommodon, the place where the main ſtreſs of the battle was fought, being juſt under the Engliſh camp. His fall put his troops to a ſtand, and his guards drawing off with his corps, many of the reſt drew off alſo; Sarsfield, who ſhould have commanded them, (and who ſince the affair of Athlone, was upon the reſerve with St. Ruth) not knowing the order of battle. The Engliſh obſerving their diſorder, preſſed boldly on, and in a ſhort time drove the enemy to the top of Kilcommodon hill, where their camp had lain; whereupon they began to commit their ſafety to flight, the foot running full ſpeed towards a great bog behind them on their left, and the horſe on the high way towards Loughreagh.

While this was doing in the right wing and centre, thoſe who firſt engaged towards the left, bravely maintained their ground; and though the Iriſh once or twice made themſelves maſters of the chevaux de friſe, that covered the French foot, yet the French abſolutely regained them. However, little happened on that ſide for near two hours; neither did the Daniſh horſe and foot, that were on the left of all, diſturb the enemy as yet, but kept in awe ſeveral bodies of horſe and foot, that faced them on the other ſide of the rivulet. But then perceiving Mackay's battalions in the centre to drive the enemy before them, leſt thoſe bodies that faced them, ſhould fall back to the relief of the flying party, they engaged them very briſkly, and were at firſt received with great reſolution; but the Iriſh being upon the decline, they all fled out of the field, their foot being miſerably ſlaughtered by the Engliſh horſe and dragoons, and their horſe purſued nigh three miles. The night coming on with a thick miſty rain, prevented the Engliſh from getting between them and a very advantageous paſs near Loughreagh, which gave many of them an opportunity to eſcape. However it was computed, that there was no leſs than ſeven thouſand of the Iriſh ſlain upon the ſpot, and of the Engliſh ſix hundred killed, and nine hundred and ſixty wounded, which ſtill makes this victory the more conſiderable, ſince the Engliſh army did not make up above eighteen thouſand effective men; whereas the Iriſh were compoſed of twenty thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe and dragoons. As for the honour of this great day, general Ginckle himſelf confeſſed, that it was principally owing to the conduct and bravery of monſieur Ruvigny, and to the Oxford and the French regiments of horſe.

The Engliſh lay upon their arms all night, and then after a few days refreſhment, the general marched to Galloway, the moſt conſiderable place now left in the hands of the Iriſh next to Limerick; and having poſted his forces before it, he ſent a ſummons to the garriſon. The lord Dillon, the governor, made anſwer, that monſieur D'Uſſon, who commanded in chief, as well as himſelf, and the reſt of the officers, were reſolved to defend the place to the laſt. But notwithſtanding this reſolution, the Engliſh had no ſooner marched part of the army over the river, and taken the fort, which the Iriſh were building, but the enemy beat a parley, and hoſtages were immediately exchanged. The Iriſh demurring upon the manner of ſurrendry, the general grew impatient, and ſent once or twice to them to come to a ſpeedy concluſion. At laſt lieutenant colonel Bourke, one of the Iriſh hoſtages, was permitted to go in, to whom Talmaſh, being, as was believed, inclined to lay the treaty aſide, and take the town by ſtorm, ſaid, "When they were ready to begin again, give us a ſign by firing a gun into the air." But the other replied, "That they would not fire a gun from within, till they were provoked from without." After ſome time the articles were agreed on, and the town delivered into the hands of the Engliſh. The conſequence of which was the ſubmiſſion of Balderick O'Donnel, with a conſiderable number of men under his command; and not long after the marching of the Engliſh army towards Limerick, which was the only place, that ſtood out, and where Tyrconnel died on the 14th of Auguſt. He had, with a particular view, ſtudied to divert the French from ſending over ſoldiers to Ireland, deſigning, in caſe of new misfortunes, to treat with king William, and to preſerve himſelf and his friends; and now he began to diſpoſe the Iriſh to think of treating, ſince they ſaw, that otherwiſe their ruin was inevitable. But as ſoon as this was ſuſpected, all the military men, who reſolved to give themſelves entirely up to the French intereſt, combined againſt him, and blaſted him as a feeble and falſe man, who was not to be truſted. This was carried ſo far, that, to avoid affronts, he was adviſed to leave the army. He ſtaid therefore all this ſummer at Limerick, where he died of grief, as was believed; but before he died, he adviſed all that came to him, not to let things go to extremities, but to accept of ſuch terms as could be got. And his words ſeemed to weigh more after his death, than in his life-time; for the Iriſh began generally to ſay, that they muſt take care of themſelves, and not be made ſacrifices to ſerve the ends of the French.

On the 25th of Auguſt the Engliſh army reached Limerick rick, and the ſame day made themſelves maſters of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts, which were now ordered to be called Mackay's and Naſſau's, becauſe gained under thoſe commanders. Two days after Caſtle Connell and Caſtle-Carrick-a-Gunnell ſtanding upon the Shannon three miles below the town, were attacked, and the garriſon of both made priſoners of war. And at the ſame time ſome Engliſh ſhips coming up the river fired ſome ſhot among the Iriſh horſe, that were incamped near the banks; which very much ſurpriſed the enemy, who till then were made to believe, that either the Engliſh had no ſhips there, or elſe thoſe, which they had, would quickly be deſtroyed by the French fleet, which they hourly expected. But though the ſiege was vigorouſly carried on, and that in the mean time the Iriſh abandoned ſeveral ſmall places in the country, and brigadier Leviſon routed many of their parties in the county of Kerry; though the bombs did very great execution upon their camp and within the town, yet on the 17th of September it was warmly debated in a council of war, whether they ſhould proſecute the ſiege, or march over the river, to deſtroy all the enemy's forage in the county of Clare, and then turn the ſiege into a blockade. And it was ſo far carried for the latter, that an engineer was ordered to go with a detachment towards Kilmulock, and fortify that place. But before he got out of the camp, he was countermanded, and a great many paliſadoes were brought into Mackay's fort, as if the army intended to winter there. On the 19th it was reſolved to paſs the river with a great party, either to preſs the ſiege on that ſide, or at leaſt to burn the enemy's forage. The ſame day a battery was raiſed between Ireton's fort and the old church, to flank the Iriſh, in caſe of a ſally from St. John's gate; four mortars were brought from the great battery to Mackay's fort; that place being judged the fitteſt for bombarding, ſince the whole town lay in a line from thence; and orders were given, in caſe of an alarm from the Iriſh troops without, that every regiment ſhould ſtand to their poſts aſſigned them for that purpoſe. On the 22d General Ginckle, who was indefatigable in his buſineſs, paſſed the Shannon over a bridge of boats, with ſtrong detachments of horſe and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon, leaving Wirtemberg, Mackay, and Talmaſh to command on this ſide; and all that morning the enemy continually fired upon them from ſeveral batteries, but without any great harm. In the afternoon a party of Colonel Matthews's dragoons was vigorouſly attacked by a ſtronger detachment of the enemy, till the Engliſh foot coming up, the Iriſh retreated under their cannon. Then all the Engliſh grenadiers, ſuſtained by four regiments of foot, were commanded to aſſault the works, that covered Thomond bridge, being one fort to the right, above a muſket ſhot from the bridge, and another to the left ſomewhat nearer, beſides ſeveral other fortifications, wherein the enemy had poſted above two hundred men. The diſpute was hot and obſtinate for a while, and the attack extremely hazardous, the beſieged plying the aſſailants with their cannon from the King's caſtle, and two or three more batteries, with ſome ſmall ſhot from the wall. However, the Iriſh being undauntedly preſſed upon by the grenadiers, they abandoned their poſts. Upon which a ſtrong detachment was ſent from the town to ſupport them; but the Engliſh went on with that courage and firmneſs, that they beat the enemy notwithſtanding this reinforcement, and purſued them over the bridge to the town. A French major, who commanded at Thomond gate, fearing the Engliſh would enter the town with the runaways, ordered the bridge to be drawn up, and left the whole party expoſed to the fury of their purſuers, who killed ſix hundred of them, and made above one hundred and ſixty priſoners, beſides a great number that were puſhed into the Shannon [n].

Upon this the Engliſh lodged themſelves within ten yards of the bridge, notwithſtanding a high tower, that ſtood near the end of the bridge next to them; and the Iriſh finding now all communication cut off between them and their horſe, and deſpairing of the French ſuccours, began to think of giving up the town. For ſoon after the action colonel Wachop looking out of a tower, called to Scravenmore, and deſired leave to come and ſpeak with him, which was readily granted. After ſome diſcourſe, he deſired the ſame liberty for Sarsfield to ſpeak with Ruvigny; which was likewiſe allowed him, and accordingly both diſcourſed about terms for the ſurrender of the place, and towards evening they returned into the town. The next day Sarsfield and Wachop came out again, and deſired a ceſſation of arms for three days, till they could ſend to lieutenant-general Sheldon, who lay with about fifteen hundred horſe at Six-mile-bridge, in order that they might be included in the general capitulation, which was granted them; and the priſoners in the town were releaſed. On the 26th Sarsfield and Wachop dined with the general; and it being then agreed, that hoſtages ſhould be exchanged in order to a farther treaty, the lord Cutts, ſir David Collier, colonel Tiffin, and colonel Piper were ſent into the town, in the room of the lords Weſtmeath, Evagh, Timelſtown, and Lowth, who remained in the Engliſh camp. The next day the Iriſh ſent out their propoſals, but in ſuch extravagant terms, that general Ginckle was ſo far from granting them, that he returned anſwer, 'That though he was a ſtranger to the laws of England, yet he underſtood that what they inſiſted upon was ſo far contradictory to them, that he could not grant any ſuch thing,' and ſo ordered a new battery to be raiſed; but upon the requeſt of the Iriſh he ſent them twelve articles, which proved to be the ſum of the capitulation. The Iriſh, it ſeems, were ſet on by the French to inſiſt on very high demands, in hopes they would be rejected. But the king had given Ginckle ſecret directions, that he ſhould grant all the demands they could make, that would put an end to that war. This was the reaſon that the articles he ſent them were ſo favourable, that a capitulation was ſoon agreed upon to the great diſappointment of the French, and the no ſmall grief of ſome Engliſh, who hoped this war ſhould have ended in the total ruin of the Iriſh intereſt,

On the 1ſt of October the lords juſtices of Ireland arrived in the Engliſh camp; and after ſome farther conferences with the commiſſioners on the part of the garriſon, and their troops in the county of Clare, the articles for the ſurrender of the city of Limerick, and the caſtles of Roſs and Clare, with all other places and caſtles, that were ſtill in the hands of the Iriſh, were on the 3d of that month finally concluded. The Iriſh were all indemnified and reſtored to all they had enjoyed in king Charles's time. They were alſo admitted to all the privileges of ſubjects, upon their taking the oaths of allegiance, without being bound to take the oath of ſupremacy. Not only the French, but as many of the Iriſh as had a mind to go over to France, had free liberty and a ſafe tranſportation. But Ginckle receiving a letter from a lieutenant colonel in the Iriſh army, wherein he complained, that he was confined for refuſing to go into France, he reſented that violence to that degree, that he immediately ordered four guns to be planted upon Bolls-bridge, ſaying in ſome heat, 'That he would teach the Iriſh to play tricks with him.' Upon this Sarsfield came to the Engliſh camp, and ſome ſharp expreſſions paſſed between him and the general, Sarsfield ſaying at laſt, 'that he was in the general's power.' 'Not ſo, (replied Ginckle) but you ſhall go in again, and do the worſt you can.' However the affair was at laſt compoſed, and the priſoners inlarged; and as many of the Iriſh as were willing to go, were ſhipped off for France, to the number of about twelve thouſand, where, upon their arrival, they were welcomed by a letter from king James, directed to general Sheldon, then the officer in chief with them, the ſubſtance of which was; 'That having been informed of the neceſſities, which forced the lords juſtices, and the general officers of his forces, to ſurrender Limerick, and the other places, that remained to him in the kingdom of Ireland, he would not defer to let him know, and the reſt of the officers, that came along with him, that he was extremely ſatisfied with his and their conduct, and of the valour of his ſoldiers, but moſt particularly of his and their declaration and reſolution to come and ſerve where he was; aſſuring both him and the other officers and ſoldiers, that he ſhould never forget this act of loyalty, nor fail, when in a capacity, to give them, above others, particular marks of his favour. In the mean time he charged Sheldon to inform them, that they were to ſerve under his majeſty's command, and by his commiſſions; and that his brother, the king of France, had already given orders to cloath them, and furniſh them with all neceſſaries, and to give them quarters of refreſhment.'

[n] Among the priſoners was colonel James Skelton, (who died of his wounds,) in whoſe pockets was found a paper with a ſpear's head or wound drawn upon it, and theſe words round it. 'This is the meaſure of the wounds of the ſide of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, which was brought from Conſtantinople to the emperor Charmaine in a coffin of goulde, and is a moſt precious reliqie, to the end that he or ſhe that carried the ſame about him, no fire or water, no wind, tempeſt, knaife, launce or ſword, nor the divil cannot hurt him; and the woman with child the day ſhe ſeeth the ſame meaſure, ſhall not die a ſudden death, but ſhall be delivered by———and if any man carie the ſame about him with good devotion, ſhall have the honor and victory of his enemy, the day that any doth read the ſame, or hear it read, ſhall not die an evil death. Amen.' This was ſuppoſed to be the hand-writing of ſome ignorant Iriſh prieſt, and kept poſſibly by the colonel out of devotion. Story's Continuation of the wars in Ireland, p. 225.

Thus

Thus ended the Iriſh war by the ſurrender of Limerick, to the great reputation of general Ginckle, and with ſo much the more glory to the Engliſh, as the Iriſh were ſo powerfully ſupported by the king of France. And it is worth obſervation, that a fleet of men of war and ſtore-ſhips, which the French king had ſent to the relief of Limerick, arrived in Dingle bay but a day or two after the articles were ſigned. Theſe articles were punctually executed; and ſome doubts, that aroſe out of ſome ambiguous words, were explained in favour of the Iriſh; ſo earneſtly deſirous was the king to have all matters compoſed at home, that he might direct his whole force againſt the enemy abroad.

The Engliſh in Ireland, though none could ſuffer more by the continuance of the war than they did, yet were uneaſy, when they ſaw that the Iriſh had obtained ſuch good conditions; and ſome of the more violent among them, who were exaſperated with the wrongs, which had been done them, began to call in queſtion the legality of ſome of the articles. But the parliament of England did not think fit to enter upon that diſcuſſion; nor made they any motion towards violating the capitulation.

General Ginckle came over to England full of honour after ſo glorious a campaign. The parliament was ſo ſenſible of what he had done for the intereſt of the nation, that the houſe of commons ordered lord Caſtleton, ſir Henry Goodrick, and five other members, to thank him and his officers for their great ſervices in the reduction of Ireland. To which the baron replied, 'I acknowledge this diſtinguiſhing honour done me by the houſe of commons, and value it above a triumph. The ſucceſs of their majeſties arms in Ireland, was owing chiefly to the valour of the Engliſh; and I will take care to communicate the vote of the houſe to the officers that ſerved in Ireland, and always endeavour the proſperity of their majeſties and their government.' He was ſoon after made earl of Athlone and baron of Aghrim, and to ſupport his honours had a grant of lands in Ireland, of twenty-ſix thouſand four hundred and eighty acres, which was confirmed by the Iriſh parliament, but which however we ſhall ſee hereafter put into the report of the commiſſioners for the Iriſh forfeitures.

The city of London invited the new earl, with the duke of Wirtemberg, the generals Scravenmore, Lanier, Talmaſh, and Ruvigny, with moſt of the officers then in town, to dine with the lord mayor ſir Thomas Stamp, and entertained them with equal reſpect and magnificence. After all, it muſt be owned, that without detracting from Ginckle, a large ſhare of all that was done, was due to ſome of the general officers, particularly to Ruvigny (who was afterwards made earl of Galway) to Mackay and Talmaſh.

With regard to the affairs of Scotland, they were now brought to ſome temper. Many of the lords, who had been concerned in the late war, came up, and confeſſed and diſcovered all, and took out their pardons. They endeavoured to excuſe themſelves, by alledging, that they had apprehended themſelves to be expoſed to ruin; and that they dreaded the tyranny of preſbytery no leſs than they did popery; and they promiſed, that if the king would ſo balance matters, that the lord Melvil, and his party, ſhould not have it in their power to ruin them and their friends, and in particular, that they ſhould not turn out the miniſters of the epiſcopal perſuaſion, who were yet in office, nor force preſbyterians on them, they would engage in the king's intereſts faithfully and with zeal.

They likewiſe undertook to quiet the Highlanders, who ſtood out ſtill, and were robbing the country in parties; and engaged to the king, that if the epiſcopal clergy could be aſſured of his protection, they would all acknowledge and ſerve him. They did not deſire, that the king ſhould make any ſtep towards the changing of the government, that was ſettled in Scotland; but only requeſted, that epiſcopal miniſters might continue to ſerve in thoſe places, which liked them beſt; and that no man ſhould be brought into trouble for his opinion, as to the government of the church; and that ſuch epiſcopal men, as were willing to mix with the preſbyterians in their judicatories, ſhould be admitted, without any ſevere impoſition in point of opinion. This looked ſo fair, and agreed ſo well with the king's own ſenſe of things, that he very eaſily hearkened to it; though it afterwards appeared, that all this was an artifice of the jacobites to engage the king to diſguſt the preſbyterians, by loſing whom, or at leaſt rendering them remiſs in his ſervice, they reckoned they ſhould ſoon be maſters of that kingdom.

For that party reſolved now to come in generally to take the oaths; but in order to that, they ſent one to king James, to ſhew the neceſſity of it, and the ſervice, which they intended by it, and therefore aſked his leave to take them. That king's anſwer was more honeſt; he ſaid, that he could not conſent to that, which he thought unlawful; but if any of them took the oaths on deſign to ſerve him, and continued to advance his intereſts, it ſhould never be remembered againſt them.

The younger Dalrymple was now made ſecretary of ſtate in conjunction with the lord Melvill; and he undertook to bring in moſt of the jacobites into the king's ſervice; but they entered at the ſame time into a cloſe correſpondence with St. Germains. The truth was, that the preſbyterians, by their violence, and other abſurd practices, were rendering themſelves both odious and contemptible. They had formed a general aſſembly in the end of the former year, in which they very much expoſed themſelves by the weakneſs and peeviſhneſs of their conduct. Little learning or prudence appeared among them; poor preaching, and wretched haranguing, partialities to one another, and violence and injuſtice to thoſe, who differed from them, appeared in all their meetings. And theſe ſo much ſunk their reputation, that they were weaning the nation moſt effectually from all fondneſs to their government. But the falſhood of many, who, under a pretence of moderating matters, were really undermining the king's government, helped in the ſequel to preſerve the preſbyterians, as much as their own conduct did now alienate the king from them.

The events at ſea were not very conſiderable. For the fleets being now of almoſt equal ſtrength on both ſides, the French as cautiouſly avoiding a general engagement, as they eagerly ſought it the year before. Their deſign was to intercept the Engliſh Turkey fleet, which was exceedingly rich; for which purpoſe they hovered a long time about the Iriſh coaſt; and had ſailed from before Kinſale, but a few days, when the Smyrna fleet came all ſafe into that harbour, under a convoy of fourteen men of war, commanded by captain Aylmer, having been held back ſeven weeks by contrary winds in their paſſage from Cadiz. The Engliſh grand fleet all this while kept another courſe, for want of intelligence. But as ſoon as admiral Ruſſel was informed, that the Smyrna fleet was got into Kinſale, he ſteered thither from Cape Clear, and afterwards took all imaginable care, that they might be ſafely convoyed into their reſpective ports; and then ſtood over to Uſhant in queſt of the enemy, whom he underſtood to be returned that way to their own coaſts. The French had orders to avoid an engagement. And though for the ſpace of two months Ruſſel did all he could to come up with them, yet they ſtill kept at a diſtance, and ſailed off in the night.

The ſeaſon being over for action, Ruſſel came into Plymouth in a ſtorm, which was much cenſured, for that road is not ſafe, and the Coronation a ſecond rate, and the Warwick a third rate, were loſt upon the occaſion. Great factions were among the flag-officers, and no other ſervice was done by this great equipment, but that our trade was maintained.

Let us now return to the king, whom we left at the Hague. His majeſty being gone to Loo, diſpatched into Flanders count Solmes, and the earl of Marlborough, to prepare all things againſt his arrival there. Some few days after, the king put himſelf at the head of the confederate army, whither he was followed by the duke of Ormond, the marquis of Wincheſter, and the earl of Eſſex. The French had taken the field earlier than the confederates. Prince Waldeck had not got above eighteen thouſand men together, when Luxemburg with an army of forty thouſand men was marching to ſurpriſe Bruſſels; and at the ſame time the marquis de Boufflers, with another army, came up to Liege. Prince Waldeck poſted his army ſo well, that Luxemburg, believing it ſtronger than indeed it was, did not attempt to break through; in which it was thought he might have ſucceeded.

The king haſtened the reſt of the troops, and came himſelf to the army in good time, not only to cover Bruſſels, but to ſend a detachment to the relief of Liege, which had been bombarded for two days. A body of Germans, as well as that which the king ſent to them, came in time to ſupport thoſe of Liege, who were beginning to think of capitulating. Boufflers therefore drew off, and the French kept themſelves ſo cloſe in their poſts all the reſt of the campaign, that though the king made many motions to try, if it was poſſible, to bring them to a battle, yet he could not do it°. Having therefore blown up the fortifications of Beaumont, a place which he had made himſelf maſter of, he marched the army towards Acth, from whence he departed the 7th of September for Loo, leaving the forces under the command of prince Waldeck.

The ſame day the confederate army marched from Irknowel to Leuze, and decamped again on the 9th in the morning, advancing towards Cambron; and about eleven o'clock the whole right wing, with the body of foot, and the greateſt part of the horſe of the left wing, had paſſed the little river and defile near Catoire. Luxemburg being informed of this motion, and encouraged by king William's abſence, advanced at the ſame time with the troops of the French king's houſhold, and a ſtrong detachment of his cavalry, making together fifty-five ſquadrons, his ſwift march not being diſcovered by reaſon of a great fog, and charged the rear guard of the allies with great fury. Count Tilly, who commanded in the rear, drew up his men as well as the ſuddenneſs of the attack would permit, and received the ſhock with great bravery, but was ſoon over-powered and put into diſorder. By this time ſeveral of thoſe, that had already paſſed the river, were brought back by the generals Overkirk and Opdam, and forming a ſecond line, gave an opportunity to the firſt to rally. Two battalions were likewiſe poſted behind the hedges adjoining to the defile, who much galled the enemy. Here the conflict was very fierce, till the ſecond line was alſo forced to give way before the enemy; but the cavalry being ſoon rallied by Overkirk, who ſignalized his conduct on this occaſion, the French, who were unwilling to puſh the action too far, for fear of the Dutch infantry, which was alſo marching up, retreated in ſome haſte and confuſion, contenting themſelves with having killed about a thouſand of the confederates, and amongſt them ſome men of great diſtinction, with the loſs of about half the number on their ſide P. And with this action the campaign ended in Flanders; during the courſe of which the king had ſeveral remarkable eſcapes, and particularly, that having once ſtood under a tree for a time, the enemy obſerving it, levelled a cannon ſo exactly, that the tree was ſhot down two minutes after the king was gone from the place. There had likewiſe been an attempt to blow up the artillery by one of the conductors of it. For at the firſt return of the army from Beaumont, on the 11th of Auguſt, about nine at night, two of the carriages belonging to the train of artillery, each laden with twenty-five bombs and a barrel of powder, took fire, by the blowing up of a bomb in each carriage; and in that, which was on the left the powder blew up, and ſet fire to two others, ſo it was amazing, that the whole train was not blown up. But monſieur Goullon, the colonel of it, and the reſt of the officers belonging to it, encouraged their men ſo effectually, that they all threw themſelves in the midſt of the flames, and drew out the two carriages from amongſt the reſt, notwithſtanding the barrel of powder had actually taken fire, and was almoſt ready to blow up, and ſo they put out the fire. If this attempt had ſucceeded, the confuſion, which was in all reaſon to be expected upon ſuch an accident, while the enemy was not above a league from them, drawn up, and looking for the ſucceſs of it, muſt have had terrible effects. For it cannot eaſily be imagined, how much miſchief might have followed upon it in the deſtruction of ſo many as would have periſhed immediately, if the whole magazine had taken fire, as well as in the panic, with which the reſt would have been ſtruck upon ſo ſhocking an accident. By the ſurprize of it the French might have had an opportunity of cutting off the whole army.

The Spaniards had already loſt in Flanders the important town of Mons; but they received a ſtill more ſenſible mortification nearer home. For the duke of Noailles, who commanded the French forces, advancing with part of his army to Belver, to make head againſt the Spaniſh troops, ſent the reſt under the command of lieutenant-general Chazeron to beſiege Urgell in Cardagne. Though the place was not altogether indefenſible, and had, beſides that, a garriſon of fifteen hundred men, and moſt of them diſciplined, yet they baſely ſurrendered it in a little time, and themſelves, both officers and ſoldiers, to be priſoners of war; only the militia were diſmiſſed home. Upon this the court of Madrid ſent ſeveral reinforcements to the duke of Medina Sidonia, vice-roy of Catalonia; however he could not hinder the French from fortifying Belver, nor make any other diverſion; for advancing to attack Prato Melo, moſt of his troops abandoned him. Nor did the Spaniards make a better figure at ſea than on land, ſince they could not prevent marſhal d'Eſtrees from bombarding Barcelona for three days together; which made a terrible deſolation in that city.

Nor were the arms of France leſs proſperous in Italy than Catalonia, at leaſt in the beginning of the campaign. Monſieur Catinat having taken the field early, with a deſign to make himſelf maſter of Nice, inveſted that place on the 3d of March; but before he proſecuted the ſiege in form, he thought fit to detach parties to ſummon Villa Franca, and the forts of St. Auſpice and Montalban, which ſurrendered without any reſiſtance. He met with almoſt the ſame good ſucceſs at Nice; for on the 16th the conſuls of the city ſent their deputies to him, who agreed at a certain hour, and upon a certain ſignal, to receive the French king's troops. The governor, upon notice of their deſign, attempted to make himſelf maſter of one of the gates, in order to prevent it's being put in execution; but the citizens being reſolved to ſecure their houſes from the bombs, immediately took arms, fired upon the governor's detachment, and delivered up the city to the French. The governor of the caſtle, enraged at

° As the proceedings of this campaign might perhaps be cenſured by thoſe who did not conſider the reaſon and circumſtances of things, it will be proper to ſubjoin here a vindication of his majeſty's conduct in it, from an original letter of Mr. John Pulteney, under ſecretary to the lord Sidney, written to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover, and dated at the camp at St. Gerard the 27th of Auguſt 1691, N. S. 'It it plain, ſays he, that the French king finding our king intended to put himſelf at the head of the confederate army to be employed in thoſe parts, and knowing his natural temper to puſh, bent his greateſt ſtrength this way; and to give him what mortification he could, ſent a powerful army, little inferior to our's even in number, and conſiſting of the choiceſt of all his troops to oppoſe him; but with orders at the ſame time not to hazard a battle, if it could poſſibly be avoided. Notwithſtanding which our king marches forward, and paſſing the Sambre, breaks in upon their conqueſts, and tries all means poſſible to draw them to a battle, which they ſtill avoid; and any body, who knows this country, and the art of war, as now practiſed, muſt needs own, that it is impoſſible to force them to a battle, without the greateſt diſadvantage and hazard imaginable.

'Wherefore having thus dared them to fight, and ſubſiſted hitherto upon the ſpoils of their conqueſts, the country being near waſted and eat up, it is no wonder, if we are now obliged to draw off, and cloſe the campaign without action. To beſiege ſome town of theirs, that way to provoke them to a battle, was what the king very much endeavoured; but the want of magazines, and ſome neighbouring garriſons to ſupply us with proviſions, Mons being loſt, and the country round about thoſe towns, which lay moſt convenient to be attacked, quite waſted, made it impracticable to be done. Nor will you wonder at the politics of our enemy in avoiding a battle, ſince the loſs of one on their ſide would have laid all Champagne, and conſequently their whole country, up to the very walls of Paris, open to us.'

In another letter, dated at the camp at Enghien, Sept. 10, 1691, N. S. he writes thus to ſir William Dutton Colt. 'Laſt Friday morning we marched from Meſlé, and encamped that night at Bois Seignior Iſaac.—The next day we continued our march, intending to have encamped that night at Hautecroye, with a deſign to have fallen upon the enemy the next day, in caſe they had lain ſtill where we heard they then were. But in our march thither we were informed, that the French were likewiſe on theirs towards Nmove; ſo that we ſhortened our march, and encamped that night at Lembeck near Halle. The French marched that day above eight leagues in the greateſt diſorder and hurry imaginable, being under an apprehenſion (as ſome deſerters and priſoners tell us) leſt we ſhould attack them. And yeſterday we heard they had paſſed the Deindre near Grammont. Whereupon the king finding they would not ſtand, reſolved to give over the chace, and to have gone from the army as to morrow morning for Loo, ſeveral of his majeſty's train being already gone before. But at night thoſe meaſures were altered, and this morning early we marched from Lembeck, and encamped at this place.—We have carried two great points here againſt the French this campaign, though we have had no battle; and that is, to drive them before us, as we have moſt apparently done; and the other, to deſtroy the forage ſo much, that they will not be able to play the ſame trick next ſpring, as they did the laſt, for want of magazines. For laſt ſummer, after the battle of Flerus, they had little or nothing elſe to do but to make them; whereas this year there is not enough left wherewithal to do it.'

P Biſhop Burnet gives the following account of this affair. 'When the time came of going into quarters, the king left the armies in prince Waldeck's hands, who was obſerved not to march off with that caution, that might have been expected from ſo old a captain. Luxemburg, upon that, drew out his horſe with the king's houſhold, deſigning to cut off his rear; and did, upon the firſt ſurprize, put them into ſome diſorder. But they made ſo good a ſtand, that, after a very hot action, the French marched off, and loſt more men on their ſide than we did. Auverquerque, commanded the body, that did this ſervice.'

Mr. John Pulteney, in a letter to ſir William Dutton Colt, dated at Loo, Sept. 14, 1691, O. S. writes thus: 'Yeſterday the king received an expreſs from prince Waldeck, giving an account, that on Tueſday laſt about nine or ten in the morning, as our army was paſſing the river at Catoire, in their march between Leuſe and Cambron, the right being got over, the French taking the advantage of a great miſt, (which hindered our paſſing over by three hours ſo ſoon as otherwiſe we ſhould have done) fell with ten thouſand horſe, amongſt which was the Maiſon de Roi, upon our rear-guards, and killed between four and five hundred men, but were, notwithſtanding that received ſo well by our men, that the French were at laſt forced to retire. There is not as yet any exact account of what particular perſons of note are killed on our ſide or the enemy's, though they pretend to name on our's the little prince d'Anhalt, count de Benthem, and the ſieur Riperca, captain of horſe, and major St. Felix killed or taken priſoners, beſides ſome others of leſs note.'

the perfidiouſneſs of the burghers, endeavoured to fire their magazine, and played the cannon upon the convents and private houſes, notwithſtanding the threats of the French, that if he ſhot againſt the city, the garriſon ſhould have no quarter.

On the other hand the French made three attacks upon the caſtle, which were carried on with great vigour; and on the 20th one of their bombs ſet the powder-magazine on fire, which ſpread itſelf in a moment through all the caſtle, and blew up not only a good part of it, but killed above five hundred of the garriſon, and about fifty of the beſiegers in their trenches, by the pieces of ſtone and timber that were carried thither. This diſaſter, together with the French being maſters of the covered way, and ſecond incloſure, obliged the governor to capitulate, which he did on the 23d, and, after all, obtained honourable terms.

Immediately after the loſs of this important place, prince Eugene of Savoy went to Vienna to ſollicit ſuccours; and the duke of Savoy repaired incognito to Milan, to confer with the count de Fuenſalida, the governor, and haſten the departure of the troops of that duchy. But beſides the ſlowneſs of the Germans and Spaniards in aſſiſting the duke, another cauſe contributed very much to the ill condition of his affairs. King William and the ſtates of Holland allowed the duke the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds a year, chiefly for the maintenance of ſeveral regiments of French refugees and Vaudois; which money was moſtly diverted to other uſes by thoſe, who had the management of the duke's affairs, and were in the French intereſt, and inveterate enemies to the proteſtants; ſo that the officers not receiving their full pay, the regiments were left incompleat, and the ſoldiers undiſciplined. To remedy theſe diſorders, and cauſe the war to be effectually carried on againſt France, king William thought proper to ſend duke Schomberg, the marquis de Miremont, monſieur d'Obercan, a Swiſs, and ſome other brave and experienced officers into Piedmont; but before they could reach Turin, the French had made ſuch a conſiderable progreſs, that few places were left in the duke of Savoy's hands beſides his capital. The ſummer was not far advanced, when Catinat made himſelf maſter of Villina; which encouraged him to undertake the ſiege of Carmagnola, a place ſeated in the marquiſate of Saluſſes, and not above nine miles diſtant from Turin. The trenches were opened on the 22d of May, and three attacks carried on with ſo much vigour, that the beſieged, finding themſelves incloſed on all ſides, and without hopes of relief, conſented to march out, the diſciplined men with their arms, the militia without, and to be conducted to Turin. This was no ſooner done, but the marquis de Feuquieres was commanded with a ſtrong detachment of horſe and foot to inveſt Coni, a place defended by nine baſtions and ſome outworks, but principally ſtrong by its ſituation on a ſteep craggy hill, and garriſoned by ſeven hundred Vaudois and French refugees, about five hundred of the militia of Mondovi, and ſome other troops commanded by the count de la Rovere. The duke of Savoy being informed of the enemy's deſign, ordered the regiment of Saluſſes, with ſome other troops, to the number of near three thouſand, to throw themſelves into the place; but Feuquieres having notice of their march, attacked them with great vigour, and being received with no leſs courage, many were killed on both ſides. The iſſue of this encounter was, that part of the relief entered the town, which was preſently inveſted by the French to the number of twelve thouſand men, who proſecuted the ſiege very vigorouſly.

Duke Schomberg arrived at Turin the 8th of June, where he found affairs in a moſt deſperate condition, and the minds of people under the deepeſt conſternation. Carmagnola had been lately taken; Coni was actually beſieged, and given for loſt; monſieur la Hoguette had forced the paſſages of the valley of Aoſta, which gave him entrance into the Verceillois, and the frontiers of the Milaneſe. And the duke of Savoy, inſtead of oppoſing the enemy's career, encamped with his ſmall army on the ſide of the hill of Montcallier, from whence he had the mortification to ſee his towns taken and his palace at Rivoli deſtroyed. Turin was under the apprehenſions of a bombardment, and the removal of the princeſſes, with the court, and all their moſt precious goods to Verceil, had ſtill increaſed the terror of the inhabitants. The emiſſaries of France ſaid aloud, that the duke would be diſpoſſeſſed of all his dominions this campaign: That the confederates entertained him with chimerical ſuccours; and that the king of England, who was his laſt reſource, ſent him only duke Schomberg, with a magnificent retinue, inſtead of real aſſiſtance; and that therefore the beſt way for him was to betake himſelf immediately to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's mercy. Things being reduced to this extremity, duke Schomberg had a very difficult part to act, eſpecially at a court, and in a country, which he had never ſeen but in printed relations and maps. He therefore employed ſome time in making himſelf acquainted with both, and till then was very reſerved in ſpeaking his thoughts. The firſt thing he judged neceſſary to be done was to revive the drooping ſpirits of the people, by giving life and motion to the army, and ſhewing ſome vigour to the French. He adviſed the duke to order his infantry to deſcend to the foot of the hill, and to extend his horſe to the right between the hill and the Po; and made the colonels of the army ſenſible, that the beſt way to render both officers and ſoldiers briſk and active, was to ſend them often upon parties. And becauſe the French, being uſed to deſpiſe the duke of Savoy's troops, came and foraged even in ſight of his grand guard, Schomberg was of opinion to go and inſult them. Accordingly on the 12th of July the duke of Savoy with the general officers, and about three thouſand horſe, advanced towards the enemy's forage; but upon his approach the French retired, and Catinat did not think fit to ſuſtain his foragers, which might have occaſioned a general engagement. It happened the ſame day, that Schomberg having ſpoke high Dutch to a German officer in the duke's preſence, the duke ſaid, 'that he had once tried to learn that language, but was diſcouraged by the difficulty he found in it;' upon which Schomberg offering to teach him, 'No, my lord, replied he; it is the trade of war I deſign to learn of you.'

In the mean while, though the garriſon and inhabitants of Coni defended themſelves with great reſolution, yet it was not poſſible for them to hold out much longer. It was therefore high time to think of relieving a place the loſs of which muſt be attended with the total ruin of the duke's affairs. And how to do it with moſt ſafety and appearance of ſucceſs, was variouſly debated in a council of war, wherein Schomberg did not content himſelf with ſpeaking his advice, but gave it afterwards to the duke. His opinion was, that monſieur La Hoguette appeared in the valley of Aoſta, with no other deſign than to keep the confederates in ſuſpence, and thereby favour the ſiege of Coni: That as ſoon as the troops of the confederates ſhould begin to move, he would return into the Tarentoiſe: That the duke ought to run where the danger was moſt preſſing, leſt by endeavouring to remedy all, he ſhould remedy nothing: That after all, he could not do better than to fight Catinat, whoſe army was inferior, at leaſt in number, to that of the allies, Feuquieres having carried away ten or twelve thouſand men with him before Coni. That, at the worſt, the confederates could but be beaten, which was ſtill to be preferred before the loſs of Coni, and the reinforcement of Caſal; and that the French, if they ſhould have the advantage, would yet pay dear for their victory; and their army being conſiderably weakened by ſickneſs, deſertion, and their loſſes before Veilanne, Carmagnoli, and Coni, they would not think of any other enterprize that ſummer. The duke and prince Eugene gave ear to Schomberg's opinion; but the marquis De Legonez, lately made governor of Milan, and don Gaſpar Henriquez de Zara, oppoſed it with frivolous reaſons, not daring to ſpeak the true one; which was, that the war was maintained at the duke of Savoy's expence; and that as long as the French were kept out of the Milaneſe, it was policy in the Spaniards not to hazard a deciſive action. However the relieving Coni being of ſo great importance, it was reſolved, that an hundred mules laden with proviſions and ammunition ſhould be ſent thither, under the convoy of twenty two hundred horſe, commanded by prince Eugene. Accordingly that prince ſet out on the 16th of June in the night from the camp, and leaving the French army on the right, marched to the left along the hills, that terminate the plain, that he might reach Coni with leſs danger. The next day, the French made an aſſault upon the place, wherein they were repulſed with great loſs; and towards the evening prince Eugene reached Magliano, a place within ſeven miles of Coni, where he was reinforced by five or ſix thouſand of the militia of Mondovi. Of this Catinat had no ſooner notice, but he ſent an expreſs to monſieur Du Bulonde, who commanded at the ſiege, not to ſtir out of his lines, and to acquaint him farther, that two thouſand five hundred men were on their march to reinforce him, under the command of monſieur Sylveſtre, mareſchal de camp. However Bulonde thought it convenient to raiſe the ſiege [q] on the 18th of June, and that with ſo much haſte and confuſion, that he left behind him two or three pieces of cannon, three mortars, good ſtore of bombs, powder, warlike utenſils, tents, and proviſions, beſides many of his ſick and wounded men, amongſt whom were five engineers. But, for his reward, he was no ſooner arrived at the camp, but Catinat had orders to put him under arreſt. The French loſt two thouſand five hundred before the place, the preſervation of which was principally owing to the bravery of the French proteſtants in garriſon there, and more particularly to the courage, vigilance, and conduct of colonel Julien, whoſe ſervices the duke of Savoy acknowledged with a preſent of a diamond ring of conſiderable value. The court of France was ſtruck with the utmoſt conſternation upon the news of the raiſing this ſiege, and Louvois himſelf was inconſolable; and going to the king to give an account of it with tears in his eyes, his majeſty anſwered him with great coolneſs, 'You are caſt down for a little matter. It is plainly ſeen, that you are too much uſed to good ſucceſs. For my part, who remember to have ſeen the Spaniſh troops in Paris, I am not ſo eaſily caſt down.'

Immediately after the raiſing the ſiege of Coni, the French troops under monſieur de la Hoguette, according to Schomberg's prediction, abandoned the valley of Aoſta; and Catinat, who was encamped near Carignan, retired with his army towards Villa nova d'Aſti, after having ſent Feuquieres with two thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe to change the garriſon of Caſale. And if the Germans had come up, or the Spaniards been willing to fight, Schomberg would have prevented the reinforcement of that garriſon, which was already reduced to fifteen hundred men.

Some days after, duke Scomberg applied himſelf to the affairs relating to the forces in Engliſh and Dutch pay. Monſieur Vandermeer, appointed by king William to be their commiſſary and pay-maſter, and the ſeveral colonels, preſented their accounts to the duke, which he examined with great exactneſs, and afterwards made a particular inquiry into the behaviour of the inferior officers. Upon the whole matter, he found in thoſe regiments, not only a great remiſſneſs in the martial diſcipline, but likewiſe other irregularities; which being partly occaſioned by ill pay, the duke gave effectual orders to have that point remedied; and becauſe a captain of Loches's regiment had killed a ſuttler in a riot, and another captain led an infamous life, he cauſed them to be caſhiered. At the ſame time he ordered all the officers in Turin to repair immediately to their reſpective commands, and declared to them, that he expected, that his majeſty's ſervice ſhould be performed with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs of diſcipline. It was no wonder, that theſe troops were ſo diſorderly, there being no body to inſpect them beſides Vandermeer, a man generally hated and deſpiſed; and they would certainly have diſbanded themſelves this campaign, if it had not been for the duke of Schomberg's arrival.

The inglorious retreat of the French from before Coni, gained no ſmall reputation to the duke of Savoy's arms throughout all Italy, and had a particular influence on the reſolution of the conclave, at that time ſitting at Rome for the election of a new pope, in the room of Alexander VIII, who died on the the firſt of February. The affairs of Piedmont had kept that aſſembly in ſuſpence all that time, the Italians fearing to diſoblige the court of France, by filling the papal chair with a perſon in the intereſt of Spain. But the duke of Savoy's late ſucceſs, and the approach of the German ſuccours, raiſed the courage of the Italian cardinals, who, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the cardinal D'Eſtres, a Frenchman, and his faction, concerted meaſures with the Spaniards and Imperialiſts, in order to get cardinal Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, elected pope [r]. The cardinals Cantelmi and Giudici managed the deſign with that addreſs, that when the French ſpoke of it to Giudici, he ſeemed very cool in the matter, as if he thought it could not ſucceed, ſince Pignatelli would be very unacceptable to the Spaniards, on account of the differences, which formerly happened between him and the viceroy of Naples. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect, and made the French more zealous for him. The Spaniards and Imperialiſts ſeeing the French engaged, concurred with all their voices, ſo that at the ſcrutiny of ſixty one voices, that compoſed the conclave, fifty-three were given for cardinal Pignatelli, who was accordingly choſen pope, being then ſeventy-ſix years and four months old. He poſſeſſed great dignities in the kingdom of Naples, and had been created cardinal in the year 1681, by Innocent XI, in memory of whom he took the name of Innocent XII, and of whoſe inclinations, intereſts, and maxims, he had been a long obſerver.

By this time the German ſuccours, to the number of eighteen thouſand horſe and foot, having joined the duke of Savoy; and the elector of Bavaria being arrived to command them, the French, who not long before threatened no leſs than to beſiege Turin itſelf, were obliged to repaſs the Po, and to ſend ſeveral expreſſes to court to ſolicit a reinforcement. The confederates, on the other hand, having vainly endeavoured to engage Catinat to a battle, bent their thoughts upon retaking ſome of the other places, which they had loſt in the beginning of the campaign. Accordingly prince Eugene inveſted Carmagnola on the 17th of September, and carried on the ſiege with ſo much vigour, that in eleven days the garriſon was forced to capitulate. And becauſe after the firſt taking of this place, the French did not punctually obſerve the articles in relation to the Vaudois, theſe took this opportunity to be revenged; and having waylaid them, took away their arms and part of their baggage. This being obſerved by the Germans, they came in for a ſhare of the booty, ſo that the French were entirely ſtript. Catinat made great complaints of this violation of the martial law; but the confederates anſwered, 'That they were ſorry ſuch things ſhould happen: but that he himſelf had ſet them the firſt example: however, that for the future they would prevent any ſuch diſorders, provided he would do the ſame.'

In the mean time the marquis d'Hocquincourt, with a body of French troops, having laid ſiege to Montmelian, made himſelf maſter of the town without much reſiſtance. But the caſtle ſtill holding out, it was reſolved by the confederates to ſend into Savoy eleven thouſand Spaniards, two thouſand of the refugees, and two thouſand of the duke of Savoy's troops, to the relief of that fortreſs. Theſe detachments were already marching by the valley of Aoſta, when they received counter-orders immediately to join the main army, the confederates having formed a deſign to attack Catinat in his intrenchments. But that enterprize not ſucceeding, the allies bent their arms againſt Carmagnola, which Catinat was ſo far from attempting to relieve, that having quitted Foſſano, Savillana, and Saluſſes, he retreated towards Pignerol, where he had ſtill the mortification to hear that the Vaudois, aſſiſted by the French refugees, had routed three thouſand men, whom he had detached to lay waſte their vallies. However, this did not hinder the council of France from reſolving upon the reduction of the caſtle of Montmelian, whither Catinat was ordered to repair with part of his army. This general arrived before the place on the 6th of November, and after a moſt vigorous ſiege, wherein they had to diſpute as well with the rigours of the ſeaſon, as with the deſperate defence of the garriſon, that fortreſs was at laſt, on the 2d of December, ſurrendered to the French upon honourable conditions; by which means they became entire maſters of all the dutchy of Savoy; the king of France all this while careſſing the princes and ſtates of Italy, by monſieur Cebenac his ambaſſador, leſt growing jealous of his ſucceſſes, they ſhould cloſe in with the confederates, and thereby increaſe the number of his enemies, who in theſe parts began to be too ſtrong for him. The loſs of Montmelian was chiefly imputed to Caraffa, who commanded the Imperial army, and was more intent on raiſing contributions, than in carrying on the war, and croſſed every good motion that was made. Duke Schomberg undertook to relieve the place, and was aſſured, that many proteſtants in Dauphiné, would come and join him. But Caraffa, and even the court of Turin, ſeemed to be more afraid of the ſtrength of hereſy, [q] The marquis De la Fare, in his 'Memoires and Reflexions ſur les principaux Evenements du Regne de Louis XIV. l. 10.' ſeems to cenſure the attempting this ſiege, which he imputes to the orders of monſieur de Louvois againſt monſieur Catinat's judgment. 'Monſieur Catinat, ſays he, carried on the war in Piedmont with great conduct, courage, and ſucceſs. He won the battle of Staffardo; and it was none of his fault, that we did not afterwards attack and make ourſelves maſters of Turin. But the repeated orders of monſieur Louvois, his relation and benefactor, obliged him, againſt his will, in the latter ſeaſon, to order monſieur Bulonde to lay ſiege to Coni, which he was obliged ſoon after to raiſe. Neither the capacity of monſieur Catinat, which at laſt occaſioned him to be made marſhal of France, nor the voice of the people, were able to hinder the king from ſacrificing him to monſieur Chamillard.'

[r] Biſhop Burnet tells us, that the party of the zealots ſtood long firm to Barbarigo, who had the reputation of a ſaint, and ſeemed in all things to ſet cardinal Barromeo before him as a pattern. But they at laſt were perſuaded to conſent to the choice of Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, who, while he was archbiſhop of Naples, had ſome diſputes with the viceroy concerning the eccleſiaſtical immunities, which he aſſerted ſo highly, that he excommunicated ſome of the judges, who, as he thought, had invaded them. The Spaniards had ſeemed diſpleaſed at this; which recommended him to the French, that they alſo concurred to his elevation.

The

than of the power of France; and choſe to let that important place fall into their hands, rather than ſuffer it to be relieved by thoſe, whom they did not like. When the duke of Savoy's army went into quarters, Caraffa obliged the neighbouring princes, and the ſtates of Genoa, to contribute to the ſubſiſtence of the Imperial army, threatening them otherwiſe with taking winter quarters among them; ſo that how ill ſoever he managed the duke of Savoy's concerns, he took care of his own. But upon the complaints made againſt him on all hands, he was recalled, and Caprara ſent to command in his room.

The campaign upon the Rhine was very inconſiderable this year, though on that ſide too the French were rather gainers. Their firſt deſign was to ſurprize the city of Mentz by a treacherous correſpondence, which they held in the place with one of the emperor's commiſſioners, Conſburg, a Weſtphalian; which being prevented by a timely diſcovery, they turned their arms againſt Algeſheim, a town five or ſix leagues from that city, which they carried after ſome reſiſtance, and then retired towards Creutſnach. On the other hand, the imperial army, commanded by the elector of Saxony, with the generals Caprara and Schoning under him, paſſed the Rhine not far from Manheim, where the French had entrenched themſelves, in order to prevent it. But though great things were expected from the Germans, they rather loſt than gained by paſſing that river; for the French, to divert them, croſſed the Rhine alſo at Philipſburg, which, after a warm conſultation in a council of war, obliged the Germans to follow them, though not with that diligence and ſucceſs, but that the others took the town of Portzheim, ſituate in the marquiſate of Baden Dourlach, on a neck of land, that gives entrance into the country of Wirtemberg, which the French had all along a deſign to put under contribution, and had never ſo fair a proſpect of effecting it as at this time. With the taking of this place, and another of leſs conſequence, beſides the ravaging of that part of Juliers, that belongs to the elector palatine, the French ended their campaign that way. And as for the Germans, the execution of their deſign was partly prevented by the death of the elector of Saxony, which happened on the 2d of September, in the 44th year of his age.

The emperor's affairs in Hungary went on ſucceſsfully this year, under the command of prince Lewis of Baden; though he committed an error, which had like to have proved fatal to him. His ſtores lay near him in great boats on the Danube; but upon ſome deſign he had made a motion off from that river; and of which the grand vizir took the advantage, and got into his camp between him and his ſtores; ſo that he muſt either ſtarve, or break through to come at his proviſions.

The Turks not having had time to fortify themſelves in their new camp, he attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were quite routed, and loſt their camp and cannon, and a great part of their army, the grand vizir himſelf being killed [s].

If the court of Vienna had really deſired a peace, they might have had it upon this victory, on very eaſy terms; but they reſolved to be maſters of all Tranſilvania; and, in order to that, undertook the ſiege of Great Waradin, which they were forced to turn into a blockade; ſo that it did not fall into their hands till the ſpring following. The emperor was led on by the prophecies, that aſſured him of conſtant conqueſts, and that he ſhould, in concluſion, arrive at Conſtantinople itſelf; ſo that the practices of thoſe, whom the French had gained about him, had but too much matter to work on in himſelf. Beſides, the news of the total reduction of Ireland, confirmed him in his reſolutions of carrying on the war in Hungary. It was reckoned, that England being now diſengaged at home, would, with the reſt of the proteſtant allies, be able to carry on the war with France. And the two chief paſſions in the emperor's mind being, his hatred of hereſy, and his hatred of France, it was ſaid, that thoſe about him, who ſerved the intereſts of that court, perſuaded him, that he was to let the war go on between France and thoſe he eſteemed heretics, ſince he would be a gainer, which ſide ſoever ſhould loſe; for either France would be humbled, or the heretics be exhauſted, while he ſhould extend his dominions, and conquer infidels. King William, on the other hand, had a ſort of regard and ſubmiſſion to the emperor, which he had to no other prince whatever; ſo that he did not preſs him, as many deſired he ſhould, to accept of a peace with the Turks, that ſo he might turn his whole force againſt France.

Flanders lay expoſed to great danger, where the feebleneſs of the Spaniſh government ſo exhauſted and weakened the whole country, that all the ſtrength of the confederate armies was ſcarce able to defend it. The Spaniards had offered to deliver it up to king William, either as he was king of England, or as he was ſtadtholder of the United Provinces. He knew the bigotry of the people ſo well, that he was convinced it was not poſſible to get them to ſubmit to a proteſtant government; but he propoſed the elector of Bavaria, who ſeemed to have much heat, and an ambition of ſignalizing himſelf in that country, which was then the chief ſcene of the war; and he could ſupport that government by the troops and treaſure, that he might draw out of his own electorate. Beſides, if he governed that country well, and acquired a fame in arms, that might give him a proſpect of ſucceeding to the crown of Spain, in the right of his electreſs, who, if the houſe of Bourbon was ſet aſide, was next in that ſucceſſion. The Spaniards agreed to this propoſal; but they would not make the firſt offer of it to that elector, nor would he aſk it; and it ſtuck for ſome time at this. But the court of Vienna adjuſted the matter, by making the propoſition, which the elector accepted; and was accordingly appointed governor, and the choice of him declared at Madrid in the council of ſtate; which put new life into thoſe oppreſſed and miſerable provinces.

This was the general ſtate of affairs when the king returned to Loo, where having ſpent almoſt two months in the diverſion of hunting, he came to the Hague to ſettle the operations of the war for the enſuing year, and then to return to England. The contrary winds, that detained him there, made him large amends, by bringing over Mr. Henry Furneſe with the agreeable news of the ſurrender of Limerick, for which the king beſtowed the honour of knighthood upon him; and on the 18th of October embarked in the Mary yatch, in the Maeſe, being attended by a ſquadron of men of war, under the command of ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, rear-admiral of the blue; and the next day ſafely landed at Margate, whence he immediately went to Kenſington.

The parliament, which was adjourned to the 31ſt of March, and from thence continued by ſeveral adjournments and prorogations to the 22d of October, being then met, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have appointed this meeting of the parliament as ſoon as ever the affairs abroad would admit of my return into England, that you might have the more time to [s] The lord Paget, the Engliſh envoy extraordinary to the emperor, in a letter to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover, dated at Vienna, 20th Auguſt, 1691, gives the following account of this victory.

'Though I have not leiſure to ſay ſo much as I would, yet I think myſelf obliged to tell you ſhortly, that though a peace with the Turk is not concluded, yet I believe it may now quickly be made. For upon the 19th inſtant prince Lewis fought their army, and beat them ſoundly. The firſt relation of the engagement was brought hither by the prince of Vaudemont, upon Friday the 24th imperfectly. That day the emperor had the particulars of it, which are, that the Turk has loſt twenty five thouſand of his beſt ſoldiers upon the place, beſides ſuch as were killed in the flight and retreat. Many of their moſt eſteemed officers, baſhaws, &c. loſt their lives, amongſt which the grand vizir, the ſeraſkier, the aga of the janiſſaries were the chief. The reſidue of the army is entirely broken; their faicks or great boats diſappear; their ſhattered troops have repaſſed the Save; and the garriſon left in Belgrade, which is not ſtrong, is in great conſternation. All the baggage is taken, and one hundred and fifty four field pieces of braſs, tents, proviſions, and in ſhort all they brought into the field either for ſubſiſtence or parade, is taken by prince Lewis of Baden, who, with his victorious army, (though very much weakened in the conflict, having loſt about eight thouſand good old ſoldiers, and many brave officers, amongſt whom general Souches, the prince of Aremberg, and the prince of Holſtein, killed, are the chief) the general hopes are yet, that the campaign will end in a peace with the Porte.'

In another letter dated at Vienna, Auguſt 23, Sept. 2, 1691, lord Paget writes thus:

'Our court has been ſo taken up with rejoicing for the late important victory in Hungary, that ſcarce any other buſineſs is talked of. And indeed it has mended matters very much on that ſide; and the grand vizir, ſeraſkier, and aga of the janiſſaries are ſaid to be of the number of the ſlain, beſides twenty five thouſand other Turks. On our part are reckoned eight thouſand killed, among whom a great many brave officers. But how all this may diſpoſe them to a peace, I am not yet able to ſay, ſince it is not known, who will ſucceed the grand vizir, if ſlain, and manage the Turkiſh affairs. Deſerters ſay, that they are in great confuſion, and the ſmall remains of their army, aſſembled near Belgrade; which place likewiſe is reported to be in no ſmall conſternation. Prince Lewis, to whoſe excellent conduct and perſonal valour much of the ſucceſs of this action is due, is ſince declared by the emperor, lieutenant-general.'

conſider of the beſt and moſt effectual ways and means for the carrying on of the war againſt France this next year.

" I am willing to hope, that the good ſucceſs with which it hath pleaſed God to bleſs my arms in Ireland this ſummer, will not only be a great encouragement to you to proceed the more cheerfully in this work, but will be looked upon by you as an earneſt of future ſucceſſes, which your timely aſſiſtance to me, may by God's bleſſing, procure to us all. And as I do not doubt, but you will take care to pay the arrears of that army, which hath been ſo deſerving and ſo proſperons in the reducement of Ireland to a peaceable condition; ſo I do aſſure you, there ſhall no care be wanting on my part to keep that kingdom, as far as it is poſſible, from being burthenſome to England for the future.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I do not doubt but you are all ſenſible, that it will be neceſſary, we ſhould have a ſtrong fleet next year, and as early at ſea, as we had this ſummer, and I muſt tell you that the great power of France will as neceſſarily require, that we ſhould maintain a very conſiderable army, ready upon all occaſions, not only to defend ourſelves from any inſult, but alſo to annoy the common enemy, where it may be moſt ſenſible to them. And I do not ſee how it is poſſible to do this with leſs than ſixty-five thouſand men.

" I ſhall only add, that by the vigour and diſpatch of your counſels and aſſiſtance to me in this ſeſſion of parliament, you have now an opportunity in your hands, which, if neglected, you can never reaſonably hope to ſee again, not only to eſtabliſh the future quiet and proſperity of theſe kingdoms, but the peace and ſecurity of all Europe."

Both houſes congratulated his majeſty upon his ſafe and happy return, after ſo many hazards, to which he had expoſed his perſon, and upon the ſucceſs of his arms in the reduction of Ireland; and aſſured him, that they would aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power in carrying on a vigorous war againſt France, in order to procure an honourable and laſting peace to his own dominions, and to ſecure his neighbours from the injuries and invaſions of the common oppreſſor. Addreſſes were alſo preſented to the queen, to acknowledge her prudent care in the adminiſtration of the government during the king's abſence.

Notwithſtanding theſe profeſſions of the parliament, it ſoon appeared, that a party was avowedly formed againſt the government. They durſt not own it before, while the war in Ireland continued. But now, ſince that was at an end, they began to infuſe into all people, that there was no need of keeping up a great land army; and that the Engliſh ought only to aſſiſt their allies with ſome auxiliary troops, and increaſe their force at ſea. Many perſons, who did not underſtand the ſtate of foreign affairs, were drawn into this notion, not conſidering that if Flanders was loſt, Holland muſt ſubmit, and take the beſt terms they could get; and the conjunction of thoſe two great powers at ſea muſt ſoon ruin our trade, and in a little time ſubdue us entirely. But it was not eaſy to bring all people to apprehend this aright, and thoſe who had ill intentions, would not be beaten out of it, but covered worſe deſigns with this pretence. And this was ſtill kept up as a prejudice againſt the king and his government, that he loved to have a great army about him, and that when they were once modelled, he would never part with them, but govern in an arbitrary way, as ſoon as he had prepared his ſoldiers to ſerve his ends.

Another prejudice had more colour, and as bad effects. The king was thought to love the Dutch more than the Engliſh, to truſt more to them, and to admit them to more freedom with him. He gave too much occaſion to a general diſguſt, which was ſpread among the Engliſh officers and the nobility. He took little pains to gain the affections of the nation; nor did he conſtrain himſelf enough to render his government more acceptable. He was ſhut up all the day long; and his ſilence, when he admitted any to an audience, diſtaſted them as much, as if they had been denied it. The earl of Marlborough likewiſe thought, that the great ſervices which he had done, were not acknowledged nor rewarded as they well deſerved, and began to ſpeak like a man diſcontented. And the ſtrain of almoſt the whole nation was, that the Engliſh were overlooked, and the Dutch the only perſons favoured or truſted. This was national; and the Engliſh being too apt to deſpiſe other nations, and being of more lively tempers than the Dutch, grew to expreſs a contempt and an averſion for them, that went almoſt to a mutiny. It is true the Dutch behaved themſelves well, and regularly in their quarters, and paid for every thing punctually; whereas the Engliſh were apt to be rude and exacting, eſpecially thoſe, who were all this winter coming over from Ireland, who had been ſo long in an enemy's country, that they were not eaſily brought into order; ſo that the common people were generally better pleaſed with the Dutch ſoldiers, than with their own countrymen. But it was not the ſame as to the officers. Theſe ſeeds of diſcontent were carefully managed by the enemies of the government; and by this means matters went on heavily in the houſe of commons. The king was believed to be ſo tender in every point, that ſeemed to relate to his prerogative, that he could not well bear any thing, that was a diminution of it; and he was ſaid to have taken a diſlike and miſtruſt of all thoſe, whoſe notions leaned to public liberty, though thoſe were the very perſons, who were firmeſt to him, and the moſt zealous for him. The men, whoſe notions of the prerogative were the higheſt, were ſuſpected to be jacobites; yet it was obſerved, that many of theſe were much courted, and put into employments, in which they ſhewed ſo little affection to the government, and ſo cloſe a correſpondence with its profeſſed enemies, that it was generally believed they intended to betray it. The blame of employing theſe men was caſt upon the earl of Nottingham, who, as the whigs ſaid, infuſed into the king jealouſies of his beſt friends, and inclined him to court ſome of his bittereſt enemies.

The earls of Rocheſter and Ranelagh were made Privy-councillors. The earl of Rocheſter was reckoned a man of parts, and to have had a good pen, but did not ſpeak gracefully. When he came into buſineſs, and roſe to high poſts, he grew violent, but was thought incorrupt. He had high notions of government, which he thought muſt be maintained with ſeverity. He delivered up his own notions to his party, that he might lead them. He was one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury in the reign of king Charles II. and afterwards lord preſident of the council; but growing weary of a place which procured him neither confidence nor dependance, he was, by the duke of York's intereſt, made lord lieutenant of Ireland. At king James's acceſſion he was made lord-treaſurer, and was one of the eccleſiaſtical commiſſioners. Soon after, for refuſing to turn catholic, he loſt the white ſtaff, and had a penſion of four thouſand pounds a year for his own and ſon's life, beſides two valuable grants. He was one of the managers for a regency in oppoſition to thoſe who were for a king. Queen Mary was ſo poſſeſſed againſt him at firſt, that he in vain endeavoured to recover her favour. But at laſt, by means of biſhop Burnet, the queen laid aſide her reſentment, and by degrees admitted him into a high meaſure of favour and confidence. The biſhop was quickly convinced of his error, for the earl went into an intereſt very different from what he imagined he would have purſued. He was for ſetting up notions of perſecution and violence, which he had promoted in king Charles's time, and talked againſt all favour of diſſenters, profeſſing himſelf an enemy to the preſent biſhops, and their methods of endeavouring to gain them by gentle uſage.

The earl of Ranelagh was a man of great parts, and as great vices. In king Charles's time the revenue of Ireland was in his management, and he was looked upon as one of the ableſt men that iſland had bred, capable of all affairs, even in the midſt of a looſe run of pleaſure and much riot. He had the art of pleaſing maſters of very different tempers and intereſts ſo much, that he continued above thirty years in great poſts. He had been pay-maſter of the army in king James's time, and being fit for the poſt, he was continued in it all this reign. He was likewiſe among thoſe that had voted for a regency.

The taking off parliament-men who complained of grievances, by places and penſions, was believed to be now very generally practiſed. Sir Edward Seymour, who had in a very injurious manner, not only oppoſed every thing, but had reflected on the king's title and conduct, was this winter, to the great mortification of the whigs, brought into the treaſury and the cabinet council. He was a man of great birth, being the elder branch of the Seymour family, and was a graceful man, bold and quick. He had a ſort of pride peculiar to himſelf, and had with it neither ſhame nor decency. He was in king Charles's time the moſt aſſuming ſpeaker that ever ſate in the chair. He knew the houſe and every member in it ſo well, that by looking about he could tell the fate of any queſtion, and accordingly managed matters.

The ſupplies granted for the ſervice of the next year amounted in all to three millions, four hundred and eleven thouſand, ſix hundred and ſeventy-five pounds, for the fleet and army.[t] But the diſpatch of theſe ſupplies was retarded by ſeveral incidental affairs this ſeſſion; particularly the ſettling the conditions on which the charter of the Eaſt-India company was to be confirmed, which took up much time.[u] The amuſement alſo given to both houſes by one William Fuller, was another cauſe of delay to the ſupplies.

The conſpiracy of the papiſts in Lancaſhire to raiſe a rebellion in the kingdom, in order to re-inthrone king James, was atteſted by ſeveral witneſſes, which the Jacobites were ſo dextrous as to take off either by fair or violent means; but nevertheleſs their ſiniſter deſigns being confirmed by the papers taken with the lord viſcount Preſton, and ſeveral other circumſtances, which amounted to a moral demonſtration, ſome perſons of note were ſeized, and ſearch made after others; which brought the buſineſs to be examined before the commons.

At this juncture Fuller, who was then a priſoner in the king's-bench, ſet up for an evidence, and at his own deſire was brought to the bar of the commons, where he produced ſeveral papers, which were peruſed by the houſe; and, according to his prayer, it was reſolved, "that an application be made to his majeſty, that he would pleaſe to give to Mr. Fuller a blank paſs for two perſons, for their ſafe coming from beyond ſea, or any other place, hither, to give their evidence, for their protection, while they were here, and for their ſafe return, if deſired." About ſix weeks after Fuller was ordered to attend the houſe of commons, with the perſons mentioned by him; but he pretending to be ſick, and not able to come abroad, ſeveral members were ordered to repair to him, to ſecure his papers, and to take his information upon oath. The next day Fuller's examination was preſented to the houſe, and read; and he mentioning Mr. James Hayes and colonel Thomas Delaval to be the two witneſſes, which he had informed the houſe of, ſeveral members, attended by meſſengers, were ordered to go to the places directed by Fuller, and bring the ſaid perſons with them. They went, but found no ſuch perſons as had been deſcribed to them; whereupon Fuller was ordered to produce them himſelf, and alſo one Jones; which he not being able to do, the commons unanimouſly declared, "that William Fuller is a notorious impoſtor, a cheat, and a falſe accuſer, having ſcandalized their majeſties and their government, abuſed this houſe, and falſely accuſed ſeveral perſons of honour and quality." And they further reſolved, "that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to command his attorney-general to proſecute the ſaid impoſtor." Fuller was accordingly proſecuted, and ſentenced to ſtand in the pillory; which ignominy he underwent without the leaſt modeſty or concern.

The warm diſpute between the two houſes, raiſed by the bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, was a farther interruption of public buſineſs. This bill having been laid aſide by the lords in the preceding ſeſſion, was now again brought in and paſſed by the commons, and ſent to the lords for their concurrence, who added a clauſe to it, "that upon the trial of any peer or peereſs for treaſon or miſpriſion of treaſon, all the peers who have a right to ſit and vote in parliament, ſhould be duly ſummoned to attend twenty days at leaſt before the trial, and ſhould vote at the trial of ſuch peer or peereſs." As it had been the cuſtom for the lord ſteward, for the time being, to ſummon by his ſerjeant at arms a competent number only of peers, to be triers of peers, and as the lord ſteward was appointed by the king's commiſſion, the commons diſagreed to the clauſe, as thinking it an alteration in the conſtitution; which occaſioned ſeveral conferences between the managers of both houſes.[w] But the reſult of all was, that the lords inſiſted upon their clauſes, and the commons adhered to their diſagreement.

The commons having reſolved, that the miſcarriages of the fleet ſhould be inquired into, admiral Ruſſel preſented to the houſe the inſtructions given by the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of England; a liſt of the ſhips, and an extract of ſeveral letters and orders touching the proceedings of the fleet during the laſt ſummer's expedition; all which were compared and examined with the copies of the ſeveral orders, that had been iſſued by the commiſſioners of the admiralty to the ſaid admiral, and a liſt of the ſhips, that had been loſt or damaged ſince the year 1688, delivered to the houſe of commons by the lord Falkland from the commiſſioners of the admiralty. And it appearing to the houſe, that in the whole matter the great fault lay upon the admiralty, a committee was appointed to receive their anſwer to the accuſation. The admiral being likewiſe aſked, how he came to lie at the Buoy in the Nore after the fleet was ready, and the wind fair for ſix days together? anſwered, that he did not think himſelf ſtrong enough to go out at firſt, ſince he could not ſail with above fifty ſhips, the Dutch refuſing to go to the blockade before Dunkirk (which was to be maintained) till their complement came [t] For the fleet (including the ordnance and charge of building one dry and two wet docks at Portſmouth) was granted 1,575,898 l. and for the army of ſixty-four thouſand nine hundred and twenty-four men, 1,935,787 l. To raiſe theſe ſums, 1,651,702 l. was granted upon land; and for the remainder were paſſed an excite upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for one year, and a poll-tax, by which all perſons (except ſuch as received alms of the pariſh, poor houſe-keepers, and their children) were to pay twelve-pence quarterly for one year; all tradeſmen and artificers, having an eſtate of the clear yearly value of three hundred pounds, and upwards, ten ſhillings; all gentlemen or reputed gentlemen, having an eſtate of three hundred pounds or more, as alſo all clergymen and teachers, who had any eccleſiaſtical benefice or contribution to the value of eighty pounds per annum, or upwards, twenty ſhillings; every lord of parliament, either ſpiritual, or temporal the ſum of ten pounds; and all perſons, who refuſe to take the oaths to their majeſties, double the ſums charged by the reſpective heads.

[u] On the 27th of October ſeveral merchants, preſented a petition to the commons againſt the Eaſt-India company; and at the ſame time the Eaſt-India company put another petition in behalf of themſelves; the conſideration of both which was referred to a committee of the whole houſe. About a fortnight after the heads of the complaints againſt the Eaſt-India company were delivered to their governor: to which they having put in their anſwer, the ſame was communicated to the petitioners, and the Eaſt-India company ordered to make their defence on the 20th of November.

Not only the appointed day, but ſeveral others were ſpent in examining the accounts, which ſir Joſeph Horne, the governor of the Eaſt-India company, delivered in, as a ſtate of their ſtock and debts at home and abroad; and in conſidering ſeveral other petitions relating to the Eaſt-India trade, till at laſt the commons agreed to the following reſolutions, on the 17th of December, '1. That a ſum not leſs than 1,500,000 and not exceeding two millions, was a fund neceſſary to carry on the Eaſt-India trade in a joint ſtock. 2. That no one perſon ſhould have any ſhare in a joint ſtock for the Eaſt-India trade exceeding 5000 l. either in his own name, or any other in truſt for him. 3. That no perſon ſhould have above one vote in the ſaid company; and that each perſon who had 500 l. ſtock therein, ſhould have one vote. 4. That the company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies ſhould be obliged to export every year in their trade goods, being the growth and manufacture of this nation, to the value of 200,000 l. at leaſt. 5. That no private contracts ſhould be made, but all goods ſold at public ſales by inch of candle, except ſalt-petre for the uſe of the crown. 6. That the Eaſt-India company be obliged to ſell to the king yearly ſalt-petre refined (the refraction not exceeding four or five per cent. out of one hundred and twelve) five hundred tuns, at the rate of 30 l. per tun. 7. That no lot ſhould be put up at any ſales in the Eaſt-India company at one time, exceeding 500 l. 8. That no perſon ſhould be governor or deputy-governor of the company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, who had leſs ſhare in the ſtock than 2000l. or committee-man, that had leſs than 1000l. 9. That the election of governor, deputy-governor, and committee for the company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, be made every year. 10. That all dividends be made in money. 11. That no dividends be made, without leaving a ſufficient fund to pay all debts, and carry on the trade. 12. That a valuation of the ſtock be made every five years by the accomptant of the company upon oath, to be ſeen by all ſuch as are concerned therein. 13. That no ſhips, either with permiſſion or without, for the future, be allowed to go to the Eaſt-Indies, except only ſuch as ſhould be of a company, or be eſtabliſhed by act of parliament. 14. That no by-laws ſhould be binding to the company, but ſuch as were approved by a general court of adventurers, and were not repugnant to the laws of the land. 15. And laſtly, that the joint-ſtock of a company to trade to the Eaſt-Indies be for twenty-one years, and no longer.'

The next day the three following reſolutions were added to the reſt, viz. 'That all perſons now having above the ſum of 5000l. in the ſtock of the preſent Eaſt-India company, in their own or other perſons names, be obliged to ſell ſo much thereof, as ſhould exceed the ſaid ſum of 5000l. at the rate of 100l. for every hundred. That the members of the committee of the Eaſt-India company be obliged to give ſecurity to be approved of by the houſe, that the ſtock and eſtate they now had, ſhould be made good 749,000l. all debts paid. And, laſtly, that (ſecurity being firſt given) an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to incorporate the preſent Eaſt-India company by charter, according to the regulations agreed upon by the houſe, that the ſame might paſs into an act.' On the 23d of December, ſir Thomas Cooke, ſir William Langhorne, ſir Thomas Rawlinſon, and others, the committee of the Eaſt-India company, delivered in propoſals concerning the ſecurity to be given; which being diſapproved, the ſaid committee was ordered to produce the perſons they propoſed to be ſecurity; which being done accordingly on the 29th of December, the commons, after a long examination of the whole matter, approved of the ſecurity propoſed, and on the 8th of January appointed a committee to prepare and bring in a bill to eſtabliſh an Eaſt-India company, according to the regulations agreed upon by the houſe; but it came to nothing. On the contrary, ſeveral petitions being preſented againſt it, to which the Eaſt-India company did not give ſatisfactory anſwers, the commons addreſſed the king to diſſolve it, and grant a charter to a new company. The king's anſwer was, 'It is a motion of very great importance to the trade of this kingdom; I will conſider of it, and in a ſhort time give the commons a poſitive anſwer.' However, he was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on ſir John Goldſborough, who was going to India in quality of the company's commiſſary-general.

[w] Charles Montague, afterwards earl of Halifax, diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the firſt conference as a manager for the commons. For the lords, were the duke of Bolton, the marquis of Halifax, the earls of Mulgrave, Rocheſter, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Stamford.

up; and that after the ſame was arrived, he then wanted proviſions. And he ſaid, that the reaſon why he ſtaid ſo long in Torbay after the wind ſerved to go out, was for want of orders from the admiralty, notwithſtanding he had ſent ſeveral times to their lordſhips for that purpoſe; it being one of the articles in his inſtructions, that whenever he came into port, he ſhould not ſtir out again but by orders from the admiralty.

On the 12th of November the commons were acquainted, that Mr. Bridges, a member of their houſe, could give an account of an information given him by a captain in their majeſties fleet, that ſir Ralph Delaval had lately taken a French boat going for Ireland, with papers of dangerous conſequence to the government. Whereupon Mr. Bridges was ordered to name the perſon; and he having named the lord Danby, a conference was deſired with the lords upon matters relating to the ſafety of the kingdom. Accordingly the lord Danby attending in his place in the houſe of lords, acquainted them, that he being on board ſir Ralph Delaval's ſhip, when the packet of papers was opened, which had been taken in the French prize, he ſaw, amongſt other papers, a copy of a letter from the earl of Nottingham to ſir Ralph. Whereupon being ordered by the houſe to put what he had then ſaid into writing, and to ſign it, he withdrew, and did the ſame accordingly. Preſently after a packet from ſir Ralph being brought to the earl of Nottingham, while he was in the houſe, he opened it before them, wherein were the papers taken in the ſaid prize; and ſir Ralph in his letter to his lordſhip ſaid the incloſed were all that were taken; which containing, as he thought, nothing of conſequence, he did not ſend them ſooner.

But the copy of the earl of Nottingham's letter not being amongſt them, lord Danby ſaid, there were not all the papers, he being confident he ſaw the abovementioned copy of the earl's letter; and named another captain of the ſaid ſquadron, who, as he believed, ſaw it as well as himſelf. Upon this ſir Ralph Delaval, (who had been ordered to attend the houſe of commons) the other captain, and the maſter of the French prize, were ordered to attend the houſe of lords.—But upon a full examination of the whole affair, it was found, that there was not a copy of any letter from the earl of Nottingham to ſir Ralph Delaval in the packet taken on board the French boat, but only a letter written by his lordſhip to ſir Ralph for ſending up the papers intercepted by him.—Upon this occaſion the commons took into their conſideration the confeſſion and examinations of the lord Preſton and Mr. Crone, which, according to their deſire, the king had ordered to be laid before the houſe.

About this time dr. James Welwood, a Scots phyſician, to ſignalize his affection to the government, employed his pen in detecting and expoſing the ſiniſter deſigns of their majeſties enemies in a weekly paper, intitled, Mercurius Reformatus, or, The New Obſervator. But his zeal having carried him ſo far as to reflect on the proceedings of the commons, that houſe, ever jealous of their privileges, ordered both the author and printer of the ſaid paper to be ſent for in cuſtody of their ſerjeant at arms; from whence they were at laſt diſcharged, after having been reprimanded for their offence. However, dr. Wellwood was fully recompenſed for the trouble and charge of his confinement, being ſoon after made one of the phyſicians in ordinary to his majeſty.[x]

[1691-2] About the middle of January many of the French proteſtants preſented a petition to the commons, praying the conſideration of that houſe in order to their relief. This petition having had but little effect, by reaſon of the multiplicity of affairs, that were depending in that houſe, thoſe diſtreſſed refugees applied themſelves to the king with their caſe in print, and their majeſties declaration of the 25th of April 1689, in their favour; both which the king commanded to be laid before the commons on the 17th of February.

A week after, the houſe conſidered his majeſty's meſſage, and the motion already made for a ſupply to be given towards the relief of the petitioners; but before they came to a reſolution, the king's affairs required their riſing, by a ſudden adjournment, which prevented the paſſing ſeveral bills, that were depending. Among theſe was a bill for aſcertaining the commiſſions and ſalaries of the judges, and to put it out of the king's power to ſtop them. The judges had their commiſſions, during their good behaviour; yet their ſalaries were not ſo ſecured to them, but that they were at the king's pleaſure. But the king put a ſtop to this, and refuſed to paſs the bill; for it was repreſented to him, by ſome of the judges themſelves, that it was not fit they ſhould be out of all dependance on the court; though it did not appear that there was any hurt in making judges, in all reſpects, free and independent.[y]

As the king was deſirous to be early in Holland, he came, on the 24th of February, to the houſe of peers, and paſſing ſeveral bills,[z] cloſed the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech to both houſes.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I return my hearty thanks to you all for the great demonſtrations you have given me of your affections in this ſeſſion, and for your zeal for the ſupport of the government.

" And I muſt thank you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons in particular, for the great ſupplies you have granted for the proſecution of the war. I aſſure you, I ſhall take care ſo to diſpoſe of the money you have given me for the public occaſions, as that the whole nation may be entirely ſatisfied with the application of it.

My lords and gentlemen,

" I think it proper to acquaint you with my intentions of going beyond ſea very ſpeedily; which I am afraid have been already retarded more than is convenient for the preſent poſture of affairs. And upon that account I think it neceſſary to put an end to this preſent meeting, the ſeaſon of the year being now ſo very far advanced, that it may prove of the laſt ill conſequence to continue it any longer."

Then the parliament was adjourned to the 12th of April, and afterwards prorogued by proclamation to the 29th of May.

The moſt material acts paſſed this ſeſſion were as follow:

1. An act for explaining and ſupplying the defects of the former laws for the ſettlement of the poor. As the poor had been taken care of by the monaſteries, it was neceſſary, after their diſſolution, to make laws about them. Accordingly, by an act of the 43d of Eliz. overſeers of the poor were firſt eſtabliſhed, who were to ſet to work the children of ſuch as could not keep them, to bind them apprentices; a boy to the age of twenty-four, a girl to the age of twenty-one, and to raiſe money for a ſtock of hemp, flax, &c. to employ ſuch as had no means to employ themſelves, and for the relief of the lame, old, and blind, that could not work. This act was continued by the 3d and 16th of Car. I. and by the ſtatute

[x] Several other affairs amuſed the houſe of commons to little purpoſe, as a bill 'for regulating abuſes in elections and returns to parliament,' which was rejected on the 12th of December, without pleading; a bill 'for the better improvement of the woollen manufacture of this kingdom,' which was alſo thrown out before a ſecond reading; a bill 'for the better repair of the harbour of Dover,' which was likewiſe rejected; a bill 'to regulate the hackney-coaches;' another 'to diſcourage the exportation of bullion, and encourage the importation of it, and converting the ſame into the coin of this this realm;' and a third 'to encourage privateers,' wherein no progreſs was made.

[y] The other bills that were depending were as follow.

1. 'A bill for leſſening the intereſt of money,' which the commons had paſſed, and ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.
2. 'For diſabling minors to marry without the conſent of their fathers or guardians, and for preventing clandeſtine marriages,' which the lords had ſent down to the commons.
3. 'For the paying of the army according to the muſters of effective men, puniſhing mutineers and deſerters, and preventing falſe muſters;' to which the lords had made ſome amendments, that occaſioned great diſputes.
4. 'Againſt the buying and ſelling of offices.'
5. 'For the better apprehending of high-way men.'
6. 'To prevent frauds by clandeſtine mortgages.'
7. 'Againſt duelling.'

[z] Acts paſſed this ſeſſion were,

1. An act for abrogating the oath of ſupremacy in Ireland, and appointing other oaths. When the bill was ſent up to the lords, the earl of Nottingham alledged, that it was in ſome parts contrary to the articles of capitulation of Limerick; upon which ſome amendments were made, particularly, that the lawyers of Limerick ſhould not be comprehended in the bill. This occaſioned two conferences between the houſes, the reſult of which was, that the lords at laſt concurred to the bill without their alterations. Pulteney's MS. Letter to Colt. Nov. 17, 1691.
2. An act for taking away clergy from ſome offenders, and to bring others to puniſhment.
3. An act againſt deer-ſtealers.
4. An act for the better repairing the high-ways, and for ſettling the rates of the carriage of goods.
5. An act for relief of creditors againſt fraudulent deviſes.

We

of the 13th and 14th of Car. II. Any poor man coming to ſettle in a tenement under ten pounds a year, may be removed to the place of his laſt ſettlement within forty days. Now by this act of the 3d and 4th of Will. and Mar. the forty days continuance in a pariſh, intended by the 13th and 14th of Car. II. to make a ſettlement, ſhall be accounted from the publication of a notice in writing, which the poor perſon ſhall deliver, of the houſe of his abode, and the number of his family, to the church-warden or overſeer of the poor; which notice is to be read publicly in the church the next Sunday, and regiſtered in a book, under a forfeiture of forty ſhillings to the poor of the pariſh.

2. An act for the encouragement of the breeding and feeding of cattle. By this act from the 1ſt of March 1691, any perſon may export into any part of the world, all ſorts of beef, pork, butter, cheeſe, and candles, free from any impoſition whatſoever.

3. An act for the better aſcertaining the tythes of hemp and flax. As the ſowing of theſe is very beneficial to England, by reaſon of the multitude of people employed in manufacturing them, and as the manner of tything them is exceeding difficult, creating many chargeable and vexatious ſuits; by this act every acre ſown with hemp or flax, is to pay a ſum not exceeding four ſhillings, before the ſame be carried off the ground.

As to the honours and preferments during the laſt year, John George, elector of Saxony, and Charles earl of Dorſet and Middleſex, were made knights of the garter. The earl of Pembroke was made privy-ſeal, and his place of commiſſioner of the admiralty given to lord Cornwallis. The lord viſcount Sidney, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, was made lord lieutenant of Ireland, ſir John Sommers was made attorney general in the room of ſir George Treby, advanced to the place of chief juſtice of the common-pleas. Sir Rowland Gwin was removed from the place of treaſurer of their majeſties chamber, for words reflecting on the lord viſcount Sidney[a]. The biſhoprick of Lincoln being vacant by the death of Dr. Barlow, was given to Dr. Thomas Tenniſon, who was recommended to the king for his exemplary piety, and moderation towards the diſſenters, whom the king ſtill endeavoured by all gentle methods, to bring over to the church[b].

Some changes were likewiſe made in Scotland, where affairs were put into another method. Lord Tweedale was made lord chancellor of that kingdom, lord Melvill appointed lord privy-ſeal, and moſt of his creatures were laid aſide. But ſeveral of thoſe who had been in Montgomery's plot, were brought into the council and miniſtry. Mr. Johnſton, who had been envoy extraordinary to the elector of Brandenburgh, was called home in February, and made joint-ſecretary of ſtate for that kingdom with the lord Stair. It began ſoon to appear there, how ill the king was adviſed, when he brought in ſome of the plotters into the chief poſts of that government. As this diſguſted the preſbyterians, ſo it was very viſible, that theſe pretended converts came into his ſervice, only to have it in their power to deliver up that kingdom to king James. They ſcarce diſguiſed their deſigns; ſo that the truſting ſuch men was aſtoniſhing to every body. The preſbyterians had very much offended the king; and their fury was inſtrumental in raiſing great jealouſies of him in England. He well foreſaw the ill effects, which this was like to have, and therefore recommended to the general aſſembly to receive the epiſcopal clergy, and to concur with them in the government of the church upon their deſiring to be admitted; and in caſe the aſſembly could not be brought to conſent to this, he ordered it to be diſſolved, without naming any other time or place of meeting. It was not very probable, that there could be any agreement, where both parties were ſo much inflamed one againſt another; and thoſe, who had the greateſt credit with both, ſtudied rather to exaſperate than to ſoften them. The epiſcopal party carried it high; they gave out that the king was now theirs; and that they

[a] We have a very particular account of this affair in the following letters of Mr. Warre, &c. to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

From Mr. Warre.

Whitehall, April 1, 1692.

"Sir Rowland Gwin acquainted the queen, that my lord Sidney ſold all the places in Ireland. The queen was ſurprized at it, and having taken ſome notice of it to his lordſhip, he earneſtly prayed it might be examined; and ſir Rowland was ordered to attend the council yeſterday, that he might produce his proofs. But I do not hear of any he gave, either then or this morning at the cabinet council; ſo that he is now commanded to attend the council on Thurſday next; and it is not believed he will be able to give any tolerable reaſon for this accuſation; at leaſt hitherto he has not pretended to any more than ſome general reports, no better than coffee-houſe talk; and ſome ſuch excuſe perhaps he may make on Thurſday next."

From another letter of the ſame date.

"I told you in my laſt, that ſir Rowland Gwin had made himſelf an affair with my lord Sidney, of which I can give a fuller account. About ten or twelve days ago, ſir Rowland went to the queen, and pretending a mighty zeal for her ſervice, took upon him to inform her of a great abuſe and corruption in diſpoſing of employments and offices in Ireland, for that they were all ſold to thoſe, that had moſt. The queen aſked him, whether he had acquainted my lord lieutenant with what he told her, that he might inquire into the abuſe, and give a ſtop to it: he anſwered, that his lordſhip was the unfitteſt man in the world to apply to in this matter, for that it was done by his order, and that he received the money. The queen was pleaſed to tell this to my lord Sidney, who reſenting it, as he had reaſon, ſent for ſir Rowland on Wedneſday was ſe'nnight to his houſe, who not imagining the occaſion of it, came to him. Our friend Mr. P. [Pulteney] was ordered by his lordſhip, to be preſent. When ſir Rowland came, my lord let him know what the queen had told him, and deſired to know, what grounds he had for the complaints he had made. Sir Rowland was ſurpriſed and quite out of countenance; he ſaid, he had no ill intention againſt his lordſhip, but only told it the queen as a report he had heard; and that his lordſhip might have an opportunity to juſtify himſelf. My lord told him, that if this had been his aim, he ſhould have come to himſelf firſt, and acquainted him with the ſcandal that was thrown upon him. In ſhort, my lord told him, that he would have the matter examined before the council, and that he ſhould produce his authors. Accordingly, my lord Nottingham wrote him a letter, to let him know, that it was the queen's pleaſure, that he ſhould attend the council yeſterday, to make good his charge againſt my lord Sidney; which method was obſerved by reaſon of his being a member of parliament; for otherwiſe it is probable a meſſenger would have fetched him.

"Yeſterday, when the council were met, we were all big with expectation to ſee what he had to ſay for himſelf; but we were diſappointed, for the buſineſs was not called for. The reaſon I cannot yet certainly learn; all I know is, that ſir Rowland came to the council-door, and deſired to ſpeak with my lord Nottingham, who came to him, and then ſir Rowland went away. We imagine it was to deſire farther time, or to make ſome other excuſe. Whatever it was, he gained that council-day by it; but there is ſince a ſecond and poſitive order ſent him to attend her majeſty in council on Thurſday next. You may believe my lord Sidney is reſolved to puſh the thing, and not let it fall till he has public reparation."

From Mr. Warre.

Whitehall, April 8, 1792.

"Yeſterday, the queen being preſent in council, ſir Rowland Gwin was called in, who as he had done before at the cabinet council, owned he had told the queen, that it was reported that places were ſold in Ireland, but denied to have ſaid, that my lord Sidney took the money for them, as the queen herſelf was pleaſed to declare he had. My lord Sidney gave the board an account likewiſe, that ſir Rowland had not at firſt diſowned the thing to him, but ſaid, he had no ill intention againſt his lordſhip, telling it as a report of the town, and that he would recollect himſelf, and endeavour to produce thoſe he heard it from. Mr. Pulteney, who was then preſent, declared the ſame thing; and Mr. Murray did likewiſe teſtify, that ſir Rowland had owned to them, that he had told the queen of the ſelling of places in Ireland.

"After which ſir Rowland was aſked, if he had any thing farther to ſay; and his anſwer was, 'Not before your lordſhips,' and ſo he went away. And after ſome debate of the matter it was reſolved, that it ſhould be entered upon the council-book, and publiſhed likewiſe in the next gazette, that the report ſir Rowland Gwin had carried to the queen about ſelling places in Ireland, &c. was groundleſs and ſcandalous; and that her majeſty is fully ſatisfied of the falſeneſs of it."

[b] The reſt of the honours and preferments were as follow:

William Harbord, Eſq; was appointed embaſſador extraordinary to the Ottoman port. He embarked the 10th of November 1691, for Holland, to proceed by the way of Vienna to Conſtantinople. The king had received a congratulatory letter from the Grand Seignior, deſiring his mediation for a peace with the emperor. About the middle of February, ſir William Phipps, knt. was appointed governor of the province of Maſſachuſets bay, and commander in chief of all the militia of New-England, and ſir Edmund Andros, knt. governor of Virginia; Benjamin Fletcher, eſq; governor of New York; and Samuel Allen, eſq; governor of New Hampſhire in New-England: the earl of Bedford was made lord lieutenant of the county of Middleſex; and ſir John Lowther, vice-chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, and Thomas Pelham, eſq; having reſigned their places, as commiſſioners of the treaſury, the ſame were diſpoſed of, the one to ſir Edward Seymour, and the other to Charles Montague, eſq; who had lately diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage, and ſignalized his zeal for the government, in the houſe of commons.

Two days after the king conferred the honour of knighthood upon Godfrey Kneller, Eſq; principal painter in ordinary to their majeſties. On the 17th of March, Anthony lord viſcount Falkland and Robert lord Lexington were ſworn of the privy-council; and on the 19th, Thomas Coningſby, Eſq; one of the lords juſtices of Ireland, was created a baron of that kingdom, by the title of baron Coningſby of Clanbrazile in the county of Armagh; and about a month after ſir Henry Capel was made baron Capel of Tewksbury, in the county of Glocester. On the 24th of March, Vere earl of Weſtmoreland, took the uſual oaths as joint lord lieutenant of the county of Kent, with Henry lord viſcount Sidney; and Charles lord Lanſdown was ſworn likewiſe joint lord lieutenant of the county of Devon and Cornwall, with John earl of Bath; and in May, Thomas Trevor, Eſq; was made ſolicitor-general.

were willing to come to a concurrence with preſbytery, on deſign to bring all about to epiſcopacy in a little time. The preſbyterians, who at all times were ſtiff and peeviſh, were more than ordinarily ſo at this time; they were jealous of the king; their friends were now diſgraced, and their bittereſt enemies were coming into favour. They continued therefore obſtinate, and would abate in no point of their government; upon which the aſſembly was diſſolved. But they pretended, that by law they had a right to an annual meeting, from which nothing could cut them off; alledging, according to a diſtinction much uſed amongſt them, that the king's power of calling ſynods and aſſemblies was cumulative and not privative; that is, he might call them if he would, and appoint time and place; but that if he did not call them, they might meet by an inherent right which the church had, and which was confirmed by law. Therefore they adjourned themſelves. This was repreſented to the king as a high ſtrain of inſolence, that invaded the rights of the crown, of which he was become very ſenſible; and moſt of thoſe, who came now into his ſervice, made it their buſineſs to incenſe him againſt the preſbyterians, in which he was ſo far engaged, that it alienated that party much from him.

About this time likewiſe, a very barbarous maſſacre was committed at Glencoe, which occaſioned great reflections on the king, though it was done without his knowledge, as will plainly appear, when in the courſe of the hiſtory, an account is given of the proceedings of the Scots parliament when this affair was taken into conſideration.

But the moſt remarkable incident which happened in England during this ſeſſion; was the diſgrace of the earl of Marlborough, which had very ill effects. The earl of Nottingham came to him ſome day in January, with a meſſage from the king, telling him, that he had no more uſe for his ſervice, and therefore demanded all his commiſſions [c]. What drew ſo ſudden and ſo hard a meſſage, was not known: for he had been with the king that morning, and had parted with him in the ordinary manner. It ſeemed ſome letter was intercepted, which gave ſuſpicion. It is certain, that the earl thought he was too little conſidered, and had upon many occaſions cenſured the king's conduct, and reflected upon the Dutch [d]. But the original cauſe of his diſgrace, is ſuppoſed by biſhop Burnet, to ariſe from another conſideration, namely, the motion made in parliament for a ſettlement on the princeſs of Denmark, independent of the king, which, as has been obſerved, was imputed to the counteſs of Marlborough, as moſt in favour with the princeſs.

Upon the earl's diſgrace, his counteſs was forbid the court, and the princeſs was deſired to diſmiſs her from her family [e]. But to this ſhe would not ſubmit. She thought ſhe ought to be allowed to keep what perſons ſhe pleaſed about herſelf. And when the queen inſiſted on the thing, [c] His poſt of lieutenant-general of the infantry was given to major-general Talmaſh, that of colonel of the third troop of horſe guards to the lord Colcheſter, that of colonel of a regiment of fuzileers to the lord George Hamilton, afterwards earl of Orkney, and that of gentleman of his majeſty's bed-chamber to the lord Lanſdown. MS. letter of Mr. Pulteney to ſir William Dutton Colt, from Whitehall, January 22, 1691-2.

[d] It was ſaid that all the reſentment was for the liberty he had taken to tell the king, "that though he had no reaſon to complain, yet many of his good ſubjects were ſorry to ſee his royal munificence confined to two or three foreign lords." The earls of Portland and Rochford, both Dutchmen, are ſuppoſed to be meant. Whereupon the king is ſaid to turn his back without making any anſwer, and ſoon after diſmiſſed him from all his employments; nor was he employed again, or called to council, till after the peace of Ryſwick. Life of the D. of Marl. I. 71.

Monſieur Bernard (in his hiſtorical letters for Feb. 1692. p. 209.) ſays, "It is very difficult to penetrate into the true reaſon of the earl of Marlborough's diſgrace, and you cannot imagine how many different conjectures there are upon this head. You know, that the earl was the favourite of king James, who from a very moderate fortune raiſed him to a condition capable of ſatisfying the moſt ambitious perſon. He was one of the firſt that went over to the preſent king, which gained him the eſteem of all the Engliſh, who loved the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of their nation. His firſt engagements have made ſome perſons ſuſpect, that he might have renewed ſome correſpondence with his old maſter. But it is thought by others, that if this were the caſe, it would have coſt him more than the loſs of his employments. Others are of opinion, that he has had a diſpute with ſome lords of the court, who are in an higher favour than himſelf; and that the king ſeeing him in the wrong, and being apprehenſive that the conſequences of ſuch diſputes might be very inconvenient, has thought proper to remove him. Some are perſuaded that his lady has been in the fault by talking a little too much. Others ſuppoſe, that he has ſhewn ſome diſcontent, becauſe he had not the command of the Engliſh troops conferred on him, and intimated that he thought himſelf not ſufficiently confided in. Others trace the matter higher, and alledge, that after the taking of Cork and Kinſale, where the earl commanded the army, he expected to be made a duke, and maſter of the ordnance, which not being granted him, he has ever ſince ſhewn great diſſatisfaction."

It is alſo ſaid that the king having formed a deſign upon Dunkirk, and communicated it to the earl of Marlborough and two others, found he was betrayed. Upon which, ſending for each of the three perſons ſeparately, he taxed them with breach of truſt. Two denied it, and took their oaths of it, the king himſelf ſwearing them; but the earl of Marlborough refuſing to ſwear, owned at laſt, that he had told it to his wife, who is ſuppoſed to have acquainted her ſiſter the lady Tyrconnel with the ſecret, by whom it was revealed to the king's enemies. The two others intruſted with the ſecret are ſaid to be the marquis of Carmarthen and the earl of Shrewſbury.

[e] This event (ſays the ducheſs of Marlborough, in the Account of her conduct, p. 41.) might perhaps be well accounted for, by ſaying that lord Portland had ever a great prejudice to my lord Marlborough, and that my lady Orkney (then Mrs. Villiers) though I had never done her any injury, except not making court to her, was my implacable enemy. But I think, it is not doubted, that the principal cauſe of the king's meſſage, was the court's diſlike that any body ſhould have ſo much intereſt with the princeſs as I had; who would not implicitly obey every command of the king and queen. The diſgrace of my lord Marlborough therefore, was deſigned as a ſtep towards removing me from about her. The following letter from the queen to her ſiſter, affords grounds for this opinion.

Kenſington, Friday the 5th of Feb.

"Having ſomething to ſay to you, which I know will not be very pleaſing, I chuſe rather to write it firſt, being unwilling to ſurpriſe you; though, I think, what I am going to tell you, ſhould not, if you give yourſelf the time to think, that never any body was ſuffered to live at court in my lord Marlborough's circumſtances. I need not repeat the cauſe he has given the king to do what he has done, nor his unwillingneſs at all times to come to ſuch extremities, though people do deſerve it.

"I hope you do me the juſtice to believe, it is as much againſt my will, that I now tell you, that, after this, it is very unfit lady Marlborough ſhould ſtay with you, ſince that gives her huſband ſo juſt a pretence of being where he ought not.

"I think I might have expected you ſhould have ſpoke to me of it. And the king and I, both believing it, made us ſtay thus long. But ſeeing you was ſo far from it, that you brought lady Marlborough hither laſt night, makes us reſolve to put it off no longer, but tell you ſhe muſt not ſtay; and that I have all the reaſon imaginable to look upon your bringing her as the ſtrangeſt thing that ever was done. Nor could all my kindneſs for you (which is ever ready to turn all you do the beſt way, at any other time) have hindered me ſhewing you that moment, but I conſidered your condition, and that made me maſter myſelf ſo far, as not to take notice of it then.

"But now I muſt tell you, it was very unkind in a ſiſter, would have been very uncivil in an equal, and I need not ſay I have more to claim. Which, though my kindneſs would make me never exact, yet when I ſee the uſe you would make of it, I muſt tell you, I know what is due to me, and expect to have it from you. 'Tis upon that account, I tell you plainly, lady Marlborough muſt not continue with you in the circumſtances her lord is.

"I know this will be uneaſy to you, and am ſorry for it: and it is very much ſo to me to ſay all this to you, for I have all the real kindneſs imaginable for you, and as I ever have, ſo will always do my part to live with you as ſiſters ought. That is, not only like ſo near relations, but like friends. And as ſuch, I did think to write to you. For I would have made myſelf believe your kindneſs for her made you at firſt forget that you ſhould have for the king and me; and reſolved to put you in mind of it myſelf, neither of us being willing to come to harſher ways.

"But the ſight of lady Marlborough having changed my thoughts, does naturally alter my ſtile. And ſince by that I ſee how little you ſeem to conſider what even in common civility, you owe us, I have told it you plainly; but withall aſſure you, that let me have never ſo much reaſon to take any thing ill of you, my kindneſs is ſo great, that I can paſs over moſt things, and live with you as becomes me. And I deſire to do ſo merely from that motive. For I do love you as a ſiſter, and nothing but yourſelf can make me do otherwiſe. And that is the reaſon I chuſe to write this, rather than tell it you, that you may overcome your firſt thoughts; and when you have well conſidered, you will find, that though the thing be hard (which I again aſſure you, I am ſorry for) yet it is not unreaſonable, but what has ever been practiſed, and what you yourſelf would do, were you in my place.

"I will end this with once more deſiring you to conſider the matter impartially, and take time for it. I do not deſire an anſwer preſently, becauſe I would not have you give a raſh one. I ſhall come to your drawing-room to-morrow before you play, becauſe you know why I cannot make one. At ſome other time we ſhall reaſon the buſineſs calmly: which I will willingly do, or any thing elſe that may ſhew, it ſhall not be my fault if we do not live kindly together: nor will I ever be other by choice, but your truly loving and affectionate ſiſter,

M. R.

To this letter the princeſs ſent the following anſwer.

"Your majeſty was in the right to think your letter would be very ſurpriſing to me. For you muſt needs be ſenſible enough of the kindneſs I have for my lady Marlborough, to know, that a command from you to part with her muſt be the greateſt mortification in the world to me; and indeed of ſuch a nature, as I might well have hoped your kindneſs to me would have always prevented. I am ſatisfied ſhe cannot have been guilty of any fault to you. And it would be extremely to her advantage, if I could here repeat every word that ever ſhe had ſaid to me of you in her whole life. I confeſs, it is no ſmall addition to my trouble to find the want of your majeſty's kindneſs to me upon this occaſion; ſince I am ſure I have always endeavoured to deſerve it by all the actions of my life.

"Your care of my preſent condition is extremely obliging. And, if you would be pleaſed to add to it ſo far, as upon my account to recall your ſevere command (as I muſt beg leave to call it, in a matter ſo tender to me, and ſo little reaſonable, as I think, to be impoſed upon me, that you would ſcarce require it from the meaneſt of your ſubjects) I ſhould ever acknowledge it as a very agreeable mark of your kindneſs to me. And I muſt as freely own, that as I think this proceeding can be for no other intent than to give ſhe retired from the court. There were no doubt ill offices done on all hands, as there were ſome that preſſed the princeſs to ſubmit to the queen, as well as others who preſſed the queen to paſs it over, but without effect. Both had engaged themſelves, before they had well reflected on the conſequences of ſuch a breach, which continued to the end of the queen's life, and was by her carried ſo far, that beſides other leſſer matters, ſhe ordered that no publick honours ſhould be ſhewed the princeſs. The enemies of the government tried what could be made of this to create diſtractions, but the princeſs gave no encouragement to them. So this miſunderſtanding had no other effect, but to give her enemies much ill-natured joy, and a ſecret ſpiteful diverſion.

The king having ſettled affairs at home, embarked for Holland the 5th of March, and arriving the next morning in the Maeſe, landed at Orange Polder, went the ſame day to the Hague, and not long after to Loo.

The King had ſcarce reached Holland before the jacobites began to be elevated with the hopes of their maſter's reſtoration. One Lunt, who was employed to bring over and diſperſe king James's commiſſions, having had the good fortune to be diſcharged from impriſonment, was again entertained in 1691 by the Lancaſhire papiſts to enliſt men, and buy arms, that if the king ſhould be taken off in Flanders, (for which a project was laid, as will hereafter be ſeen) they might be ready for an inſurrection in England, as ſoon as the blow was given. Theſe preparations having ſpent the ſummer of the year 1691, and the campaigns in Flanders being ended, without any news, either of the aſſaſſination or invaſion, Lunt was ſent in November into France, to acquaint the abdicated king, that they were in a condition to receive him, and therefore deſired him to inform them, when his affairs would permit him to make a deſcent into this kingdom. Lunt returned in December following with advice, that king James would be in England the next ſpring; and that in the mean time colonel Parker, and others, ſhould be ſent over with full inſtructions how to put themſelves into a poſture fit for his majeſty's reception; for now the deſcent from la Hogue was reſolved upon.

Parker and Johnſon the prieſt, who in conjunction with ſome few others, had projected the intended murder of the king, and with many the invaſion, landed in England about the latter end of January 1691-2. And thinking the aſſaſſination to be the only means to make the invaſion practicable, and the conqueſt of England eaſy, they communicated this deſign to as many as they could truſt, in hopes, (as Mr. Goodman depoſed before the ſecretary of ſtate) to have done it before the king went to Holland. But they were ſo long in contriving how, by whom, when, and where it was to be done, that the time elapſed before their conſultations came to maturity. However Parker aſſured them that the aſſaſſination-plot would be reaſſumed in Flanders by the ſame perſons, who had undertaken it laſt campaign; which encouraged the jacobites to make preparations for what was to follow, namely the invaſion.

The ſcheme of this deſcent was laid in France, and Parker and others were ſent over to communicate it to the jacobite party here. This Parker did (according to the depoſitions of captain Blaire before the Privy council) by calling their general officers and confederates together, and acquainting them, 'That their old maſter had now obtained of the moſt Chriſtian king thirty thouſand effective men; and that, when the ſpring was a little more advanced, king James, who was already marching into Normandy, would be wafted over with them into England; with aſſurance, that if that number was not great enough to reduce his rebellious ſubjects, France would ſpare him thirty thouſand more.' Therefore he deſired all to be in readineſs with the utmoſt ſpeed and ſecrecy imaginable; and addreſſing himſelf particularly to captain Blaire (at the inſtance of Johnſon the Prieſt) told him, 'That he was going to command in Lancaſhire, but intended to move ſouthward at his majeſty's landing; and therefore deſired the captain to join him, in regard his own men were raw, and the captain's for the moſt part, were all old officers and ſoldiers.'

[1692] In this interval king James's queen being big with child, and drawing near her time, he ſent a letter to ſeveral lords and others of his late privy council, requiring ſuch of them as could poſſibly come, to attend him at St. Germains, to be witneſſes of his queen's labour. The letter was alſo directed to ſeveral ladies, as well as to the wives of ſome commoners, but the invitation was not accepted by any of them [f].

Not long after king James ſent over his declaration, dated at St. Germains, April 20, 1692. to this effect, 'That whereas the king of France, according to his promiſe, had put him into a way of endeavouring his reſtoration, and to that end had lent as many troops, as were abundantly ſufficient to untie the hands of his ſubjects, and to make it ſafe for them to return to their duty, and repair to his ſtandard; and yet purpoſely give me a very ſenſible mortification, ſo there is no miſery that I cannot readily reſolve to ſuffer rather than the thoughts of parting with her. If, after all this that I have ſaid, I muſt ſtill find myſelf ſo unhappy as to be farther preſſed in this matter, yet your majeſty may be aſſured that, as my paſt actions have given the greateſt teſtimony of my reſpect both for the king and you, ſo it ſhall always be my endeavour, wherever I am, to preſerve it carefully for the time to come, as becomes,

From the Cockpit,
Feb. 6th, 1692.

"Your Majeſty's
"very affectionate ſiſter
"and ſervant,
"ANNE."

To this the princeſs received no anſwer, but a meſſage by the lord chamberlain 'To forbid the counteſs of Marlborough's continuing any longer at the Cockpit.' Upon this the princeſs left the Cockpit, and removed to Sion houſe, which ſhe borrowed of the duke of Somerſet.

[f] The letter was directed not only to privy councillors but to the ducheſſes of Somerſet and Beaufort, the marchioneſſes of Hallifax, the counteſſes of Derby, Mulgrave, Rutland, Brooks, Nottingham, Lumley, and Danby; the ladies Fitz-harding, and Fretchville, and to the wives of ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker, ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, ſir Thomas Stamp, mayor; ſir William Aſhurſt, and ſir Richard Levett, the two ſheriffs, and laſtly to Dr. Chamberlain, the famous man-midwife. The letter was as follows:

JAMES, R.

"Right truſty and well beloved couſin and counſellor, we greet you well. Whereas our royal predeceſſors uſed to call ſuch of their privy council, as could conveniently be had, to be preſent at the labour of their queens, and witneſſes of the births of their children; and that we have followed their example at the birth of our deareſt ſon James Prince of Wales; however that precaution was not enough to hinder us from the malicious aſperſions of ſuch as were reſolved to deprive us of our royal right; that we may not be wanting to ourſelf, now it hath pleaſed Almighty God, the ſupporter of truth, to give us hopes of further iſſue, our dear conſort the queen being big, and drawing near her time, we have thought fit to require ſuch of our privy council as can come, to attend us here at St. Germains, to be witneſſes to our ſaid conſort the queen's labour. We do hereby ſignify this our royal pleaſure to you, that you may uſe all poſſible means to come with what convenient haſte you can, the queen looking about the middle of May next. And that you may have no ſcruple on our ſide, our dear brother the moſt Chriſtian king has given his royal word and promiſe to you, as we hereby do, that you ſhall have leave to come, and, the queen's labour being over, to return with all ſafety. The iniquity of the times, the tyranny of ſtrangers, and miſled party of our own ſubjects, brought us under the neceſſity of uſing this unuſual way; yet we hope it will convince the world of the truth and candour of our proceedings, to the mortification of our enemies. We, not doubting of your compliance herewith, bid you heartily farewell. Given at our court at the caſtle of St. Germains, the 2d of April, N. S. 1692, and in the eighth of our reign."

This letter was animadverted upon in a pamphlet, printed the ſame year, and intitled, 'The late King James's letter to his privy councillors; with juſt reflections upon it, and upon the pretended prince of Wales; and a ſhort account of the judgment of the Parliament 1 Edw. IV. in confutation of the author of The caſe of allegiance to a king in poſſeſſion; with the reaſons why the ſham birth hath not been publickly expoſed.' The author of this piece obſerves, "That the birth of the pretended prince of Wales would have been leſs ſuſpected, if all the witneſſes, who ſwore materially, were not to be thought parties; if the biſhops had not been ſent to the Tower, as it were on purpoſe to remove the neceſſity of ſending for the then archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had not at that time reſigned himſelf up to the French intereſt; if there had been credible proof of the late queen's having been with child before ſhe was brought to bed; and ſhe had not paſſed the years at which it was uſual for Italian women to bear children."

He takes notice afterwards, 'That ſome men whoſe crimes in former reigns, and profeſſed enmity to the liberties of England, had engaged them in a party, which oppoſed the acceſſion of their majeſties to the imperial throne of this realm, after they had invited his majeſty's arms, and importuned him to take upon him the adminiſtration, raiſed a great clamour upon the ſilence of parliaments in relation of the putative prince of Wales, as if it were a tacit admiſſion, that he was real. But certainly in this the parliaments choſe to ſhew, that the government is ſettled upon ſuch a bottom, as makes it not the leaſt material, whether prince or no prince; well knowing, that the convention, which afterwards became a parliament, upon acting under a legal head, (as did the parliament, which afterwards turned into a convention by the diſpoſal of Richard II. acted with Henry IV.) exerciſed a power, which was veſted in them by the conſtitution of this monarchy, and followed the wiſe examples of Henry VIII. and queen Elizabeth of glorious memory. Henry VIII. though he had baſtardized both his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, yet ſettled the crown upon them both ſucceſſively, in remainder after his ſon Edward, without taking off the illegitimation of either daughter: whereby he certainly placed the right of their ſucceſſions upon a ſurer foundation, from the authority of the king and ſtates to diſpoſe of the crown, than if he had declared either of the ſiſters to be legitimate. Nor indeed would he have done this without ſhewing at the ſame time that one was illegitimate, the queſtion being, Whether the mother of Mary, or the mother of Elizabeth had full opportunity and power to cauſe the act, which baſtardized her to be repealed, eſpecially after the proteſtant religion was thoroughly ſettled, and that party cruſhed, who held the pope's authority to make good the marriage of Henry VIII. with his brother's wife carnally known by him; yet ſhe wiſely contented herſelf with a title derived from that conſtitution of the monarchy, by virtue of which the crown had been ſettled, rather than to fetch one from heaven by a divine right of birth." State Tracts II. p. 234.

declined ſending over ſuch numerous forces, as might raiſe any jealouſies in the minds of any of his good ſubjects, as if he intended to take the work out of their hands, and deprive them of ſo glorious an action, as the reſtoration of their lawful king (all which troops he promiſed to ſend away, as ſoon as he was put into peaceable poſſeſſion.) Though the thing ſpoke for itſelf, and he did not think himſelf obliged to ſay any more upon the occaſion, than that he came to aſſert his own juſt rights, and to deliver his people from the oppreſſions they lay under; yet conſidering how ſtrangely they were deluded by the prince of Orange's declaration, and to prevent as much as in him lay the ſame for the future, he was willing to look back and take the matter from the beginning. And it could not be forgotten, that as ſoon as he had notice of the prince's intentions to invade him, he put himſelf both by ſea and land into the beſt poſture of defence he was able, and ſeemed to have done the ſame ſo effectually, that though the French king offered him conſiderable ſuccours, he refuſed them, and threw himſelf wholly upon the fidelity of the Engliſh army; and at the ſame time applied himſelf to give reaſonable ſatisfaction to the minds of his good ſubjects, and undeceive them in reſpect to the danger of the intended invaſion. But they perceived it not till it was too late, and the defection grown ſo general, that he was at length neceſſitated to retire into France, in order to avoid the preſent danger, which threatened him, and to preſerve himſelf for better times, and a more happy opportunity, which was then put into his hands.

"Upon what foundation of juſtice or common ſenſe, the prince's faction in England were pleaſed to treat his eſcape out of the hands of his enemies in the ſtile of an abdication, which was never before uſed to ſignify any thing but a voluntary reſignation; but upon which they built ſuch a ſuperſtructure, as to make an ancient hereditary monarchy become elective. He then proceeds to ſhew the miſeries and inconveniencies, which he ſuppoſes had already, and would ſtill attend ſuch unwarrantable proceedings; inſiſts upon the indiſputable title of his only ſon, hoping his queen was then with child of another; ſets forth the calamitous condition of Europe, by reaſon of that war, an end of which there could be no reaſonable proſpect of till his reſtoration; prohibits his ſubjects to pay any taxes to ſupport the preſent uſurpation; and to gain them all over to his ſervice, he declares he would pardon all of them who ſhould return to their duty (except the perſons hereafter named) provided all magiſtrates, upon notice of his landing, made ſome public manifeſtation of their allegiance to him, and ſubmiſſion to his authority.

"And he further declared, that if any of the ſoldiery, who were in the prince's ſervice, ſhould come in to him, they ſhould be pardoned, and have their pay and arrears. He likewiſe promiſed to maintain the church of England, and earneſtly recommended to his parliament the ſettling of liberty of conſcience; and, in a word, to do every thing that might tend to the honour and welfare of the nation."[g]

When Parker went into Lancaſhire, he took with him ſeveral good officers, ſome of whom ſtayed with him in that county, and others he diſpoſed of in Yorkſhire and the biſhopric of Durham. His head-quarters were at Mr. Walmſley's at Dungan-Hall, from whence he iſſued out his orders. And becauſe their arms were, for fear of a diſcovery, hid in woods and grounds, or buried between walls and in cellars and out-houſes, he ordered them all to be taken out, and immediately diſtributed among the officers and inliſted men; while Mr. James Fountaine, as lieutenant-colonel to the lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, were compleating each a regiment of horſe in London, to join king James at his landing. For by this time that king, with his army of Engliſh, Scots, Iriſh, and French, was at la Hogue, ready to embark for England. And at the ſame time the jacobites here ſent captain Lloyd expreſs to the lord Melfort, to acquaint him that they had corrupted ſeveral of the Engliſh ſea-commanders, particularly rear-admiral Carter,[h] and with that falſe intelligence they tranſmitted to him an exact liſt of the number and rates of the Engliſh fleet, and how long it would be before it was poſſible they could be joined by the Dutch; deſiring him to lay it before his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and to procure his command to marſhal de Tourville to ſeek and immediately to fight the Engliſh, before they could be reinforced by the Hollanders. Upon the receipt of this meſſage, the lord Melfort applied himſelf to the king of France, who immediately gave his poſitive commands to Tourville to engage the Engliſh fleet, without waiting for the Thoulon ſquadron under Monſ. d'Eſtrees.

The queen being informed of theſe preparations, gave orders for haſtening out the fleet, and putting the militia in readineſs. She ſent over for three regiments of foot, Selwin's, Beveridge's, and Lloyd's, from Holland, under the command of lieutenant-general Talmaſh, which, together with ſome other troops remaining then in the kingdom, formed afterwards a camp near Portſmouth. And to be better [g] The exceptions were, the duke of Ormond, the marquis of Winchester, the earls of Sunderland, Bath, Danby, and Nottingham, and the lords Newport, Delamere, Wiltſhire, Colchester, Cornbury, Dunblain, and Churchill; the biſhops of London and St. Aſaph; ſir Robert Howard, ſir John Worden, ſir Samuel Grimſtone, ſir Stephen Fox, ſir George Treby, ſir Bazil Dixwell, ſir James Oxendon, dr. John Tillotſon, dean of Canterbury, dr. Gilbert Burnet, Francis Ruſſel, Richard Leviſon, and John Trenchard, Eſquires; Charles Duncomb, citizen of London, ——— Edwards, ——— Stapleton, ——— Hunt, fiſhermen, and all others, who had offered perſonal indignities to him at Feverſham, or 'had an hand in the barbourous murther of Mr. John Aſhton, and of Mr. Croſs, or of any others who had been illegally condemned and executed for their loyalty; and all ſpies, and ſuch as had betrayed his counſels during his late abſence from England.' This declaration was anſwered by dr. W. Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph, in a pamphlet printed in 1692, under the title of 'A ſecond letter to a friend concerning a French invaſion,' in which the declaration lately diſperſed under the title of his majeſty's moſt gracious declaration to all his loving ſubjects, commanding their aſſiſtance againſt the prince of Orange and his adherents, is entirely and exactly publiſhed, according to the diſperſed copies; with ſome ſhort obſervations upon it.

He obſerves, 'That there is nothing in the declaration, which a reaſonable man, who remembered king James's reign, eſpecially the concluſion of it, would have expected in it. If the deſign, ſays he, of ſuch a declaration be to give ſatisfaction to the minds of the ſubjects, it ought at leaſt to have contained as good words, and fair promiſes, as a prince could give. He knew very well what it was that had alienated his ſubjects from him; that they apprehended their laws, their religion, and their liberties, to be in great danger; and could not but know, that he had given them too juſt occaſion for ſuch jealouſies and fears. And it is wonderful that he ſhould think of publiſhing a declaration, and not think fit to give the leaſt ſatisfaction about theſe matters; not to ſay one word about popery and arbitrary power; nor to give any expreſs promiſes that he would remove theſe fears. The only thing he appeals to is the juſtice of his cauſe; and does not think himſelf 'obliged to ſay any thing more upon this occaſion, than that he comes to aſſert his own juſt rights,' &c. But this was not the controverſy between him and his people; they did not diſpute then his right to the crown (though they have ſome reaſon to do it now) and yet were willing to part with him, when he thought fit to leave them; and if he knew what made them ſo, and hoped to return again by their aſſiſtance, and with their good liking, any one but thoſe of his own council would have thought him obliged to ſay ſomething of it.'

He then vindicates the prince of Orange, from the reflections caſt upon him in the declaration, and denies that he afterwards appeared to be any other than his own declaration had repreſented him. 'He came not for the crown, but to reform abuſes, and to ſecure the ſucceſſion, which the right of his princeſs, and his own right and intereſt, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and of the liberties of Europe, gave him a right and authority to meddle with. But beſides his expectation, and original intention, he has the crown, which he came not for. He has deceived nobody in it; but if any one be deceived, king James and the people of England have deceived him; the one in leaving the crown, and the other in placing it on his head, where indeed it ought to be, both in right of his princeſs, and for his own merits; for he who ſaves a nation, had he no other claim or title, may very well deſerve to wear the crown, eſpecially when it was with the free conſent of the princeſs, our moſt gracious queen, and upon the deſires of the eſtates of the realm, and ſtill neceſſary to ſave the nation.' He afterwards endeavours to ſhew, that the French king was author of all the preſent wars in Europe. 'Who, ſays he, has been the great diſturber of the peace of Europe, but his moſt Chriſtian majeſty? With whom are all the princes of Europe at war but with him? Who elſe has hindered the ſucceſs againſt the common enemy, and the enlarging the bounds of the Chriſtian empire? Who invited the Turk into Europe? Who encourages him to continue the war after ſo many fatal defeats, which may probably prove the ruin of his whole empire? In a word, what other Chriſtian prince is the great Turk's ally and confederate in this war? And is not this war continued and encouraged by all the power and intereſt of the French king, on purpoſe to diſturb the peace of Europe, that, while the Imperial forces are otherwiſe employed, he may make a prey of his weaker neighbours? Who but the late king could hope to perſuade the world, that to reſtore him to his kingdom is abſolutely neceſſary to the peace of Europe; that before his reſtoration no rational projects of a treaty can be formed in order to a peace? He may be miſtaken in this, for the French king may quickly be glad to make a peace, and leave him and his reſtoration out of the treaty. For things are come to that extremity now, that it is in vain to think of peace, till Lewis the Great be reduced to ſuch a ſtate as to accept it, and unable to break it. And this argument returns upon him; for the peace of Europe is a neceſſary reaſon why he ſhould not be reſtored.'

With regard to king James's promiſes to protect and defend the church of England, the writer obſerves, that this would be a great favour indeed from him, if he ſhould return with a French power. 'But the church of England, ſays he, is protected already by princes, who think it their duty to do it; and we think ourſelves much ſafer in the inclinations of a proteſtant king and queen, than we can be in all the promiſes of a zealous papiſt. And therefore this can be no argument in our caſe, becauſe it offers us a worſe ſecurity for our protection, than what we already have; for it is always great odds on nature's ſide. And yet this promiſe to the church of England ſeems fainter and cooler than ſome he has formerly made; which is all the reaſon we have to expect it will be be better kept, eſpecially there not being the leaſt intimation of the breach of his former promiſes, nor any excuſe made for it.' State Tracts, II. 253.

[h] Carter it ſeems had been applied to by them, and having given the government intimation of it, he was ordered to humour the thing; which he did ſo effectually, that they credulouſly gave into it, to the deſtruction of their plot and their confederate's fleet.

ſecured from the dangers of an inſurrection, ſhe publiſhed a proclamation on the 4th of May, 'commanding all papiſts and reputed papiſts forthwith to depart from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and from within ten miles of the ſame:' and to provide for the advice and aſſiſtance of a fitting parliament, ſhe publiſhed another proclamation on the 5th of May, requiring the attendance of the members of both houſes on the 24th of May, a day, to which the parliament had been prorogued, declaring, 'That they ſhould on that day meet and ſit for the diſpatch of ſuch weighty and important affairs, as may be requiſite for the ſafety of the kingdom, in a time when it was threatened with a powerful invaſion from abroad.'

In the next place ſhe cauſed a diligent ſearch to be made after ſeveral of the moſt diſaffected perſons, and ordered warrants to be iſſued out againſt them, upon which they withdrawing themſelves from their uſual places of abode, and being fled from juſtice, ſhe publiſhed a proclamation on the 9th of May, to diſcover, take, and apprehend the earls of Scarſdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore, the lord Griffin, the lord Forbes, eldeſt ſon of the earl of Granard, James Griffin, ſir John Fenwick, ſir Theophilus Oglethorpe, ſir Andrew Foreſter, colonel Henry Slingſby, James Graham, Mr. Orby, ſecond ſon of ſir Thomas Orby, deceaſed, colonel Edward Sackville, Oliver St. George, ſon of ſir Oliver St. George, major Thomas Soaper, Charles Adderly, David Lloyd, George Porter, ſon of Thomas Porter, deceaſed, and Edward Stafford.[i]

And to be the better guarded, ſhe ordered the militia of Weſtminſter, being two regiments of foot of about fifteen hundred men each, and a troop of horſe to appear in Hyde-park on Monday, May the 9th, under the earl of Bedford, lord lieutenant of Middleſex; and the next day the trained bands of the city of London, in ſix regiments, under the command of the lord mayor and other their reſpective colonels, conſiſting together of about ten thouſand men, were drawn out in the ſame place. Her majeſty was pleaſed to go in perſon among them on both days, and was extremely ſatisfied with the good order they appeared in, and the great zeal and readineſs which they ſhewed for her ſervice. And becauſe a malicious and dangerous report was ſpread abroad, as if ſome of the officers of the fleet were diſaffected to the ſervice, and that the queen had thereupon ordered the diſcharge of many of them from their employments, ſhe commanded the earl of Nottingham to acquaint admiral Ruſſel, that ſhe was ſatisfied that this report was induſtriouſly raiſed by the enemies of the government; and that ſhe repoſed ſo entire a confidence in their fidelity and zeal for their majeſties ſervice, and the defence of their country, that ſhe had reſolved not to diſplace any of them.

Whether any of the ſea-officers were ſtaggering in their duty, is uncertain; but however, it was good policy in the queen to ſend this meſſage; which was no ſooner communicated to them by admiral Ruſſel, but ſir John Aſhby, admiral of the blue; ſir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red; Mr. Rooke, vice-admiral of the blue; ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, rear-admiral of the red; Mr. Carter, rear-admiral of the blue; and the other commanders of the fleet, unanimouſly ſubſcribed an addreſs, wherein they aſſured her majeſty, 'That they would with all imaginable alacrity and reſolution venture their lives in the defence of their majeſties undoubted rights, and the liberty and religion of their country, againſt all foreign and popiſh invaders whatſoever.' This addreſs being preſented to the queen by the commiſſioners of the admiralty, her majeſty ſaid, 'That ſhe always had this opinion of the commanders; but was very glad this was come to ſatisfy others.' And indeed it was not long before they performed their promiſe; and in the mean time the queen, truſting to their fidelity and reſolution, publiſhed a proclamation the ſame day, declaring, that the parliament ſhould be prorogued from the 24th of May to the 14th of June next, giving this for the chief reaſon; our navy being now at ſea, and joined with that of our allies, and in a readineſs, by the bleſſing of God, to reſiſt and repel the deſigns and attempts of our enemies.

Notwithſtanding theſe precautions, England was at this time in greater danger than, for want of intelligence, was apprehended by the miniſtry. King James with fourteen thouſand Engliſh and Iriſh, and marſhal Belfonds with three thouſand French, were to ſail in April from Cherbourg and la Hogue, and ſome other places in Normandy, and to land in Suſſex, and from thence to march directly to London. They were to bring over only a ſmall number of horſes; for the jacobites undertook to ſupply them with horſes at their landing. The French king, who was at the ſame time to march a great army into Flanders, ſeemed to think the project ſo well laid, that it could not miſcarry; for he publicly ſaid, before he ſet out, that he was going to make an end of the war. And indeed, ſo little care had been taken to procure intelligence, that, if the winds had favoured the French, they themſelves would have brought the firſt news of their deſign. They ſent over ſome perſons, to give their friends notice but a very few days before they reckoned they ſhould be on the Engliſh coaſt. But there happened, for a whole month together, ſuch a ſtormy and contrary wind, that it was not poſſible for them to come out of their ports; nor could marſhal d'Eſtrees come about with his ſquadron from Thoulon ſo ſoon as was expected.

In the beginning of May about forty of our ſhips were on the coaſt of Normandy, and were endeavouring to deſtroy their tranſport ſhips. Upon which, orders were ſent to marſhal Tourville to ſail to the channel, and fight the Engliſh fleet. They had a weſterly wind to bring them into the channel; but then the wind turned to the eaſt, and ſtood ſo long there, that it brought over the Dutch fleet, and alſo brought about our great ſhips. By this means, our whole fleet was joined; ſo that Tourville's deſign of getting between the ſeveral ſquadrons that compoſed it was loſt. The king of France, then in Flanders, upon this change of wind, ſent orders to Tourville not to fight. But the veſſel that carried theſe orders was taken, and a duplicate, ſent by another conveyance, came not to him till the day after the engagement.[k]

Admiral Ruſſel, on the 18th of May, ſailed with the whole fleet, Engliſh and Dutch, towards the coaſt of France, and the day after, about three in the morning, Cape Barfleur bearing S. W. by S. diſtant about ſeven leagues, the ſcouts weſtward of the fleet, which were the Cheſter and Charles gallies, fired ſeveral guns; which ſhips, in a ſhort time after, coming within ſight, made the ſignal of diſcovering the enemy, and lay with their heads northward. Whereupon the fleet was drawn up into a line of battle, and notice given for the rear to tack, that ſo, if the French ſtood northward, we might the ſooner come up and engage; but, the ſun having diſperſed the fog ſoon after four,[l] they were ſeen ſtanding ſouthward, forming their line with the ſame tack, which our

[i] Mr. Warre, in a letter from Whitehall, May 6, 1692, to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover, writes thus. 'On Tueſday night laſt warrants were iſſued by the privy council for apprehending ſeveral perſons: Upon which my lords Huntingdon and Marlborough, Mr. Edward Ridley, Mr. Knevett Haſtings, and Mr. Robert Ferguſon, were ſeized; and yeſterday the two lords were committed to the Tower, and the three gentlemen to Newgate, by warrant of the council, for high-treaſon, in abetting and adhering to their majeſties enemies. And my lord Brudenell and my lord Fanſhaw having been ſeized this morning, they are in like manner to be committed to the Tower. And a proclamation is ordered for apprehending the reſt, who are fled from juſtice.'

In another letter of May the 10th he writes thus: 'The biſhop of Rocheſter was taken into cuſtody on Saturday laſt upon ſuſpicion, and is confined to his own houſe. The ſame day colonel Langſtone, colonel Hale, lieutenant-colonel Williams, major Langſtone, and three officers more of the army were ſeized, and are committed to Newgate for high-treaſon.' On the 13th of that month he writes: Yeſterday morning colonel Sackville, mentioned in the proclamation, was taken; and the day before one Wilſon, a known jeſuit, was taken in the park. He has been heard preaching in a preſbyterian meeting in the country, and was ſent to Newgate. That morning Mr. Bernard Howard was committed to the Tower by order of the council.' On the 17th he writes thus: 'Yeſterday morning the lords Dunmore and Middleton, and ſir Andrew Forreſter, were taken in Goodman's Fields, at a quaker's houſe, and in the afternoon were ſent to the Tower.'

[k] Whilſt the jacobites were pleaſing themſelves with hopes of approaching ſucceſs, the firſt diſcouragement they met with was the report of the junction of the Engliſh and Dutch fleets: But this being contradicted the next day, leſt that report ſhould have influence upon the French, they ſent over ſir Adam Blair, to aſſure them, that the Dutch were not yet come up. However, it ſo happened, that, before that gentleman could reach Dover, they had certain news that the fleets had joined indeed; and therefore one Mr. Clark was diſpatched into France to acquaint them with this fatal junction. But Clark was ſo far from gaining credit to his report (ſir Adam Blair averring to the contrary) that he was impriſoned as a ſpreader of falſe news, till ſeveral other expreſſes confirmed his account. Upon this the king of France ſent to Tourville to decline fighting; but theſe counter orders came too late.

[l] Monſieur Du Larrey, in his Hiſtoire ſous Lewis XIV. ſays, that when the fog was diſſipated, Monſieur Tourville was ſurprized to find it was the whole Engliſh and Dutch united fleet, which he was going to engage, whereas before he imagined it was only part of it. But however, conſidering that an haſty retreat would bring his fleet into ſuch a confuſion, as might prove more hazardous than a battle, he continued his orders for the engagement. He himſelf commanded the white ſquadron, conſiſting of ſixteen ſhips in the centre; the marquis d'Amfreville commanded the blue and white of fourteen ſhips in the van; and the rear or blue ſquadron likewiſe of fourteen ſhips was under the command of Monſ. Gabaret; all the fleet conſiſting of ſhips of the firſt and ſecond, according to their way of reckoning in France.

The

ſhips had on board; upon which the admiral cauſed the ſignal for the rear to tack to be taken in, and bore away with his own ſhip ſo far to the leeward, as that every one in the fleet might fetch his wake or grain, and then bringing to, he lay by with his fore-top-ſail to the maſt, that ſo others might have the beſt opportunity of placing themſelves, according as they had been before directed. About eight, our line was indifferently well formed, which ſtretched from ſouth, ſouth-weſt, to north, north-eaſt; the Dutch in the van, the admiral in the center, and the blue in the rear; and by nine the enemy's van had almoſt ſtretched as far ſouthward as ours, their admiral and rear-admiral of the blue (who were in the rear) cloſing the line, and their vice-admiral of the ſame diviſion ſtanding towards the rear of our fleet. About ten they bore down upon us with little wind; and the admiral, who ſtill lay by with his fore-top-ſail to the maſt, obſerving, that monſieur Tourville had put out his ſignal for battle, commanded that this ſhould not be ſpread till the French, who had the weather-gage, were come as near as they thought convenient.

At this time admiral Allemonde, who commanded the Dutch ſquadron, was ſent to tack, and get weſtward of the French as ſoon as any of his ſhips could weather them; and thoſe in the blue (then at ſome diſtance a-ſtern) were ordered to cloſe the line. But the fleets had not been long engaged before it came quite calm, ſo that theſe directions could not poſſibly be complied with.

About half an hour after eleven monſieur Tourville, in the Royal Sun, a ſhip of one hundred and ten guns, brought to, and began the fight with admiral Ruſſel at the diſtance of about three quarters muſket ſhot; in which poſture he lay about an hour and a half, plying his guns very warmly, but then began to tow off in great diſorder, his rigging, ſails, and top-ſail-yards being very much damaged; nor could it be diſcerned, that any great endeavours were uſed to repair the ſame.

About two o'clock the wind ſhifted to the N. W. by W. and in a little time five ſhips of the enemy poſted themſelves three a-head and two a-ſtern of their admiral, and fired very ſmartly, till paſt three; ſo that Mr. Ruſſel, and his two ſeconds Mr. Churchill and Mr. Aylmer had ſix or ſeven ſhips to deal with. About four o'clock there was a thick fog; whereupon all firing ceaſed; but, it clearing up in a little time, the French admiral was diſcovered towing away northward; and our admiral, that he might the better come up with him, ordered all the ſhips of his diviſion to do the like; and there happening a ſmall breeze of wind eaſterly about half an hour after five, the ſignal was made for chaſing, and notice ſent to every ſhip within reach, that the enemy were ſtanding away. At this time many guns were heard to the weſtward; and though the ſhips, which fired, could not be ſeen by reaſon of the fog, it was concluded they were our blue ſquadron, which had, by a ſhift of the wind, weathered the French; but it proved to be the rear-admiral of the red, ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, who was got to windward of monſieur Tourville's own ſquadron, and between him and their admiral of the blue. After they had fired ſome time, the ſhips of both ſides came to anchor, but could not diſcover each other by reaſon of the thickneſs of the weather; and in this ſcuffle captain Haſtings, who commanded the Sandwich, a ſecond rate, was killed, not being able to avoid driving amidſt theſe ſhips of the enemy, by reaſon his anchors were not clear. Things being now in great confuſion, the admiral thought it moſt adviſeable to order the ſhips, which were neareſt him, to chaſe weſtward all night, and let them know he intended to follow the French to Breſt, believing it more proper to do ſo than to anchor; and ſo indeed it proved; for next morning he found himſelf nearer the enemy than thoſe ſhips, which had dropped their anchors [m]. About eight at night there was a firing heard weſtward, which laſted about half an hour, part of our blue ſquadron having fallen in with ſome of the enemy's ſhips in the fog; and in that diſpute rear-admiral Carter was killed, whoſe laſt words to his captain William Wright ſufficiently ſhewed, that there was no reaſon to ſuſpect his zeal to the ſervice, for he recommended it to him to fight as long as the ſhip could ſwim.

It continued foggy with very little wind all night, and it was ſo hazy in the morning, that not any of the enemy's ſhips, and but very few of ours, could be ſeen; but, the weather clearing up about eight, the Dutch, who were to the ſouthward, made the ſignal of ſeeing the French fleet, and ſoon after about thirty-four ſail were diſcovered between two and three leagues off, the wind being then at eaſt north-eaſt; and they bearing weſt ſouth-weſt, our ſhips chaced them with all the ſail they could make, but not in the line of battle, as they did after the fight at Beachy-Head; for the ſignal for a line was taken in, that ſo every ſhip might make the beſt of her way. Between eleven and twelve the wind veered to the ſouth-weſt, when the French crowded away weſtward, and our fleet after them; but near four in the afternoon the tide of ebb being over, both fleets anchored, Cape Barfleur then bearing ſouth by weſt [n]; but they weighed about ten at night, and both plying weſtward, our admiral's fore top-maſt came by the board near twelve, it having been ſhot in ſeveral places. He continued chacing until four next morning, and then, the tide of ebb being over, anchored in forty-ſix fathom water, Cape de la Hogue bearing ſouth by weſt, and the iſland of Alderney ſouth ſouth-weſt; but, by reaſon of his wanting a top-maſt, the Dutch ſquadron, and the admiral of the blue, with ſeveral of his ſhips, got conſiderably to the windward of him.

About ſeven in the morning part of the French ſhips, which had advanced far towards the Race of Alderney, were perceived driving eaſtward with the tide of flood, without ground-tackle to ride by, for they had in the engagement, and the morning after, cut away all their heavy anchors. When they were driven ſo far, as that our admiral judged he could reach them, he made the ſignal for the ſhips neareſt to him to cut and chace, which accordingly himſelf and they did. But ſir John Aſhby, with his diviſion of the blue ſquadron, and ſeveral Dutch ſhips, which were weathermoſt, rid faſt (as Mr. Ruſſel had made the ſign for them to do) to obſerve the motion of the reſt of the French ſhips, which continued at anchor in the Race.

Three of their great ſhips, being under the ſhore, tacked about eleven o'clock, and ſtood weſtward; but, after making two or three ſhort boards, the biggeſt of them, being the Royal Sun, ran on ground, and preſently her maſts were cut away; and in the mean while the other two to leeward, which were the French admiral's ſeconds, plied up to her. This, it was judged, they did becauſe they could not get to windward of the weathermoſt ſhips, nor ſtretch out a-head eaſtward. The admiral obſerving, that many ſhips of our fleet hovered about him, ſent orders to ſir Ralph Delaval, vice-admiral of the red, who was in the rear, to keep a ſtrength with him ſufficient to deſtroy them, and to order the reſt to follow the body of the fleet; which ſervice was effectually performed [o].

About four in the afternoon eighteen of the French ſhips, which were got eaſt-ward of Cape Barfleur, haled in for La

[m] The account which father Daniel gives of this engagement, is in ſubſtance, "That monſieur Tourville attacked the Engliſh corps de battaile with ſo much vigour, that all fled before him, that he maintained the fight the whole day from morning to night, without the loſs of a ſingle ſhip, though he did conſiderable damage to ſeveral of the Engliſh ſhips; and that he made a fine retreat, which would have been as happy as glorious, had not the tide failed him. That his conduct however was ſo much approved, that the king himſelf after honoured him with a marſhal's ſtaff on that account.' Monſieur Fourbin in his Memoirs begins his relation with ſomewhat more modeſty, and muſt be ſuppoſed to know more of it than father Daniel. He tells us, "That the Engliſh expected them in very good order, and ſuffered them to come as near to them as they thought fit. The battle was begun, (continues he) with a great deal of vigour and even with ſome advantage on the ſide of the French; but the wind, which in the beginning of the fight, was in their favour, changed in an inſtant, and was favourable to the Engliſh, they took the advantage of it, and with their van wheeled round the French fleet, and by that means made them be expoſed to two fires at once. As their fleet was far ſuperior to the French (who had but four and forty ſhips) beyond all diſpute the whole French fleet would have been loſt, if they had managed as they might have done. But their ſlowneſs in attacking let the opportunity ſlip out of their hands."

[n] This day the admiral gave an account of the action hitherto, in the following letter, which confirms moſt of the particulars abovementioned.

Cape Barfleur, S. W. diſtance ſeven leagues, May 20, 1692.

"Yeſterday about three in the morning, Cape Barfleur bearing S. W. and S. diſtance ſeven leagues, my ſcouts made the ſignal for ſeeing the enemy. The wind weſterly, the French bore down upon me, and at eleven engaged me, but at ſome diſtance. We continued fighting till half an hour paſt five in the evening; at which time the enemy towed away with all their boats, and we after them. It was calm all day. About ſix there was an engagement to the weſtward of me, which I ſuppoſed to be the blue. It continued calm all night. I can give no particular account of things, but that the French were beaten; and I am now ſteering away for Conquet road, having a freſh gale eaſterly, but extremely foggy. I ſuppoſe that is the place they deſign for. If it pleaſe God to ſend us a little clear weather, I doubt not we ſhall beat their whole fleet. I ſaw in the night three or four ſhips blow up, but I know not what they were. So ſoon as I am able to give a more particular relation, I will not be wanting."

"Be-

Hogue, where our ſhips anchored about ten at night, and lay until near four next morning; at which time the admiral weighed and ſtood in near the land. The flood coming on, he anchored again; but at two in the afternoon got under ſail, and plied cloſe in with La Hogue, where he found thirteen of the enemy's ſhips very near the ſhore [p].

On Monday the 23d of May he ſent in Mr. Rooke, then vice-admiral of the blue, with a ſquadron, fire-ſhips, and the boats of the fleet, to deſtroy thoſe ſhips; but they were got in ſo far, that not any but the ſmall frigates could advance near enough for ſervice. However, the boats burnt ſix of them that night, and about the next morning the other ſeven were ſet on fire, together with ſeveral tranſport ſhips, and ſome ſmall veſſels with ammunition; wherein not only all the officers, but likewiſe the men behaved themſelves with great reſolution and gallantry. Thus at La Hogue and Cherbourg were burnt two ſhips of one hundred and four guns each, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of ſeventy-ſix, four of ſixty, and two of fifty-ſix guns; from which time to the peace concluded in the year 1697, the French did not attempt to engage the Engliſh at ſea, but contented themſelves to prejudice their trade by their ſmaller ſhips of war and privateers [q].

This ſervice being over, the admiral ſailed out of La Hogue bay on the 25th, and ordered ſir John Aſhby, who was returned without doing any execution on the other part of the enemy's fleet, to run with a ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch along the French coaſt, as far as Havre de Grace, and to look out for thoſe five ſhips, which he had ſeen ſtanding eaſtward. But even in this he had no better ſucceſs than before [r].

The reſolution, with which the French bore down upon our fleet, was not a little ſurprizing; for they were not above fifty ſhips [s], from one hundred and four to fifty-ſix guns; and it was thought by ſome to have occaſioned at firſt ſome jealouſy amongſt the Engliſh; but, if that was really the caſe, it was ſoon blown over, for every one endeavoured to do what he was able. And as for monſieur Tourville's running this hazard, it is attributed to the poſitive orders, which he had from his maſter to fight the Engliſh fleet; which, had he thought fit, he might have avoided, even after [t] they ſaw each other, for he was ſeveral leagues to the windward. And it is ſaid, that, when he called his flag-officers together, they unanimouſly gave their opinions not to engage; but that he at laſt produced an order under the French king's own hand, which ſhewed them the neceſſity there was for their ſo doing [t]. Theſe orders were undoubtedly given him upon a preſumption, that our great ſhips and "I believe it my duty to acquaint you, that, on the 21ſt inſtant, admiral Ruſſel having made the ſignal for the fleet to cut their cables, I obſerved the French to be forced from the Race of Alderney, (where they anchored) to the eaſtward; and finding, that ſome of them endeavoured for the bay of Cherbourg, I ſtood in for that place, where I found three three-decked ſhips of the enemy's, but ſo cloſe to the ſhore, and within ſome rocks, that it was not ſafe for me to attempt them till I had informed myſelf of the road, they being hawled into ſhoal water. I immediately took my boats, and ſounded within gun-ſhot of them, which they endeavoured to prevent by firing at us. And, that no time might be loſt, I went immediately on board the St. Alban's, where, for the encouragement of the ſeamen, I hoiſted my flag; and having ordered the Ruby, with two fire-ſhips to attend me, I ſtood in with them, leaving the great ſhips without, as drawing too much water. But coming very near, they galled us ſo extremely, and finding the fire-ſhips could not get in, I judged it beſt to retreat without ſhot, and there anchored; and immediately called all the captains, where it was reſolved to attempt them in the morning, with all the third and fourth rates and fire-ſhips. But, after having drawn them into four fathom and half water, I found we could not do our buſineſs, the water being ſhoal. Upon which I ordered three fire-ſhips to prepare themſelves to attempt burning them, going myſelf with all the barges and tenders to take them up, if by the enemy's ſhot they ſhould miſcarry. Indeed I may ſay, and I hope without vanity, the ſervice was warm; yet, God be praiſed, ſo effectually performed, that notwithſtanding all their ſhot, both from their ſhips and forts, two of our fire-ſhips had good ſucceſs by burning two of them. The other by an unfortunate ſhot was ſet on fire, being juſt going on board the enemy. Indeed ſo brave was the attempt that I think they can hardly be ſufficiently rewarded, and doubt not but their majeſties will do them right. The third French ſhip being run aſhore, and obſerving the people on board to go on ſhore by boats full, I ordered the St. Alban's, the Reſerve, and others, to fire upon her, judging it might cauſe them to quit her, and after having battered her for ſome time, I obſerved ſhe made no reſiſtance. I took all the boats armed, and went on board her. I found abundance of men on board, and ſeveral wounded, but no officers; and having cauſed all the people, as well thoſe that were wounded, as others, to be taken out, I ſet her on fire; and, had I not had notice by my ſcouts, that thirty ſhips were ſtanding with us, had ſent all the French on ſhore, who are now very troubleſome to me. The ſhips we ſaw proved to be Sir John Aſhby and the Dutch coming from the weſtward. We are proceeding together to the eaſtward to La Hogue, where I am informed three or four of the enemy's ſhips are; and if ſo, I hope God will give us good ſucceſs. I expect to find the admiral to-morrow, where I hope to hear he has deſtroyed ſome of the enemy's ſhips, having left him in chace of them laſt night, ſtanding to the eaſtward, and pretty near them, as I judged. My Lord, I hope you will excuſe me, if I preſume to pray, you will uſe your intereſt with the queen, that a reward may be given to the three captains of the fire-ſhips, and ſeveral of the others; for greater zeal and greater bravery I never ſaw. I pray your excuſe for being thus tedious and particular. Pray God preſerve their majeſties, and that their arms may be ever crowned with ſucceſs both by ſea and land, ſhall be the prayers and endeavours of, &c.

"P. S. Captain Heath burnt Tourville's ſhip, the Royal Sun, which was the moſt difficult. Captain Greenway burnt the other, called the Conquerant. The Admirable was burnt by our boats; captain Fowlis attempted the Royal Sun, but was ſet on fire by the enemy's ſhot, yet deſerves as well as the others."

[p] Monſieur Fourbin, contrary to the opinion of father Daniel, blames the conduct of his admiral in the latter part of the action. "The General, ſays he, neglecting to improve the advantage, which he had, of eſcaping, reſolved, for what reaſon I could not imagine, to come to an anchor, at the entrance of the Race, inſtead of ſteering off quite, as he ſhould have done, not being in any condition to continue the fight. At laſt an unexpected accident completed our ruin. The ſhip, in which the admiral was, with ſeveral others ſlipped their anchors, and were thereupon driven by the tide upon the enemy. Monſieur de Tourville, who ſaw himſelf in danger, being unwilling to expoſe the whole fleet, which was about to follow him, and which would infallibly have been either taken or ſunk, took down his general's flag. Upon this monſieur de Pannetier, commander of a ſquadron, put up a flag as a ſignal to rally, and thereby ſaved the remainder of the fleet. Thoſe, which followed the general's fate, ran themſelves aſhore at La Hogue, where fourteen of our fineſt men of war were unfortunately burnt. I ſaved mine, though bored through and through, and following the remainder of the fleet, which were in no better condition than myſelf, we made for the road of St. Malo's."

[q] According to a relation, which we find in Kennet, the French loſt five great ſhips in the fight, (which father Daniel however contradicts) one of which was monſieur Gabaret's, admiral of the blue ſquadron, of ninety odd guns; ſo that in the whole one and twenty of their biggeſt ſhips were deſtroyed, beſides the two frigates, and other ſmall veſſels. And, had it not been for the foggy weather, few of the reſt would have eſcaped. On our ſide not one ſhip was loſt, but the fire-ſhips, which were ſpent upon action; and beſides rear-admiral Carter and colonel Haſtings, not one commiſſion-officer.

The Dutch admiral Allemonde gave an account of this action to the States-General in the following letter,

From on board the Prince near Cape Barfleur, June 3, 1692. N. S.

"High and mighty lords,

"Since my two laſt of the 31ſt paſt, and 1ſt inſtant N. S. which gave your high mightineſſes an account of what had paſſed in the defeat of the French fleet, I came to anchor under this cape, where I have been ſince yeſterday in the afternoon with your highneſſes ſquadron, and that of ſir John Aſhby, admiral of the Engliſh blue ſquadron, and ſome other Britiſh ſhips. At my arrival here I was informed by the captain of a French fire-ſhip, who was taken priſoner, that about twelve of the ſhips, which had engaged your highneſſes ſquadron, and to which we had given chace, were got in among the rocks; upon which I prepared to go and deſtroy or burn them. But as I was ready to put my deſign in execution, I found that admiral Ruſſel was giving orders to the ſame purpoſe. I immediately offered him your light frigates and fire ſhips to aſſiſt his ſhips, and immediately gave the neceſſary orders, in caſe he ſhould make uſe of them. But as yet I know not whether thoſe frigates and fire-ſhips were employed or not. All that I can aſſure your high mightineſſes, is, that the ſame day they took a reſolution to deſtroy theſe ſhips; they burnt ſix of the largeſt, being ſhips of three decks; and this day the reſt which remained, the leaſt of which carried ſixty pieces of cannon, incurred the ſame fate, being burnt, with all their ammunition and proviſion, together with ſix other ſmall veſſels, which they had lightened of their guns, to try whether it were poſſible to ſave them, by towing them any higher; ſo that this expedition has compleated the irreparable ruin of the enemy's fleet. I underſtand this day from on board of admiral Ruſſel, that orders are given out to burn the tranſport veſſels, which are in the bay of La Hogue, to the number of three hundred, if it may be done with ſafety. But, I fear, it will be very difficult, becauſe the water is very ſhallow, where thoſe veſſels lie; and great reſiſtance may be made from the land-ſide. I therefore leave the ſucceſs of the deſign to Providence. On the other hand it has been reſolved in a grand council of war to reduce our fleet to fifty or ſixty great ſhips, ſail away to the iſle of Uſhant, and endeavour to take all the enemy's ſhips that ſhall come off, or deſign to go into Breſt, and to ſend the reſt of the men of war, with ſome fire-ſhips to ſcour the coaſts of France, as far as Dunkirk; to ſeek and deſtroy, if poſſible, the ſcattered remnants of the French fleet, that have ſteered their courſe to the eaſt. I am,

"Moſt High and Mighty Lords,

"Yours, &c.

"O. Allemonde."

[r] Biſhop Burnet tells us that Sir John purſued them ſome leagues; but then the pilots pretending danger, he came back; ſo that twenty-ſix of the French ſhips, which, if he had purſued, by all appearance he had deſtroyed, got into St. Malo's. Burnet II. 93.

[s] Father Daniel and monſieur Fourbin ſay, but forty-four.

[t] Father Daniel takes no notice of all this; but on the other hand, ſays, that ſeveral diſappointments, occaſioned by contrary winds, obliged count de Tourville to come to an engagement. What monſieur de Fourbin ſays of this matter may in ſome meaſure clear it up. "The views of France, (ſays he,) and the project of a deſcent into England, were now no more a ſecret. King James was already gone to La Hogue, where he was ready to embark at the head of twenty thouſand men, and waited only the ſucceſs of a battle with the Engliſh, which monſieur de Tourville had orders to give even at a hazard, if occaſion required it. It was indeed neceſſary to run this riſque, in order to make the deſcent ſecure, for there was nothing could be an impediment to it but the Engliſh fleet. It is not to be doubted, but if the Engliſh had been worſted, which probably would have happened, if we had the Dutch could not poſſibly join ſir Ralph Delaval's and rear-admiral Carter's ſquadrons, then cruiſing on their coaſt, before he might have had an opportunity of coming up with them. And indeed, had not admiral Ruſſel ſailed from the river at the very time he did, contrary to the opinion of the pilots, the winds, which afterwards happened, would have prevented his coming timely to their aſſiſtance; ſo that the enemy might, in all probability, have had equal, if not greater ſucceſs, than we had over them. And here it may be obſerved, that although the confederate fleet was conſiderably ſtronger than the French, yet were the latter beaten by an inferior number; for by reaſon of the calm, and the thickneſs of the weather, it was not poſſible for many of the Dutch ſhips, or of the blue ſquadron, to engage; whereas had they been favoured with clear weather, and a gale of wind, it is very probable, that not ſo much as one of the French ſhips would have eſcaped [u].

It was believed, that if this ſucceſs had been purſued with vigour, conſidering the conſternation, with which the French were ſtruck, upon ſuch an unuſual and ſurprizing blow, the victory might have been carried much farther than it was. But admiral Ruſſel was provoked by ſome letters and orders, which the earl of Nottinham ſent him from the queen, which he thought were the effects of ignorance; upon which he fell into a croſſneſs of diſpoſition, and found fault with every order, that was ſent him, but would offer no advices on his part. And he came ſoon after to St Helen's, which was much cenſured; for though the diſabled ſhips muſt have been ſent in, yet there was no ſuch reaſon for bringing in the reſt, that were not touched. Croſs winds kept them long in port; ſo that a great part of the ſummer was ſpent before he went out again, and the French had recovered out of the firſt diſorder that had quite diſpirited them.

The loſs of the French fleet was ſenſibly felt by king James, who thereupon writ to the king of France, 'That he had hitherto, with ſome conſtancy and reſolution, ſupported the weight of all his misfortunes, ſo long as he himſelf was the only ſufferer; but he acknowledged, that this laſt diſaſter overwhelmed him, and that he was altogether comfortleſs, in relation to what concerned his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, through the great loſs, that had befallen his fleet. That he knew too well, that it was his own unlucky ſtar, which had drawn this misfortune upon his forces, always victorious, but when they fought for his intereſts; which plainly let him ſee, that he no longer merited the ſupport of ſo great a monarch. He therefore intreated his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, no longer to concern himſelf for a prince ſo unfortunate as himſelf, but permit him to retire with his family to ſome corner of the world, where he might ceaſe to obſtruct the uſual courſe of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's proſperities and conqueſts, and where nothing could more contribute to his conſolation, than to hear of the quick return of all his wonted triumphs both by ſea and land, 'over both your enemies,' ſays he, 'and mine, when my intereſt ſhall no longer be intermixed with your's.' The king of France endeavoured to alleviate his affliction by a kind anſwer, wherein he promiſed never to forſake him in the worſt of his extremities.

The queen was no ſooner informed of the victory, but ſhe ſent thirty thouſand pounds to Portſmouth, to be diſtributed among the ſailors; ordered medals to be ſtruck for tokens of honour to the officers, and cauſed the bodies of admiral Carter and colonel Haſtings to be honourably interred. At the ſame time a deſcent into France was projected, and about ſeven thouſand men, that were encamped near Portſmouth, were ſhipped there, under the command of the duke of Leinſter, who embarked on the Breda. It was intended they ſhould land at St Malo's, Breſt, or Rochefort. Great matters were expected from this expedition; but, to the general ſurprize, in a few days intelligence came that all the tranſports were retuned to St Helen's with part of the fleet. It ſeems, the next day, after the fleets were joined, admiral Ruſſel and the reſt of the commanders went on board the Breda, where the duke of Leinſter's commiſſion was opened; and on the 28th of July a council of war was held on board the general, where it was agreed, that an attempt upon the enemy's ſhips at St Malo's, or at Rochefort, was not then practicable, the ſeaſon of the year being ſo far advanced. The flag-officers likewiſe by themſelves came to a determination, 'That, ſince the land-forces were come to the fleet, ſomething might have been attempted at one of thoſe places with probability of ſucceſs, were not the ſeaſon of the year ſo far ſpent, as not to admit of the fleet's going thither with ſafety.' It was complained, That the earl of Nottingham being ignorant of ſea-affairs, and not conſulting ſeamen, ſent orders which could not be obeyed without endangering the whole fleet. The queen ſent to Portſmouth a committee of privy councillors, the lord ſteward, lord chamberlain, the earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter, and the lords Sidney and Cornwallis, who having given freſh orders to the fleet, and conferred with the generals, returned to London. The ſoldiers, after having lain on board almoſt a month, were, to ſave the ſhame of landing them again in England, ſent over to ſerve in Flanders, where they arrived the 22d of Auguſt. Thus the campaign at ſea, which began ſo glorioufly, ended but poorly.

The common reflection that was made on our conduct, was, that Providence, and the valour of our men had given us a victory, of which we knew not what uſe to make. What was worſe, our merchants complained of great loſſes this ſummer; for the French, having laid up their fleet, let the ſeamen go and ſerve in privateers, with which they watched the motions of our trade: and ſo, by an odd reverſe of things, as we made no conſiderable loſſes, while the French were maſters of our ſea two years before; ſo now, when we triumphed on that element, our merchants ſuffered moſt. The concluſion of all was, Ruſſel complained of the miniſtry, and they complained no leſs of him. The merchants complained of the admiralty; but they, in their defence, ſaid, that there were not ſhips and ſeamen enough both to furniſh out a great fleet, and at the ſame time to ſend out convoys for ſecuring the trade.

As to foreign affairs this campaign, though the elector of Bavaria, who, through the influence of king William, had been made Governor of the Spaniſh Netherlands, had put thoſe provinces in a far better ſtate than formerly, yet that did not hinder the king of France from attemping the ſiege of Namur, one of the ſtrongeſt places in all thoſe parts, both by its advantageous ſituation on the confluence of the Sambre and the Maeſe, and its good fortifications, but principally a caſtle built upon a hill in an angle formed by thoſe two rivers. The French king inveſted the town in perſon, and purſued the ſiege with ſuch vigour and diligence, that, in four days, he made himſelf maſter of all the out-works near St. Nicholas's gate. The garriſon, ſeeing it was in vain to withſtand an army encouraged by the preſence of their ſovereign, ſurrendered the town upon articles, and retired into the citadel.

Upon the news of this ſiege, king William with the confederate army under his command, decamped from Anderleck, marched to Diegom, the next day towards Louvain, and pitched his camp near Bethlem Abbey, from whence he continued his march towards Namur. But, before the king removed, he gave the enemy notice of his late victory at ſea by a triple diſcharge of an hundred and forty pieces of cannon, which were anſwered by as many vollies of ſmall ſhot from the two lines of the army. It is reported, that the French king heard this noiſe with a great deal of unconcern, ſaying, "Here's a mighty ſtir indeed about burning two or three ſhips!" But in fact the conſequence ſhewed, that it was the unhappieſt blow he received during the whole courſe of the war; for thereby his ſea-coaſts remained expoſed to the inſults of the Engliſh, the French not being able after this to ſet out a fleet fit to engage with that of the confederates.

The duke of Luxemburg, who covered the ſiege of Namur with an army of ſeventy thouſand men, upon information, that the king of England moved towards the Mehaigne, marched that way likewiſe, and the two armies, which were almoſt equal as to number (the confederates not exceeding ſeventy-five thouſand men) advanced in ſight of one another, the river only remaining between them. King William poſſeſſed himſelf of all the poſts upon the Mehaigne on his ſide, as Luxemburg did of two villages ſurrounded with ſtrong hedges and thickets on the oppoſite bank. But the confederates had ſuch an entire command of the river by their batteries, that the ſame evening the king ordered the pontoons to be laid over it, in order to attack the enemy the next day. All things were in readineſs for an engagement, but the ſame night, and the ſucceeding days, the weather proved ſo rainy, hindered their fleets from joining, this project of a deſcent, which fell to the ground, by the blow our fleet received, would have cauſed the Engliſh a great deal of uneaſineſs and pains. But the contrary winds, which laſted for three whole weeks, and hindered our proceeding, gave the enemy time to join their fleets; ſo that inſtead of five and forty ſhips, which they were ſuppoſed to be, the number, after they were joined, amounted to ninety-ſix."

[u] This is Burchet's account, the greateſt part of which is taken from admiral Ruſſel's letter to the earl of Nottingham, dated from Portſmouth, June 2, 1692. See Lettres Hiſtoriques. II. 108.

This

that a ſtop was put to his enterprize[w]. He tried, by another motion to raiſe the ſiege; but, the town having capitulated ſo early, and the citadel lying on the other ſide of the Sambre, he could not come at it.

The moſt remarkable action, before the citadel of Namur, was the taking of Fort William, which was raiſed by that great engineer Coehorn, and defended by himſelf. The French king, being reſolved to carry this work at all adventures, cauſed it to be aſſaulted; and, though all the efforts of his men proved unſucceſsful, yet they returned to the ſtorm the next day. The beſieged, animated by their commander, made an incredible reſiſtance, repulſing twice the aſſailants with great ſlaughter; but at length the latter, with redoubled numbers, made themſelves maſters of the covered way, and cut off the beſieged from their communication with the caſtle.

Coehorn being dangerouſly wounded, the garriſon, who thought themſelves no longer in a condition to hold out, deſired to capitulate; reſerving only ſo much time to themſelves, as to ſend to the prince of Barbanſon, governor of the Old Caſtle, to give him notice of their reſolution, which he readily allowed; and thereupon Fort William, which from this time was called Fort Coehorn, was delivered up to the French.

The conſequence of this loſs was the ſurrender of the citadel of Namur, which, conſidering the ſtrength of the place, and the ſhortneſs of the ſiege, occaſioned ſome reflections on the prince of Brabanſon, whom king William is reported to have ſuſpected, and therefore to have deſired the elector of Bavaria to remove him from his government of Namur; but the French inveſting the place before the elector could comply with the king's deſire, without ſhewing any diſtruſt of the Prince, his electoral highneſs contented himſelf with ordering the count de Thian to accompany him in this ſiege, with particular inſtructions to obſerve his conduct. But the prince of Barbanſon is juſtified by others, who maintain, that he did all that could be expected from a man of honour and courage.

The taking of Namur was reckoned the greateſt action of the French king's life; that, notwithſtanding the depreſſion of ſuch a defeat at ſea, he yet ſupported his meaſures, ſo as to make himſelf maſter of that important place in the view of a great army. On the other hand, king William's conduct, on this occaſion, was much cenſured; for it was ſaid, that he ought to have put much to hazard, rather than ſuffer ſuch a place to be taken in his ſight.

When the citadel of Namur was ſurrendered, the king lay encamped at Melle, where he formed a deſign to ſurprize Mons, which the French took care to diſappoint. From Melle he marched his army to Genap, thence to Noſtredame de Hall, and on the 22d of July over the Seine, when he was joined by eight thouſand Hanoverians. But the king of France, contenting himſelf with the glory of having taken Namur, left the command of his forces to Luxemburg[x], who pitched his camp in an advantageous poſt, covered by a wood and thick hedges, between Enghen, and Steenkirk, where king William reſolved to attack him, upon the information of ſome perſons who were thought to underſtand the nature of the ground, though it was found to be narrower and leſs practicable than the king had been made to believe it was.

Accordingly on Sunday, July the 24th, the army marched early in the morning, the heavy baggage being ordered to repaſs the Seine at Hall. There were ſeveral defiles to paſs, and the ways to be made, which rendered it a tedious march. However about ten o'clock the prince of Wirtemberg with the van-guard, which conſiſted of four battalions of Engliſh foot, two of Danes, and a detachment of Churchill's brigade, advanced towards the enemy, and fell upon them with ſo much vigour, that he drove them from hedge to hedge; poſted himſelf in the wood, that fronted the right wing of their army, and erected two batteries of cannon on little eminences, one on the right, and the other to the left of the wood. Whilſt theſe batteries were playing upon the enemy, the confederate army marched up to the head of the defile (about half an Engliſh mile from the wood) where it opened in a little plain not above half a league over, which terminated upon the right of the wood, and upon ſeveral rows of high trees planted in great order.

Upon the right of this plain there was a farm, which ſoon after the engagement, was ſet on fire by the enemy, to cover by the ſmoke ſeveral of their batteries, that were ordered this way. From the head of the defile, upon the left of the plain, there was a deep hollow way, with high trees and hedges upon the banks of it, which reached as far as the wood, where the van-guard was poſted, and where it branch-

[w] This circumſtance is confirmed by the following extracts of original letters from James Vernon, Eſq; afterwards ſecretary of ſtate, and then in the king's army, to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover; which extracts will ſhew likewiſe the motions of the confederate army.

From the camp at Ville on the Mehaigne, the firſt of June, 1692.

'Our army lies ſtill encamped in the ſame place, the low grounds on each ſide of the river lying ſo full of water from the inceſſant rains we have had ever ſince our coming hither, that it is not practicable at preſent to paſs over to attack the enemy.

'The French army lies ſtill in our ſight, though they have removed their camp ſomething backwarder. There were above five hundred ſoldiers, that deſerted from the French on Sunday and Monday laſt; and ſeveral have come away ſince, but not in ſo great numbers ſince the removal of their camp.

'The ſhooting continues ſtill at Namur. The caſtle, we hear, has not yet been attacked, the French plying their batteries hitherto againſt the new fort, where they have made but ſmall advances, ſince we have given them ſo great a diverſion by our being ſo near to them.'

From the camp on the Mehaigne, 5th June, 1692.

'We have nothing at preſent very material, the armies lying ſtill in the ſame places. We have had very beaſtly weather almoſt ever ſince our being here; and the rains ſtill continue; which has made a bog of the land on both ſides the river, and deſtroyed moſt of the bridges we had made, ſo that I ſcarce ſee what we have to do here. I am almoſt afraid we ſhall not be able to ſuccour Namur, though the caſtle holds out ſtill with great bravery; and we hear they have repulſed the enemy with loſs, at ſome aſſaults they have given to their outworks; but they may very well be loſt at laſt, whilſt we are kept at this diſtance from them. They, that know the inconveniencies of paſſing a river, and through defiles, to an enemy, who ſtand ready to receive them, think this a hazardous piece of work, if the difficulties had not been increaſed by ſo much ill weather. I don't find but the French are reckoned ſuperior to us in horſe by at leaſt fifty ſquadrons; and that they have not fewer foot. If nothing elſe be to be done, and that we can ſubſiſt here longer than they do, we may inconvenience them as they march off. About two days ago we ſent out a detachment of forty ſquadrons, which, I hear, are gone towards Huy; but I don't yet know on what deſign. One would think it were now time for the confederates to be doing ſomething on the Rhine and in Savoy; for it is hard to have the whole burthen lie ſo long upon his majeſty.'

From the camp on the Mehaigne, 6 June, 1692.

'His majeſty's army and the French continue ſtill in the ſame camps. The late rains, which we are not yet freed from, have ſpoiled moſt of the bridges we have made over the river, ſo that we muſt be obliged to make them over again. We hear almoſt continual ſhooting from the caſtle of Namur; and we are adviſed by perſons lately come from thence, that the beſieged have behaved themſelves with very great bravery; and that the place holds out ſtill, having hitherto kept the enemy from making any conſiderable advance upon them.'

From the camp at Ramillies, on the Mehaigne, 8 June, 1692.

'On Monday night late, orders were given for the army to march next morning. As ſoon as the French obſerved our intentions to march, they put themſelves into a poſture to do the like; and the armies were both moving about the ſame time and the ſame way, each on their own ſide of the river, and in ſight one of the other all the way. His majeſty brought up the rear of the army that day, which had no diſturbance in its march. The French and we lie again encamped oppoſite one to the other; but they are now nearer to the river than they were before; and we lie with our right ſtretched towards Perwys.——Our army lies ſtill this day; and it is yet uncertain, what we are to do to-morrow, for the orders given hitherto importing only, that the troops ſhould not go out to forage to-morrow, by that is underſtood, that every one is to be in a readineſs to receive what orders ſhall be given.

'Part of the French army were this morning in motion, but it proves only in order to extend themſelves further towards their left wing, that is near to Mazey and Gemblours; ſo that their right wing is now about oppoſite to the middle of their line.

'This morning his majeſty was out with ten ſquadrons of horſe to view the ground as far as the great road on this ſide Perwys.

'This afternoon the earl of Athlone and monſieur d'Auverquerque paſſed the river towards our right with ſeven or eight ſquadrons of horſe, and were near ſome ſquadrons of the enemy, which brought up the rear of thoſe that marched. But his majeſty did not think it fit they ſhould charge them, there being ſome reaſon to ſuſpect, that more French horſe with ſome of their foot might be lying in ambuſcade behind a riſing ground there adjoining; ſo that nothing paſſed, only one of their carabineers, firing his piece at ſome diſtance, ſhot a young gentleman ſon to colonel Boncourt, who was aid de camp to major-general the marquis de Foreſt. The bullet came in by his noſe, and paſſed into his mouth without going further, ſo that it is not doubted but he will recover.'

From the camp at Sombreff, 13 June, 1692.

'On the 10th inſtant, about four in the afternoon, monſieur Luxemburg's army began to decamp, in order to draw near to Namur, and yeſterday our army marched about four leagues to this place, paſſing by that, which was the enemy's camp, while they lay by Gemblours. We ſaw the enemy's camp about a league and a half diſtant, who lie with their left towards Mazey, but our right is extended beyond them towards Flerus.

'Before we left our laſt camp, we had an account, that a party of three hundred horſe and fifty dragoons, paſſing the Sambre at Charleroy, had fallen upon a convoy of the French between Phillipeville and Walcour, going to Namur; and, after routing the enemy, conſiſting of four ſquadrons of horſe, they ſeized one hundred and thirty waggons laden with wine, meal, and oats, which they deſtroyed, and brought away two hundred horſe, and one hundred head of cattle, with ſome priſoners.'

[x] And returned to Paris after his uſual method. For, according to the old Perſian luxury, he uſed to bring the ladies with him, with the muſic, poems, and ſcenes, for an opera and a ball; on which he and his actions were to be ſet out, with the pomp of much flattery.

Biſhop

ed itſelf into two other deep ways, and going through the wood upon the left to the Danes attack, and to that of the guards; and the other upon the right going along the outſide of the wood. Between theſe two laſt were poſted the regiments of ſir Robert Douglas, colonel Fitzpatrick, and colonel O'Farrol.

When the confederate army was come up to the head of theſe defiles, and juſt entring into the ſmall plain, they were ordered to halt, except the Engliſh life-guards, and horſe and dragoons, and the lord Cutt's, lieutenant-general Mackay's, ſir Charles Graham's, and the earl of Angus's regiments; which being interlined with the horſe, were commanded at the ſame time to the right ſkirts of the wood, whilſt the prince of Heſſe's, colonel Lowther's, and the earl of Leven's regiments, were alſo intermixed with the left wing of horſe, and poſted upon the outſide of the wood. Things being thus diſpoſed, and the army continuing in their halt, the prince of Wirtemberg, after he had cannonaded for above two hours, began the attack with the Danes upon the right, which was immediately followed by the other four Engliſh regiments, that compoſed the van-guard, and ſeconded by Cutt's, Mackay's, Angus's, Graham's, Lowther's, the prince of Heſſe's, and Leven's regiments. Never was a more terrible, and at the ſame time more regular firing heard; for during the ſpace of two hours it ſeemed to be continued claps of thunder. The van-guard behaved themſelves with ſo much bravery and reſolution, that though they received the charge of ſeveral battalions of the enemy, one after another, yet they drove them beyond one of their batteries of ſeven pieces of cannon, of which the Danes and the ſecond battallion of the regiment of Engliſh guards poſſeſſed themſelves, and which colonel Whacop, who commanded the Engliſh, would have ſent away, had not the French cut off the traces, and carried away the horſes. Sir Robert Douglas with his firſt battalion, charged ſeveral of the enemies, and beat them off from three ſeveral hedges, and made himſelf maſter of the fourth, when going through a gap to get on the other ſide, he was unfortunately killed upon the ſpot. All the other regiments behaved themſelves with equal bravery, firing muzzle to muzzle through the hedges, they on the one ſide, and the enemy on the other.

The king being made ſenſible of the difficulties, which the van-guard had to encounter, by one of the prince of Wirtemberg's aids de camp, who had already ſent two meſſengers to count Solms, to no purpoſe, his majeſty diſpatched away count Paulin, one of his aids de camp, with poſitive orders to count Solms, who commanded the main body, to ſend more foot to the prince's aſſiſtance. But count Solms (who is ſaid to have been always envious of the Engliſh[y], and who beſides had a particular jealouſy for the prince of Wirtemberg's commanding the attacks, an honour which he would have had himſelf) inſtead of obeying the king's commands, ordered the horſe to march, and the foot to halt, which proved the loſs of the day. For the ground was ſo ſtrait, and the enemy had ſuch hedges, copſes, and ditches to cover them, that there was nothing to do for the horſe; ſo that, when the van-guard began to engage, they had none but part of the infantry interlined with the left wing of the horſe to ſecond them, the body of foot being almoſt a mile in the rear. However, the king made all poſſible diligence to get the infantry up, ordering a brigade to march to the wood, and forming a line of battle in the plain, with ſuch foot as could come up. The eagerneſs of the ſoldiers to follow their royal leader, and to engage the enemy, was ſuch, that they put themſelves in ſome diſorder, and took more time to form their battalions, than could now be conveniently ſpared; ſo that, before they could reach the wood, the van-guard and infantry of the left wing being overpowered by thirty battalions of the enemy, that charged them continually one after another, and by a freſh body of dragoons brought up by Boufflers, they were forced to retreat in great confuſion, and to leave the wood in the enemy's poſſeſſion. The Engliſh life-guards owed their preſervation to the Daniſh foot-guards, and the baron of Pibrack's regiment of Lunenburghers being in diſorder upon the ſkirt of the wood, and the colonel himſelf lying dangerouſly wounded upon the place, ſir Bevil Grenville, who commanded the earl of Bath's regiment, marched up to his relief, receiving the enemy's fire, before he ſuffered any peloton of his battalion to diſcharge once. By this method he lodged himſelf in the hollow way near the wood, ordered his ſerjeants to carry off the baron of Pibrack, and maintained his poſt, till he was commanded to leave it by the prince of Naſſau.

The king, enraged at the diſappointment of the vanguard for want of a timely relief, expreſſed his concern by often repeating theſe words, 'O! my poor Engliſh! how they are abandoned!' Nor would he admit count Solms to his preſence for many months after. And now conſidering, that the fight was not to be renewed without endangering the loſs of the whole army, Luxemburg being conſiderably reinforced by Boufflers, and beſides the night drawing on, the king commanded a retreat, which was performed with admirable order, and without any great diſturbance from the enemy, who never durſt engage the Engliſh in the rear.

In this battle the confederates loſt the brave lieutenant-general Mackay,[z] ſir John Lanier, ſir Robert Douglas, the earl of Angus, and divers other gallant officers, above two thouſand men killed, three thouſand wounded or made priſoners, and ſeveral pieces of cannon. As for the French, excepting the honour of remaining maſters of the field, they had not much reaſon to boaſt of any advantage, having had the prince de Turenne, the marquis de Belleſonds, the marquis de Tilladet, the brigadier Stouppe, the marquis of Firmacon, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction, and two thouſand private ſoldiers killed, and near as many wounded. Neither had they eſcaped ſo well, had it not been for the chevalier de Millevoix, one of the elector of Bavaria's domeſtics, who had already given, and ſtill endeavoured to give further intelligence to marſhal Luxemburg, of the king's motions and deſigns, for which he was hanged on a tree in the right wing of his majeſty's army.

The author of the memoirs of the reign of Lewis XIV. who is miſtaken in ſtiling Millevoix a ſecretary of king William, ſays, that his correſpondence being diſcovered, he was made to give Luxemburg falſe intelligence, that the confederates would come that day towards the French army to forage: ſo that when the French parties aſſured him, that the whole army of the confederates was advancing, he could not be perſuaded of it, till the brigade of Bourbonnois, which poſſeſſed the hill on the right, was attacked.

About the ſame time, a more infamous criminal than Millevoix was diſcovered, and deſervedly puniſhed. This was the chevalier Grandval. The occaſion was thus: The king's enemies, being unwilling to wait any longer the uncertain fate of war, laid a deſign to aſſaſſinate him in Flanders, the laſt year 1691. The chevalier Grandval, captain of dragoons in the French ſervice, and Anthony du Mont, upon the promiſe of great rewards, undertook to put this horrid deſign in execution, while the king was at Loo; but, miſſing their opportunity, they followed him to his camp in Flanders. From hence, Grandval returned to the French army, and Du Mont, according to the orders given him, entered himſelf into the confederate army, that he might take his opportunity, when the king went to viſit the grand guard on the lines, to ſhoot him behind his back, and then make the beſt of his way to a body of horſe, that Grandval and Parker ſhould have in readineſs, upon a previous intimation, to reſcue and carry him off. But Du Mont, whatever might be the cauſe, after ſome weeks attendance went to the court of Hanover, as one that had forſaken the French ſervice, and the project was laid aſide for that year.

The king of France had loſt two miniſters, one after another; Seignelay died firſt, who had no extraordinary genius, but he knew all his father's methods, and purſued them ſo, that he governed himſelf both by his father's maxims, and with his tools. Louvois did not long ſurvive him. He had more fire, and therefore grew uneaſy at the authority madam de Maintenon took in things ſhe could not underſtand. By this means, he at length was ſo unacceptable to the king, that once, when he flung down his papers upon the floor before him, upon ſome provocation, the king lifted up his cane;

[y] Biſhop Burnet obſerves, 'That this count bore the blame of the errors committed on this occaſion. The Engliſh had been ſometimes checked by him, as he was much diſguſted with their hate and pride: ſo they charged all on him, who had ſome good qualities, but did not manage them in an obliging manner.' II. 97.

[z] Mackay, being ordered to a poſt that he ſaw could not be maintained, ſent his opinion about it, but the former orders were confirmed: ſo he went on, ſaying only, The will of the Lord be done. He was a man of ſuch ſtrict principles, that he would not have ſerved in a war which he did not think lawful. He took great care of his ſoldiers morals, and formed them to be both ſober and juſt in their quarters. He had one ſingular quality: In councils of war he delivered his opinion freely, and maintained it with due zeal; but how poſitive ſoever he was in it, if the council of war over-ruled it, even though he was not convinced by it, yet to all others he juſtified it, and executed his part with the ſame zeal as if his own opinion had prevailed. but the lady held him from doing more. This affront, as was given out, ſunk ſo deep into Louvois's ſpirits, that he died ſuddenly a few days after. Some ſaid of an apoplexy; others ſuſpected poiſon; for a man, that knew ſo many ſecrets, would have been dangerous, if he had out-lived his favour. His death happened juſt after the project was laid for killing the king, a memorandum of which was found among his papers, by his ſon the marquis of Barbeſieux, who had the ſurvivance of his place, and continued in it ſome years; but, as he was young, ſo he had not a capacity equal to the poſt. He reſolved to purſue the project of the aſſaſſination, in which madam de Maintenon concurred, and Luxemburg was truſted with the direction of it. Du Mont having, in the winter, at Hanover, from ſome diſcourſes and practices of his raiſed a ſuſpicion, ſir William Colt, the king's envoy there, gave notice of it. Upon which one Leefdale, a Dutch papiſt, was ſecretly ſent to Paris as a perſon that would enter into the deſign; but in reality went on purpoſe to diſcover it.[a] Grandval and he came back to Flanders in the ſpring, to ſet about it, whilſt king James was preparing to invade England.

In caſe this invaſion failed, the French king did not queſtion but all his deſigns would be accompliſhed by the king's aſſaſſination, to which he chiefly truſted. But Leefdale, as he was going with Grandval from Antwerp to Eyndhoven, brought him into a party that ſeized him, and carried him to Boiſleduc. He was afterwards tried by a court-martial, and ſentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. When he found that Du Mont as well as Leefdale had made a diſcovery of the affair, and that there was full proof againſt him, he confeſſed the whole ſeries of the management without ſtaying to be put to the torture. The king gave orders that none belonging to him ſhould go near Grandval, that there might be no colour for ſaying, that the hopes of life had drawn his confeſſion from him, nor was he ſtrictly interrogated about the circumſtances; but was left to tell his ſtory as he pleaſed, which he did in the following manner, as it is related in the ſentence paſſed upon him by the court-martial, of which the earl of Athlone was preſident.[b]

Whereas Bartholomew de Liniere, knt. ſieur de Grandval, born at Liniere in Picardy, aged about forty-three years, and now a priſoner, hath confeſſed before the grand court-martial, without any conſtraint by pain, or being in irons; and it farther appearing to the ſaid court-martial, that the late marquis de Louvois, in his life-time ſecretary of ſtate to the French king, in the year 1691, entered into an agreement with one Anthony du Mont, about the murther of his majeſty, William III. king of Great Britain, &c. and that the ſaid Du Mont had framed a project, ſetting forth in what manner that deſign might be executed; that he delivered the ſaid project to the ſaid marquis de Louvois; That the priſoner, ſome time before the marquis de Louvois's death, aſking his leave to go ſomewhere elſe, was ordered by the ſaid marquis not to go away, for that he had ſome buſineſs of conſequence to employ him in, which the priſoner ſuppoſes to have relation to the ſaid deſign; but, the marquis de Louvois dying ſome time after, there was no further progreſs then made in the ſaid deſign.

That the marquis de Barbeſieux, ſon of the ſaid marquis de Louvois, as alſo ſecretary of ſtate to the French king, having five days after his father's death found the ſaid project, together with a warrant for thirty piſtoles to be paid to the ſaid Du Mont, among his father's papers, the ſaid deſign was revived again, and the thirty piſtoles were paid accordingly. That the priſoner contracted acquaintance with Du Mont at monſieur Rabenac's houſe, where monſieur Paparel, paymaſter-general to the French king's armies, ſaying one day to monſieur Rabenac (the priſoner being preſent) that, if they had a mind to ſeize the king of England, Du Mont would be a fit perſon for it; Du Mont replied with execrations, that he would carry off his majeſty alive or dead, as he had promiſed to monſieur de Louvois.

That, Du Mont having delivered the ſame or the like project to Monſieur de Barbeſieux, the priſoner, to promote the ſaid deſign, had ſeveral conferences with Monſieur Barbeſieux and Monſieur Paparel; in one of which Monſieur Barbeſieux told the priſoner, that he ſuſpected his father was poiſoned by order of the prince of Orange (meaning his preſent majeſty of Great Britain) and therefore he would be revenged on him. That Monſieur Barbeſieux told the priſoner in another conference, that he ſhould give Du Mont notice, that his majeſty of Great Britain wore a coat of mail; which the priſoner acquainting Du Mont with, he anſwered thereupon, "It is no matter, I'll kill him for all that." That Barbeſieux had ſaid further, he would not ſpeak himſelf with Du Mont, fearing he might be taken priſoner; and, if he ſhould happen then to name him, it might make a great breach in his fortune.

That the priſoner was engaged with one Parker, a colonel belonging to the late king James, to put the ſaid deſign in execution; and that Parker told him he had formed the ſaid deſign with the late marquis de Louvois.

That at laſt the priſoner, with the ſaid Barbeſieux, Paparel, Parker, and Du Mont, agreed upon the manner of executing the ſaid deſign, viz. That the priſoner and Parker ſhould meet at the grand guard of the duke of Luxemburg's army, where they were to have fifteen hundred horſe: That Du Mont ſhould go to the king of England's army, and watch the time, when his majeſty went to viſit the grand guard; and at the ſame time he was to ſhoot his majeſty: That the priſoner and Parker with fifteen hundred horſe were to reſcue and bring him off, the ſaid Du Mont giving timely notice to the priſoner of the intended execution. That, Barbeſieux giving the priſoner orders to accompany Du Mont to Menin, he gave him at the ſame time an order to the duke of Luxemburg for furniſhing the priſoner with ſuch a detachment of horſe, as he ſhould require, and think neceſſary for the deſign.

That the priſoner, by Monſieur Barbeſieux's order, received of Monſieur Paparel eighty louis d'ors; and, purſuant to monſieur Barbeſieux's directions, he gave to Du Mont fifty-five louis d'ors out of that ſum, viz. fifteen piſtoles in ſpecie, and a bill of exchange for four hundred and ſixty livres French money, to be paid at Ghent. That the priſoner accordingly left Paris the 11th of September 1691, and went poſt with Du Mont to Menin: That he defrayed the whole charge of the journey: That Du Mont acquainted him on the way, that Monſieur Barbeſieux had promiſed him an annual revenue of twenty thouſand livres, and to make him a knight of the order of St. Lazarus, in caſe the deſign took effect: That the priſoner, coming to Menin, went to the governor, monſieur Pertuis, as he had been directed by monſieur Barbeſieux, and obtained of him a paſſport for Du Mont, who parted immediately for Ghent, promiſing the priſoner, that according to their agreement he would ſend to him at the grand guard: That the priſoner thereupon went to the duke of Luxemburg's army, and he and Parker continued at the head of the grand guard till the day before the rencounter at Leuze, without hearing from Du Mont.

That, Du Mont going to Hanover, the priſoner had kept a conſtant correſpondence with him about executing the ſame deſign at ſome other opportunity. That the priſoner communicated what letters he received from Du Mont to monſieur Barbeſieux, who gave him directions what anſwers he ſhould return. That the priſoner reſolved with monſieur Barbeſieux, that the deſign ſhould be executed this campaign, anno 1692, which had failed the laſt. That the priſoner had taken ſome meaſures concerning the ſame with monſieur Chanlais, quarter-maſter-general to the French king.

In the mean time one Frederic Aelbreyt Leefdale, heretofore captain lieutenant of a troop of dragoons, in the ſervice of the high and mighty ſtates-general of the united provinces, coming to Paris, was brought acquainted with the pri-

[a] Biſhop Burnet informs us, that monſieur Morel of Berne, the famous medaliſt (who had for ſome years the charge of the French king's cabinet of medals, but being a proteſtant, and refuſing to change his religion, was kept a cloſe priſoner in the baſtile for ſeven years) was ſet at liberty in April this year; and, before he left Paris, his curioſity led him to St. Germains, to ſee king James. He happened both to go and come back in the coach with Grandval; and while he was there, he ſaw him in private diſcourſe with king James. Grandval was full of his project, and, according to the French way, talked very looſely to monſieur Morel, not knowing who he was, but fancied he was well affected to that court. He ſaid there was a deſign in hand, that would confound all Europe; for the prince of Orange (as he called king William) would not live a month. This Morel wrote over to biſhop Burnet in too careleſs a manner, for he directed the letter with his own hand, which was well known at the French court; however, his letter came ſafe. II. 96.

ſoner by the means of one Sterck. That the priſoner, having contracted an intimate familiarity with the ſaid Leefdale, diſcovered the ſaid deſign to him towards the latter end of March laſt 1692, telling him, that an officer, who would ingratiate himſelf in the king's favour, muſt venture at ſomething of conſequence: That he, the priſoner, had concerted the execution of a deſign, upon which his fortune depended: That it was indeed a matter not without hazard, but, the greater the difficulties were, the more would be the honour; encouraging Leefdale to be concerned in it. And, the ſaid Leefdale ſhewing a readineſs to comply with him, the priſoner opened himſelf with greater freedom, and told him, that he was engaged laſt campaign with one Du Mont to aſſaſſinate the king of Great Britain, but it had no effect, by reaſon of his majeſty's leaving the army ſo ſoon; but it was reſolved again to put the ſame in execution this year. That Du Mont by many repeated oaths had ſworn he would do it; yet he, the priſoner, feared, that if he were not preſent, Du Mont would not ſo exactly obſerve his orders, and therefore he was reſolved to go along with Du Mont, aſking Leefdale if he would be of the party; who anſwering that he would, the priſoner diſcourſed to him at large of all the particulars concerning the deſign, and afterwards brought him to monſieur Barbeſieux and Chanlais.

That Chanlais, in one of the conferences held upon that ſubject, told Leefdale, the priſoner being by, that a great reward ſhould be given him, the buſineſs ſucceeding: That Barbeſieux and Paparel had both of them knowledge of the promiſed rewards.

That he, the priſoner, with the ſaid Leefdale and colonel Parker, went to St. Germains on the 16th of April 1692, to ſpeak with the late king James about the ſaid deſign, who had knowledge of it, and to take leave of him before they began their journey. That the priſoner had audience at the ſame time of the ſaid king James, the late queen being preſent; king James telling him, 'Parker has given me an account of the buſineſs: If you and the other officers do me this ſervice, you ſhall never want.' And Parker, the priſoner, and Leefdale, entered into a diſcourſe about this deſign.

That Du Mont's wife delivered to monſieur Barbeſieux ſeveral letters, which ſhe received from her huſband, whilſt he was at Hanover; and, the priſoner continuing his correſpondence with him all that time, he engaged Du Mont by letters, eſpecially thoſe dated the 20th and 25th of April, and the 12th of May laſt, to come from Hanover to a rendezvous at Aden in the country of Raveſtein, in order to take a final reſolution with the ſaid priſoner and Leefdale concerning the manner of executing their deſign; the priſoner preſſing Du Mont to haſten his journey, for fear the king of England ſhould have occaſion to repaſs the ſea; the priſoner adding withal that he ſhould be mad, if he failed in his buſineſs.

That the priſoner, with Chanlais and Leefdale, were agreed in what manner the aſſaſſination ſhould be committed on the perſon of his majeſty, viz. That when the king ſhould ride along the lines, or ſhould go out to take any view; or when the army ſhould decamp, Du Mont ſhould lie in ambuſcade, and, when his majeſty ſhould paſs within an hundred paces of him, he ſhould then fire upon the king. That Chanlais, to whom notice was to be given before of the time, ſhould be with three thouſand horſe at the duke of Luxemburg's grand guard. That the priſoner had told Leefdale, that there would be no danger for him, ſince Du Mont had a ſecret to charm people's eyes; and at all adventures they two would keep with thoſe who followed the king; and when every body was purſuing Du Mont, they ſhould have time to eſcape and ſave themſelves, and carry the account to monſieur Chanlais; and it little concerned them, whether Du Mont ſhould be taken or not, provided they could eſcape themſelves. That the priſoner and Leefdale received their laſt orders from Chanlais, who told them he was going to Mons, and that they ſhould ſtay for him there.

That the priſoner and Leefdale went from Paris the 17th of April laſt, and arrived a few days after at Mons, having waited ſome time for monſieur Chanlais's arrival; and, finding he did not come, they reſolved to go forward to the rendezvous by the way of Bruſſels. That the priſoner, as they were travelling on the way, told Leefdale, that, their deſign taking place, the alliance among the confederate princes would be broken; that the princes concerned would each of them recall their troops; and, the country being thereby left without ſoldiers, the king of France would eaſily make himſelf maſter of it, and king James would be reſtored again.

That the priſoner, with Leefdale, went to the mayor of Boiſleduc, and was apprehended at Eyndhoven.[c]

[c] It will be proper to ſubjoin here ſome extracts of original letters from James Vernon, eſq; then attending the king in Flanders, to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover, relating to Grandval and his deſigns.

From the camp at Genap, July 11—21, 1692.

'The three priſoners, who were ſecured at Boiſleduc, being engaged in a deſign againſt the king's perſon, were brought to the army on Friday laſt, and are in the provoſt's hands, in order to the trial of ſome of them. Their names are the chevalier Grandval a Frenchman, Du Mont a Walloon, and the baron de Leefdale a Dutchman.

'Becauſe you have had ſome part in the late diſcovery, I will be a little more particular about theſe three perſons. Grandval is kept in irons, and is the perſon that will be immediately tried. Du Mont, that came from your parts, is in the ſame houſe with him in the cuſtody of the provoſt, but not in the ſame room. He is not chained, but is only guarded by three or four ſoldiers. I have not ſeen him, but I hear he ſpends the day in ſmoking and drinking, and ſeems very deſirous to ſpeak with my lord Portland. I know not whether he will be gratified in it; but, by what I can hear, I am apt to believe, he may have ſomething more to ſay than what he owned at Hanover; and I like him never the better for being ſo long before he brings it out, eſpecially ſince he had thoſe opportunities of doing it both to the duke of Zell and yourſelf. It is well for him he was ſo early in the diſcovery (though he might have been quicker in it too) for, God be thanked, the treaſon would have come out by hands, that were not ſo deeply engaged as his ſeem to be, which I think I may gueſs by the baron de Leefdale's being as it were at liberty.

From the camp at Genap, July 14—24, 1692.

'The general officers appointed to conſtitute a court-martial (whereof the earl of Athlone is preſident) for the trial of the chevalier Grandval, met yeſterday for the firſt time, in order to ſettle all things relating to that trial.'

From the camp at Genap, July 18—28, 1692.

'The general court-martial is ſtill ſitting upon the trial of the chevalier Grandval. On Friday and Saturday laſt his examination was taken, and it remains now only, that the witneſſes be confronted with him.'

From the camp at Lembeck, July 28, Aug. 7, 1692.

'I have the favour of your's of the 18th inſtant, in anſwer to which I muſt acquaint you, that theſe greater matters [the battle of Steenkirk] intervening, have put a ſtop to the proceſs of Grandval, which otherwiſe would have been finiſhed; and now three of the judges are diſabled from attending, viz. Lieutenant-general Mackay, who is killed; and lieutenant-general Lanier and Tetteau are both wounded; ſo that I know not whether it will not be requiſite to fill up their number. As for Du Mont, I cannot but repeat it again, that he is very fortunate to be favoured with the patronage of ſo great a prince, the conſideration of whom will certainly outweigh the ingenuity of his diſcovery and confeſſion, which I wonder ſhould not be more ſincere, ſince nothing could have better become one in his circumſtances. I am afraid, it is too partially ſaid in his favour, that Leefdale concealed the treaſon for a year, for there is no manner of footſteps by any thing, that has appeared, that Leefdale was let into the buſineſs till laſt ſpring, and he diſcovered it as ſoon as ever he got Grandval out of France, if not before; and both their diſcoveries ſeem to be ſo near the ſame time, that I think it hard to ſay which made it firſt. But I am confident the difference in time was ſo little, that neither of them could have notice what the other intended, if there had been any body, that would have meddled to give the advice.

'As for what you write about my lord Portland's ſpeaking with Du Mont, I believe his lordſhip will hardly think it fit for him to make ſuch a viſit, unleſs Mr. Schutz, who has ſeen him, ſhould ſatisfy his lordſhip that it was for the king's ſervice, which, by any thing he has hitherto ſaid in public, I do not ſee any reaſon to believe. Some men are naturally myſterious; ſome are ſo through ignorance, and ſome through guilt, and are loth to appear in their own colours, as long as any cover is to be found. Which of theſe belongs to this gentleman, I am not well enough acquainted with him to determine.'

From the camp at Lembeck, Aug. 1—11, 1692.

'Grandval's trial lay ſilent all laſt week, three of the court-martial being killed or wounded, viz. the lieutenant-generals Mackay, Lanier, and Tetteau; but their places having been ſupplied ſince by major-general Scravenmore, and brigadiers Churchill and Ramſay, this day the trial was made an end of, Grandval in a manner confeſſing all the articles of his accuſation. I believe it will not be long before he is executed. If you have any concern for Du Mont, I can ſatisfy you, that he is not tried at preſent, and I do not know there are any intentions to do it.'

From the camp at Lembeck, Aug. 4—14, 1692.

'The chevalier Grandval being found guilty on Monday laſt by the court-martial, chiefly upon his own confeſſion, for having conſpired againſt the life of his majeſty, he was executed yeſterday morning in the camp, according to the ſentence pronounced againſt him, for his being hanged, drawn, and quartered. A relation of the proceedings is ordered to be forthwith printed.

'As to what you would be informed in, you will have it ſo ſoon in print from Holland, that it will not be worth while to tell it you beforehand, ſince it

Grandval was executed in the camp, on the 13th of Auguſt 1692. He ſuffered with ſome ſlight remorſe, for going into a deſign to kill a king. But, how black ſoever his confeſſions repreſented the court of France, no notice was taken of it: Nor did any of that court offer to diſown or diſprove it, but let it paſs and be forgotten. Yet ſo blind and violent was their party in England, that they reſolved they would believe nothing, that either blemiſhed king James, or the French court.

After the action at Steenkirk, there was little done this campaign. The Engliſh forces that landed at Oſtend, in Auguſt, under the command of the duke of Leinſter, being joined by a detachment from the army, poſſeſſed themſelves of Furnes and Dixmuyde, which they began to fortify, and, putting the country about them under contribution, became very uneaſy neighbours to Dunkirk. The command of theſe places was given to count Horn, who underſtood well the way of making all poſſible advantages by contributions, but was a man of no great merit, and of as little courage. This diſguſted the Engliſh ſtill more, who ſaid, that the Dutch were always truſted and preferred, while themſelves were neglected. They had ſome colour to cenſure this choice the following winter, for, upon the motion of ſome French troops, the count (without ſtudying to amuſe the enemy, or to gain time, upon which much may depend in winter) immediately abandoned Dixmuyde. All he had to juſtify himſelf was a letter from the elector of Bavaria, telling him, that he could ſend him no relief; and therefore ordering him to take care of the garriſon, which was of more importance than the place itſelf. King William greatly reſented this conduct of count Horn, who till then had enjoyed a conſiderable ſhare in his eſteem; and it is probable, that the loſs of it was impreſſed deeply upon the count's mind, for he did not live long after. Thus ended the campaign in Flander; Namur was loſt; the reputation of the king's conducting armies was much ſunk; and the Engliſh were generally diſcontented, and alienated from the Dutch.

Nothing of conſequence was done on the Rhine. There were two ſmall armies which acted ſeparately, under the command of the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the markit would fall ſo far ſhort of the relation you have to expect. However, for your preſent ſatisfaction, I muſt tell you, that Barbeſieux, Chanlais, and Paparel will be noted with infamy, for the part they have had in ſo villanous a deſign; and when you ſee the printed account, pray compare it with what you remember of Du Mont's diſcovery, whilſt he was at Hanover; and by that judge of the ſincerity and ingenuity of his confeſſion.

'Grandval died with what may be called great courage or ſtubbornneſs. He ſaid nothing at the gallows, but he left monſieur Barbeſieux a legacy, that will ſtick by him, having the ſame morning, before he went to execution, writ a letter to a friend of his at Paris, deſiring, that monſieur Barbeſieux ſhould be acquainted by the archbiſhop of Rheims, that he loſt his life for having obeyed his orders; which you will ſee publiſhed at large, with many more particulars, that I have not time to mention.'

From the camp at Ninové, Arg. 11,—21, 1692.

'I have received this day the favour of your's of the 5th. By the account you give of the manner, in which Du Mont made his firſt diſcovery, it is plain, how little ingenuity there is in the man, who, in his firſt confeſſion taken at Boiſſeduc, mentions none but the duke of Zell, to whom, he ſays, he diſcovered the buſineſs, as ſoon as ever he had received Grandval's letter of the 20th of April, and had the duke's leave to write an anſwer, that he might draw more letters from Grandval. But whatever he wants of honeſty, he has cunning enough to know what will be of moſt uſe to his purpoſe. I believe he would have ſecured his life either way; and it would have been yet leſs in hazard by a more open and frank confeſſion. I ſuppoſe it will be thought fit he ſhould undergo a trial, for the juſtification of his majeſty's proceedings throughout this whole buſineſs.'

From the camp at Grammon, Aug. 31, 1692.

'As to the buſineſs of Du Mont, I think that is now over, upon his ſending a petition to his majeſty, in which he owns his guilt, and implores his majeſty's mercy as to life, upon the account of his being one of the firſt diſcoverers, ſubmitting himſelf to be diſpoſed of as his majeſty ſhall think fit, in any place of ſafety, and begging, that care may be taken of his ſubſiſting there. Which petition being referred to the council of war, that ſat upon Grandval, for their opinion, they have recommended him as an object of mercy, on account of his diſcovery, and coming hither to teſtify what he knew of this buſineſs; adviſing withal his being kept ſafely in ſome ſecure place with a maintenance, that others may be encouraged by this example rather to rely on the king's clemency, than perſiſt in their damnable deſigns. So you ſee by this proceeding, regard has been had to any promiſes, that might have been made him in Germany upon his firſt diſcloſing the buſineſs; which yet I think he might then, and ſince, have made more fully than he did.'

The letter, which Grandval writ the morning before his execution, was as follows:

Du camp de Halle ce 13, d'Aout 1692.

Mademoiſelle,

'Je vous prie d'aller trouver monſieur L'archevêque de Rheims, avec monſieur Jourduil, & faire connoître au dit ſeigneur Archevêque qu'il m'en coûte la vie pour pour avoir obeï aux ordres de monſieur de Barbeſieux, c'eſt la grace, que vous demande,

Votre Serviteur,

De Grandval.

Voyes monſieur le marquis d'Arſy, qu'il contribue à faire prier Dieu pour moy.

A Mademoiſelle Juré, Rue Trevelle, vis-a-vis de la Rue des deux Eſcus, pres de l'Hotel de Soiſſons, à Paris.

From the camp at Hall, Aug. 13, 1692.

Madam,

'I pray you to go to the archbiſhop of Rheims, with monſieur Jourduil, and to let the ſaid archbiſhop know that it coſts me my life for having obeyed the orders of monſieur de Barbeſieux: Which is the favour deſired of you, by,

Your Servant,

De Grandval.

'Speak to monſieur d'Arſy, that he takes care I be prayed for.

'To Madam Juré in Treville-Street, over-againſt the Street of the Two Crowns, near the Hôtel of Soiſſons at Paris.'

Upon occaſion of this letter, it will not be improper to take notice of a paſſage, that happened ſome days before Grandval's condemnation. A perſon diſcourſing with him in priſon, and obſerving he endeavoured to juſtify himſelf upon the orders, which he had received from the marquis of Barbeſieux, he told him, that, though this was in itſelf a very weak excuſe for being engaged in a baſe action, yet ſtill it might prove ſo much the worſe, as that it was like enough that monſieur Barbeſieux would diſown his having given any ſuch orders, or that he was any way concerned with him in a buſineſs of this nature. To which Grandval replied, 'Let him deny what he pleaſes; yet, if I were put upon it, I would make it appear very plainly; for I have an original paper under monſieur Barbeſieux's own hand, which I have lodged with a friend of mine, who will not part with it to any one but myſelf, and nobody elſe knows with whom I have intruſted it.' State Trials II. 284.

Soon after the diſcovery of this ſhocking attempt, there was publiſhed a piece, intitled, 'Reflections upon the late horrid conſpiracy contrived by ſome of the French court to murder his majeſty in Flanders, and for which monſieur Grandval, one of the aſſaſſins, was executed:' The author of which obſerves, that, beſides the French king himſelf, ſome of the greateſt perſons in France were privy to the deſign, viz. Monſieur Louvois, and his ſon Barbeſieux, miniſters of ſtate; the duke of Luxemburg, marſhal and peer of France, and general of the French army; monſieur Rabenac and monſieur Bedal, embaſſadors; monſieur Paparel and monſieur Chanlais, employed in ſome of the greateſt poſts of the army; madam Maintenon, the French king's miſtreſs. He remarks likewiſe, 'that the carriage of the French court in this affair towards the late king James is a maſterpiece of craft and treachery. Here it is, 'adds he,' that it were almoſt to be wiſhed, that there were a curtain drawn over that part of the ſtage, where this unfortunate prince comes to act ſo unnatural and ſo frightful a part. That any one, that ever filled the Engliſh throne, ſhould be capable of ſo unprincely a revenge as murder, is a very mortifying reflection, and leads us naturally to look back to ſome ſhrewdly ſuſpected events that have fallen out in England of late years, which for ſome reaſons are not now to be inſiſted on. As, in moſt of the tranſactions of this prince's reign, he was impoſed upon by the French king's deſigns, and gave himſelf up to the meaſures given him from France, which proved his ruin; ſo now, when under their protection, they bring him in to cover and own a tranſaction ſo baſe and horrid, that the French king had not the face to appear in it himſelf. They ſo ordered the matter, that Grandval, Parker, and Leefdale ſhould wait upon king James, and receive his approbation of the thing, with promiſes of encouragement; and this is not done till the whole deſign had been fully concerted beforehand. It was fit the murder of the king ſhould paſs in the world as a perſonal revenge of king James, and that the French court ſhould lay it upon the quarrel betwixt thoſe two princes; though at the ſame time they had the chief hand in the contrivance of it, were to reward the inſtruments employed in it, and were to reap the greateſt advantages by it. Whether that unfortunate prince was ſenſible of this trick put upon him, or whether his eager deſire to ſee the king taken off, gave him no leiſure for reflections, it is hard to determine. This is clear, that he thought himſelf no ways obliged to uſe the precautions, that even Barbeſieux had done, ſince that after his ſpeaking to Grandval, according to the words in the printed account, 'he was pleaſed to entertain Parker, Leefdale, and him, all together, on the ſame ſubject;' for in the French copy it is ſaid, 'Qu' alors il a auſſi parlé avec le dit Parker & Leefdale de cette affaire:' At the ſame time he (meaning king James, and not the priſoner Grandval, as in the Engliſh tranſlation) ſpake likewiſe to Parker and Leefdale about that affair.' The treachery of the French court towards king James in this buſineſs is deep and black.

'All the world lays his ruin at the French king's door; and it is to the meaſures he gave him, that he owes the loſs of three crowns. The leaſt amends could be made him for all this, was an honourable retreat in France; yet that this is granted him only on the account of their own intereſt, appears in a great many inſtances, and particularly in the part they bring him in to act in this conſpiracy. If there had been true friendſhip and kindneſs meant him, they would never have put him upon a neceſſity of making himſelf known in ſo foul a deſign to three perſons all at once, but would have at leaſt allowed him the precautions, that Barbeſieux, if not the very ſame, that one of his own rank, thought himſelf obliged to obſerve. But this is not all; in bringing king James to own this buſineſs, the French court did him the laſt offices of an enemy. Inſtead of promoting his reacceſſion to the throne, they did more at one daſh to ſhut it for ever againſt him, than all that his enemies could have thought of. With what horror muſt the Engliſh nation have been ſtruck, to ſee a prince, that had recovered them from the brink of deſtruction, and expoſed his perſon ſo often for their ſake; to ſee him, I ſay, murdered by the bloody hand of a ruffian! And with what execrations and cries for vengeance againſt both the actors and contrivers of ſuch a villany! Could the French ever imagine, that the way for king James to regain the hearts of the three kingdoms, which he had loſt by his endeavouring the ſubverſion of their laws and liberties, was to hire three parricides to murder the only perſon, that had ſecured theſe to them?' The author afterwards informs us, that the jacobites in England were at that time in great expectation of a revolution in their favour. 'At the grave of Bareith. The French army there was commanded by the duke de Lorge, who advancing in September towards the Rhine, with a great train of artillery, the landgrave and markgrave held a council of war with the reſt of the generals, wherein it was reſolved, that the two armies, which were ſeparated, ſhould now rejoin. This was accordingly done, and the whole German force encamped near Neuſtadt; but in ſome days they ſeparated again, the landgrave marching to beſiege Eberemburg. He had not been gone long, before the markgrave ſent him an expreſs, that the French were moving towards him, which made the landgrave ſend away four thouſand dragoons to the other's aſſiſtance. But, before they and the body of artillery could come up, the duke of Wirtemberg, who was gone before with a body of about four thouſand horſe, and poſted himſelf near Edelſheim, with a deſign to ſtop the march of the French, was by them ſurprized in his camp by the means of a great fog, and charged ſo briſkly, that his men had not time to put themſelves in a poſture of defence. About a thouſand Germans were killed upon the ſpot, and ſeveral made priſoners, and amongſt the latter the duke of Wirtemberg himſelf, who was carried to Paris; whilſt the French lived at diſcretion in his country, and obliged the landgrave, now weakened by the detachment, which he had ſent away to the markgrave of Bareith, and afterwards by another to ſecure Heidelberg, to raiſe the ſiege of Eberemberg. However the landgrave was ſoon after revenged of the French; for they under the command of count Tallard, having beſieged Rhineſield, a place, which would have been of greater importance to them, if they had carried it, the governor made ſo brave a defence, and the landgrave ſuch extraordinay expedition to relieve it, that the French were obliged to abandon the enterpriſe with conſiderable loſs (both from the enemies fire, and the rigour of the ſeaſon) and not without ſome confuſion to the court of France, who had ſent orders to count Tallard, not to beſiege, but take poſſeſſion of the place. The elector of Saxony had likewiſe promiſed to bring an army upon the Rhine; but Schoening, his general, who had great power over him, was gained by the French to break this deſign. The elector complained, that the emperor favoured the circles of Franconia and Swabia ſo much, that he could have no good quarters aſſigned him for his army. And upon this occaſion it was ſaid, that the emperor drew much money from thoſe circles, that they might be covered from winter quarters; and that he applied all of it to the carrying on of the war in Hungary, and ſo left the weight of the war with France to lie heavy on the princes of the empire. This conteſt ran ſo high, that Schoening who was thought the ill inſtrument in it, going for his health to the hot-baths at Dablitz in Bohemia, was ſeized by the emperor's orders; upon which great expoſtulations paſſed between the courts of Vienna and Dreſden.

But though the emperor did, as it were, abandon the empire to the French, he made no great progreſs in Hungary. The Turks laid upon the defenſive, and the ſeaſon was ſpent in motion, without either battle or ſiege. There was ſtill ſome diſcourſe, but no great probability of peace. Two Engliſh embaſſadors dying, the one, ſir William Huſſey, ſoon after his arrival at Conſtantinople, and the other, Mr. Harbord, on his way thither, the lord Paget, his majeſty's embaſſador at the emperor's court, was ordered to go thither to mediate a peace. He found the mediation was in a great meaſure ſpoiled by the Dutch embaſſador before his arrival; for he had been prevailed on by the court of Vienna to offer the mediation of the Dutch upon a very high ſcheme. Comeniek, and the Ukrain, and Podolia, with Moldavia and Walachia, were demanded for Poland; Tranſilvania, with the perſon of count Tekeli, for the emperor: And Achaia and Livadia, as an antemurale to cover the Morea, for the Venetians. The court of Vienna, by offering ſuch a project, reckoned the war muſt go on, which they deſired. The miniſters of the Porte, who were gained by the French to carry on the war, were glad to ſee ſo high a project. They were afraid of tumults; ſo they ſpread this project over the whole empire, to ſhew, on what ignominious terms the mediation was propoſed; and by what they juſtified their going on with the war. But the lord Paget offered the king's mediation upon another project; which was, that every prince was to keep what he was then poſſeſſed of; and Comeniek was only demanded to be razed. If this had been offered at firſt, the Ottoman court durſt not have refuſed it; the people were become ſo weary under a long and unproſperous war. But the vizir ſuppreſſed this, and made it ſtill paſs among them, that the Engliſh preſſed the ſame project, that the Dutch had propoſed; which was the more eaſily believed there, becauſe, how ignorant ſoever they were at that court, they knew well what an intereſt the king of England had in the ſtates. So the war was ſtill carried on there; and ſir William Trumball, who came over to England at this time, told the king, that if, inſtead of ſending embaſſies, he would ſend a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, to deſtroy the French trade, and ſtop the commerce with Turkey, he would quickly bring that court to other meaſures, or raiſe ſuch tumults among them, as would ſet that empire, and even Conſtantinople itſelf, all in a flame.

With regard to the affairs of Piedmont, the court of France, having brought the Pope to an accommodation, endeavoured through his means to divide the duke of Savoy from the confederacy, and diſpatched monſieur Chanlais to Turin, to made advantageous propoſals to him, but whether in the form, that was afterwards made public, is a myſtery. However there was a writing printed at Paris, wherein the author mentioned all the offers made the duke; though that paper ſeemed chiefly deſigned to render the Italian princes jealous of the Germans, by magnifying the diſorders committed by them in their quarters, and inſinuating, that proteſtants reaped all the advantage of the preſent war;

the ſame time, ſays he, that Grandval and Leefdale take their journey from Paris to Flanders, Parker comes over to England. We have all the reaſon to remember the great hopes our malecontents expreſſed here at that time, and how ſure they ſeemed to be of ſome new revolution. It is true, theſe people are eaſily buoyed up on the leaſt appearances; and every ſmall accident, that ſeems to favour their cauſe, raiſes their hopes beyond all bounds. But about that time ſo much joy and aſſurance was viſible in their very countenances, as ſeemed to proceed from a fixed certainty they had of ſome mighty ſucceſs, which they hoped for in their affairs, that we could not poſſibly dive into. It is true, the French king was in Flanders, and king James was waiting the firſt opportunity of wind and tide to waft over his army into England. But even all this could ſcarce make up more than a probability, much leſs a certainty of ſucceſs. His majeſty was already on the other ſide, and his army was drawing together from all quarters to oppoſe the French. Our fleet was at ſea, and a far braver one it was than the French could poſſibly ſend out againſt us. Whence then could all this confidence proceed? There muſt certainly be ſome other thing in it, than we were then aware of. Parker's coming over at this time, and his correſponding with his friends here, carries with it a ſhrewd ſuſpicion of what we may reaſonably judge was the ground of all this inſolence of the party. It were folly to imagine he ſhould make public among them the deſign then in agitation to murder the king: It was too great a ſecret to be communicated to many. But on the other hand, it is ſcarce to be thought, but that Parker aſſured his friends in general, that there was ſome great and certain event ready then to break forth, that would decide the controverſy; and he might venture to open the ſecret to ſome of the firſt from amongſt them.' The author alſo mentions two remarkable paſſages never before made public, which ſhew king William's generoſity to the French king, and his abhorrence of all aſſaſſinating deſigns. About ten years ago, ſays he, that is, about the year 1682, he received a letter from an unknown hand, who yet gave himſelf a name, in which he offered to deliver Europe from all her fears, by deſtroying the French king. He deſired only a ſafe refuge in Holland, and a ſmall ſubſiſtence, much leſs than he ſhould leave behind him in France. He deſired an anſwer might be writ to him, and left with the poſt-maſter's wife at Paris; and about a week after he writ a ſecond letter to the ſame purpoſe. The firſt letter came to the then prince of Orange at night at Loo, and monſieur Dyckvelt happened to be with him; ſo he ſhewed him the letter, and deſired him to go to the Hague immediately, and deliver that letter to monſieur D'Avaux, who was then the French embaſſador to the ſtates. Monſieur Dyckvelt made ſuch haſte, that he was with monſieur D'Avaux next morning, and gave him the letter (and the ſecond was likewiſe ſent to him). He received it with great acknowledgments of the prince's generoſity, and ſent the letter to Paris. The poſt-maſter's wife, being examined, ſaid, that one had come ſeveral times to call for a letter, but, he not coming again, ſhe was ordered to go about Paris, and ſee if ſhe could know him again. One was taken up who ſhe believed was the perſon, and was put in the Baſtile. He happened to be a proteſtant, which no doubt made the court of France to like the diſcovery the better. But when ſome of the parliament came to examine him, and to confront him with the woman, ſhe, when ſhe viewed him nearly, and heard him ſpeak, owned ſhe was miſtaken, and that he was not the man; ſo after a little while he was diſmiſſed, and came into Holland upon the general perſecution of the proteſtants. By theſe circumſtances it appears, that the court of France believed that this was a real deſign, and no contrivance thrown out to try the prince of Orange's temper. But another inſtance ſhewed, that king William looked on propoſitions of this kind with ſo much horror, that he thought that, which on all occaſions was the moſt ſacred with him, his word, did not bind in this. A few days after he came to the crown, an unknown perſon wrote to Dr. Burnet, that he had a propoſition of great conſequence to make to the king, if he ſhould have his promiſe, that he might do it ſafely. This the king allowed the doctor to do. So he wrote to the perſon by the name and method, that he had given. When he came to the doctor, he told how long he had lived and ſerved in Verſailles, and how he knew all the methods of that court; and at laſt he came to offer to kill the French king. At this the doctor ſtarted up immediately, and ſaid, he thought the king was too well known for any to dare to come to him with ſuch a propoſition. He hoped he himſelf had been alſo ſo well known, that none ſhould have made it by him. He was ſorry, that a promiſe was given of ſafety, but he bid the rogue be gone immediately. When he gave an account of this the next day, the king thought he had carried the matter of the promiſe too far; ſince the promiſe was to be underſtood to relate not to ſuch crimes; and therefore he wiſhed, that the doctor had ſeized on him, and ordered him to be ſure to do it, if ever he could ſet eye on him again.

Biſhop

which argument was not long after effectually improved by the partiſans of France in the court of Savoy. But the German troops now in Italy were too numerous to give any of thoſe petty princes an opportunity to diſturb them, ſuppoſing they had an intention to do it; and as for the duke of Savoy, whatever his true ſentiments were, he appeared firm, and reſolute to carry on this campaign with great vigour. On the other hand, the French, who bent the power of their arms againſt Flanders and Germany, left monſieur Catinat very much inferior to the allies in Piedmont, as deſiring only to defend what they had gained the year before on that ſide. But this they could not do; for, the duke of Savoy having got his army into the field, and diſpoſed of ſeveral parties into the vallies and other places for the better ſecurity of the country, he marched in the month of July at the head of twenty thouſand men into the province of Dauphiné; where, after they had pillaged La Roche, Chantelouve, and ſome other villages, they made themſelves maſters of the caſtle and highlands of Guilleſtre, and ſome other paſſes. In Auguſt all the army croſſed the Durance at Guilleſtre, and moved towards the city of Ambrun, which was ſurrendered upon articles, after a ſiege of about nine days. Here the duke of Savoy found twenty pieces of cannon, and a conſiderable quantity of proviſions; and the city preſently granted him forty thouſand livres contribution, which they borrowed at Grenoble for that purpoſe: beſides which, he ſeized upon ſixty thouſand livres in gold, which was the French king's money, in the hands of the pay-maſter of the troops. And not only the city of Ambrun, but all the neighbouring towns and villages were at the ſame time put under contribution. Here likewiſe duke Schomberg, who commanded the Engliſh forces to the aſſiſtance of Savoy, publiſhed a declaration in the name of king William, inviting people to join him, and aſſuring them, that his majeſty "had no other aim in cauſing his forces to enter into France, than to reſtore the nobility and gentry to their ancient ſplendor, the parliaments to their former authority, and the people to their juſt privileges; and even to grant his protection to the clergy; and in ſhort to cauſe the edict of Nantz to be revived, of which the kings of England had been made guarantees."

Encouraged by this declaration, ſeveral of the French proteſtants, who had been forced to abjure their religion, took this opportunity to make their voluntary recantation before monſieur Dubourdieu, duke Schomberg's chaplain. From Ambrun the army marched directly to Gap, a city upon the frontiers of Provence, whoſe inhabitants opened their gates to prince Eugene of Savoy upon his firſt appearing before it, and readily conſented to pay contribution, to preſerve their houſes from being pillaged and burnt; a treatment, which near eighty caſtles and villages received from the Germans, in retaliation of the barbarities committed by the French in the Palatinate. Not only Grenoble, the capital of Dauphiné, but the neighbouring provinces, and the rich city of Lyons began already to tremble. And indeed never had the allies a fairer opportunity of ſhaking the power of France [d]. But the duke of Savoy's falling ſick of the ſmall-pox, and, what was of more fatal conſequence, the ſpirit of diviſion, which broke out among the generals, not only hindered the deſign, that had been formed of taking Briançon and Quieras, but likewiſe incapacitated them to keep what they had already conquered. Thus having plundered the country, deſtroyed all the proviſions they could not conſume or carry away, and burnt all that refuſed to contribute, they blew up the fortifications of Ambrun, took money to ſave the houſes, and ſo put an end to the campaign. As for the duke of Savoy, he was ſcarce recovered of the ſmall-pox, when he fell into an ague, which reduced him ſo low, that his phyſicians began to deſpair of his life; but at length his youthful conſtitution got the better of his diſtemper.

Beſides the annoying France in her moſt ſenſible part, his Britannic majeſty improved the duke of Savoy's alliance towards the reſtoration of the Vaudois, a people, who juſtly boaſted a purity of faith derived from the primitive ages of the church, and untainted by later ſuperſtitions. But they having loſt all eccleſiaſtical diſcipline through the violence of their late perſecution, and being unable to maintain even a miniſter or ſchool-maſter, monſieur Dubourdieu acquainted Dr. William Lloyd biſhop of St. Aſaph, who about this time was removed to the ſee of Litchfield and Coventry, with their miſerable condition, who repreſenting the caſe to the queen, a fund was eſtabliſhed out of her majeſty's privy-purſe for the maintaining of ten preachers and as many ſchool-maſters in the vallies of Piedmont.

In Catalonia things continued in their former ſtate, the French having attempted nothing on that ſide, by reaſon their forces were ſufficiently diverted another way, and the Spaniards having done as little, from their uſual inactivity and weakneſs.

This year the proteſtant intereſt in Germany was ſtrengthened by the creation of a ninth electorate in favour of the duke of Hanover. That duke, who had been long under the influence of France, had now broken off all commerce with that court, and entered into a treaty, both with the emperor and king William. He promiſed great ſupplies againſt France and the Turk, if he might be made an elector of the empire; in which the king concurred to preſs the matter ſo earneſtly at the court of Vienna, that the emperor agreed to it, in caſe he could gain the conſent of the other electors; which the emperor's miniſters reſolved ſecretly to oppoſe as much as poſſible. The duke quickly gained the conſent of the greater number of the electors; yet new objections were ſtill made. It was ſaid, that, if this was granted, another electorate in a popiſh family ought alſo to be created, to balance the advantage, which this would give to the Lutherans; and it was moved, that Auſtria ſhould be made an electorate. But this was ſo much oppoſed, ſince it would give the emperor two votes in the electoral College, that it was let fall. In concluſion, after a year's negotiation, and a great oppoſition both by papiſts and proteſtant princes (ſome of the latter conſidering more their jealouſies of the houſe of Hanover, than the intereſt of their religion) the inveſtiture was given on the 19th of December 1692, with the title of elector of Brunſwick, and great marſhal of the empire. The French oppoſed this with all the artifices they could employ; and the matter lay long in an unſettled ſtate; nor was he now admitted into the college, it being ſaid that the unanimous conſent of all the electors muſt be had.

The greateſt prejudice the French ſuffered this year was from the ſeaſon; they had a very bad harveſt, and no vintage in the northern parts. England had likewiſe great apprehenſions from a very cold and wet ſummer, deluges of rain continuing till the very time of harveſt. But, when the nation was threatened with a famine, the ſeaſon changed in ſo extraordinary a manner, as to produce a very plentiful harveſt, ſufficient both to ſerve ourſelves, and to ſupply our neighbours abroad, which brought great ſums of money into the kingdom.

In the beginning of September, there was an earthquake felt in moſt places in England, particularly in London; and in many parts of France, Germany, and the Netherlands. The king was then in his camp at dinner, in an old decayed houſe, which ſhaking very much, and every one apprehending it was ready to fall, he was prevailed with to riſe from table, and go out of the houſe; but the ſurpriſe was ſoon over, and he returned to dinner. About two months before, moſt terrible earthquakes happened in Sicily and Malta, which were repreſented as the moſt dreadful, of any men[d] Biſhop Burnet tells us, that "If the duke of Savoy had carried on the attempt on Dauphiné with the ſpirit, with which he began it, he had put the affairs of France on that ſide into great diſorder. But he was either ill ſerved or betrayed in it. He ſat down before Ambrun, and beſieged it in form; ſo that a place which he might have carried in three days, coſt him ſome weeks. And in every ſtep he made it appear, there was either a great feebleneſs, or much treachery in his counſels. He made no great progreſs; yet the diſorder, it threw that and the neighbouring provinces into, was very great. He was ſtopped by the ſmall-pox, which ſaved his honour as much as it endangered his perſon. The retreat of his army, when his life was in danger, looked like a due caution. He recovered of the ſmall-pox, but a ferment remained ſtill in his blood, and broke out ſo often into feveriſh relapſes, that it was generally thought he was poiſoned. Many months paſſed before he was out of danger. So the campaign ended there with conſiderable loſſes to the French, but with no great advantage to the duke." II. 100. Monſieur Bernard aſſigns the following reaſons, why the duke did not make a further progreſs in Dauphiné: 1. Becauſe the Spaniſh fleet, which had been promiſed to come and alarm the coaſts of Provence, did not appear there. 2. Becauſe the Spaniſh troops in the duke's army, would not obey him, nor penetrate ſo far as he would have had them, either from a fear of being engaged too far, or a deſire of having a greater ſhare of the booty than they had received. This miſunderſtanding occaſioned a great deal of time to be loſt, and gave the enemy an opportunity of ſtrengthening themſelves, and ſtopping the progreſs of the confederate arms. 3. The ſickneſs of the duke himſelf. 4. and laſtly, The extraordinary vigilance of monſieur Catinat, and the good diſpoſition which he had every where made. This general having learned that the duke had ſome deſign upon Briançon and Jup, took ſuch meaſures with the inconſiderable body of troops under his command, that it was thought impoſſible to penetrate as far as theſe two places through a great many defiles, in which the French were ſtrongly intrenched, and which could not be forced without the loſs of part of the army. The duke therefore and his generals being informed of theſe difficulties, and finding the winter advancing, and the country ſo ruined, that it was impoſſible to ſupport the troops there during that ſeaſon, and conſidering, that they had no place to ſecure themſelves in, if they ſhould be attacked by the enemy, when the mountains ſhould be ſhut up by the ſnow; they thought proper to retire, after they had plundered the country. Lett. Hiſt. II. 405.

tioned in hiſtory. It was eſtimated, that about one hundred thouſand periſhed by them in Sicily. About the ſame time, an earthquake alſo ſhook the iſland of Jamaica, and almoſt totally ruined the town of Port-Royal: ſo that, beſides the damages, no leſs than fifteen-hundred perſons periſhed in it. Theſe were very extraordinary things, which made thoſe that ſtudied apocalyptical matters, imagine the end of the world drew near. But however, theſe diſmal accidents had but little influence on people to reform their manners. The great examples, ſet the nation by the king and queen, were not much followed. The king had publiſhed a proclamation, declaring his reſolution, to diſcountenance all manner of vice and immorality, in all perſons from the higheſt to the loweſt degree; and the queen, in the king's abſence, gave orders to execute the laws againſt drunkenneſs, ſwearing, and debauchery; and ſent directions over England, to all magiſtrates to do their duty in executing them: to which the king joined his authority, upon his return to England. Yet the reformation of manners, which ſome zealous men ſtudied to promote, went on but ſlowly. Many of the inferior magiſtrates were not only remiſs, but were very faulty themſelves, and even diſcouraged thoſe, who endeavoured to have vice ſuppreſſed and puniſhed. It muſt be confeſſed, that the behaviour of many clergymen gave great offence. They had taken the oaths, and read the prayers for the preſent eſtabliſhment: they obſerved the orders for public faſts and thankſgivings, and yet they ſhewed in many places their averſion to the government but too viſibly. In ſome places it broke out in very indecent inſtances, that were brought into courts of law and cenſured. This made many conclude, that the clergy were a ſort of men, that would ſwear and pray even againſt their own conſciences, rather than loſe their benefices, and conſequently were governed by intereſt, and not by principle. The jacobites grew ſtill to be more outrageous, while the clergy ſeemed to be neutrals in the diſpute. And what was, yet, more extraordinary, the government itſelf acted with ſuch remiſſneſs, and ſo few were enquired after or puniſhed, that thoſe who were employed by the king, behaved themſelves in many places, as if they had ſecret inſtructions to be heavy upon his beſt friends, and to be gentle to his enemies. Upon the whole matter, the nation was falling under a general corruption, which was much ſpread among all ſorts of people.

On the 13th of September the queen iſſued out two proclamations; the one for the better diſcovery of ſeditious libellers [e], and the other for the diſcovery and apprehending of highwaymen, and for a reward of forty pounds for every ſuch offender, to the diſcoverers; which encouragement occaſioned the taking of many of theſe robbers, who about this time very much infeſted the roads of this kingdom.

In May this year was detected a ſham plot invented by one Robert Young, who was committed to Newgate till he diſcharged a fine impoſed upon him. One Henry Pearſon, a priſoner in the ſame place for debt, perceiving Young to be very expert in counterfeiting hands, told him, that, if he could contrive a plot, and father it upon the earls of Marlborough and Saliſbury, Dr. Thomas Sprat biſhop of Rocheſter, and ſome others, he might ſoon have money enough to pay his fine. Young gladly accepted the propoſal; but told Pearſon, that nothing could be done in that matter, till he was releaſed, which in a ſhort time was effected. As ſoon as Pearſon was at liberty, he employed one Stephen Blackhead to carry letters between himſelf and Young. By a certain ſtratagem Young happened to procure the earl of Marlborough's hand, which he counterfeited ſo exactly, that it was very difficult to diſtinguiſh the true from the falſe. Afterward he drew up an aſſociation, and affixed to it the hands of the earls of Marlborough and Saliſbury, as alſo ſir Baſil Firebraſs's, the biſhop of Rocheſter's, and the lord Cornbury's, which two laſt were writ by another hand. And, that the more credit might be given to this pretended plot, Young forged ſeveral letters in the earl of Marlborough's name, ſuppoſed to be directed to himſelf, which Blackhead uſed to bring to him again. Blackhead went three times to the biſhop of Rocheſter's houſe at Bromley in Kent, upon a fictitious errand, from a ſuppoſed doctor of divinity, but with no other intent than to convey the forged aſſociation into a ſecret place, where it was afterwards found by the king's meſſengers, who, upon information given by Young againſt that prelate, came firſt to ſecure his perſon, and then to ſearch his houſe. His lordſhip was ſome days under confinement; but upon a ſtrict examination of the whole matter before the council, and the confronting of Blackhead with Young, the forgery was evidently diſcovered, and his lordſhip's innocence made manifeſt.

The earl of Marlborough was likewiſe committed to the Tower upon the accuſation of this Young, on the 5th of May, where he continued till the 15th of the next month, being the laſt day of the term, when he was admitted to bail at the King's-Bench bar, the duke of Shrewſbury, the marquis of Hallifax, the earl of Carbury, and Mr. Boyle being bail for him. On the 24th of October following, being the firſt day of Michaelmas term, his lordſhip appeared again in that court, and inſiſted to be diſcharged, alledging, that he had been committed upon the charge of Young, againſt whom an information of perjury and forgery had been ſince found by the grand jury, and declaring, that he would otherwiſe make his complaint in the houſe of lords. But his bail was ſtill continued by order of that court.

Scotland enjoying now a perfect tranquility, the parliament of that kingdom was very zealous and forward to contribute new levies for the ſupport of their majeſties government. And as for Ireland, the lord Sidney, lord lieutenant of that kingdom, ſo managed affairs, that the parliament there, which began on the 5th of October, made an act, not only of 'recognition of their majeſties undoubted title to that crown,' and another 'for encouragement of proteſtant ſtrangers to ſettle in that kingdom,' but alſo one 'for granting to their majeſties the ſum of ſeventy thouſand pounds, by an additional duty of exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors.' After which, on the 3d of November, they were prorogued [f].

The king departed from the camp at Gramont on Friday, September the 7th, having left the command in chief of the army with the elector of Bavaria; and the next day arrived at Breda, and went thence to his houſe at Loo, to divert himſelf a few days with hunting. He then came back to Bruſſels, and held a council of war, wherein he gave orders

[e] Now it was that the Glencoe buſineſs was induſtriouſly noiſed about town and country, and repreſented as bad as the maſſacres at Paris and in Ireland, and as the king's act and deed; but, how juſtly, will hereafter be ſeen. Leſley publiſhed a pretended relation of the fact, in a letter which was greedily ſwallowed by the jacobites, and other enemies of the revolution.

[f] The proceedings of that parliament will appear from the following extracts of original letters from Mr. Richard James, one of the under-ſecretaries of ſtate, to ſir William Dutton Colt, envoy-extraordinary at Hanover.

Whitehall, Octob. 7, 1692.

"This week arrived an expreſs from Ireland with ſeveral bills, that have been prepared by the council there to be preſented to the parliament, which ſat down on the 5th inſtant. They were put into the hands of Mr. attorney-general to conſider of them, who made this afternoon his report to the queen and council here, where the ſaid bills were read, and ſuch amendments being made, as were thought fit, they are ordered to be engroſſed and paſſed under the great ſeal of England, in order to be diſpatched back to Ireland. Theſe bills are eleven in number; the chief of them are for 'granting the aid to their majeſties;' for 'ſettling the militia;' and for 'an indemnity.'

Whitehall, Octob. 11, 1692.

"The council has met ſeveral times to conſider of the bills tranſmitted hither from Ireland, and have, with ſome amendments, approved of theſe that follow: 'An act for granting certain duties to their majeſties; An act for an additional exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors: An act for ſettling the militia: An act for puniſhing deſerters and mutineers in the army: An act to encourage proteſtant ſtrangers to come and ſettle in Ireland: An act to prevent vexatious ſuits; and an act about taking affidavits in the country.' The 'act of indemnity,' which was ſent over with the reſt, is ſtill under debate; and the papiſts, who are concerned therein, ſince it cuts off all remainders to the forfeited eſtates, have petitioned the queen, that they may be heard, before the bill be ſent back; and their petition is referred to Mr. attorney-general."

Whitehall, Octob. 21, 1692.

"The letters from Dublin of the 12th tell us, that the parliament had yet done little beſides appointing the committees. That of grievances had fallen upon Mr. Culliford, lately one of the commiſſioners of the revenue there, who, it was believed, would not come off there as he did the laſt winter in England. They had likewiſe queſtioned one Croſs, a gentleman of the county of Cork, for ſeveral things done by him in the late king James's time, and had confined him, and expelled him the houſe, of which he was a member. They have likewiſe ordered their votes to be printed."

Whitehall, Octob. 28, 1692.

"The king came hither yeſterday, being the day appointed for a public thankſgiving; and in the afternoon was preſent at the general council, where two Iriſh bills more were read and approved, viz. one 'to prevent frauds and perjuries;' and another 'to ſettle inteſtates eſtates.' There were two other bills under conſideration, to wit, that for a 'general indemnity;'

for the march of the forces into winter quarters, and went thence to the Hague, where having ſettled his affairs, he embarked on the 15th of October on board the Mary yatch, attended by ſir Cloudeſley Shovel, with ſeveral men of war, and on the 18th landed ſafe at Yarmouth. The next night he lay at ſir John Duke's at Saxmundham, and, on Thurſday the 20th, was met by the queen at Newhall, and about eight the ſame evening their majeſties come to Kenſington, having paſſed through the city of London amidſt the acclamations of the people, and continued illuminations of the houſes, and other demonſtrations of joy for his ſafe return. Two days after the lord mayor, aldermen, and recorder of London attended his majeſty at Kenſington, with a congratulatory addreſs. The king received them very graciouſly, conferred the honour of knighthood upon Salathiel Lovel, eſq. ſerjeant at law, their recorder; and accepted their invitation to dine at Guildhall on the lord mayor's day, ſir John Fleet being then mayor. The entertainment was very magnificent; and the king was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood upon John Wildman, William Gore, James Houblon, aldermen; Leonard Robinſon, chamberlain; Rowland Aynſworth, William Scawen, Joſiah Child, and John Touch, citizens. And the ſame honour was conferred ſome days before on Thomas Trevor, eſq. their majeſties ſollicitor general.

On the 10th of October, it had been ordered by the queen in council, that the monthly faſts, appointed by proclamation of the 24th of March, 1691, ſhould be diſcontinued till further order; and a public thankſgiving was ordered for the preſervation of their majeſties and their government againſt the deſigns and attempts of their open and ſecret enemies, particularly for the late ſignal victory at ſea, againſt the French fleet; and for the diſappointment of the barbarous and horrid conſpiracy for taking away his majeſty's life by aſſaſſination.

About this time ſeveral French refugees, ſtudious to promote the intereſt of England, and to weaken France by impairing her manufactures, in conjunction with ſome Engliſh merchants, termed the 'Royal Luſtring company;' and being ſupported by the protection of the earl of Pembroke, whom they choſe their Governor, obtained the king's patent, whereby they were reputed a body politic, having the full and ſole privilege for the making of luſtrings and alamodes in England. On the 26th of October, this patent was read in full committee at their houſe in Auſtin Friars; at which time the company was farther aſſured by their governor of their majeſties ſatisfaction in this undertaking to ſuch a degree, that all other encouragements might be expected for the promoting of it.

On Friday the 4th of November, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, which the king opened with the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am very glad to meet you again in parliament, where I have an opportunity of thanking you for the great ſupplies you have given me for the proſecution of this war. And I hope by your advice and aſſiſtance, which have never failed me, to take ſuch meaſures, as may be moſt proper for ſupporting our common intereſt againſt the exceſſive power of France.

"We have great reaſon to rejoice in the happy victory, which by the bleſſing of God we obtained at ſea. And I wiſh I could tell you, that the ſucceſs at land had been anſwerable to it. I am ſure my own ſubjects had ſo remarkable a part in both, that their bravery and courage muſt ever be remembered to their honour.

"The French are repairing their loſſes at ſea with great diligence, and do deſign to augment their land forces conſiderably againſt the next campaign; which makes it abſolutely neceſſary for our ſafety, that at leaſt as great a force be maintained at ſea and land, as we had the laſt year. And therefore I muſt aſk of you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, a ſupply ſuitable to ſo great an occaſion.

"I am very ſenſible how heavy this charge is upon my people; and it extremely afflicts me that it is not poſſible to be avoided, without expoſing ourſelves to inevitable ruin and deſtruction. The inconvenience of ſending out of the kingdom great ſums of money, for the payment of the troops abroad, is indeed very conſiderable; and I ſo much wiſh it could be remedied, that, if you can ſuggeſt to me any methods for the ſupport of them, which may leſſen this inconvenience, I ſhall be ready to receive them with all the ſatisfaction imaginable.

My lords and gentlemen,

"None can deſire more than I do, that a deſcent ſhould be made into France; and therefore, notwithſtanding the diſappointment of that deſign laſt ſummer, I intend to attempt it the next year with a much more conſiderable force; and ſo ſoon as I ſhall be enabled, all poſſible care and application ſhall be uſed towards it.

"And upon this occaſion I cannot omit taking notice of that ſignal deliverance, which by the good providence of God we received the laſt ſpring, to the diſappointment and confuſion of our enemies deſigns and expectations.

"This has ſufficiently ſhewn us how much we are expoſed to the attempts of France, while that king is in a condition to make them. Let us therefore improve the advantage we have at this time of being joined with moſt of the princes and ſtates of Europe, againſt ſo dangerous an enemy. In this ſurely all men will agree, who have any love for their nity:' and that for 'eaſing proteſtant diſſenters;' but they are both laid aſide for the preſent. By the firſt a great many perſons are attainted, and the remainders are cut off from all forfeited eſtates; and by the latter a greater liberty is given the diſſenters than what they now enjoy here."

Whitehall, Novemb. 4, 1692.

"Yeſterday came in ſeveral mails from Ireland; the laſt are of the 20th and 24th of laſt month. They bring little news, telling us only, that the two houſes of parliament had paſſed an act for recognition of their majeſties undoubted title to the crown of Ireland, and had under conſideration ſeveral other bills, as alſo the ſtate of the revenue, and ſome grievances, which they complained of; but the letters do not ſay what they were. They had expelled Mr. Farrel the houſe for having adhered to and favoured the Iriſh during the late rebellion, as they had done before to Mr. Crofts of the county of Cork. And my lord lieutenant had ſent a meſſage to them, letting them know, that they ſhould ſit but a fortnight longer, and be then prorogued till the ſpring."

Whitehall, Novem. 8, 1692.

"By the letters from Dublin of the 27th and 30th paſt, we have an account, that the two houſes of parliament there had paſſed an act for granting to their majeſties an additional exciſe upon beer, ale, and other liquors, which may raiſe about twenty-five thouſand pounds. But at the ſame time the commons declared, That it was their undoubted right to prepare and reſolve the ways and means of raiſing money; and that their receiving the ſaid bill of exciſe, which was tranſmitted to them under the great ſeal of England, ſhould not be drawn into precedent for the future. And withall they rejected another bill ſent out of England, for granting certain duties to their majeſties for one year, and ordered it to be entered in their journals, that the reaſon why the ſaid bill is rejected, is, that the ſame had not its riſe in their houſe. And after this they themſelves took into conſideration, how they ſhould raiſe the reſt of the ſupply of ſeventy thouſand pounds, which they had voted to be given for one year towards paying the army. They had likewiſe rejected two other bills tranſmitted out of England, one intitled,

'An act to confirm the acts of ſettlement and explanation and reſolution of the doubts of the lord lieutenant and council upon the ſaid acts;' and the other, 'An act for reverſing the act of attainders, and all other acts made in the late pretended parliament of Ireland.' They had appointed a committee to inquire what laws were going to expire in Ireland, and were fit to be continued; and what laws, that have been made in England, were fit to be made of force in that kingdom; and the ſaid committee had reported ſeveral laws accordingly; among which one was the Habeas Corpus act. They had alſo repreſented ſeveral grievances to the lord lieutenant, to wit, the employing of papiſts in the army; the ſuffering them to go armed; and miſapplying of the forfeitures, &c. Laſtly, they had given his excellency thanks for his care to ſuppreſs the rapparees and tories, whoſe numbers began to increaſe in the north of Connaught, and in the county of Cork. And the houſe of lords had reſolved to write letters to the houſes of the parliament in England, to thank them and this whole kingdom for their kindneſs and aſſiſtance to the Iriſh, when they lately fled into this kingdom from the popiſh perſecution in Ireland. The ſame letters add, that it was believed the parliament would end their ſeſſions the laſt week, and be prorogued till the ſpring."

Whitehall, Novemb. 11, 1692.

"This day came in an expreſs from Ireland, with an account that his excellency the lord lieutenant had on the 3d inſtant prorogued the parliament to the 6th of April next, after having given the royal aſſent to the 'Act of recognition of their majeſties undoubted title to the crown of England; an act for granting an additional exciſe to their majeſties; an act for encouraging proteſtant ſtrangers to ſettle in Ireland; and an act for taking affidavits in the country.' The commons had rejected ſeveral other acts beſides thoſe mentioned in my laſt, to wit, that, 'for ſettling the militia; another for puniſhing mutineers and deſerters, &c.' Which, together with ſome other votes, gave his excellency ſuch diſlike of their proceedings, that he took notice of it in his ſpeech at their riſing, and cauſed a proteſtation to be entered againſt them in the lords houſe, for aſſerting the king's prerogative; and his excellency had likewiſe removed Mr. ſerjeant Oſborne and Mr. ſerjeant Broderick, two leading men in the houſe, from being of the king's council."

The

country, or any zeal for our religion. I cannot therefore doubt but you will continue to ſupport me in this war againſt the declared enemy of this nation; and that you will give as ſpeedy diſpatch to the affairs before you, as the nature and importance of them will admit; that our preparations may be timely and effectual for the preſervation of all that is dear and valuable to us.

"I am ſure I can have no intereſt but what is yours. We have the ſame religion to defend; and you cannot be more concerned for the preſervation of your liberties and properties than I am, that you ſhould always remain in the full poſſeſſion and enjoyment of them; for I have no aim but to make you a happy people.

"Hitherto I have never ſpared to expoſe my own perſon for the good and welfare of this nation; and I am ſenſible of your good affections to me, that I ſhall continue to do ſo with great chearfulneſs upon all occaſions, wherein I may contribute to the honour and advantage of England."

This ſpeech was received with the univerſal approbation which it deſerved. The commons after reading the king's ſpeech, by reaſon of the thinneſs of the houſe adjourned to the 11th of November[f], in order to give their members time to come up; the lords likewiſe adjourned to November the 7th, when a complaint was made by the earls of Huntingdon, Scarſdale, and Marlborough, that they had been lately committed to the Tower by warrants, wherein it was not ſaid, that, that any information was given againſt them upon oath, which they alledged to be required by the law. They complained likewiſe, that the beginning of this Michaelmas term they were continued upon bail, by the court of King's-Bench, though the parliament was then going to meet: which they looked upon as a breach of the privilege of the peerage of England; wherein they were ſeconded by ſome other lords. Theſe two points were debated ſome time, and the opinion of the judges was aſked upon the laſt; and the lord chief juſtice Holt juſtified the proceeding of the King's-Bench. At laſt it was reſolved, that a committee ſhould be appointed to inquire into precedents about this matter, and to make their report on the Wedneſday following; till which time the houſe adjourned; and the committee met on Tueſday accordingly.

The houſe of peers meeting on Wedneſday, November 9th, reſumed the affair of the commitment of the lords to the Tower, and their being continued under bail by the King's Bench. The debate ran chiefly upon the ſecond head; and it was moved, that the recognizances of the ſaid lords, which were taken in the King's Bench, ſhould be removed to the houſe of peers, as being the ſupreme court. But the lord chief juſtice Holt's opinion being aſked, and he acquainting them, that it could not be done, that debate fell. The day following, their lordſhips called before them Mr. Aaron Smith, who was the Solicitor for law affairs; and he was aſked upon oath what witneſſes there were in the firſt place againſt the earl of Huntingdon; to which he anſwered, that he knew of but one. It was then debated whether one witneſs was ſufficient to keep a peer under bail, after he had entered his prayer at the King's Bench to be tried, as the habeas corpus act directs; but they came then to no reſolution upon it.

The houſe of commons met on the 11th according to their adjournment, when a motion was made by ſir Thomas Clarges for an addreſs to his majeſty, that the foreign alliances might be laid before that houſe; which was carried; and the deſign of it was evidently to enter into the conſideration of the part, which the ſeveral confederate princes bore in the war; and whether it was proportionable to that of England.

The next day the peers reſumed the debate concerning the lords who had been committed; and the committee, which had been appointed for that purpoſe, reported an order, declaring, 'That no peer ſhould be continued upon bail, unleſs there were two witneſſes againſt him.' Upon this ſome debate aroſe, but concluded without any determination; and then their lordſhips entered upon the conſideration of the legality of the commitments, but adjourned without coming to any concluſion.

The ſame day there was brought into the houſe of commons a bill for 'regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon;' and they voted thanks to admiral Ruſſel, and the commanders and ſeamen of the fleet, for the late victory at ſea; and ordered, that the lords of the admiralty lay before the houſe copies of the orders by them ſent to the admiral; who was likewiſe ordered to bring copies of thoſe, which he had received; the houſe reſolving to inquire how it came to paſs, that the victory was not purſued.

The next day, November 12, the houſe of lords received a report from their committee, of an order, declaring, that no peer ſhall be remanded to priſon by the King's Bench upon his appearing before them by virtue of the habeas corpus act, after having entered his prayer to be tried as the ſaid act directs, or kept under bail, unleſs there be againſt him two witneſſes upon oath. Hereupon the judges were conſulted, and they were of opinion, that it was not neceſſary in this caſe to have two witneſſes upon oath againſt the priſoner, but that there ought to be two witneſſes in a capacity to be ſworn, ſince it might happen, that one of them was abſent and had not yet had an opportunity to be ſworn. The committee therefore altered their order agreeably to this opinion of the judges; and then it was moved on the 14th of November, and debated ſeveral hours, whether that order ſhould be a ſtanding rule in the journals of the houſe, and at laſt was reſolved in the affirmative by thirty-five voices to twenty-eight. The day following their lordſhips entered again upon the matter of the lords continued under bail, and conſidered in what manner to diſcharge them from their recognizances; and after ſome debate it was intimated as an expedient, that his majeſty would give order for their diſcharge the next day; which put an end to the debate, and they accordingly adjourned to Thurſday, November 17, when they were informed, that theſe lords had been diſcharged the day before by the king's particular command. Upon this a debate aroſe, what entry ſhould be made thereof in their journals for aſſerting the rights and privileges of the peers, wherein they came to no determination, but adjourned the debate to the next day, when they ordered it to be entered upon their journal, that being informed, that his majeſty had given directions for the diſcharge of the lords under bail in the King's Bench, the debate about that matter ceaſed. This debate went off in a bill, that indemnified the miniſtry for thoſe commitments, but limited them, for the future, by ſeveral rules; all which rules were rejected by the commons. They thought thoſe limitations gave a legal power to commit, in caſes where they were obſerved; whereas they thought the ſafer way was to indemnify the miniſtry, when it was viſible they did not commit any but upon real danger, and not to ſet them any rules. Since, as to the committing of ſuſpected perſons, where the danger is real and viſible, the publick ſafety muſt be looked to, and ſuperſede all particular laws,

The commons, on the 12th of November entered upon an inquiry, 1. Why the late victory at ſea had not been purſued? 2. Why the deſcent had not been made? 3. Why care had not been taken to cover the trade, by having convoys and cruiſers in proper ſtations? In anſwer to the firſt, admiral Ruſſel alledged, that nothing had been omitted on his part; and that he gave orders in writing to ſir John Aſhby, preſently after the fight, to purſue the French ſhips, that fled through the Race of Alderney[g]. Secondly, as to the deſcent, he ſaid, That it was ſo late in the year when the land-forces joined the fleet, that it was the opinion of all the ſeamen, that the great ſhips could not ſtand over to St. Malo's, or the other places propoſed, without an extreme hazard, So that the inquiry remaining was, why the land forces embarked no ſooner; of which the commiſſioners of tranſports, victuallers, and officers of the ordnance, were required to give an account as far as related to their ſeveral parts. Laſtly, the commiſſioners of the admiralty were directed to give an account about the convoys.

On the 14th, the commons made an addreſs to the king, in which they acknowledged 'The great affection his majeſty ſhewed to his ſubjects, by taking notice of their bravery and courage, by that ſenſible concern he expreſſed for the charges on his people, and by that tender regard for the preſervation of their religion, liberties, and properties, which muſt ever be remembered with gratitude by all his faithful ſubjects. They likewiſe acknowledged the favour of God, [f] The proceedings of both houſes in this ſeſſion, are chiefly extracted from a ſeries of original letters, written by Mr. Warre, under ſecretary of ſtate, to ſir. W. D. Colt, envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

[g] Accordingly ſir John Aſhby being examined, November 19, particularly in relation to the French men of war that eſcaped into St. Malo's, he gave an account of the proceedings of the ſhips under his command in and after the engagement; with which the houſe was ſo well pleaſed, that the ſpeaker, by direction of the houſe, acquainted him, 'That the houſe took notice of his ingenious behaviour at the bar, and that he had given an account to the ſatisfaction of the houſe, and was diſmiſſed from farther attendance.' Pr. H. C. II. 410.

in

in reſtoring his majeſty in ſafety to his people, after ſo many hazards and dangers, to which he had expoſed his ſacred perſon; that there might be nothing wanting on his part to oppoſe the ambitious deſigns of his enemies, and to maintain the honour of England, and the liberties of Europe. They alſo congratulated his deliverance from the ſecret and open deſigns, which the malice of his enemies had formed againſt him; and aſſured him, that they would always adviſe and aſſiſt him in the ſupporting of his government againſt his enemies.' They preſented at the ſame time their thankful acknowledgments to the queen, 'for her gracious and prudent adminiſtration of the government, whilſt his majeſty was hazarding his royal perſon abroad; and for the bleſſings of peace, which they enjoyed at home under her auſpicious reign, at a time when the greateſt part of Europe was ſuffering the miſerable effects of war. They alſo congratulated, not only the ſignal deliverance, which they received from a bold and cruel deſign, formed and proſecuted for their deſtruction, when it was juſt ready to be executed, but likewiſe the return of her majeſty's fleet with ſo compleat and glorious a victory, as was not to be equalled in any former age; aſſuring her majeſty, that the grateful ſenſe they had of their happineſs under her government, ſhould be always manifeſted in conſtant returns of duty and obedience, and a firm reſolution to do all that was in their power to render her reign ſecure and proſperous.'

On the 14th ſir Edward Seymour delivered to the commons a meſſage from the king in anſwer to their addreſs the laſt ſeſſion, about the Eaſt-India Company, with ſeveral papers relating to that company; namely, a copy of the new regulations drawn up by his majeſty's order, and which the company had refuſed to ſubmit to; and the opinion of the judges thereupon, which the king informed the houſe was the reaſon of his having done nothing in the affair, ſince the judges had declared, that the company muſt have three years notice, and that no company could be ſet up in that time; for which reaſon he left the commons to proceed in that matter as they ſhould think proper.

The next day the commiſſioners of accounts laid before the commons their report about the receipts and iſſues of the public monies; the conſideration of which being deferred to the Thurſday following, the buſineſs of the day was called for, which was to conſider of the king's ſpeech; but it was anſwered, that, ſince his majeſty deſired their 'advice' as well as 'aſſiſtance,' they could not offer the former till they had inquired into the alliances, public accounts, &c. And thereupon it was ordered that the conſideration of his majeſty's ſpeech ſhould be adjourned till the Tueſday following.

On Wedneſday, November 16th, the commons had a debate of two hours, by whom the alliances laid before them ſhould be tranſlated; ſome propoſing, that it ſhould be done by public notaries; others that they ſhould be returned to the ſecretary for that purpoſe; and others, that they ſhould be referred to a committee, in order to be rendered into Engliſh, and theſe laſt prevailed. The next day was ſpent by that houſe in the buſineſs relating to the Eaſt-India company; and, the day following, they read a ſecond time the bill 'for regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon;' upon which a long debate aroſe, whether it ſhould be rejected or committed, many of the members looking upon it as very unſeaſonable at that time, when the enemies of the government were ſo active in plotting againſt it, ſince by this bill the conviction of ſuch offenders would be made much more difficult than it was before; but in concluſion, it was carried upon the queſtion by one hundred and ſeventy againſt one hundred and fifty, that the ſaid bill ſhould be committed to the committee of the whole houſe.

On Wedneſday November the 23d, the commons had a long debate about the foreign generals, on which ſubject ſeveral warm ſpeeches were made, and the count de Solms was particularly named as the chief occaſion of the ill ſucceſs at Steenkirk by not ſending ſuccours, when called for, to ſupport the Engliſh, and as a perſon, who had not treated the Engliſh well. It was at firſt preſſed, that no foreign general ſhould be allowed of upon the Engliſh eſtabliſhment; but that motion would not paſs, though it was reſolved with little oppoſition, that his majeſty ſhould be humbly adviſed to fill the vacancies, that ſhall happen for the future, of general officers in our army with ſuch only as are natives of their majeſties dominions; and that the general of the Engliſh foot be a native of their majeſties dominions. By which vote they propoſed to hinder the coming in of any other foreign generals than were already employed in the ſervice, and to remove count Solms. And it was even moved, that the houſe ſhould deſire the king to confer that command upon lieutenant-general Talmaſh, who, it was ſaid, was a better and more experienced officer; but this motion was not ſeconded, and ſo it fell.

On the 24th of November, the commons reſumed the affair of the Eaſt India company; and reſolved, that there ſhould be a new ſubſcription of a joint ſtock not exceeding two millions, and not leſs than 1,500,000l. to continue for twenty one years. And the day following the ſtate of the war for the enſuing year was laid before the houſe. The land force was the ſame as it was the laſt year, but the naval ſomewhat greater. The whole expence amounted to four millions, two hundred thouſand pounds, to which was added the deficiency of the laſt poll-act, amounting to 750,000l, The eſtimates were read, and the farther conſideration of the ſupply adjourned to the Tueſday following.

The lords, on November the 23d, attended their majeſties with their addreſſes of thanks and congratulation; and on the 28th they reſolved, that his majeſty be humbly adviſed to employ one, who was born their majeſties ſubject, to be general of the Engliſh forces; and the day following they conſidered the miſcarriages of the intended deſcent into France, and after ſome debate reſolved, to make an addreſs to his majeſty, that all orders, letters, &c. relating to the ſame, be laid before them.

On Saturday, November 26th, the committee about the tranſports made their report to the houſe of commons; and after ſeveral warm ſpeeches, it was reſolved, that in regard many of the great affairs of the government have been for the time paſt unſucceſsfully managed by thoſe who had the direction thereof, the houſe ſhould humbly adviſe his majeſty to prevent the like miſchiefs for the future, by employing men of known ability and integrity; this queſtion being carried without a ſingle negative. Some members then repreſented the prejudices which they conceived to ariſe to the public by having all affairs of ſtate paſſed only through the cabinet council; thinking it better to have them conſidered of in the privy council; upon which there was ſome debate, but the motion fell.

On the 28th the commons were employed upon the bill 'for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon,' wherein they made ſeveral amendments, the principal of which was, that this act ſhould not take place, nor be of any force, till after the expiration of the preſent war with France; which upon the queſtion was carried by one hundred and ſeventy-five, againſt one hundred and forty; this amendment being thought to anſwer the main objection againſt the bill, of its being unſeaſonable.

The day following they took into conſideration the eſtimates about the fleet. The firſt debate was, whether they ſhould allow of the thirty-three thouſand ſeamen demanded by the admiralty; which ſome would have reduced to thirty thouſand; but it was carried for the whole number; after which they agreed likewiſe to all the particulars of the eſtimate, except that about the two marine regiments, which they did not allow of.

On the 30th of November, the commons went again into a grand committee to give advice to his majeſty. Several ſpeeches were made againſt the ill management of affairs, and the inactivity and want of vigour, that appeared in thoſe, who had the adminiſtration of them; which they imputed to the principles of ſome of them, who at firſt oppoſed the ſettlement of the government, and therefore could not be thought to be ſo zealous for the ſupport of it as was neceſſary in the preſent ſtate of things. And Mr. Arnold went ſo far as to name the earl of Nottingham, though he was not ſeconded. After a long debate the following vote paſſed without any oppoſition, that his majeſty be humbly adviſed, for the neceſſary ſupport of the government, to employ in his councils and management of his affairs, ſuch perſons only whoſe principles oblige them to ſtand by him and his right, againſt the late king James and all other pretenders whatſoever.

The day following, the houſe agreed with the committee about the eſtimates of the fleet for the enſuing year; and then reſolved upon an addreſs to his majeſty, that a liſt of the ſhips deſigned for the next year's ſervice might be laid before them. After this the report was made about the bill 'for regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon,' to which the houſe agreed, and particularly to the amendment, that this act ſhould not take place till after the expiration of the preſent war, which was debated for ſome time, and at laſt carried by one hundred and ſixty-five againſt one hundred and forty. Some clauſes were then offered to be added to the bill, one of which occaſioned a long debate. It was to enact, that it ſhould be high treaſon for any perſon to declare by word or writing, that their preſent majeſties were not lawful and rightful king and queen of this realm. This was very much oppoſed, as a thing irregular to bring in thus a clauſe for making a new law, and as dangerous to the ſubject to make words treaſon. At laſt it was agreed to lay aſide the clauſe, and that a bill be brought in for the better preſervation of their majeſties perſons and government. But no further mention was made of the other bill 'for regulating trials, &c.' during this ſeſſion.

The houſe of lords, on the 2d of December, reſumed the conſideration of the bill of indemnity, and added to it a clauſe impowering the council, in caſe of an invaſion, to ſecure all ſuſpected perſons, who refuſe to take the oaths, and to give ſecurity for their peaceable behaviour. And on the 6th of that month the earl of Nottingham gave in to their lordſhips an account of all orders and proceedings about the deſcent.

On the 3d of December, the commons proceeded upon the eſtimates about the land-forces; when the lord Ranelagh acquainted them, that, of the fifty-four thouſand demanded by his majeſty, he deſigned, that twenty-thouſand ſhould be left in England, and the reſt employed abroad. Upon this, the firſt debate was, whether they ſhould agree to have twenty-thouſand men kept in England; and it was preſſed to begin with this queſtion; but the managers for the court oppoſed it, and would not ſuffer this ſeparate queſtion, inſiſting to have the whole fifty-four thouſand men put into the queſtion together; which occaſioned a long debate, but at laſt it was agreed, that the ſeparate queſtion about the twenty-thouſand men to be kept in England ſhould be put firſt; which being done, it paſſed without a negative. Then the ſecond queſtion was debated about the thirty-four thouſand men to be employed abroad; which was warmly oppoſed by ſeveral, who were againſt ſending any forces to Flanders, where no advantage was to be expected by the experience of the laſt campaign; at leaſt they were for leſſening the number, ſince the kingdom could not bear ſo great an expence. This debate kept the houſe ſitting till nine at night, when the queſtion being put, it was carried for the thirty-four thouſand men with ſo great a majority, that the oppoſite ſide did not think fit to divide for it. On the 5th they went again into a grand committee to give advice; and after a long debate, and divers angry ſpeeches, they paſſed the two following votes: 1. That the committee was of opinion, that there had been an apparent miſcarriage in the management of the affairs relating to the deſcent the laſt ſummer. 2. That one cauſe of the ſaid miſcarriage, was the want of giving timely and neceſſary orders by ſuch perſons, to whom the management of this matter was committed. The firſt paſſed without any oppoſition; but the laſt, which was plainly levelled at the earl of Nottingham, was carried only by one voice, a hundred and ſixty-five againſt a hundred and ſixty-four. The day following they proceeded upon the eſtimates about the land-forces, and agreed to the allowances demanded for the general officers. But, when they came to the three pounds a day ſet down for Mr. Blaithwait, they would not allow of it, but reduced it to twenty ſhillings, which, upon the queſtion, was carried by about nineteen voices.

The lords, on the 7th of December, had the earl of Nottingham's relation concerning the deſcent read to them, and it was ordered, that the original letters from admiral Ruſſel, and other perſons therein mentioned, ſhould be laid before the houſe. After which a motion was made, that they ſhould proceed jointly with the commons in giving their advice to his majeſty, and to that end it ſhould be propoſed, that a committee might be appointed by either houſe, to meet together, and conſider of heads for the ſame. But, after a long debate, it was reſolved in the negative by a majority of forty-eight againſt thirty-ſix; of the former number were all the lords of the cabinet council, except the lord Steward; all the biſhops preſent, except dr. Watſon, biſhop of St. David's.[h]

[h] Leave having been aſked and given, that ſome lords might proteſt, if the queſtion was carried in the negative, the lords, whoſe names are underwritten, entered their proteſtation in the reaſons following:

1. Becauſe his majeſty, having particularly and expreſsly deſired the advice of his parliament at this time, when he ſo much ſeems to need it, no other method was, or, in our opinions could be propoſed, by which the two houſes might ſo well and ſo ſpeedily be brought to that concurrence, which is neceſſary to render their advice effectual.

2. Becauſe it appears by ſome papers already imparted to this houſe, that ſeveral members of the houſe of commons are concerned in the matters before us, as having been ſo lately employed in his majeſty's ſervice; and we conceive it the eaſieſt, propereſt, and faireſt way of communication between the two houſes, to have ſo great and important a buſineſs tranſacted and prepared in a committee ſo choſen.

3. Becauſe it cannot be expected, that ſo many members of the houſe of commons, from whom we ſhall need information, can in any other manner be here preſent ſo often, though with the leave of the houſe, as will be neceſſary for a ſufficient inquiry into the ſeveral affairs now under conſideration.

4. Becauſe, if the houſe of commons intend alſo to give advice to his majeſty, it is very probable that both houſes of parliament may receive ſuch information ſeverally, as will be thought fit to be communicated as ſoon as poſſible; and we conceive no way of doing that can be ſo proper or ſpeedy as in a committee of both houſes.

5. Becauſe, in a time of ſuch imminent danger to the nation, by reaſon of ſo many miſcarriages, as are ſuppoſed generally to be committed, the cloſeſt and ſtricteſt union of both houſes is abſolutely neceſſary to redeem us from all that ruin, which we have too much cauſe to fear is coming upon us.

Mr. John Hampden publiſhed about this time a remarkable piece, intitled, "Some ſhort conſiderations concerning the ſtate of the nation." He begins it with remarking, that 'perhaps there was not any time in which it was more neceſſary to join heads and hearts for the ſervice of our native country, that ſo a ſafe and effectual method might be agreed upon, to bring the nation through the great and many difficulties it laboured under; and to attain the end, which was propoſed in the late revolution, and in that war, in which it was engaged for the defence of all that was dear to us, againſt thoſe, who were ſworn enemies of our religion and country.' He then conſiders, that the remedying of all the evils, under which the nation laboured, was only to be expected from the parliament; and that, if the parliament ſhould ſeparate what the king had ſo wiſely joined together in his ſpeech, and ſhould either give aſſiſtance without advice, or advice without aſſiſtance, our affairs would be ruined, and the nation undone.

Mr. Hampden next makes ſome reflections upon the ſtate of the nation, and conſiders it as in a ſtate of war, and againſt whom, and for what ends, it was engaged in that war. The perſon againſt whom the war was directed, he tells us, was the French king, who might be ſaid to be in ſome ſort the enemy of mankind, 'the deſign of whoſe whole life had been to eſtabliſh in Europe what they call an univerſal monarchy, which might more properly be called the enſlaving of all Europe, and whoſe hatred to all, that bore the name of proteſtant, was inveterate and invincible.' The ends of the war were both juſt and neceſſary in the higheſt degree; ſelf-defence, the maintenance of our antient free government; the aſſerting our rights and liberties; and, above all, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion againſt popery and idolatry.

Mr. Hampden then conſiders, in what ſtate and condition we were for the carrying on this great war, 'which had already laſted almoſt four years, and was likely to laſt much longer, and at length to end unhappily, if effectual meaſures were not taken by the parliament to manage it in ſuch a way, and for ſuch ends, as were conſiſtent with our ability, preſent condition, and true intereſt.' He proceeds to ſhew, that the nation was not only in a ſtate of war, but alſo in a ſtate of decay and conſuming, and that in many reſpects, as, 1. With reſpect to its ſhipping; it being incredible, what number of ſhips had been loſt ſince the beginning of the war. 2. With regard to its ſeamen; the occaſion of which decay was this, that we had indeed acts of navigation, and one would think our own intereſt ſhould have inclined us ſufficiently to employ our own men in matters of trade: yet there was ſo great opportunity given to employ foreigners by want of convoys, and the breeding of ſeamen being interrupted by the loſs of ſo many of our ſhips, and the giving up the bank-fiſhing, and Newfoundland fiſhing, in a manner entirely to the French, that our trade inſenſibly ſlipt from us, our merchants were diſappointed and undone, and our ſeamen diſcouraged and diminiſhed; in whom notwithſtanding conſiſts the true ſtrength and ſafeguard of this iſland. 3. In the decay of our trade: 'Not to mention again, ſays he, the prodigious number of trading ſhips taken by our enemies, and the diſcouragement of our ſeamen by employing foreigners, it is well known, that all nations now drive on a free trade with France, and we alone are excepted from that benefit; while, on the other hand, we bear three parts in four of the charges of this war. The Swedes, Danes, Portugueſe, Venetians, and others, take off the French goods as openly as ever; and the two former ſupply them with ſhips and naval ſtores. The Spaniards in the Netherlands maintain as open and regular a trade with them as in the time of full peace, without ſo much as a diſguiſe, or the leaſt pretence of a diſguiſe, though we know they cannot ſubſiſt one moment without us; and therefore we may put a ſtop to ſuch abuſes and deſtructive practices whenſoever we pleaſe. Thoſe who know the condition of Denmark, know likewiſe, that we might eaſily have hindered the ſupplies, that have gone from thence to France; but, though that were often adviſed and preſſed, yet nothing could be ever procured to be done. The Dutch, who pretend to be ſo cloſely united with us in intereſt at this time, have private factors every where carrying on a trade with France in the name of other nations; while we alone loſe the benefit of that trade, which the reſt of the allies divide among them. 4. In the loſs and diminution of our treaſure, of which the king takes notice in his ſpeech.' And this proceeded not only from hiring foreigners for convoys, and foreign importers, who carry away the money that ſhould be divided among our Engliſh ſeamen and traders, as was obſerved above, but principally from thoſe vaſt ſums, which were ſent in ſpecie to pay our land-army, little of which ever returned into England again; and that which did was ſo clipped and leſſened, that it would not paſs. '5. In the loſs of our men. I ſhall not, ſays Mr. Hampden, ſay how many lives have been ſpilt for the reduction of Ireland, and how many of them might eaſily have been ſpared, if things had been rightly managed at firſt; nor how many of our braveſt men periſhed in the action at Steenkirk, for want of being ſuſtained as they might and ought to have been.' He then ſhews, that the nation was likewiſe in a ſtate of unſettledneſs in all reſpects, which muſt needs be very dreadful

The ſame day, the commons proceeded upon the buſineſs of the Eaſt-India company, and agreed to the reſt of the regulations, viz. that no man ſhall have above 10,000l. ſtock, nor under 100l. every 500l. to have a vote; and no perſon to have more: the governors to have 5000l. ſtock: the deputy governor 10,000l. The company to export every year of the Engliſh manufactures to the value of 100,000l. and to furniſh the government with 500 tun of ſalt petre yearly at a certain rate. Upon theſe heads the committee reſolved to move the houſe, that a bill might be brought in to ſettle the ſaid trade.

On the 8th of December, the lords went into a grand committee upon giving advice; and, having before them the eſtabliſhment of the ordnance, they found upon it two Dutch officers, colonel Gower, colonel of the Engliſh train abroad, and Mr. Meeſters, keeper of the ſtores at home; and thereupon, after ſome debate, it was reſolved humbly to adviſe his majeſty to remove them both from the ſaid employments. Meeſters having another poſt, that of comptroller of the train abroad, there was not much oppoſition made to the removing him from this; but the queſtion againſt colonel Gower was carried againſt him by forty-one voices againſt thirty-eight. After this there aroſe ſome debate, whether the earl of Nottingham's relation ſhould be referred to a committee of the whole houſe, or to a ſelect committee; and it was reſolved, as his lordſhip himſelf deſired, that it ſhould be conſidered of in a committee of the whole houſe.

The commons were likewiſe the ſame day upon giving advice; and ſir Richard Temple having moved, that in purſuance of the king's ſpeech, they would conſider how to pay the forces abroad, by ſending over Engliſh manufactures, and ſo preventing the exportation of ſo much money yearly; and, this motion being ſeconded, it was reſolved, that a committee ſhould be appointed to conſider thereof. The houſes being then deſirous of riſing, ſir Francis Winnington the chairman was called upon to leave the chair; which, after having put the uſual queſtion, he did accordingly, and the ſpeaker reſumed the houſe. But, as they had omitted in the committee to direct their chairman to report what they had done to the houſe, and to deſire leave to ſit again, no report could be made, and ſo the vote, which they had paſſed in the committee, fell to the ground. But the committee was revived by the houſe, and appointed to ſit again on the Monday following.

On the 9th of December, the commons proceeded upon the eſtimates about the land forces. They had already agreed to the fifty-four thouſand men, to the charge of the general officers, the train, and the tranſports; and now they agreed to give 200,000l. more for hoſpitals and other extraordinary charges, being deſirous to throw theſe together, becauſe in the article about the ſubſidies to the dukes of Savoy and Hanover, and the other, about the three Saxon regiments, it was ſaid, that the king paid two thirds, and the Dutch one, which proportion the houſe was unwilling to allow of, but put the ſeveral ſums together under one general head, though with an abatement of 35,000l. which they thought the eſtimates might very well bear. A motion was then made in behalf of the duke of Wirtemburg and the majors-general Tetteau and La Foreſt, who commanded the Daniſh troops, that their particular pay might be according to the Engliſh eſtabliſhment, and not according to the Dutch, which they were then upon; and this was agreed to in conſideration of their good ſervices. And thus the houſe agreed to the whole ſtate of the war for the enſuing year; their next buſineſs being to conſider of ways to raiſe the funds for the ſame.

In the houſe of lords the ſame day, the earl of Nottingham's relation, with the original papers therein mentioned, were read; and, becauſe there ſeemed to be ſome reflection made therein upon admiral Ruſſel, who was a member of the houſe of commons, their lordſhips appointed a committee to conſider how they might come to ſpeak with the admiral, and to know what he had to ſay in anſwer thereunto.

Their lordſhips likewiſe on the 10th reſumed the conſideration of the earl of Nottingham's relation, and after ſome debate reſolved to appoint a committee to draw up an abſtract of what the earl had farther by word of mouth told the houſe, that more nearly affected admiral Ruſſel, as if he had been wanting in ſeveral things, which were incumbent upon him. The committee thereupon met, and a queſtion aroſe, whether their account ſhould be drawn up as coming from the houſe, or from the earl of Nottingham; and the firſt was reſolved on; and, to prevent all miſtakes and further delays, the earl was deſired to draw up himſelf the ſubſtance of what he had ſaid to the houſe.

Among other advices, which the lords reſolved about this time to give to his majeſty, one was, that, when the Engliſh forces were joined with the Dutch, his majeſty would be pleaſed to give the precedence to the former; and that an Engliſh officer might command all Dutch officers of the ſame rank, though his commiſſion be of a later date. This was grounded upon a treaty, which the earl of Marlborough told the houſe was made at the beginning of the war, and of which he produced a copy, it being anſwered upon the application they made to the king for the treaty, that it could not be found.

The commons on the 10th of December voted a ſupply for the navy of two millions and ninety thouſand pounds, as they had before granted 1,925,000l. for the fleet; which together amounted to above four millions without reckoning 750,000l. for the deficiency of the laſt year's poll-tax, and 600,000l. for the civil liſt. The ſame day they agreed to dreadful in the midſt of a war.

For, 1. It was entirely unſettled as to the government, the king's title, and the legality of it, being as publicly diſputed, and with as little fear of puniſhment, as any point of natural philoſophy in the ſchools of Oxford, or any moot caſe of law by the ſtudents of the Temple; while others, who pretended to ſubmit to the government, openly renounced and impugned the principles and grounds, upon which it was ſet up by the nation; and would not ſuffer any mention to be made of the original contract broken by king James, nor of that new contract made by king William with this nation, in virtue whereof he was king of England; but wrote books and publiſhed them, one while to prove, that he was king by conqueſt, another while to prove, that he was king by an immediate providence of God, and direction from him; both which were equally deſtructive to the nature of our government, and to all the ends propoſed to be compaſſed in the revolution. Beſides, ſeveral bills and declarations had been offered ſeveral times in parliament for abjuring king James's authority, and declaring king William and queen Mary lawful and rightful king and queen of this realm; but nothing of this kind had been yet brought to perfection. Nor was the nation in an unſettled condition, only in reference to the king's title, but likewiſe to the antient government itſelf, and the time of holding parliaments; for the government could not in any ſort be thought to be ſettled, till the manner and time of calling parliaments, and their ſitting when called, were fully determined, explained, and agreed to. 2. The nation was unſettled as to the quiet enjoyment of our own houſes, from the quartering of ſoldiers in them. 3. From the ſeizing the ſubjects property for tranſport ſhips, without ſettling any fund to pay them. 4. From the want of proper regulations with regard to trials for treaſon. 5. From the want of ſettling a militia. 6. From the decay of trade by the loſs of ſhips for want of convoys.

Mr. Hampden then affirms, That, in the conduct of the war, and the management of affairs at home, in reference to it, 'there was evidently, a vein of treachery run through it from one end to the other.' "How elſe, ſays he, is it poſſible every thing ſhould miſgive and miſcarry, as we ſee it has done? How could all our preparations this year for a deſcent upon France have been foreſlowed and retarded as they were, and our men embarked, only to coſt half a million, and make us ridiculous to the whole world, unleſs the hand of Joab had been in it?——Who can believe, that our victory at ſea this year ſhould not have been farther purſued, if all people employed had been well-intentionated?—How came we to labour under ſuch want of intelligence, even in things, in which it may ſo eaſily be had, and that for ſo little money?——When orders are to be given out for any deſign, there are ſo many delays, upon one pretence or other, that the time of execution is always over before the orders are received. And beſides, they are ſo defective, and in their nature ſo impracticable (as we have lately ſeen in the buſineſs of the deſcent) that it were better none at all ſhould be given. Are there deſigns on foot to join with our enemies, and riſe in favour of them, as there was this ſummer, when the French were coming? Yet nobody is found out or proſecuted, that was concerned in it. Every body knew, that horſes and arms were bought, and ſome were taken. Every county ſaw, that their diſcontented men flocked up to London. Nobody thought the French would either provide to come hither, or ſeek to fight us at ſea, but upon ſome ground of treachery; and yet there could be nobody diſcovered, that had any correſpondence with them. Theſe things are indications ſufficiently plain to any wiſe man, where the bottom of all this miſchief lies. But none are ſo blind as thoſe, who will not ſee."

Mr. Hampden concludes with theſe words: 'All theſe things put together make a conſiderable part of the melancholy and miſerable ſtate of the nation at this preſent time. If it be aſked, what ſhall be done to remove all theſe evils? I ſay, the firſt ſtep towards a cure is well to underſtand our diſeaſe; and, if the parliament can be thoroughly ſenſible of theſe things, and make the king likewiſe ſenſible of them, the very nature of the diſeaſe will of itſelf lead to the proper remedies. Therefore, I am humbly of opinion, that the parliament ſhould begin by a moſt humble, dutiful, and reſpectful addreſs to his majeſty, repreſenting to him the true ſtate of the nation in it's preſent circumſtances, returning thanks in the moſt humble and affectionate manner imaginable for that gracious expreſſion of demanding the advice of the parliament, and aſſuring him, that neither their advice nor aſſiſtance ſhall be wanting for maintaining and defending his perſon and government againſt the attempts of all his enemies; as on their ſide, after what he has ſaid at the opening of this ſeſſion of parliament, they cannot doubt but his majeſty will heartily concur with them in what they ſhall adviſe for his honour, ſafety, and greatneſs, and the good of the nation. After this the parliament will proceed to offer to his majeſty ſuch bills, as may be moſt proper to remedy the grievances of which we complain; and at the ſame time, that they give money for carrying on the war, will adviſe ſuch meaſures as may beſt enable his majeſty to bring down the exceſſive power of France, and at the ſame time to ſecure the happineſs and liberties of the Engliſh nation. If debates are free and clear within doors, ſo as to encourage thoſe without to hope, that there is really a probability of ſomething to be done for the good of the nation, there will be farther propoſals made of ſuch things as are thought moſt proper and neceſſary to be done at this time.'

the report about the East-India trade; and after that read for the first time the bill for the better preservation of the government, in which there was appointed a new oath to be taken by all persons in offices.

The day following, December 12th, the house designed to have proceeded upon the advice to the king; but Mr. Russel informing them, that he heard some papers relating to the last summer's expedition would be sent them from the lords, and desiring, that the farther consideration of this matter might therefore be deferred for some days, it was accordingly adjourned till the Friday following.

On the 13th the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, that no person should for the future be elected a member of parliament, who had any other employment or office of profit; and that no member of the present house should, during his being such, accept of any office or employment. After this they proceeded to the supply, and resolved, that there should be raised four shillings in the pound upon lands and offices.

The house of lords on the 15th had a warm debate about the foreign forces then in England, upon a motion, that his majesty should be humbly advised to send them all away; and at last it was resolved to advise him not to bring any more foreign troops into the kingdom; but that those already here, which were four Dutch and three French regiments might continue.

On Wednesday the 14th, the commons had likewise a long debate about the bill for preserving the government. The main objection against it was, that it made words treason, which would make people unsafe even among their own servants and in their own families; and that the oath to be taken by all persons in offices was, that, 'during their lives,' they should stand by their majesties against king James and all other pretenders; which, it was said, laid an obligation upon people beyond what was in their power to be answerable for. To this it was replied, that any thing, that was thought amiss, might be amended in the committee, but that the scope and substance of the bill was certainly very necessary at that time. But the bill was at last thrown out by two hundred against one hundred and seventy-five, the court party being divided upon it[1]. The next day they took into consideration a project for borrowing a million, and resolved to make it part of the supply. The project was, that ten thousand persons should lend 100l. each: that a fund of 70,000l. should be settled out of the hereditary excise to pay the interest at seven per cent. which was to be divided among the lenders and survivors of them, during their lives, provided that no man should at any time have above 10,000l. per annum.

The next day, December the 16th, they went into a grand committee for giving advice to his majesty, and it was moved, that he should be advised to remove colonel Gower and Mr. Meesters, two Dutch officers, out of the ordnance; which occasioned a debate of above two hours. At last it was said by several generals, that this was a trivial matter, not worth the spending their time about; and that, if they had nothing of more weight to lay before the king, they might go to their dinners. Which motion was so well liked, that the committee adjourned, and the speaker took the chair without appointing any time for their next sitting.

On the 17th the bill 'for ascertaining the fees of officers of justice' was rejected by the commons, being the same which had passed the two houses the preceding session, but was then rejected by the king.

Two days after, the papers given in to the house of lords by the earl of Nottingham, concerning the last summer's expedition, being communicated to the commons at a conference, they were read in that house, when admiral Russel, who thought himself reflected on in them, made answer thereto in his place so much to the satisfaction of the house, that they passed a vote 'that he had behaved himself during the last expedition with fidelity, courage, and conduct;' and ordered, that this vote should be communicated to the lords at a conference the next day. Besides this, there were some warm speeches made in the house; and it was even moved by Mr. comptroller Wharton, that an address should be made to the king to remove the earl of Nottingham; but that motion fell to the ground.

The vote of the house of commons in favour of admiral Russel was communicated to the lords at a conference on the 21st of December, and at the same time the narrative and other papers concerning the last summer's expedition were returned to them; which being reported to the house of lords, some of their lordships observed, that this proceding of the commons seemed to be somewhat irregular and unparliamentary in returning the papers so hastily, without taking any time to consider of them, and it was moved to desire a free conference with them upon it. But it was at last resolved to look into precedents, and appoint a committee for that purpose.

The commons on the 21st went into a grand committee to review the book of rates payable upon goods exported and imported; wherein they made some alterations, though they proceeded no farther than the letter C. And the day following they read for the first time a bill for raising four shillings in the pound upon real and personal estates, which, it was supposed, would amount to two millions; and they passed the bill 'touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament,' which was afterwards sent up to the lords for their concurrence. The design of it was to prevent men, after they were chosen members of parliament, from accepting any places of profit; for, though any person, who was in office already, might be chosen, yet, if he accepted one whilst he was a sitting member, he was to lose his seat in parliament, and to be incapable of being chosen again; but the speaker for the time being was excepted. After this the business of the East-India company should have come on, but a printed paper having been dispersed in the lobby of the house, wherein the chief sticklers against the old company were all named, and recommended as the only fit persons to have the direction of the new company, since they had carried on this affair with great charge and loss of time; and there being among them several parliament-men, one of them made complaint thereof to the house as being designed for a reflection upon them; but the house treated it with contempt, and, being grown cool upon the East-India business, and Mr. Smith, who used to be their chairman, going out of the house to avoid it, the further consideration of the affair was deferred to the 29th of December; which was great encouragement to the old company.

On the 23d the commons were to have received the report from the committee for giving advice to the king; but it seemed, that the house was grown weary of that matter, for it was adjourned fine die.

On the 28th of December the commons made some progress in the money-bill; and the day following, in a grand committee upon the East-India business, went through several regulations, and particularly agreed to that for a new subscription of a stock not exceeding two millions, and not under 1,500,000 l.

In the house of lords the committee appointed to look into precedents, in order to a free conference with the commons upon their late vote concerning admiral Russel, reported some precedents, which came near to the point in question; upon which their lordships on the 30th resolved, to demand such a conference the next day. Accordingly the same day messengers came from the lords to the commons for that purpose; but, it being put to the question, whether they should agree to the free conference desired by the lords, it was carried in the negative by seventy-eight against sixty-one.

The lords on the 31st of December read the second time the bill sent up from the commons 'touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament.' Great endeavours were used to throw it out; but at last it was resolved by a majority of nine voices, that it should be committed to a committee of the whole house.

The same day the commons made some farther progress in the money-bill, as they did likewise on the 2d of January; and the day following went through it to the blanks for the commissioners names, which were to be filled up the next day. They received likewise a message from the lords, that they had appointed eleven of the clock the next morning for the free conference; and thereupon named managers for the same, who were only to hear what the lords had to say to them, and to report it to the house.

[1692-3] The lords were, on the 3d of January, in a grand committee upon the bill 'for free and impartial proceedings in parliament,' and went through it, agreeing to all the clauses of it; but, when it came to be reported to the house, after a long debate, the bill was thrown out by two voices, the majority of proxies, which are not allowed of in a committee, being against the bill.

It is remarked on this bill, that, when the party, that was set against the court, saw they could carry nothing in either house, they turned their whole strength against the present parliament to force a diſſolution. They began with giving it the name of an ill ſound, calling it 'the officers parliament,' becauſe many, that had commands in the army, were of it: and the word, that they gave out among the people, was, that we were to be governed by a ſtanding army, and a ſtanding parliament. Then they tried to carry this bill, for rendering all members of the houſe of commons incapable of places of truſt or profit. The truth was, it came to be obſerved, that ſome got credit by oppoſing the government, and, to ſilence them, they were preferred: And then they changed their note, and were as ready to flatter, as before to find fault. This gave a ſpecious colour to thoſe, who charged the court with deſigns of corrupting members, or at leaſt of ſtopping their mouths by places and penſions. Though the bill had paſſed the commons with little difficulty (thoſe in places, having not ſtrength to make great oppoſition, being looked on as parties, and thoſe out of places having not courage to oppoſe it, as it would have looked like recommending themſelves to one) it was however rejected by the lords, ſince it ſeemed to eſtabliſh an oppoſition between the crown and the people, as if thoſe, who were employed by the one, could not be truſted by the other. The earl of Mulgrave exhauſted his eloquence in a celebrated ſpeech on this occaſion [k].

The commons on the 4th of January reſumed the Eaſt India buſineſs, wherein they made ſome further progreſs, and reſolved particularly, by a majority of voices in a thin houſe, that the ſubſcription for a new ſtock ſhould be begun within ten days after the paſſing of the act; which vote did at firſt lower a little the actions of the old company, but they ſoon roſe again to a hundred and thirty, as they were before, upon a belief, that the parliament would not have time to finiſh the buſineſs that ſeſſion.

The lords in their free conference with the commons on the 4th of January repreſented to them, that the houſe of lords did look upon the late vote and proceeding of the commons in returning them the papers about the laſt ſummer's expedition to be irregular and unparliamentary. For having tranſmitted thoſe papers to them for their information in a matter, wherein ſeveral perſons ſeemed to be concerned, their lordſhips expected, that they would not only have duly conſidered of them, but likewiſe have given their lordſhips communication of what they had before them relating to that matter, and which they grounded their vote upon. This was the ſubſtance of what the earl of Rocheſter ſaid, and afterwards gave in writing to colonel Granville; who anſwered, that they had nothing to ſay, but were only to report to the houſe what they had received from their lordſhips [l].

On the 12th of January, the lords reſumed the buſineſs of [k] In this debate, Sheffield earl of Mulgrave made the following remarkable ſpeech:

"My lords,

"This debate is of ſo great conſequence, that I reſolved to be ſilent, and rather to be adviſed by the ability of others, than to ſhew my own want of it. Beſides, it is of ſo nice a nature, that I, who ſpeak always unpremeditately, apprehend extremely ſaying any thing, which may be thought the leaſt reflecting; though even that ought not to reſtrain a man here from doing one's duty to the public in a buſineſs, where it ſeems to be ſo highly concerned.

"I have always heard, I have always read, that foreign nations, and all this part of the world have admired and envied the conſtitution of this government. For, not to ſpeak of the king's power, here is an houſe of lords to adviſe him on all important occaſions about peace or war; about all things that may concern the nation, the care of which is very much intruſted to your lordſhips. But yet, becauſe your lordſhips cannot be ſo converſant with the generality of the people, nor ſo conſtantly in the country, as is neceſſary for that purpoſe, here is a houſe of commons alſo choſen by the very people themſelves, newly come from among them, or ſhould be ſo, to repreſent all their grievances, to expreſs the true mind of the nation, and to diſpoſe of their money, at leaſt ſo far as to begin all bills of that nature; and, if I am not miſtaken, the very writ for elections ſent down to the ſheriffs does impower them to chuſe; what? Their repreſentatives?

"Now, my lords, I beſeech you to conſider the meaning of that word 'Repreſentative.' Is it to do any thing contrary to their mind? It would be abſurd to propoſe it. And yet how can it be otherwiſe, if they, after being choſen, change their dependency, engage themſelves in employments plainly inconſiſtent with that great truſt repoſed in them? And that I will take the liberty to demonſtrate to your lordſhips they now do, at leaſt according to my humble opinion.

"I will inſtance firſt in the leaſt and loweſt incapacity, they muſt be under, who ſo take employments. Your lordſhips know but too well, what a general careleſſneſs there appears every day more and more in the public buſineſs. If ſo, how is it likely, that men ſhould be as diligent in their duty in parliament, as that buſineſs requires, where employments and a great deal of other buſineſs ſhall take up both their minds and their time? But then in ſome caſes it is worſe, as in commands of the army, and other employments of that kind, when they muſt have a divided duty. For it does admirably become an officer to ſit voting away money in the houſe of commons, while his ſoldiers are perhaps taking it away at their quarters for want of his preſence to reſtrain them, and of better diſcipline among them. Nay, perhaps his troop or regiment may be in ſome action abroad; and he muſt either have the ſhame of being abſent from them at ſuch a time, or from that houſe, where he is intruſted with our liberties.

"To this I have heard but one objection from a noble lord, that if this act ſhould paſs, the king is not allowed to make a captain, a colonel, without diſabling him to ſit in parliament. Truly, if a captain has only deſerved to be advanced for expoſing himſelf in parliament, I think the nation would have no great loſs in the king's letting alone ſuch a preferment.

"But my lords, there is another ſort of incapacity yet worſe than this; I mean that of parliament-mens having ſuch places in the exchequer, as the very profit of them depends on the money given to the king in parliament. Would any of your lordſhips ſend and intruſt a man to make a bargain for you, whoſe very intereſt ſhall be to make you give as much as he can poſſibly? It puts me in mind of a farce, where an actor holds a dialogue with himſelf, ſpeaking firſt in one tone, and then anſwering himſelf in another. Really, my lords, this is no farce, for it is no laughing matter to undo a nation. But it is altogether as unnatural for a member of parliament to aſk firſt in the king's name for ſuch a ſort of ſupply, give an account from him how much is needful towards the paying ſuch an army, or ſuch a fleet, and then immediately give, by his ready vote, what he had before aſked by his maſter's order.

"Beſides, my lords, there is ſuch a neceſſity now for long ſeſſions of parliament, and the very privileges belonging to members are of ſo great extent, that it would be a little hard and unequal to other gentlemen, that they ſhould have all the places alſo. All the objections, that have been made, may be reduced to theſe:

"Firſt, it is told us, that it is a diſreſpect to the king, that his ſervants or officers ſhould be excluded.

"To this, I deſire it may be conſidered, that it is in this caſe as when a tenant ſends up any body to treat for him. Would any of your lordſhips think it a diſreſpect, nay, would the king himſelf think it any, if the tenant would not wholly refer himſelf to one of your own ſervants, or the king's commiſſioners in the caſe of the crown? And if he chuſes rather ſome plain honeſt friend of his own to ſupply his abſence here, will any man blame ſuch a proceeding, or think it unmannerly?

"Beſides, your lordſhips know even this act admits them to be choſen, notwithſtanding their employments, provided the electors know it firſt, and are not deceived in their choice.

"All we would prevent is, that a good rich corporation ſhould not chuſe to intruſt with all their liberties a plain honeſt country neighbour, and find him within ſix months changed into a preferred cunning courtier, who ſhall tie them to their choice, though he is no more the ſame man, than if he were turned papiſt, which by the law, as it ſtands already, puts an incapacity upon him.

"Another objection is, that this act may by its conſequence prolong this parliament, which they allow would be a very great grievance; and yet ſuppoſe the king capable of putting it upon us, which I have too much reſpect for him to admit of; though I am glad, however that is is objected by privy councillors in favour, who conſequently, I hope, will never adviſe a thing, which they now exclaim againſt as ſo great a grievance.

"But pray, my lords, what ſhould tempt the king to ſo ill a policy? Can he fear a freedom of choice in the people, to whoſe good will he owes all his power, which theſe lords ſuppoſe he may uſe to their prejudice? And therefore give me leave to ſay, as I muſt not ſuſpect him of ſo ill a deſign as the perpetuating this parliament, ſo he cannot, he ought not, to ſuſpect a nation, ſo entirely, I was going to ſay, ſo fondly devoted to him.

"My lords, no man is readier than myſelf to allow, that we owe the crown all ſubmiſſion as to the time of calling parliaments according to law, and appointing alſo where they ſhall ſit. But with reverence be it ſpoken, the king owes the nation entire freedom in chuſing their repreſentatives; and it is no leſs his duty, than it is his true intereſt, that ſuch a fair and juſt proceeding ſhould be uſed towards us.

"Conſider, my lords, of what mighty conſequence it may be, that ſo many votes ſhould be free, when upon one ſingle one may depend the whole ſecurity or loſs of this nation. By one ſingle vote ſuch things may happen, that I almoſt tremble to think. By one ſingle vote a general exciſe may be granted, and then we are all loſt. By one ſingle vote the crown may be impowered to name all the commiſſioners for raiſing the taxes; and then ſurely we ſhould be in a fair way towards it. Nay, whatever has happened, may again be apprehended: and I hope thoſe reverend prelates will reflect, that if they grow once obnoxious to a prevalent party, one ſingle voice may be as dangerous to that bench, as a general diſſatisfaction among the people proved to be once in a late experience; which I am far from ſaying by way of threatening, but only by way of caution.

"My lords, we may think, becauſe this concerns not the houſe of lords, that we need not be ſo over-careful of the matter. But there are noblemen in France, at leaſt ſuch as were ſo before they were inſlaved, who, that they might domineer over others, and ſerve a preſent turn perhaps, let all things alone ſo long till the people were quite maſtered, and the nobility themſelves too, to bear them company. So that I never met a Frenchman, even of the greateſt rank (and ſome had ten thouſand piſtoles a year in employments) that did not envy us here for our freedom from that ſlavery, which they groan under. And this I have obſerved univerſally, except juſt monſieur Louvois, monſieur Colbert, or ſuch people, becauſe they were the miniſters themſelves, who occaſioned theſe complaints, and thrived by the oppreſſion of others.

"My lords, this country of ours is very apt to be provoked. We have had a late experience of it; and though no wiſe man but would bear a great deal rather than make a buſtle, yet really the people are otherwiſe, and at any time change a preſent uneaſineſs for any other condition, though a worſe. We have known it too often, and ſometimes repented it too late. Let them not have this new provocation, in being debarred from a ſecurity in their repreſentatives; for malicious people will not fail to infuſe into their minds, that all thoſe vaſt ſums, which have been and ſtill muſt be raiſed towards this war, are not diſpoſed away in ſo fair a manner, as ought to be; and I am afraid they will ſay their money is not given, but taken.

"However, whatever ſucceſs this bill may have, there muſt needs come ſome good effect of it. For if it paſſes, it will give us ſecurity; If it be obſtructed, it will give us warning." Pr. H. L. I. 413.

[l] The earl of Nottingham, it ſeems, had aggravated Ruſſel's errors and neglects very ſeverely. But the houſe of commons juſtified Ruſſel, and gave him thanks over and over again; and remained ſo fixed in this, that, though the lords communicated the papers the earl of Nottingham had laid before them, to the commons, they would not ſo much as read them, but renewed their firſt votes that juſtified Ruſſel's fidelity, courage, and conduct. Burnet II. 103.

giving advice to the king; and it was moved, that his majeſty ſhould be humbly adviſed to demand both the Hollanders and Spaniards cautionary towns, as Oſtend, Newport, Sluyce, &c. which occaſioned a long debate; but the queſtion being at laſt put, whether cautionary towns ſhould be deſired for our troops then abroad, without naming either Dutch or Spaniards, it was carried in the negative by thirty-ſix againſt twenty-four voices.

The commons, on the 11th, had a long debate about the commiſſioners of the admiralty. A motion had been made, that his majeſty be adviſed to conſtitute a commiſſion of the admiralty of ſuch perſons, as were of known experience in maritime affairs; which upon the queſtion paſſed in the negative [m], and now an addreſs was voted, that, for the future, all orders for the management of the fleet ſhould paſs through the hands of the lords commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high-admiral. This was thought to point at the earl of Nottingham. The day following, they paſſed the bill for the land-tax, and ſent it up to the lords.

On the 13th, the lords read the money-bill for the firſt time, and the next day reſolved to add a clauſe, to impower the lords to appoint commiſſioners of their own, to aſſeſs their perſonal eſtates.

The commons the ſame day were in a committee of the whole houſe upon the bill for raiſing a million, but made no great progreſs therein, becauſe ſir John Sommers the attorney-general, who was obliged to attend the houſe of lords on lord Banbury's caſe, who, having committed a murder, claimed his peerage, left the chair, which he did ſomewhat abruptly, not without giving ſome diſguſt to the houſe; and at the ſame time the lords were diſpleaſed likewiſe, becauſe they ſtayed for him; but the perſonal eſteem, which every perſon had for him, was the reaſon, that no notice was taken of it further than the lords appointed a committee to inquire how far the attorney-general is obliged, by his poſt, to attend their houſe.

On the 16th, the money-bill was read the laſt time in the houſe of lords, and paſſed with the additional clauſe, whereby they taxed themſelves; and then they went into a grand committee upon the bill 'for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments,' which had been brought in by the earl of Shrewſbury. They agreed, that a parliament ſhould meet every year, and that there ſhould be a new one every three years, and then came to the clauſe, which declares, that, if the king ſhould not order new writs to be iſſued out, the lord chancellor or commiſſioners of the great ſeal ſhould do it by their own authority under ſevere penalties. But this was poſtponed, and they proceeded to the next point, which was, when the preſent parliament ſhould determine; ſome propoſing one, others two, and others again three years; but this debate was adjourned.

The commons ſpent a great deal of time the ſame day upon the bill for raiſing the million, and reſolved to put the project two ways; that is, that thoſe, who ſhould ſubſcribe their money with the benefit of ſurvivorſhip were to have but ſeven per cent, and thoſe, who ſhould ſtand only upon their own lives, fourteen per cent. The day following they were again upon the ſame bill; and, having gone through it, ordered it to be reported the next day.

On the 17th, the lords ſent back the money-bill with the additional clauſe to the commons, who diſagreed 'nemine contradicente' to that clauſe, as an incroachment upon their fundamental rights in the article of given money, and ſent to the lords to deſire a conference thereupon; but their lordſhips making their meſſengers wait a conſiderable time, becauſe they were engaged in a debate upon the lord Banbury's claim of peerage, the houſe of commons, who had nothing to do, and began to be weary with expecting the return of their meſſengers, ſent for them back, and then adjourned.

The day following, the lords in a committee of the whole houſe went through the bill 'for the calling and meeting of frequent parliaments,' and ordered it to be engroſſed. It enacted, that there ſhould be a new parliament every three years, and meet every year; and that the preſent parliament ſhould continue no longer than till the firſt day of January following. They ordered likewiſe a bill to be engroſſed, by which all perſons in offices were to take a new oath, that they would be faithful to their majeſties king William and queen Mary, and aſſiſt them againſt the late king James and all his adherents.

The ſame day the managers for the commons went to a conference with the lords, to whom they repreſented, that the commons had diſagreed to the clauſe added by their lordſhips to the money-bill, as being a notorious incroachment upon the rights of the houſe of commons, to order and ſettle all matters relating to the giving of money, which their anceſtors had been ſo jealous of, that they thought it a diminution of this their fundamental privilege to give their lordſhips any reaſon for the ſupporting of it. The lords having made a report thereof to their houſe, the conſideration of that matter was adjourned till the next day, when their lordſhips, after a long debate, reſolved to recede from the ſaid clauſe which was carried by ſo great a majority, that the houſe did not divide unto it. After this the houſe appointed a committee to draw up reaſons for their quitting this clauſe, to be communicated to the commons the next day, to this effect, that their lordſhips did for the preſent depart from this point purely in conſideration of the preſſing exigency of affairs, being otherwiſe of opinion, that of right they might have inſiſted upon it.

The ill humour, it ſeems, which thus ſhewed itſelf in the houſe of lords, was chiefly managed by the marquis of Hallifax and the earl of Mulgrave. They had drawn in the earl of Shrewſbury, who was very ill pleaſed with the credit, that ſome had with the king, and lived in a particular friendſhip with the earl of Marlborough, whom he thought was both ungratefully and unjuſtly perſecuted. Thoſe lords had all king James's friends, ready to aſſiſt them in every thing that could embroil matters. A great many whigs, who were diſcontented and jealous of the miniſtry, joined with them: But they knew that all their murmurings would ſignify little, unleſs they could ſtop a money-bill. Wherefore, as it was ſettled in the houſe of commons as a maxim, that the lords could not make any alterations in money-bills, they put their ſtrength to carry a clauſe in the land-tax bill, that the peers ſhould tax themſelves. And though, in the way in which the clauſe was drawn up, it could not be defended, yet they did all that was poſſible to put a ſtop to the bill, and with unuſual vehemence preſſed for a delay, till a committee ſhould be appointed to examine precedents. This the earl of Mulgrave preſſed for many hours, with great force of argument and eloquence. He inſiſted much upon the dignity of peerage; and made this which was now propoſed to be ſo eſſential a part of that dignity, that he endeavoured to convince the lords, that, if they yielded to it, they diveſted themſelves of their true greatneſs, and nothing would remain, but the name and ſhadow of a peer, which was but a pageant. But, after all the force of his rhetoric, the lords conſidered the ſafety of the nation, more than the ſhadow of a privilege, and ſo dropped their clauſe.

On the 20th of January, a complaint was made to the commons of a printed pamphlet, lately publiſhed with licence, and ſaid to be written by Charles Blount, Eſq. intitled 'King William and Queen Mary Conquerors,' as containing aſſertions of dangerous conſequence to their majeſties, to the liberties of the ſubject, and to the peace of the kingdom. The houſe therefore, upon examination of the matter, ordered, the next day, the ſaid pamphlet to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, and that his majeſty be deſired to remove Mr. Edmund Bohun, the licenſer, from his employment, for having allowed the ſame to be printed. It was at the ſame time ſuggeſted, that Dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, was the inventor of the notion of their majeſties being conquerors, which he had firſt of all publiſhed in his paſtoral letter. This occaſioned a debate of ſeveral hours, but at laſt it was carried by one hundred and ſixty-two againſt one hundred and fifty-five, that the ſaid 'paſtoral letter' ſhould be burnt by the common hangman. There was likewiſe complaint made by one of the members, of a book written on the ſame ſubject, by Dr. William Lloyd, biſhop of St. Aſaph, intitled 'A diſcourſe of God's ways of diſpoſing of kingdoms;' but that motion fell.

The lords likewiſe took into conſideration the book intitled, 'King William and Queen Mary Conquerers,' and ordered it to be burnt the next morning in the Old Palace-Yard in Weſtminſter, and afterwards paſſed this vote: 'That the aſſertion of king William's and queen Mary's being king and queen by conqueſt, was highly injurious to their majeſties, and inconſiſtent with the principles on which this government is founded, and tending to the ſubverſion of the rights of the people.' This vote they reſolved to communicate to the commons at a conference the next morning, and to deſire their concurrence thereunto; which was given by the latter with the remarkable addition of ſome words, viz. 'injurious to their majeſties rightful title to the crown of this realm.' The ſame day their lordſhips paſſed the bill for raiſing a million upon lives, and the commons went through the book of rates, and laid ſeveral new impoſitions upon ſome commodities, that were imported, which they propoſed to give for three years, and thereby to raiſe 500,000l.

[m] This motion was occaſioned by a conſtant clamour in the city of London, againſt the management of the admiralty with reſpect to convoys and cruizers. One of the lords of the admiralty, being applied to by ſome Barbadoes merchants for convoy, and preſſing him to provide it, he anſwered, they needed not to have given themſelves that trouble; for the Virginia convoy would be ordered to take care of their ſhips.

On the 25th, the lords read the ſecond time the bill for the new oaths to be taken by all perſons in offices, and after a long debate it was carried by a majority of two voices, there being thirty-eight againſt thirty-ſix that the bill ſhould be committed.

The day following the commons proceeded upon the report of the committee about laying new impoſitions upon ſeveral foreign commodities; and among the reſt they laid 8l. a tun upon French wines, the act of prohibition being expired.

The commons, on the 27th of January, appointed the bill 'for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments,' to be read the next day, which was accordingly done, and occaſioned a long debate, great endeavours being uſed to throw it out; but it was at laſt carried, that it ſhould be read a ſecond time on the Thurſday following.

On the 31ſt, the lords ſate in Weſtminſter-Hall upon the trial of the lord Mohun, for the murder of Mr. William Mountfort the player, the lord preſident being lord high-ſteward; and after examination of the witneſſes, which laſted till five in the afternoon, their lordſhips withdrew to their own houſe, and, after ſome debate, adjourned the court till the next morning, and ſet a fine of 100l. each upon the lord Faulconberg, lord Newport, lord Lovelace, and lord Leigh, for going away before the houſe was adjourned; which they excuſed the next day on account of their being faint and quite ſpent with ſo long an attendance. On Wedneſday morning, February the 1ſt, the lords met again in their own houſe, and continued together till ſeven at night without going down to the court in Weſtminſter-Hall, ſpending the whole day in ſtating and debating ſeveral points of law, without taking any reſolution thereupon, further than that it was reſolved, that every peer might aſk the judges in open court what queſtion he pleaſed as to points of law; and then they adjourned till the 3d, the day before being Candlemas day, on which the courts of judicature do not uſe to ſit.

On the 2d of February, the commons read the ſecond time the bill 'for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments,' and committed it.

On the 3d, the lords met in their own houſe, and debated about the queſtions to be aſked of the judges; and about four in the afternoon went down into Weſtminſter-hall, where ſeveral queſtions were aſked the judges in preſence of lord Mohun the priſoner; after which their lordſhips returned to their own houſe, to debate thereupon; and about nine adjourned the court till the next morning, when fourteen of them found the priſoner guilty, and ſixty-nine acquitted him.[n]

The commons, on the 7th of February, went into a grand committee upon the bill 'for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments,' and divided about the parliament's meeting every year, which was determined in the affirmative by a hundred and ſeventy-one againſt a hundred and ſixty. After which they went through the bill, and made the following amendment, that whereas it was ſaid, that the preſent parliament ſhould determine the 1ſt of January next, they extended it to the 24th of March, or ſooner, as his majeſty ſhould think fit; the deſign of that amendment being, that the parliament might hold another winter ſeſſion, if his majeſty pleaſed. A clauſe was offered to be added to the bill to ſave the king's right of diſſolving and proroguing the parliament; but it was rejected by a majority of ſeven voices, becauſe it was thought to caſt a reflection upon the bill, as if it were derogatory to his majeſty's prerogative; which they would not allow it to be, but only an explanation of the old law.

The next day the commons were again in a grand committee, upon the ways of raiſing the reſt of the ſupply. They reckoned they had already given five millions, viz. two millions by the land-tax; one million by the project for raiſing money upon lives; one million out of the ſtanding revenues; five hundred thouſand pounds by continuing the duties upon wine, vinegar, and tobacco, which were to expire in 1696, for two years longer; five hundred thouſand pounds by the new duties added to the book of rates for four years; and fifty thouſand pounds by the tax they laid of five per cent. upon the Eaſt-India company, and other joint ſtocks; ſo that there remained but three hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed; for the ſtate of the expence for this year was computed at five millions and three hundred and ſixty-ſix thouſand pounds; namely, one million nine hundred and twenty-ſix thouſand pounds for the fleet; two millions and ninety thouſand pounds for the army; ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds to make good what was borrowed upon the credit of the poll act; and ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the civil liſt.

On the 9th, the bill 'for the frequent calling and meeting of parliaments,' was reported to the houſe of commons; after which they had a long and warm debate, whether it ſhould be read the third time, which was carried in the affirmative by two hundred againſt one hundred and ſixty-one, and ſent back to the lords, who were deſired to concur in the amendments. To this they immediately agreed, and ſent down two of the judges to acquaint the commons therewith.

This bill, by which it was enacted, that a ſeſſion of parliament ſhould be held every year, a new parliament ſummoned every third year, and the preſent parliament diſſolved, within a limited time, was brought in, when the bill for free and impartial proceedings in parliament had failed. It was imagined that a bill from the lords diſſolving a parliament, which ſtruck only at the houſe of commons, the lords being ſtill the ſame men, would upon that ſingle account have been rejected by the commons; but they alſo paſſed it, and fixed their own diſſolution to the 25th of March in the next year, reſerving to themſelves another ſeſſion. The king let the bill lie on the table for ſome time: So that men's eyes and expectations were much fixed on the iſſue of it. But, in concluſion, he refuſed to paſs it; ſo the ſeſſion ended in an ill humour. The rejecting a bill, though an unqueſtionable right of the crown, has been ſo ſeldom practiſed, that the two houſes are apt to think it a hardſhip, when there is a bill denied.[o]

On the 11th of February, a report was made in the houſe of lords by the committee for giving advice to his majeſty; and their lordſhips agreed to the ſeveral heads mentioned above, only with this alteration, that they then allowed colonel Gower to continue in his command over the artillery, though this was carried but by one voice, ſo that their advice was reſolved to be drawn up in the form of an addreſs to the king.

The ſame day the commons were upon the bill againſt mutineers and deſerters, and the day following upon the [n] In the beginning of February 1692-3, the lord Mohun was indicted for the murder of William Mountfort the player, who, for his good action on the ſtage and good nature in life, was a great favourite of the town. A rakiſh officer had made lewd addreſſes to Mrs. Bracegirdle, the famous actreſs, which ſhe returning with diſdain, the man reſolved to get his will of her by force. Mountfort coming from her lodgings, having ſeen her ſafe home, was attacked by this officer and baſely murdered. The lord Mohun, being preſent when the murder was committed, was apprehended, impriſoned in the Tower, and brought to his trial for it before his peers in Weſtminſter-hall, the marquis of Carmarthen being conſtituted lord high-ſteward. After a trial of ſeveral days he was acquitted.

[o] Biſhop Burnet has the following obſervation upon this bill. The ſtatutes (ſays he) for annual parliaments in king Edward the firſt, and king Edward the third's time, are well known. But it is a queſtion whether the ſuppoſition 'if need be,' falls upon the whole act, or only upon thoſe words, 'or oftener.' It is certain theſe acts were never obſerved; and the non-obſervance of them was never complained of as a grievance. Nor did the famous act, in king Charles the firſt's time, carry the neceſſity of holding a ſeſſion further, than to once in three years. Antiently, conſidering the haſte and hurry in which parliaments ſat, an annual parliament might be no great inconvenience to the nation: But, by reaſon of the ſlow methods of ſeſſions now, an annual parliament in times of peace would become a very inſupportable grievance. A parliament of a long continuance ſeemed to be very dangerous, either to the crown, or to the nation: If the conjuncture, and their proceedings, gave them much credit, they might grow very uneaſy to the crown, as happened in king Charles the firſt's time; or, in another ſituation of affairs, they might be ſo practiſed upon by the court, that they might give all the money, and all the liberties of England up, when they were to have a large ſhare of the money, and were to be made the inſtruments of tyranny, as it was in king Charles the ſecond's time. It was likewiſe hoped, that frequent parliaments would put an end to the great expence candidates put themſelves to in elections; and that it would oblige the members to behave themſelves ſo well, both with relation to the public, and in their private deportment, as to recommend them to their electors at three years end: Whereas, when a parliament was to ſit many years, members covered with privileges were apt to take great liberties, forgot that they repreſented others, and took care only of themſelves. So it was thought that England would have a truer repreſentative, when it was choſen anew every third year, than when it run on to the end of a reign. All that was objected againſt this was, that frequent elections would make the freeholders proud and inſolent, when they knew that applications muſt be made to them at the end of three years. This would eſtabliſh a faction in every body, that had a right to an election; and, whereas now an election put men to a great charge all at once, then the charge muſt be perpetual all the three years, in laying in for a new election, when it was known how ſoon it muſt come round. II. 106, 107.

ſupply, when they reſolved, that credit ſhould be given to the king to borrow as much as the review of the laſt poll came ſhort of 300,000l. which was all that remained to be raiſed.

On the 14th, the commons read the ſecond time the bill for ſeveral new duties on goods imported, and committed it; as alſo the bill for taking the public accounts; into a grand committee on the 17th, on which they went, it was moved, that the commiſſioners of the ſaid accounts ſhould be impowered to examine and ſtate the old debt of the bankers, ariſing from the ſhutting up of the exchequer in the reign of king Charles II. and this motion occaſioned a debate of two hours; but the country gentlemen being jealous, that the deſign of this motion was either to throw the debt upon the parliament, or elſe to obſtruct the bill, rejected it.

The day following the lords finiſhed their addreſs of advice to the king, to which they added, that they humbly adviſed and prayed his majeſty, that the army to be left in England of twenty thouſand men may conſiſt all of their majeſties own ſubjects; and the lords with the white ſtaves were ordered to know his majeſty's pleaſure, when he would be attended by the houſe to preſent the ſaid addreſs. Their lordſhips had ſome debate about the lieutenancy of London; and it was moved, that it might be part of the addreſs to remove out of the lieutenancy ſeveral perſons, who were looked upon not to be well affected to the government; but it was rejected, and they reſolved, that they would conſider of this matter apart; which they did on the 20th, and, after ſome time ſpent therein, the further debate was adjourned ſine die. Upon this occaſion Mr. Wilmore, who had ſuffered very much in the two laſt reigns, diſperſed in the lobby of the houſe ſeveral printed papers, giving very ill characters of divers perſons, who were then in the lieutenancy of London; of which complaint being made to the houſe, their lordſhips, after ſome debate, reſolved by a majority of fourteen voices, that the paper was a ſcurrilous paper; and ordered Wilmore to be taken into cuſtody.

The commons on the 22d of February took into conſideration the ſtate of Ireland, concerning which they examined ſeveral perſons, eſpecially upon theſe heads, 1. The abuſes committed in diſpoſing of the forfeitures, which were either given away, or let out to favourite particular perſons, ſo much under the value, that what was worth 100l. was not let for 20l. 2. The diſorders committed by the forces, who lived upon free quarter, and were very vexatious to the country. 3. The proceedings of the late parliament, and their ſudden prorogation, with a proteſt of the lord lieutenant, for that they had aſſerted their rights with reſpect to preparing heads for money bills. And, 4. The great encouragement given to papiſts and their favourers. The houſe did not enter into any debate upon theſe matters, but ordered that the ſaid perſons ſhould give in writing what they knew of their own knowledge, and what they could make out by other proofs; and that they ſhould lay the ſame before the houſe on the Friday following. And becauſe, in ſpeaking upon the point of forfeitures, they charged Mr. Culliford, who was lately one of the commiſſioners of the revenue in Ireland, with divers miſdemeanors in the management of that truſt, he was ordered to attend the houſe, of which he was a member.

The lords, on the 23d, attended the king with their addreſs of advice, which conſiſted of theſe four heads: 1. That the perſon who ſhould command the Engliſh forces under his majeſty, be born their majeſties ſubject. 2. That the Engliſh officers might have the preference and precedence of all officers in the confederate troops (except thoſe of crowned heads) of the ſame rank and quality, though the commiſſions of the latter be of an older date, according to what was agreed on by a capitulation made in 1678; the contrary practice whereof in the preſent war they conceived to be a great diminution to the crown of England, and a great diſſatisfaction to their majeſties ſubjects. 3. That there be left in England twenty thouſand Engliſh ſoldiers during the year 1693, under the command of an Engliſh general. 4. That his majeſty would be pleaſed to give effectual order for remedying the great abuſes committed by preſſing of men for the fleet; and that he would cauſe ſuch officers, as were guilty thereof, to be caſhiered, and further puniſhed according to law; to which his majeſty returned this anſwer, that he would take it into conſideration. 5. That there may be no foreigners at the board of ordnance, ſince they eſteemed it a prejudice to their majeſties ſervice, and a diſcouragement to their ſubjects.

On the 24th of February, ſir Francis Brewſter, Mr. Stone, and the reſt gave in writing to the commons, what they had before delivered by word of mouth. And the houſe having thereupon reſumed the conſideration of the ſtate of Ireland, after a long debate, which kept them ſitting till ſeven at night, they paſſed this vote without coming to a diviſion, that it appeared by the information given to the houſe, that there had been great abuſes and miſmanagements in the affairs of Ireland; and that an addreſs be made to the king to lay the ſame before him, that they might be remedied for the future; and to pray him, that a ſtate of the forfeitures might be laid before the parliament; and a committee was appointed to draw up this addreſs.

The lords likewiſe, on the 28th of February, entered upon the conſideration of the ſtate of Ireland; and beſides the perſons, who were examined before the commons, the lady Arglas, the biſhop of Meath, ſir Robert Southwell, and Mr. John Pulteney, ſecretary to the lord lieutenant, were ſummoned to attend their lordſhips, and examined accordingly. After which they were ordered to put the ſubſtance of what they had ſaid, in writing. Mr. Pulteney gave their lordſhips a full account of what had paſſed within his knowledge, concerning the proceedings of the late parliament, the forfeited eſtates, and the army; and then the lords adjourned the farther conſideration of this matter till the next day; when they proſecuted the inquiry, and on the 2d of March, after ſome debate, came to this reſolution, That there had been great abuſes and illegal and arbitrary proceedings in the management of affairs in Ireland. By the 'abuſes' they meant the embezzlements of the forfeited eſtates real and perſonal; and by the 'illegal proceedings,' the diſorders committed by the forces, but more particularly they ſeemed to have their eye upon a complaint, that had among others been made to them, that, a little before the reduction of Limerick, a perſon being accuſed of having been concerned in the murder of ſome of colonel Faulkes's ſoldiers quartered at Dublin, the lords juſtices ordered him to be brought before the council, and immediately commanded the provoſt martial to cauſe him to be hanged without any previous proceedings againſt him, either by trial at common law, or before a court-martial.

The commons, on the 28th of February, went into a committee of the whole houſe, upon the bill for prohibiting trade with France, and encouraging privateers, and went through the ſame; and on the 2d of March they preſented to his majeſty their addreſs about the Eaſt-India company; to which his majeſty anſwered, That he would do whatever was in his power for the good of the kingdom, and for the advantage of this particular trade; and that this was a matter, which would require ſome time for him to conſider.

The day following they proceeded upon the review of the quarterly poll-bill; and, on the 7th, were in a committee of the whole houſe, upon the bill for continuing certain impoſitions upon Eaſt-India goods, &c. and went through the ſame. And having finiſhed all the money-bills, they ſent up the laſt to the lords on the 9th of March for their lordſhips concurrence. Among other bills, that had paſſed both houſes, and lay then ready for the royal aſſent, was one for puniſhing mutineers and deſerters, which was to take place on the 10th of March; and therefore their lordſhips reſolved, after ſome debate, on the Tueſday before, that the lords with the white ſtaves ſhould acquaint his majeſty therewith, in order that his majeſty, if he thought proper, might come to the houſe, and give the royal aſſent, on the 9th or 10th, to that and other bills, which were ready, that ſo the bill againſt mutineers might not commence before it was made a law by the royal aſſent, which was thought by ſome not very proper; but his majeſty thought fit to leave this, together with the reſt of the bills to the end of the ſeſſion.

The lords threw out the bill for prohibiting of lotteries, which was ſent them from the commons. The patentees of the Royal Oak Lottery are ſaid to have found means to have this bill ſtopped in the houſe of lords.

On the 9th of March the two houſes waited upon his majeſty ſeverally, and preſented their addreſſes about Ireland.

The heads of that of the lords were as follow:

1. That there had been great abuſes in the diſpoſing of the forfeited eſtates, inſomuch, that of the perſonal eſtates, which amounted to 135,000l. but 10,000l. had been accounted for to the king.

2. That protections had been granted to the Iriſh, not included included in the articles of Limerick, whereby the proteſtants had been deprived of the benefit of the law againſt them.

3. That the quarters of the army had not been paid, though the ſame was deducted out of the pay of the troops; and that the parliament had made ſufficient proviſion for both.

4. That a mayor had been impoſed for two years together upon the city of Dublin, contrary to their antient privilege and charter.

5. That one Gaffney and ſeveral others, who were accuſed of the murder of ſome of colonel Faulkes's men were executed without any proofs, and one Sweetman, who was the moſt guilty, diſcharged without any proſecution.

To this addreſs the king made this anſwer:

"Your lordſhips may be aſſured, I will, as ſoon as poſſible, take care to remedy all theſe matters."

The commons, in their addreſs, particularized the abuſes and miſmanagements in the affairs of Ireland; which conſiſted,

1. In expoſing the proteſtant ſubjects to the miſeries of free quarters, and the licentiouſneſs of an army, to the great oppreſſion of the people there; which they conceived had been chiefly occaſioned by the want of that pay, which they did hope they had fully provided for.

2. In recruiting his majeſty's troops with Iriſh papiſts, and ſuch perſons, as had been in open rebellion againſt his majeſty, to the great endangering and diſcouraging of his majeſty's proteſtant ſubjects in that kingdom.

3. In granting protections to Iriſh papiſts, whereby proteſtants were hindered from the legal remedies, and the courſe of law was ſtopped.

4. In reverſing out-lawries for high-treaſon againſt ſeveral rebels in that kingdom (not within the articles of Limerick) to the great diſcontent of his proteſtant ſubjects there.

5. In letting the forfeited eſtates at under-rates, to the leſſening of his majeſty's revenue.

6. In the great embezzlements of his majeſty's ſtores in the towns and garriſons of that kingdom, left by the late king James, and in the great embezzlements, which had been made in the forfeited eſtates and goods, which might have been employed for the ſafety and better preſervation of Ireland.

7. In the addition made to the articles of Limerick, after the ſame were finally agreed to, and ſigned, and thereupon the town ſurrendered; which had been a great encouragement to the Iriſh papiſts, and a weakening to the Engliſh intereſt there.

Theſe abuſes they moſt humbly beſought his majeſty to redreſs; particularly, that the ſoldiers might be paid their arrears, and the country their quarters. That no papiſt might be admitted to ſerve in the army. That foraſmuch as the reducing of Ireland had been of great expence to this kingdom, agreeably to his majeſty's gracious aſſurances, no grant might be made of the forfeited lands in Ireland, till there might be an opportunity of ſettling that matter in parliament. That a true account of all forfeitures real and perſonal, and of the ſtores left by the late king James, might be laid before the commons aſſembled in parliament. That no out-lawries might be reverſed or pardons granted to the rebels, but by advice of parliament. That no protections might be granted to the Iriſh. And that the additional article in the capitulation of Limerick, by which ſo wide a paſſage had been opened to the Iriſh papiſts, to come in and repoſſeſs themſelves of the eſtates, which they had forfeited by their rebellion, might be laid before the commons, that ſo the manner of obtaining the ſame, and the prejudices that had been thereby occaſioned to the proteſtant intereſts, might be inquired into. They cloſed this addreſs by ſaying, "That as his majeſty had been pleaſed to give ſuch gracious aſſurances of his readineſs to comply with them in any thing, that might tend to the peace and ſecurity of this kingdom; ſo they doubted not of his majeſty's like grace and favour to that of Ireland, in the ſafety and preſervation whereof this his majeſty's kingdom was ſo much concerned."

To this addreſs the king anſwered,

"I will always have a great regard to what comes to me from the houſe of commons; and what may have been amiſs in Ireland, I will take care to remedy."

By theſe proceedings it was plain, that an ill humour prevailed in both houſes; and that the parties of tory and whig appeared almoſt in every debate, and in every queſtion. In the houſe of lords particularly ſtrong oppoſition was made to every thing that was propoſed for the government. They paſſed many votes, and made many addreſſes to the king, which were chiefly deſigned to load the adminiſtration, and to alienate the king from the Dutch. Their propoſition for a committee of both houſes to conſider the ſtate of the nation, and to give the king advice upon it, was ſuch as had never been offered, but when the nation was ready to break out into civil affairs. This committee, when once begun, would have grown, in a very ſhort time, to have been a council of ſtate, and ſoon have brought all affairs under their inſpection. The commons indeed paſſed the ſupplies, but it was with great ſlowneſs; and thoſe, who could not oppoſe them, yet ſhewed their diſcontent in delaying the bills, and clogging them with unacceptable clauſes. The waſteful method was continued of raiſing money upon remote funds, by which there lay a heavy diſcount on tallies; ſo that above a fourth part was in ſome of them to be diſcounted. However, after their complaints of the admiralty, and of the conduct in Flanders, particularly in the action of Steenkirk, and their voting ſome heads of an addreſs relating to theſe matters, the commons, by a ſecret management, let the whole fall, and thoſe angry votes come to nothing. Though the lords perſiſted in their ill humour, any thing they could do was of leſs moment, when it was not like to be ſeconded by the commons.

Soon after the addreſſes about the Iriſh affairs, the king came to the houſe of peers, and, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, concluded the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE large ſupplies which you have given me this ſeſſion, are ſo great teſtimonies of your good affections, that I take this occaſion, with great willingneſs, to return my hearty thanks to you. And I aſſure you, it ſhall be my care to ſee, that that money you have given may be effectually applied to ſuch ſervices, as may be moſt for the honour and intereſt of England.

"I muſt recommend to your care the peace and quiet of the ſeveral counties, to which you are now returning, and doubt not but by your care the ſupply, which you have ſo freely given, will not only be effectually levied, but with the greateſt equality too, and the leaſt uneaſineſs to the people, that is poſſible.

My lords and gentlemen,

"The poſture of affairs does neceſſarily require my preſence abroad; but I ſhall take care to leave ſuch a number of troops here, as may be ſufficient for the ſecurity of the kingdom againſt any attempts of our enemies.

"I ſhall add no more, but that, as I ſhall continue to expoſe my own perſon, upon all occaſions, for the good and advantage of theſe kingdoms; ſo I do likewiſe aſſure you, that my hearty and ſincere endeavours ſhall never be wanting in any other kind, to make this a great and flouriſhing nation."

And then, by his majeſty's command, the parliament was prorogued to the 2d of May.

Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion were,

1. An act, that the inhabitants of the province of York may diſpoſe of their perſonal eſtates by will. It was the cuſtom before, that the widows and younger children of perſons, dying in that province, were intitled to a part of the goods and chattels of their late huſbands or fathers (called their 'reaſonable part') notwithſtanding any will, or jointure to the contrary.

2. An act for taking ſpecial bails, in the country upon actions and ſuits, depending in the courts of 'king's bench, common-pleas, and exchequer.' By this act, the judges, by commiſſions under the ſeals of their reſpective courts, may empower perſons, not attornies and ſollicitors, in all the counties of England and Wales, to take recognizances of bails in action, depending in the ſaid courts, as the juſtices and barons uſed to do, for which the perſons impowered ſhall receive 2s. This is a great eaſe and benefit to ſuch as would otherwiſe be obliged to appear in perſon at Weſtminſter.

3. An act for encouraging the apprehending of highwaymen. Every perſon, who ſhall take any robbers upon the highway, ſhall have from the ſheriff, without fee, for every offender 40l. within one month after conviction; and alſo, the horſe, furniture and arms, money or other goods of the robber taken with him.

4. An act to prevent frauds by clandeſtine mortgages. If any perſon ſhall acknowledge judgment, ſtatute, or recognizance, and afterwards mortgage his lands to a ſecond creditor, the mortgager ſhall have no remedy againſt the mortgagee for redemption of the lands. In caſe of a ſecond mortgagee, the mortgager ſhall have no equity of redemption againſt the ſecond mortgagee; and, in caſe of more mortgages than one, the late or under mortgagees ſhall have power to redeem any former mortgages.

5. An act for the better diſcovery of judgments in the courts of law. Particularly all judgments for debt ſhall in every Eaſter term be put into an alphabetical dogget, to be ſearched by all perſons paying for every term's ſearch for judgment againſt one perſon 4d. No judgment, not doggeted, ſhall affect any lands as to purchaſers or mortgagees, or have any preference againſt heirs, executors, or adminiſtrators.

6. An act to prevent malicious informations in the crown-office of the court of King's-Bench. No information to be filed before recognizance is taken from the informer, that he will effectually proſecute ſuch information.

During the ſeſſion of the parliament ſeveral officers of the army, wanting men to compleat their companies, agreed with thoſe, who had warrants to preſs for ſea; who, under pretence of preſſing for the navy, took up great numbers of young men, whom they ſhipped off for Holland, and there forced them into land-ſervice. Among the reſt a ſervant belonging to one of the members of the houſe of commons happened to be thus ſpirited away. Upon which the houſe ordered this grievance to be repreſented to the king, who, in his anſwer, let the houſe know, 'How much he reſented, that his ſubjects ſhould meet with ſuch hard uſage; and that he would take all poſſible care for the future to puniſh the authors of it. And that in the firſt place he had called before him the officers of the army, and given them a ſtrict charge, that they ſhould receive no men, that were impreſſed. And had given orders to the admiralty to examine the preſs-maſters, that had committed thoſe abuſes; and that there ſhould be ſuch exemplary puniſhment inflicted on them, that others ſhould be deterred from doing the like.'

As to the honours and promotions beſtowed by the king in the laſt year, and the beginning of this, the moſt remarkable were as follow:

Sir Henry Capel, brother to the earl of Eſſex, was created, about the middle of April, 1692, baron Capel of Tewkſbury.

On the 30th of December, ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and firſt commiſſioner of the great ſeal, was made maſter of the rolls, in the room of Henry Powle deceaſed. He had enjoyed that place under king James.

Sir Edward Ward was made attorney-general, which gave ſuch diſguſt to ſir Thomas Trevor the ſollicitor general, who thought he had a right to ſucceed to that office, that he had determined to reſign his own place, and was with great difficulty perſuaded by his friends to continue in it.

At the ſame time ſir John Lowther, Henry Prieſtman, (who had been one of king James's ſea-captains) Anthony lord viſcount Falkland, Robert Auſten, ſir Robert Rich, Henry Killigrew, and ſir Ralph Delaval, were appointed commiſſioners of the admiralty. George Rooke, who was ſoon after knighted on board his ſhip at Spithead, was made vice-admiral of the red; the lord Berkley, vice-admiral of the blue; colonel Matthew Aylmer, rear-admiral of the red; and David Mitchel, rear admiral of the blue.

The king being now poſſeſſed againſt admiral Ruſſel, he diſmiſſed him from his ſervice, and put the command of the fleet into the hands of three perſons, Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel. Killigrew and Delaval were thought ſo inclinable to king James's intereſts, that it made ſome inſinuate, that the king was in the hands of thoſe, who intended to betray him to his enemies. For, though no exception lay againſt Shovel, yet it was ſaid, that he was put in with the other two, only to give ſome reputation to the commiſſion, and that he was one againſt two; ſo that he could neither hinder nor do any thing. The chief blame of this nomination was caſt on the earl of Nottingham; and of thoſe, who belonged to his office, many ſtories were raiſed and ſpread about, as if there had been among them, beſides a very great remiſſneſs in ſome of the concerns of the government, an actual betraying of all ſecrets and councils. The opinion of this was ſpread both within and without the kingdom; and moſt of the confederates were poſſeſſed with it. But he juſtified not only himſelf, but all his under ſecretaries, and the king and queen ſtill continued to have a good opinion of his fidelity, though they ſaw ſome defects in his judgment, with a great party-heat, that appeared on all occaſions, and even in the ſmalleſt matters.

The king made likewiſe conſiderable alterations in his miniſtry. Every body was now grown weary of the great ſeal's being in commiſſion. It occaſioned the proceedings in chancery to be more dilatory and more expenſive, and there were ſuch exceptions made to the decrees of the commiſſioners, that appeals were brought againſt moſt of them, and they were generally reverſed. Sir John Sommers had now got ſo great a reputation, both in his poſt of attorney-general, and in the houſe of commons, that the king on the 23d of March gave him the great ſeal, with the title of lord-keeper. He was excellently well ſkilled in his own profeſſion, and had an uncommon ſhare of knowledge in all parts of polite and uſeful learning. He had a great capacity for buſineſs, with an extraordinary temper; for he was fair and gentle, perhaps to a fault, conſidering his poſt; and had all the patience and ſoftneſs, as well as the juſtice and equity, becoming a great magiſtrate. He had always agreed in his notions with the whigs, and had ſtudied to bring them to better thoughts of the king, and to a greater confidence in him.

The ſame day ſir John Trenchard was ſworn one of their majeſties principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and of the privy-council. He had been engaged far with the duke of Monmouth, as has been obſerved. He got out of England, and lived ſome years beyond ſea, and had a true knowledge of foreign affairs. He was a calm and ſedate man, and much more moderate than could have been expected, ſince he was a leading man in a party. The bringing him and ſir John Sommers into thoſe poſts was aſcribed chiefly to the great credit, which the earl of Sunderland had gained with the king. He had now got into his confidence, and declared openly for the whigs. This earl, after he was removed from his places by king James, retired into Holland, where he wrote a letter to a friend in vindication of himſelf, which was publiſhed in London, in 1689. He was ſeized at Rotterdam by order of the ſtates, and excepted out of the act of indemnity by the parliament; but it was thought, his detenſion was by colluſion, and that he was apprehended on purpoſe to be formally diſcharged, to make way for his more honourable return to England. However this be, it is certain, that the ſame expreſs that carried the king's letter to the ſtates, on his advancement to the throne, conveyed another for the diſcharge of the earl of Sunderland; and his being excepted out of the pardon, ſeems to have been done purely in compliance to common fame, that he had been deeply concerned in all king James's arbitrary proceedings: For the confidence king William put in him afterwards ſhews he was not diſſatisfied with his conduct at that juncture. Moſt aſſuredly, his advice to king James (from what motive ſoever it flowed) not to accept the offer of a French army, made the way eaſy to accompliſh the revolution.

But as theſe advancements had a conſiderable effect on the whole party, and brought them to a much better opinion of the king, ſo a party came to be now formed, that ſtudied to croſs and defeat every thing. This was led by ſir Edward Seymour, and ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave; the latter of whom was a gentleman of a good family in Cumberland, whoſe life was regular, and his deportment grave. He had loſt a place in king James's time; for, though he was always a high tory, yet he would not comply with that king's deſigns. He had indeed contributed much to increaſe his revenue, and to offer him more than he aſked; but he would not go into the taking off the teſt. Upon the revolution, the place, out of which he had been turned, was given to a gentleman, who had a good ſhare of merit in it. This alienated him from the king; and he, being a man of good judgment and great experience, came to be conſidered as the head of the party; in which he found his account ſo well, that no offers that were made him, could ever bring him over to the king's intereſts. Upon many critical occaſions he gave up ſome important points, for which the king found it neceſſary to pay him very liberally [p].

However, the party of the tories was too inconſiderable to have raiſed a great oppoſition, if a body of whigs had not joined with them. Some of theſe had ſuch republican notions, that they were much ſet againſt the prerogative, and thought the king was become too ſtiff in maintaining it. Others were offended becauſe they were not conſidered nor preferred, as they thought they deſerved. The chief of this body of men were Mr. Paul Foley and Mr. Robert Harley, who were both this ſeſſion made commiſſioners for examining and ſtating the public accounts of the kingdom. Foley was a younger ſon of one, who from mean beginnings had, by iron-works, raiſed one of the greateſt eſtates, that had been known in England in that time. He was a learned, though not a practiſing, lawyer, and was a man of virtue and good principles, but moroſe and wilful; and he had the affectation of paſſing for a great patriot, by his conſtant finding fault with the government, and keeping up an ill humour with, and a bad opinion of, the court. Harley was deſcended of an antient and good family, and very eminently learned; much turned to politics, and of a reſtleſs ambition. He was a man of great induſtry and application, and knew forms and the records of parliament ſo well, that he was capable both of lengthening out, and perplexing debates. Nothing could anſwer his aſpiring temper. So he and Foley joined with the tories to create jealouſies, and raiſe an oppoſition.

That, which gave them much ſtrength, was the king's cold and reſerved way. He took no pains to oblige thoſe, who came to him; nor was he eaſy of acceſs. He lived out of town at Kenſington, and his chief confidents were Dutch. He took no notice of the clergy, and ſeemed to have little concern in the matters of the church or of religion. And at this time ſome deiſts were publiſhing books againſt the chriſtian religion in general, as the Socinians were more particularly againſt ſome points of the orthodox faith [q]. Theſe, expreſſing great zeal for the government, gave a handle to thoſe, who were waiting for all advantages, and were careful of increaſing and improving them, to ſpread it all over the nation, that the king, and thoſe about him, had no regard to religion, nor to the church of England.

[1693] In this ſituation were affairs when the king departed for Holland. He went to Harwich on the 25th of March, but the wind proving contrary, he returned to Kenſington, from whence he ſet out again on the 31ſt, and embarking near Graveſend, and being attended with a ſquadron of men of war commanded by admiral Mitchel, arrived ſafely at the Maeſe on the 2d of April, went to the Hague, thence to Loo, and afterwards to the army in Flanders, where the French were this year ſo ſtrong, that their forces exceeded the confederates almoſt by one half at the beginning of the campaign. But the king's diligence, in poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp at Parke near Louvain, entirely broke the French king's deſigns upon Brabant; who was thereby obliged to ſend a ſtrong detachment, under the command of the Dauphin, and the marſhal de Boufflers, into Germany, and return himſelf to Verſailles, without attempting any thing [r].

The French, under the duke of Luxemburg, were all this while encamped at Meldert; and, though their convoys were much diſturbed by the garriſon of Charleroy, yet it ſeemed a trial of ſkill between both armies, which ſhould continue longeſt in their poſts. But at length the French were forced to quit theirs firſt, marching to Heiliſheim, in their way towards the Maeſe; which gave the king an opportunity of ſending a ſtrong detachment under the command of the prince of Wirtemberg, to force the lines, which the French had made to cover their conquered countries from the Scheld to the Lys; and ſo on to the very ſea by Dunkirk.

At the ſame time count Tilly, general of the troops of Liege, was marching with a reinforcement to join the king, of which Luxemburg being informed, marched immediately with a good body of troops to hinder that conjunction; which he did effectually, ſurprizing the count in the hollow way, through which he was marching, and forcing him to retreat to Maeſtricht, leaving near two hundred of his men killed, and all his baggage behind him. Wirtemberg's forcing the lines with good ſucceſs, and raiſing great contributions, did not hinder Luxemburg from laying ſiege to Huy, which made the king advance nearer the country of Liege. But, when he came to Tongres, he was ſurprized to hear, that the caſtle of Huy had capitulated.

Upon farther information that Luxemburg was drawn nearer Liege, the king ſent ten battalions thither, which, with great difficulty, got at length into the place, that now abſolutely rejected the neutrality, which Luxemburg had offered. Though the biſhop was true to the allies, yet there was a faction formed among the capitulars to offer themſelves to the French; but the garriſon adhered to the biſhop; and now, when ſo great an army lay near them, they broke the meaſures which that faction had taken. Luxemburg thereupon made a feint of beſieging Liege, though his real deſign was to attack the king, now encamped at Neerheſpen, ſo much weakened by the ſeveral detachments he had made to reinforce the garriſons of Liege and Maeſtricht, that it was generally computed, that the French were at leaſt thirty-five thouſand men ſtronger than the confederates.

As ſoon as the king had notice of the enemies approach, he got on horſeback with the elector of Bavaria, and chief officers of the army, and finding by the enemy's countenance, that it was the vanguard of their whole army, that was coming to attack him in his own camp, he immediately ordered to arms, and to draw up in battle to expect the enemy.

Moſt of the general officers were for repaſſing the Geet, but the king choſe to take the advantage of the ground he had, and venture a battle, notwithſtanding the great diſproportion of the two armies, rather than expoſe his rear to the enemy's charge. Beſides, the French were now near the large and defenceleſs town of Brabant, which muſt feel the effects of their fury, unleſs they were ſtopped by venturing an engagement; and, as the benefits of a victory were great, ſo, upon the worſt ſuppoſition of the event, the king had ſtill Wirtemburg's victorious army ready to make up the breaches of his own; an advantage, which the enemy had not ſo ready on their ſide. But however, as the king might have ſecured himſelf from all attacks, by paſſing the river, his conduct, in not doing it, was much cenſured, conſidering his ſtrength and the enemy's.

The right of the confederates in this camp was at Heiliſheim and Wangen, upon the river Geet, and reached as far as Neer-Winden, being covered with a ſmall brook, ſeveral hedges, and hollow ways. The elector of Bavaria had his quarters at Wangen; the body of foot and left wing of the horſe reached from thence as far as Dormal, upon the brook of Beck, where Lewe remained in their rear.

As ſoon as the enemy drew up by the confederate camp, the king ordered brigadier Rumſey, with the regiments of O'Farrel, Mackay, Lauder, Leven, and Monroe, to the right of all, to guard ſome hedges and hollow ways upon the right of the village of Lare. The Brandenburg battalions were poſted to the left of this village; and more to the left the infantry of Hanover. Prince Charles of Brandenburg, as major-general, commanding the ſix battalions of Brandenburg, and lieutenant-general Dumont the Hanoverians, with whom he was to defend the village of Neer-Winden, that covered part of the confederates camp, between the right wing of horſe, and their main body. Theſe were afterwards reinforced by the firſt battalion of the firſt regiment of guards, and the ſecond battalion of Scots guards. Upon the left at Neer-Landen the king ordered the firſt battalion of the royal regiment, Churchill's, Selwin's, and Trelawney's, prince Frederic's battalion of Danes, and Fagel's, to poſſeſs this

[p] Mr. Pope, in his epiſtle on the 'uſe of riches,' mentions a ſtory, which confirms the character of ſir Chriſtopher; and in the 'note upon' that epiſtle obſerves, that, "the unſuſpected old patriot coming out of the back door from having been cloſetted by the king, where he had received a large bag of guineas, the burſting of his bag diſcovered his buſineſs there."

[q] The honourable Mr. Robert Boyle, the famous experimental philoſopher, who died in the beginning of the year 1692, left the foundation of a monthly ſermon to convince Atheiſts, Deiſts, and Jews of their errors, and demonſtrate the truth of the chriſtian religion in general, without meddling with any of the points about which the chriſtians are divided into parties and ſects.

[r] The French king had opened the campaign with great pomp in Flanders, coming thither in perſon, accompanied by the ladies of the court, which appeared the more ridiculous, ſince there was no queen at the head of them; unleſs madam de Maintenon was to be taken for one, to whom reſpects were indeed paid with more ſubmiſſion than is commonly due to queens; ſo that what might be wanting in the outward ceremony, was more than balanced by the real authority ſhe poſſeſſed. village, that covered the left to the brook of Beck, where it was covered by the village of Neer-Landen. The ground was open between the villages of Neer-Winden and Neer-Landen; whereupon the king ordered a retrenchment to be made in the night from the one to the other, to cover the body of foot; which was indeed but a ſlight breaſt-work, as may eaſily be judged by the ſhort time they had to make it, and the ſmall number of men who worked about it, being only thirty of each battalion. What remained of the body of the foot was drawn up in one line within this retrenchment to defend it. The dragoons upon the left were ordered to the village of Dormal, to guard that paſs upon the brook of Beck, and from thence the left wing of horſe reached to Neer-Landen, where it was covered by this brook, and from thence turned off to the right behind the body of foot.[*]

The king, who had been on horſeback till late in the evening, not only to give all the neceſſary commands, but to ſee them executed, ordered his coach to be brought to the rear of Stanley's regiment, where he repoſed himſelf about two hours, and early in the morning ſent for Dr. Menard, one of his chaplains, to pray with him in the coach.

By ſun-riſing the French were drawn up within the reach of the confederates cannon, which played upon them with good ſucceſs, and which the French ſuſtained with great reſolution till about ſix of the clock, when they made a motion to draw nearer the king's retrenchments. About eight Luxemburg ordered a ſtrong body of troops to attack the villages of Lare and Neer-Winden, which they did with great fury and various ſucceſs, having gained and loſt theſe poſts more than once; but at length the allies maintained their ground, and here it was the duke of Berwick was taken priſoner by brigadier Churchill. This ill ſucceſs did not diſcourage the French from trying their fortunes againſt the confederates left wing at Neer-Landen. This poſt, indeed, was not a weak one, but it was attacked with a great diſproportion of forces, and the fire was very ſmart on both ſides. The firſt battalion of the royal regiment was, after a ſharp diſpute, forced to retire, but was ſoon after encouraged by the king's preſence (who rode immediately from the right to the left) and ſuſtained by Selwin's, who obſerving a paſſage in this place, where horſe could come upon his rear, ordered trees to be cut down, and to ſtop it up. The houſe, where Hamilton's grenadiers had before been poſted, was likewiſe ſet on fire; and by this time the two regiments above-mentioned being ſupported by prince Frederic's and Fagel's, the enemy, after a ſharp diſpute of about two hours, were entirely beaten off, and purſued quite out of the defile into the very plain, ſo that they attempted this place no more.

Hitherto the ſucceſs of the day was viſibly on the ſide of the confederates; and the French, who continued a faint fire at Neer-Winden, ſeemed as if they deſigned to draw off. But Luxemburg, having ſtill ſeveral brigades of freſh men, reſolved to gain the village of Neer-Winden, and ordered the prince of Conti to make the attack. The enemy had remained maſters of the outermoſt hedges of this village; for, though our rallied forces had made the French give way conſiderably, yet they could not entirely clear the village.—The prince of Conti, with the beſt foot in the French army, charged the confederates ſo vigorouſly, that he obliged them, ſpent as they were by the former encounters, ſoon to yield to him the avenues of Neer-Winden; upon which ſucceſs Luxemburg came to obſerve the paſſages, that led to the confederates camp, for his horſe to march in. As the marſhal de Villeroy was marching with a ſtrong body of horſe this way, count d'Arco, general of the Bavarian Cuiraſſiers, charged them with ſo much vigour, that, notwithſtanding their brave reſiſtance, he repulſed them quite within their foot; the duke de Chartres, who charged with them, narrowly eſcaping being made priſoner. Thereupon the confederates endeavoured to regain once more the poſt of Neer-Winden; and the elector of Bavaria ordered two battalions to charge the enemy in front, whilſt three others ſhould charge them upon their left flank. But the French rallying, and being conſiderably reinforced, the attempt became impoſſible, the Dutch and the Scots guards having ſpent all their ammunition by their continual fire.

The king, who had left Neer-Landen upon the enemy's freſh attempt upon Neer-Winden, led twice the Engliſh battalions to the charge, up to the right of the retrenchment (which was now flanked and under the enemy's command) where they fought with great bravery. In the mean time Luxemburg, who had found a more convenient paſſage for the horſe between the poſts of the king's and Zurbeck's brigades, came in himſelf with the prince of Conti and count de Marſin, into the plain of the confederates camp, with the Carabineers, and ſeveral other regiments; whilſt the marſhal de Joyeuſe paſſed between Neer-Winden and Lare with three brigades. Conti, being joined by the French guards, fell upon the Hanover horſe, and broke them; whilſt part of the enemy's ſecond line of horſe, and the reſerve, came in upon their left along the hedges of Lare. The marquis d'Harcourt, who had been ſent for from Huy with his detachment of twenty-two ſquadrons, came time enough to have his ſhare of the day. He joined theſe, and made his dragoons alight to chace our foot out of the village of Lare. The duke of Villeroy came in upon our right of the retrenchments, which place the Engliſh foot diſputed with undaunted reſolution, till, being overpowered, the French remained maſters of this part of the retrenchment, which they levelled, to make room for a body of horſe to come in.

After the Hanover horſe had been broken, the reſt of the confederate right wing of horſe, being cut off from the body of foot, was ſoon overthrown by the enemy, who now had the opportunity of charging them both front and flank. The elector of Bavaria did what he could to reſiſt the numerous multitude of the enemies horſe, that charged him thus; but, finding it impoſſible, with no ſmall difficulty he retreated over the bridge, and rallied on the other ſide as many of the ſcattered horſe and foot as could get over, to favour the retreat of thoſe, who were ready to paſs. The king did what he could to remedy this diſorder, riding to the left to bring up the Engliſh horſe for the relief of the right wing. But the enemy had now got another body of horſe in our camp commanded by the duke d'Elboeuf. At the ſame time the duke de Montmorency, Luxemburg's ſon, fell upon the right flank of the Dutch horſe, and put them in diſorder before the Engliſh horſe, which were led on by the king, could come up and form their ſquadrons; ſo that they were forced to charge the enemy in the ſame order they rid up to them (and moſt of them had rid as faſt as their horſes could gallop) but that did not hinder them from doing extraordinary ſervice. The king himſelf charged at the head of lord Galway's regiment, which diſtinguiſhed itſelf very much on this occaſion. Colonel Wyndham, at the head of his regiment, charged ſeveral times through and through the enemy's ſquadrons. Colonel Langſton was made priſoner, and the duke of Ormond, having charged at the head of one of Lumley's ſquadrons, received ſeveral wounds, and had his horſe ſhot under him; was reſcued by a gentleman of the French king's guards from the hands of one, who was offering to ſtab him.

The king, ſeeing the battle loſt, ordered the infantry to retreat to Dormal upon the brook of Beck, which poſt had hitherto been kept by the dragoons of the left wing, who had nothing to do this day; and finding that the enemies were ſurrounding him on all ſides, he ordered the regiments of Wyndham, Lumley, and Galway, to cover his retreat over the bridge at Neerheſpen, which he gained with great difficulty. There was now nothing but confuſion and diſorder in the confederates camp; all thoſe who could not get the paſſes for the retreat, being preſſed by the enemy, were forced to throw themſelves into the river, where many were drowned, the earl of Athlone narrowly eſcaping the ſame fate. Lieutenant-genearl Talmaſh brought off the Engliſh foot with great prudence, bravery and ſucceſs, but ſome of the Engliſh life-guards were ſo terrified with the apprehenſion of a purſuing enemy, that they did not think themſelves ſafe till they reached Breda. Sixty pieces of cannon and nine mortars were loſt; but all the baggage had been ſent to Lewe the night before, where it was ſafely brought off in reſpect of the enemy, but generally plundered by our own ſoldiers.

The king in this battle was ſeen every where, acting the different parts of a general and of a private ſoldier. He had ſupported the whole action with ſo much courage, and ſo true a judgment, that it was thought he got more honour that day, than even when he triumphed at the Boyne. He charged himſelf, in ſeveral places, and was in the midſt of the moſt imminent dangers, many being ſhot round about him with the enemies cannon, and himſelf eſcaping no leſs than than three muſket ſhots, one through his peruke which deafened him for ſome time, another through the ſleeve of his coat, and a third, which carried off the knot of his ſcarf, and left a ſmall contuſion on his ſide. In a word, he gained ſo far the reſpect and admiration of his very enemies, that it was a common ſaying among them, "that they wanted but ſuch a king to make themſelves maſters of Chriſtendom." And the prince of Conti, in an intercepted letter to his princeſs, declared, "I ſaw the king expoſing himſelf to the greateſt dangers; and ſurely ſo much valour very well deſerved the peaceable poſſeſſion of the crown he wears." The French king himſelf likewiſe was reported to have ſaid, that Luxemburg's behaviour was like the prince of Conti's, but king William's like marſhal Turenne's.

[*] Whether it was out of envy to king William, or that he really found ſomething amiſs in the forming this camp, Luxemburg, when he viewed it the next morning, ſaid, "Now I believe Waldeck is dead;" that general being allowed to have been the beſt in his time for incamping.

The French loſt ſo many men, and ſuffered ſo much, in ſeveral onſets they had made, that they were not able to purſue a victory, which coſt them ſo dear. The confederates loſt in all about ſeven thouſand; and among theſe there was ſcarce an officer of note, only the count de Solms had his leg ſhot off by a cannon ball, of which he died in a few hours. By all the accounts that came from France, it appeared that the French had loſt double that number, with at leaſt two thouſand officers killed or wounded; and theſe accounts ſeem to be confirmed by Luxemburg's continuing fifteen days after the battle, at Waren, without attempting any thing. The king's army was in a few days as ſtrong as ever, by recalling the duke of Wirtemburg and the battalions he had ſent to Liege. and ſome other bodies that he drew out of garriſons. The reſt of the campaign paſſed over without any other action; only after the king had left the army, and Luxemburg had been reinforced with ſome troops from the ſea coaſt, and a great detachment under Boufflers from the Rhine, he ſat down before Charleroy. The place was attacked with great fury, but the garriſon made ſuch a vigorous reſiſtance, that, though they had little or no proſpect of relief, yet they held out ſix and twenty days from the opening of the trenches, and then made an honourable capitulation. The country about Charleroy had been ſo eat up, that it was not poſſible to ſubſiſt an army that might have been brought to relieve it.

The French had better ſucceſs and leſs oppoſition in Catalonia, where ſo early as the 29th of May they inveſted Roſes, and carried on the ſiege with that diligence, that they made themſelves maſters of the place in ſeven days. Then they advanced to Barcelona, expecting their fleet, which was to have bombarded it by ſea, while their army attacked it by land. This put all Spain in great conſternation; the deſign of the invaſion was to force them to a ſeparate peace; while they felt themſelves ſo vigorouſly attacked, and ſaw that they were in no condition to reſiſt.

The Dauphin, with a great part of the French army, had been ſent to make head againſt the Germans, who had brought an army together, commanded by the elector of Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the prince of Baden. The Germans (who had been retarded by ſome diſputes about the command) were ſo ſlow, and the French ſo forward, that the latter paſſed the Rhine about the middle of May at Phillipſburg; and, without any oppoſition, the marquis de Chamilly inveſted the city of Heidelberg. At the ſame time the duke de Lorge croſſed the mountains to oppoſe the prince of Baden, who was not yet in a condition to act but defenſively, ſo that the town was left to defend itſelf. But beſides its natural weakneſs, there was at this time ſuch a diviſion between the garriſon and the townſmen about the money, that was called in, and which the garriſon would have to be current again, that, when the regiment of Sconbeck was ready to enter the place to reinforce the garriſon, the townſmen would not ſuffer them to come in; which gave monſieur de Melac an opportunity to ſeize a redoubt, which commanded that part of the town. In ſhort, the French, on the 21ſt of May, made themſelves maſters of the ſuburbs with little oppoſition, and their grenadiers drove the beſieged with ſo much fury to the caſtle gates, that above ſix hundred of their ſoldiers were left without, who were all put to the ſword. The governor of the caſtle, apprehending the ſame fate, accepted the conditions which de Lorge impoſed upon him, and was contented to be conducted to Wimpel with the reſt of his garriſon, conſiſting of twelve hundred men, two pieces of cannon, and twelve waggons laden with baggage.

The Imperialiſts were no ſooner out of the city, but the French ſet both that and the caſtle on fire, and committed ſeveral other barbarities in the Palatinate, not ſparing ſo much as the tombs of the deceaſed electors. Fluſhed with this eaſy ſucceſs, de Lorge advanced towards the Neckar, with a deſign to attack the prince of Baden, who lay incamped with his army on the other ſide of the river, which the French twice endeavoured to paſs, but were forced to abandon their enterprize with the loſs of near a thouſand men. Some time after the Dauphin in perſon joined the army, which conſiſted of near ſeventy thouſand men; and, having croſſed the Neckar, made a ſhew of attacking the prince of Baden, but found his highneſs ſo well poſted, that he repaſſed the river, without attempting any thing; and having put a garriſon into Stugard, and ſent a detachment into Flanders and Piedmont, he returned in Auguſt to Verſailles.

With regard to the affairs of Italy, the duke of Savoy was no ſooner recovered of his long indiſpoſition, but he put himſelf at the head of the army; which, being conſiderably ſtrong, made the inhabitants of Dauphiné apprehenſive of a worſe irruption into their country than the laſt; but the confederates ſeemed now chiefly to aim at the driving the French out of Italy, by diſpoſſeſſing them of Caſal and Pignerol; neither of which was effected this year. Caſal indeed was blocked up for ſome time, and the fort of St. George carried by aſſault, which compleated the blockade of that place; but things went no farther, and the duke of Savoy, with the main army, laid ſiege to Pignerol, and took the fort of St. Bridget, that covered the place, but paid ſo dear for this poſt, that after all it was debated, whether they ſhould carry on the ſiege, or only bombard the town. Whilſt the allies were thus deliberating among themſelves, Catinat being conſiderably reinforced, deſcended into the plains, and gave the duke ſuch apprehenſions for Turin, that he drew off from about Pignerol, and encamped at Marſaglia, having firſt blown up the fort of St. Bridget. The army was preſently drawn up. The marquis de Leganez commanded the left wing, compoſed of the king of Spain's troops. The duke, and under him the count of Caprara, commanded the right wing; and prince Eugene the main battle, having under him the marquis de la Parelle, and the count de las Torres. As for duke Schomberg, being denied the poſt due to him, he reſolved to fight on foot at the head of his own regiment, like an ordinary colonel. The confederate army, being thus diſpoſed, marched into the neighbourhood of Orbaſſon, from whence they perceived the enemy towards the hills, between Orbaſſon and Pioſaſque.

Early the next day the French advanced towards the confederates, making uſe of the advantage they had in the ground, which was full of woods and vineyards; and ſoon after the cannon began to play on both ſides. About half an hour after eight, the French fell upon the confederates left wing with near twenty thouſand men, without firing a ſhot, having their bayonets at the ends of their fuzees, and their ſwords in their hands. They were received and driven back with great vigour; but, renewing their attack, they took in front and flank the Neapolitan and Milaneſe horſe, who, after having courageouſly withſtood the fury of their enemies, were at laſt overpowered by their numbers, and puſhed upon the German horſe. Theſe, being at the ſame time charged by the little Gendarmerie, were no longer able to maintain their ground, but fell upon the infantry, which was alſo put into diſorder. The ſecond line was brought on to oppoſe the enemy, while the firſt line rallied; but the horſe giving way, the foot was quickly routed.

While things paſſed thus on this ſide, the French were thrice repulſed with great loſs by the confederates main battalia and right wing, till their horſe which had made the left wing give way, attacked the confederates infantry behind and in flank, who had no longer any horſe to cover them, and were at the ſame time attacked by the enemy's foot. All the troops fought with great courage, and the diſpute was deſperate on both ſides. His Britannic majeſty's forces, which were poſted in the main battle, particularly diſtinguiſhed themſelves; and duke Schomberg, their general, was deſired by the count de las Torres, after the enemy's third attack, to take upon him the command, and cauſe a retreat to be made by the body of foot and the right wing. But his grace, reſenting the uſage, which he had met with before, told him, that it was neceſſary firſt to have his royal highneſs's order; and till it came he would bear the enemy's fire; adding, that he found things were gone ſo far, that they muſt now either conquer or die.

The confederates reſiſted the repeated efforts of the enemy with extraordinary reſolution, but were at laſt forced to abandon the field of battle, and to retire with the loſs of the greateſt part of their cannon, and of ſeven or eight thouſand men. Duke Schomberg, having fought with unparallelled valour, received a wound in his thigh, of which he died not many days after, to the regret of all good and gallant men, for he was of that number in an eminent degree. The honour of the action, but with that the greateſt loſs, fell to the French; for though they carried the victory by their numbers, yet the reſiſtance which they met with was ſuch, that the duke of Savoy gained more in his reputation, than he ſuffered by the loſs of the day. With this ended the campaign in Peidmont.

Nor were our affairs at ſea more fortunate than at land. The Engliſh and Dutch fleet was large and ſtrong, and ſet out early. The joint-admirals were not at firſt reſtrained by any particular inſtructions, but ordered in general only to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to annoy the enemy, and protect the trade. But afterwards they received her majeſty's commands more particularly from the lords of the admiralty, chiefly regarding the ſecurity of a great fleet of merchantmen of near four hundred ſail, Engliſh, Dutch, Hamburghers, &c. Much time was however ſpent, ſeveral councils of war held, and divers repreſentations made, before they could come to a reſolution, what number of ſhips to appoint for the ſpecial convoy, and how far to accompany them with the whole fleet. It was at laſt determined, that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean ſquadron, ſhould proceed together thirty leagues weſt ſouth-weſt from Uſhant; and that when the admirals ſpread a blue flag at the main-top-maſt head, and fired three guns, ſir George Rooke, as well as the other convoys, ſhould go forward, according to the orders, which they had received from the lords of the admiralty; but, being come to the height limited, on the 4th of June, they reſolved, in another council of war, to proceed with the Mediterranean ſquadron twenty leagues farther, and then to return to the former ſtation, to take up the cruiſers, from whence it was judged adviſeable to proceed to the rendezvous north-weſt of Uſhant. Sir George Rooke therefore, with twenty-three men of war, and the Turky fleet, left the main body of the fleet on the 6th of June, and, ſteering for the Streights, left by the way the veſſels bound for Bilboa, Liſbon, St. Ubes, and other parts, under the convoy of two men of war. He was unhappy in that, which, upon any other occaſion, would have been a great happineſs; he had a fair and ſtrong gale of wind, ſo that no advice ſent after him could overtake him; nor did he meet with any ſhips at ſea, that could give him notice of the danger that lay before him. Being come, on the 17th, within ſixty leagues of Cape Vincent, he diſcovered part of the French fleet,[t] which made him call a council of war, wherein it was reſolved, that, the wind being freſh northerly, and giving a fair opportunity of haſtening their paſſage to Cadiz, the merchant-ſhips ſhould make the beſt of their way. Upon the diſcovery of the enemy's whole fleet, conſiſting of eighty ſail, commanded by monſieur de Tourville, Rooke being of opinion, that he was too far advanced to think of a retreat, reſolved to puſh for it; but the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes bringing to, and letting him know he choſe to avoid fighting, which he thought hazardous; he likewiſe brought to, and ſtood off with an eaſy ſail, that ſo the Duch and the heavy ſhips might work up to the windward; ſending at the ſame time the Sheerneſs with orders to the ſmall ſhips, which were near the land, and could not (as he judged) keep up with the fleet, to endeavour to get along ſhore in the night, and ſave themſelves in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. About ſix in the evening, the French admiral and vice-admiral of the blue, which had the whole afternoon gained upon the ſquadron, notwithſtanding all the ſail they could make, came up with the leeward and ſternmoſt of the confederate fleet. Theſe were three Dutch men of war, whereof two were commanded by the captains Schryver and Vander Poel, who for five hours together bravely fought, firſt eleven, and then ſeven of the enemy's men of war. They had the good fortune to get clear of the firſt eleven, but were at laſt forced to yield, after having made a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance.[u] The Dutch merchant ſhips immediately tacked, and ſtood in for the ſhore, as the enemy did after them. The admiral ſtood off all night, having a freſh gale at north north weſt; and the next morning fifty-four of the merchant ſhips, with ſeveral men of war, were about him; but of the latter no more than two of thoſe belonging to the Dutch, and one Hamburgher, five ſail of the enemy's ſhips being to the leeward, and two to the windward, which laſt kept ſight of him until it was night. The next day the admiral called the officers of the men of war and merchant-ſhips on board him, to inform himſelf from them what account they could give of the reſt of the fleet, and to adviſe what was beſt to be done for their ſecurity; and at laſt determined to ſail to Madeiras for water, and from thence, either to Cork or Kingſale, at the former of which ports he arrived on the 3d of Auguſt.[w]

[t] The French either were, or feigned to be, at firſt, in as great a ſurprize as the confederates; for they ſtood away with ſeveral of their ſhips, and abandoning others, ſet fire to them. And, though it may have been a decoy to draw them on, yet the great numbers of ſhips might very well make them apprehend it to be the whole body of the Engliſh and Dutch fleets coming upon them. And, indeed, had they come ſo far with them, ſuch an occaſion offered here, which perhaps might not be found again in an age, of deſtroying the whole naval force of France.

[u] The captains being carried on board the French admiral, he aſked Schryver, Whether he was a man or a devil?

[w] The following letter, written by captain Littleton, commander of the Smyrna-factor man of war from Cadiz, contains ſome particulars of this unfortunate affair, not mentioned in other accounts.

"The 26th of June, N. S. ſays he, at nine in the morning, we arrived to the height of Cape Vincent. About two in the afternoon the headmoſt ſailors diſcovered the French, and about four in the afternoon both ſides engaged for ſome time. After this the headmoſt retired, and gave notice the ſame evening to the officer in chief. The 27th in the morning we arrived near Lagos, and our ſhips took a fire-ſhip of the enemy's, which reported, that there were at Lagos eighteen French men of war, with ſome fire-ſhips and merchant-men. About four in the morning two ſhips blew up, or elſe the enemy ſet them on fire themſelves, within cannon-ſhot of the convoy. The commander alſo gave the ſignal of drawing into a line of battle; for till then we deſcried no more than nine and twenty ſail of the enemies. There was no wind ſtirring till ten o'clock, at which time a freſh gale aroſe, and then we diſcovered a greater number of ſhips. The convoy alſo ſteering ſouthward perceived on the one ſide forty ſail under three flags, beſide another ſquadron, which endeavoured to get between us and the coaſts; which the admiral obſerving, gave notice to the merchant-men to make all the ſail they could for the port of Cadiz, while the men of war kept the enemy in play. This deſign was obſerved by the French, who made all the ſail they could to intercept us. But the convoy, having the wind, kept the enemy in play till the evening, and gave time to the nimbleſt ſailers to get hither. Towards five in the afternoon, the eighteen French men of war abovementioned engaged the convoy, and the fight laſted ſome part of the beginning of the night, the reſt of the fleet not being able to come up with them. The 28th in the morning the fight began with greater fury, ſo that about ſeven o'clock our veſſels ſaw four ſhips on fire, not knowing whether French or Engliſh, and the guns were heard till nine, though the event be not yet known. It is to be feared we have loſt ſome men of war, and ſeveral merchants. The engagement happened about ſix miles from Cape St. Mary."

After having given an account of this misfortune from our own writers, let us now hear what the French ſay to it: "The Engliſh and Dutch, ſays Father Daniel, ſuſtaining every day great loſſes from the French privateers, and more particularly by thoſe of St. Malo, had reſolved to ſecure their Smyrna fleet from any inſult, by putting it under a convoy of two and twenty men of war. Advice of this precaution being carried to the king of France, his majeſty ordered the marſhal de Tourville to ſail with ſixty ſhips towards the coaſt of Portugal, and then way-lay the Smyrna fleet. Their ſcouts diſcovered it a few days afterwards; but as they had information the Engliſh were at ſea with a fleet of ninety men of war, which had been ſeen on the coaſt of France, the marſhal, who was not yet joined by the Toulon ſquadron, conſiſting of thirty ſhips, under the count d'Eſtrees, thought fit to detach twenty of his beſt ſailers, to take a view of the Engliſh fleet, and to begin the attack, if they did not find them much more numerous than themſelves, whilſt he would back them with the body of his fleet. They executed the orders given them, and took, at the beginning of the attack, two men of war; after which they burnt, ſunk, or run a-ground upon the coaſt ſixty merchant-ſhips; ſeven and twenty were taken, and the remainder, which could not make their way for England, took refuge at St. Lucar, Cadiz, and Gibraltar. The marquis de Coetlogon, commander of a ſquadron, burnt four ſhips very richly laden at Gibraltar, and carried off thirteen, though they were defended by the batteries of the place, and an eſtacade. If a greater number of men of war had taken the ſame courſe by night, as the ſieurs de Belliſle, Errard, de Chaland, and d'Henri, the Engliſh and Dutch would have ſuſtained a far greater loſs; though, as it was, it amounted, according to the relations of the captains of ſhips, who were taken, to above twenty millions of livres." Monſieur de Forbin, who was in the action, gives us the following account of it in his memoirs: "The king of France's fleet, which conſiſted of ſeventy-five men of war, commanded by the marſhal de Tourville, ſet ſail for the ſtreights of Gibraltar, where the count d'Eſtrees, who was coming with twenty other ſhips from Provence, was to join them. They came to anchor in the road of Lagos on the coaſt of Portugal. I was ſent out for intelligence, with orders ſtrictly to examine whatever came to my view; and particularly, if I ſaw a great number of ſhips, I was to make it my buſineſs to diſcover whether they were merchant-men, or the enemy's ſhips of force. I was accompanied with three other captains, who were ſent on the ſame errand. We ſet ſail together, and in a few days we diſcovered a fleet of the enemy's merchant-men. We found they conſiſted of upwards of a hundred and fifty ſail, of which being well aſſured, we returned with all poſſible haſte to the fleet, to inform the admiral, that it was a fleet of merchantmen, and not men of war. Upon this advice the admiral made ready for ſailing, and ſtretched out (for what reaſon I am at a loſs to ſay) before the wind, to ten leagues diſtance. The next day our whole fleet diſcovered the enemy. The admiral gave orders for the chace, but the enemy took the advantage of the wind which our working the night before had made us loſe, and made off, in ſo much, that we did them very little damage. We took nevertheleſs two of their men of war of ſixty guns; and about thirty of their merchant ſhips, which ran a-ground on the coaſt of Portugal, were burnt: I burnt three of them myſelf, and took a fourth. It was happy for them, that they came off ſo well; for, had it not been for the falſe ſtep I juſt mentioned, their whole fleet would have been loſt."

This

Thus the enemy with great art had drawn the confederate ſquadron and the merchant-ſhips into this misfortune; and if they had purſued the advantage with as much conduct and reſolution, not a ſhip could well have eſcaped them; for the admiral and vice-admiral of the blue were within ſhot of ſir George Rooke, when they tacked and ſtood in for the ſhore after the Dutch; which tacking ſaved the reſt of the fleet, by giving them opportunity to make their eſcape. However, the loſs was very conſiderable, and fell hardeſt on the Dutch; for, beſides four of the greateſt Smyrna ſhips and one Dutch man of war, which monſieur Coetlogon burnt or ſunk at Gibraltar, and ſeven, which he took, monſieur D'Eſtrees took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace and an Engliſh man of war, took twenty-nine merchant-men, and deſtroyed about fifty more. The French, inſtead of following Rooke to the Madeiras, tried what they could do upon Cadiz, but found that it was not practicable. They came next to Gibraltar, where the merchants, terrified at the bombs thrown among them, ſunk their ſhips to prevent their falling in their hands. From thence they ſailed along the coaſt of Spain, and burnt ſome Engliſh and Dutch ſhips at Malaga, Alicant, and other places. They hoped to have deſtroyed the Spaniſh fleet; but they put in at Port Mahon where they were ſafe. At length, after a glorious campaign the French came back to Toulon. Thus the voyage was quite loſt, and the diſgrace of it was viſible to the whole world, and very ſenſible to the trading part of the nation.

The appearances were ſuch, that it was generally ſurmiſed, our counſels were betrayed. The ſecretary that attended on the admirals, was much ſuſpected, and charged with many things: But the ſuſpicions roſe high, even as to the ſecretary of ſtate's office. It was ſaid, that our fleet was kept in port, till the French were laid in their way, and was then ordered to ſail, that it might fall into their hands: Many particulars were laid together, which had ſuch colours, that it was not to be wondered at, if they created jealouſy, eſpecially in minds ſufficiently prepared for it. Upon inquiry, it appeared, that ſeveral of thoſe, who, for the laſt two years, were put in the ſubaltern employments, through the kingdom, did upon many occaſions ſhew a diſaffection to the government, and talked and acted like enemies. Our want of intelligence of the motions of the French, while they ſeemed to know every thing that we either did, or deſigned to do, caſt a heavy reproach upon our miniſters, who were now broke ſo in pieces, that they acted without union or concert: Every one ſtudied to juſtify himſelf, and to throw the blame on others: A good ſhare of this was caſt on the earl of Nottingham; the marquis of Caermarthen was much ſuſpected: The earl of Rocheſter began now to have great credit with the queen; and ſeemed to be ſo violently ſet againſt the whigs, that they looked for dreadful things from him, if he came again to govern: For, being naturally warm, and apt to heat himſelf in company, he broke out into ſallies, which were carried about, and began to create jealouſies, even of the queen herſelf.

But, while France was thus triumphing every where over the allies, ſhe had a more dangerous enemy to encounter within her own bowels, famine. This was occaſioned by two bad harveſts that came ſucceſſively one after the other. They had alſo ſuffered much in their vintage, ſo that they had neither bread nor wine. Great diligence was uſed to bring in corn from all parts; and the famous Dubart ſeaſonably brought great quantities from Sweden and Denmark, which he ſafely convoyed into the harbour of France. Strict orders were given by the court for regulating the price of corn, and furniſhing the markets with it. There was alſo a liberal contribution ordered by the French king for the relief of the poor. But, after all poſſible care to alleviate the miſery, great multitudes periſhed for want; and the whole kingdom fell under an extreme poverty: So that all the pomp of thoſe victories could not make them eaſy at home. They tried all poſſible methods for bringing about a general peace; or, if that failed, for a ſeparate peace, with ſome of the confederates: But there was no diſpoſition in any to hearken to them; nor could they engage the northern crowns to offer their mediation. Some ſteps were indeed taken, and a memorial was preſented to king William, by the Daniſh miniſter, wherein ſome offers were made by France not only to the Empire, Spain, and Holland; but likewiſe to England: But, as the demands of the French were ſtill ſo high, that there was no proſpect of a juſt peace, theſe offers were rejected [x].

London, Decemb. 19. O. S. 1693.

SIR,

The deſolation this preſent war carries into moſt parts of Europe, together with the duty incumbent on a chriſtian king, to apply all the remedies, that lie in his power, to ſo general a calamity, oblige the king of Denmark, my maſter, to impart to your majeſty theſe propoſals of peace, which the moſt chriſtian king has communicated to him. My maſter might have reaſon to decline his offices towards the peace of Europe, and taking upon him ſo important a negotiation, ſince the advances he has already made, as well as the king of Sweden, have not only proved ineffectual, but likewiſe been ſo miſconſtrued, as to render them ſuſpected. Nevertheleſs, it is moſt evident, that without any proſpect of private intereſt (the union of the northern crowns, for the ſecurity of the trade of their reſpective ſubjects, being ſo well eſtabliſhed, and enjoying the privileges of neutrality, that the continuation of the war might very much increaſe the riches of their majeſties dominions) the public welfare of Europe, and the deſire to ſee a juſt and laſting peace reſtored, have prevailed above all other conſiderations. Wherefore the king, my maſter, has repreſented to the moſt chriſtian king, that the propoſals, which he has made hitherto towards a general peace, have been looked upon by the confederates rather as a means to diſunite them, and to cruſh and ſubdue them one after another, than as a mark of his ſincere intentions of ſettling the public repoſe. But his moſt chriſtian majeſty, to remove all manner of diſtruſt, has not only, by repeated proteſtations, aſſured the king my maſter of the ſincerity of his ſentiments in this affair, but has likewiſe delivered a project of a general peace, and added to the conditions, that concern the empire, and which are already known to your majeſty, ſome others relating to the reſt of the allies, which are comprehended in the following heads:

I. That, notwithſtanding the advantages his arms have gained this campaign, no alterations ſhall be made in the conditions his moſt chriſtian majeſty has already offered to the emperor, the princes and ſtates of the empire, and the dukes of Lorrain and Savoy.

II. His majeſty ſhall reſtore to the catholic king the important place of Roſes, that of Belvers, and whatever has been conquered in Catalonia during the preſent war.

III. Towards the forming a barrier in the Low-Countries, which may remove all jealouſy and uneaſineſs from the ſtates of Holland, his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhall, upon that conſideration, reſtore the places of Mons and Namur to the king of Spain, and cauſe Charleroy to be razed.

IV. His ſaid majeſty ſhall reſtore to the biſhop of Liege the town and caſtle of Huy, and recompenſe him for Dinant and Bouillon, by annexing upon that account to his biſhopric ſuch a portion of the country of Luxemburg, as ſhall be moſt convenient to that biſhop, and judged equivalent by arbitrators.

V. His majeſty conſents, that the treaty of commerce made at Nimeguen with the ſtates be renewed without any alteration.

VI. His majeſty thinks the ſtates of Holland will be glad to obtain ſuch important reſtitutions, and to put an end to the war by a peace ſo advantageous both to Spain and all the allies, eſpecially after the proſperous campaigns of France, which may be ſtill attended with others no leſs ſucceſsful. But that neither Holland, nor any other ſtate of Europe, may have any ground of apprehenſion, that, upon pretence of new rights his majeſty will extend the boundaries of his dominions in the Low-Countries, beyond what ſhall be regulated by the treaty, his majeſty declares, that, in caſe the king of Spain dies without iſſue, he conſents, that the Low-Countries fall to the ſhare of the duke of Bavaria, upon condition, that the emperor makes the ſame declaration. And his majeſty ſhall, as well for himſelf, as for the Dauphin his ſon, confirm the ſaid renunciation by all the formalities neceſſary for that purpoſe, in behalf of his electoral highneſs.

His moſt chriſtian majeſty hopes, that this laſt engagement will, more than any thing beſides, ſecure to the confederates the firmneſs of the peace they ſhall make with him. And he thinks, that, after ſo advantageous propoſals, the world will ſoon know, whether Europe may hope to ſee the public tranquillity reſtored, or whether the preparations of war are to be renewed.

This, ſir, is what the moſt chriſtian king has communicated to the king my maſter, and which his majeſty has commanded me to impart to you. He does in no manner pretend to preſcribe rules to your majeſty, ſince your prudence will beſt judge what is moſt for your glory and intereſt; but however, he thinks theſe propoſals deſerve a ſerious conſideration. And, becauſe there is no mention made of England, the king, my maſter, has made it already his buſineſs to incline the moſt chriſtian king not to inſiſt upon that, which might put a ſtop to the general peace. In the mean time the king, my maſter, thinks it neceſſary, that, in order to advance a work ſo profitable and beneficial to all Europe, a negotiation be ſet on foot. And his majeſty is the more confirmed in this opinion, by reaſon the winter will ſoon be over, and that it is to be feared, leſt by laying till the next campaign an opportunity be given to France, either of enlarging her conqueſts, or by a powerful irruption into Germany, and the ſuperiority of her forces, to divide the confederacy; which would give a juſt pretence to that crown of recalling the offers ſhe has already made, and render a peace very difficult, if not altogether impoſſible. The king, my maſter, does not only offer to become guarantee with all the princes and potentates, that will concur with him, but likewiſe to unite himſelf in particular with your majeſty by a moſt ſtrict and indiſſoluble alliance.

Upon the whole matter, the king, my maſter, is perſuaded, that nobody has more reaſon to contribute to this peace, than your majeſty, ſince it will confirm to you the glory and advantages you have gained during the war; and will beſides make Europe to be eternally beholden to your majeſty for the peace ſhe groans after. If your majeſty thinks, that there is any thing defective, in relation to the ſecurity of the peace, or that wants to be either altered or explained, the king, my maſter, engages to procure to your majeſty all the ſatisfaction imaginable; and, if you are pleaſed to confide in his mediation, he will manage it to your majeſty's entire ſatisfaction. Laſtly, the king, my maſter, has commanded me to aſſure your majeſty, that, being, upon ſeveral accounts, concerned in the proſperity of your royal family, he will, to the utmoſt of his power, promote its intereſt and advantage, and deſires your majeſty to be perſuaded, that all the advances he has made in this affair have no other aim, and are grounded upon no other principle.

Theſe

Affairs in Scotland grew more and more out of joint. Many, whom the king had truſted in the miniſtry there, were thought enemies to him and his government; and ſome took ſo little care to conceal their inclinations, that, when an invaſion was looked for, they ſeemed reſolved to join in it. They were taken out of a plot, which was managed by perſuading many to take oaths to the government, on deſign to betray it; and were now truſted with the moſt important poſts. The preſbyterians began to ſee their error, in driving matters ſo far, and in provoking the king ſo much; and they ſeemed deſirous to recover his favour, and to manage their matters with more temper. The king came likewiſe to ſee, that he had been a little too ſudden in truſting ſome, who did not deſerve his confidence. Duke Hamilton had for ſome years withdrawn from buſineſs; but he was now prevailed with to return to council; many letters were intercepted between France and Scotland: In thoſe from Scotland, the eaſineſs of engaging that nation was often repeated, if no time were loſt; it ſeemed therefore neceſſary to bring that kingdom into a better ſtate.

A ſeſſion of parliament was held there*, which, on the 18th of April, was opened with a ſpeech by the duke of Hamilton, his majeſty's commiſſioner, and another by the earl of Tweedale, the lord chancellor of that kingdom; after which the king's letter was read, which exhorted that aſſembly to union; to which letter they returned a very dutiful anſwer.

On the 25th of that month, the committee, appointed to conſider of the ſecurity of the nation, voted, that four new regiments of foot, and two of horſe, ſhould be immediately raiſed, to make up the forces then ſubſiſting in that kingdom ſix thouſand men, without reckoning thoſe on the Engliſh eſtabliſhment; and that for maintaining them, and defraying other public expences, a ſupply ſhould be given their majeſties of 114,000l. ſterling, to be raiſed in eighteen months.

The parliament was engaged the ſame day in a debate about their abſent members; and as it appeared, that ſeveral had never come to the houſe ſince the convention had been turned into a parliament, and had neither taken the oath of fidelity to their majeſties, nor the aſſurance (which latter was an abjuration of the late king James) it was reſolved and declared, that their places were void; that new elections ſhould be made in their ſtead; and that fines ſhould be ſet upon thoſe abſentees. With regard to other members, who had taken the oath of fidelity, but not the aſſurance, they were ſummoned to appear in parliament by the 15th of May, and to take the aſſurance; and in default thereof, to be dealt with as the others. And laſtly, as the heretors or freeholders of the ſhire of Angus, out of their diſaffection to the government, had hitherto refuſed to chuſe members to be ſent to parliament, it was reſolved, that the ſaid heretors ſhould be cited before the parliament on the 15th of May, to ſhew why they had omitted to chuſe their members.

Secretary Johnſton likewiſe laid before a private committee an information, which he had received of dangerous practices againſt the government, and how the late endeavours to alter the magiſtracy of Edinburgh were concerted by the enemies of the government; and he produced proofs of the ſame, and of the deſigned invaſion the laſt year.

The Scots parliament proceeded to augment their tax, ſo as to proportion it to the maintenance of ſix thouſand three hundred men; to ſupply the magazines of the kingdom with arms and ſtores, and to ſatisfy the country for their arrears of quarters; ſo that the whole ſum then given amounted to 156,000l. to be raiſed in eighteen months, upon theſe branches, viz. 48,000l. by a poll, 45,000l. by an exciſe on beer and malt, and by continuing the ceſs upon land, which was then to laſt ſeven months and an half, to ten months and an half beyond that term, 63,000l.

The committee for the ſecurity of the kingdom, who had before them ſeveral intercepted letters and papers, relating to dangerous deſigns and practices againſt the peace of the kingdom, having made their report to the parliament, it was reſolved, that there were ſufficient proofs to evince, that a deſign was carried on both there and in France, for invading the nation with foreign force; and that, in order thereunto, there were eſtabliſhed correſpondencies and concerts; and that aſſurances had been given both at home and abroad, for effecting ſuch a deſign, which had lately proceeded ſo far, that declarations were concerted for that purpoſe, and the raiſing of men, and naming of officers to command them, were reſolved; as alſo reconciliations made amongſt the different parties of the diſaffected; and the proofs were plain, that the late king James's intereſt was at the bottom of the late debates concerning the elections at Edinburgh; with regard to which, king James had been deſired to interpoſe his authority by letters. In the debate of this vote it was endeavoured to divide it into queſtions, and to ſeparate the latter part, which related to the magiſtracy of Edinburgh, from the former part of deſigns in general; but, the houſe reſerving that upon the previous queſtions by three to one, the main queſtion was carried without any diviſion.

The whole Preſbyterian party in Scotland was now again entire in the king's intereſt. The matters of the church were brought to more temper than was expected. The epiſcopal clergy had more moderate terms offered them; they were only required to make an addreſs to the general aſſembly, offering to ſubſcribe to a confeſſion of faith, and to acknowledge preſbytery to be the only government of that church, with a promiſe to ſubmit to it; upon which, within a fortnight after they did that, if no manner of ſcandal was objected to them, the aſſembly was either to receive them into the government of the church, or, if they could not be brought to that, the king was to take them into his protection, and maintain them in their churches, without any dependence upon the preſbytery. This was a ſtrain of moderation, that the preſbyterians were not eaſily brought to. A ſubſcription, that owned preſbytery to be the only legal government of that church, without owning any divine right in it, was far below their uſual pretenſions. And this act veſted the king with an authority very like that, which they uſed to condemn as Eraſtianiſm. Another act was alſo paſſed, requiring all perſons in any office of the church or ſtate to take, beſides the oath of allegiance, a declaration called 'the Aſſurance,' owning the king and queen to be their righful and lawful ſovereigns, and promiſing fidelity to them againſt king James and all his adherents. This council was alſo empowered to tender theſe, as they ſhould ſee cauſe for it, and to fine and impriſon ſuch as ſhould refuſe them.

When the ſeſſion was near at an end, Nevil Payne was brought before the parliament to be examined, upon the many letters, which had been intercepted. There was a full evidence againſt him in many of his own letters; but he ſent word to ſeveral of the lords, and in particular to the duke of Hamilton, that, as long as his life was his own, he would accuſe none; but that he was reſolved he would not die, ſince he could diſcover enough to deſerve his pardon. This ſtruck ſuch a terror into many of them, whoſe ſons and near relations had been concerned with him, that, he moving for a delay, on pretence of ſome witneſſes, who were not then at hand, a time was given him beyond the continuance of the ſeſſion, by which he eſcaped, and that inquiry was ſuppreſſed.

The ſeſſion ended calmly; but the king ſeemed to have forgot Scotland ſo entirely, that he let three months go over, before he took notice of any of their petitions. And though he had aſked, and had ſupplies for an augmentation of forces, and many had been gained to conſent to the tax by the hope of commiſſions in the troops, that were levied, yet the king did not raiſe any new ones, but applied the ſupply to other uſes. This began to raiſe an ill humour, which had been almoſt quite laid aſide in the whole courſe of this ſeſſion, which was thought a reconciling one. The epiſcopal clergy let ſlip the day prefixed for making their ſubmiſſion to the aſſembly, and did not take the oaths; for which reaſon they could claim no benefit by the acts that had been carried in their favour, not without ſome difficulty. And the law which was intended to ſave them, did now expoſe them to ruin, ſince by it they, not taking the oaths, had loſt their legal rights to their benefices. However, they were ſuffered to continue in them, and were put in hope, that the king would protect them, though it was now againſt law. They were alſo made to believe, that the king did not deſire, that they ſhould take the oaths, or make any ſubmiſſion to preſbytery. And it is certain, that no public ſignification of his majeſty's mind was made to them; ſo that they were eaſily impoſed upon by ſurmiſes and whiſpers; and upon this the diſtractions grew up afreſh. Many concluded there, as well as in England, that the king's heart led him ſtill to court his enemies, even after all the manifeſt reaſons, which he had to

to conclude, that the ſteps they had made towards him were only feigned ſubmiſſions to gain ſuch a confidence, as might put it in their power to deliver him up.

The earl of Middleton had gone over to France in the beginning of this year; and it was believed, that he was ſent by a great body of men, with a propoſition, which, had he had the aſſurance to have made, and the court of St. Germains the wiſdom to have accepted, might have much increaſed the factions and jealouſies of the nation. It was, that king James ſhould offer to reſign his title in favour of his ſon; and likewiſe to ſend him to be bred up in England, under the direction of a parliament, till he ſhould he of age. But it is not known, whether the earl ever ventured upon this advice; but in another he ſucceeded better. When king James thought the invaſion from Normandy, the former year, was ſo well laid, that he ſeemed not to apprehend it could miſcarry, he had prepared a declaration, of which ſome copies were brought over. He promiſed nothing in it, and pardoned no body by it, but ſpoke in the ſtyle of a conqueror, who thought he was maſter, and therefore would limit himſelf by no promiſes, but ſuch as were conceived in general words, which might be afterwards expounded at pleaſure. This was much blamed, even by his own party, who thought, that they themſelves were not enough ſecured by ſo looſe a declaration; and therefore the earl of Middleton, upon his going over, procured one of another ſtrain, which, as far as words could go, gave all content; for king James promiſed every thing, and pardoned all perſons. His party got this into their hands, and they waited for a fit occaſion to publiſh it to the nation.

A parliament had been ſummoned in Ireland, by the lord Sidney; but they met full of diſcontent, and were diſpoſed to find fault with every thing: and there was too much matter to work upon; for the lord lieutenant was apt to excuſe and juſtify thoſe, who had the addreſs to inſinuate themſelves into his favour: ſo that they were diſmiſſed, before they had brought their bills to perfection. The Engliſh in Ireland thought the government favoured the Iriſh too much; ſome ſaid this was the effect of bribery, whereas others thought it was neceſſary to keep them ſafe, from the proſecutions of the Engliſh, who hated them, and were much ſharpened againſt them. The protecting the Iriſh was indeed in ſome ſort neceſſary, to keep them from breaking out, or running over to the French; but it was very plain, that the Iriſh were ſtill enemies to the Engliſh nation, and to the preſent government: ſo that all kindneſs ſhewed them, beyond what was due in ſtrict juſtice, was the cheriſhing an inveterate enemy. There were alſo great complaints of an ill adminiſtration, chiefly in the revenue, in the pay of the army, and in the embezzling of ſtores. Of theſe, much noiſe was made in England, which (as has been related) drew addreſſes fram both houſes of parliament to the king, which were invidiouſly penned; every particular being ſeverely aggravated. Upon this the king recalled the lord Sidney, (who was made maſter of the ordnance) and put the government of Ireland into three lords juſtices; lord Capel, ſir Cyril Wyche, and Mr. William Duncomb, who had lately been envoy extraordinary in Sweden. When they were ſent from court, the queen did very earneſtly recommend to their care, the reforming of many diſorders, that were prevailing in that kingdom: for neither had the late deſtructive war, out of which they were but beginning to recover themſelves, nor their poverty, produced thoſe effects that might have been expected.

The queen taking into conſideration, that the great ſcarcity and exceſſive price of corn in France, invited the exportation of it from this kingdom thither, whereby not only her enemies were ſupplied, but her own ſubjects might be expoſed to want, ſhe iſſued out a proclamation for preventing the exportation of corn to France, and enhancing the price of it at home; and, becauſe by this further command the poor were like to become ſufferers, ſhe at the ſame time ordered all the laws in force for ſetting them at work to be effectually put in execution.

In October, the king arrived at the Hague from Loo, and prevailed with the ſtates of Holland to agree to the raiſing of fifteen thouſand men for augmenting the land forces; and likewiſe to the addition of a conſiderable number of ſh ps to their navy; for which he thanked them in their public aſſembly. The king, having waited almoſt a month for a fair wind, embarked at laſt on the 28th of October, landed at Harwich on the 29th, and on the 30th arrived at Kenſington.

The parliament being met on the 7th of November, purſuant to the laſt prorogation, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am always glad to meet you here, and I could heartily wiſh, that our ſatisfaction were not leſſened at preſent, by reflecting upon the diſadvantages we have received this year at land, and the miſcarriages in our affairs at ſea. I think it is evident, that the former was only occaſioned by the great number of our enemies, which exceeded ours in all places. For what relates to the latter, which has brought ſo great a diſgrace upon the nation, I have reſented it extremely; and as I will take care, that thoſe, who have not done their duty, ſhall be puniſhed, ſo I am reſolved to uſe my utmoſt endeavours, that our power at ſea may be rightly managed for the future. And it will well deſerve your conſideration, whether we are not defective both in the number of our ſhipping, and in proper ports to the weſtward, for the better annoying our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is ſo eſſential to the welfare of this kingdom.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am very ſenſible of the good affection, wherewith you have always aſſiſted me to ſupport the charges of the war, which have been very great; and yet I am perſuaded, that the experience of this ſummer is ſufficient to convince us all, that, to arrive at a good end of it, there will be a neceſſity of increaſing our forces both by ſea and land the next year. Our allies have reſolved to add to theirs; and I will not doubt, but you will have ſuch regard to the preſent exigency, as that you will give me a ſuitable ſupply to inable me to do the like. I muſt therefore earneſtly recommend it to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, to take ſuch timely reſolutions, as that your ſupplies may be effectual, and our preparations ſo forward, as will be neceſſary both for the ſecurity and the honour of the nation."

In anſwer to this ſpeech the commons unanimouſly reſolved, that they would 'ſupport their majeſties and their government,' and grant a ſufficient ſupply for the vigorous proſecution of the war. But the firſt thing they did was to inquire into the miſcarriages of the fleet the laſt ſummer, and to take into their conſideration the preſervation of the trade of the nation. Some time having been ſpent in examining the inſtructions and orders given to the fleet; the number of ſhips for the line of battle, and of the convoys and cruiſers; the admirals, who commanded both, and the reſults of the ſeveral councils of war held by them; the commons reſolved, on the 17th of November, "that it was their opinion, that there had been a notorious and treacherous miſmanagement in the miſcarriage of the Smyrna fleet." Their next inquiry was, "Why the Streights fleet was ſtopped till the main fleet went out?" and then, Why the main fleet did not convoy ſir George Rooke's ſquadron, and the merchant-ſhips, out of danger of the French?" And it being alledged, that the main fleet was not ſufficiently victualled, the commons examined the ſtate of the victualling the fleet at its ſailing from Spithead, and thereupon reſolved, on the 27th of November, "That there was ſufficient beer on board the main fleet, when ſir George Rooke ſeparated, to have convoyed his ſquadron, and the merchant-ſhips out of danger of the Breſt fleet." Two days after the queſtion being put, "That it did appear to that houſe, that the admirals, that commanded the fleet the laſt ſummer, had, on the 11th of May laſt, information, that part of the Breſt fleet was going out to ſea," it paſſed in the negative. And on the 6th of December another queſtion being put, "That the admirals, by not ſending into Breſt, for intelligence, before they left the Streights ſquadron, were guilty of a high breach of the truſt, that was repoſed in them, to the great loſs and diſhonour of the nation," it was likewiſe carried in the negative by a hundred and eighty-five againſt a hundred and ſeventy-five.

The houſe of lords likewiſe took into conſideration this affair, and after hearing the admirals, and reading the letters and orders in relation to it, reſolved, on the 10th of January, "that the admirals, who commanded the fleet laſt ſummer, had done well in the execution of the orders they received;"

though ſome lords entered their proteſt [y]. There was likewiſe a conference between the two houſes on the ſame ſubject [z].

Before this inquiry in parliament, the admirals had been examined at the council-board; but nothing could be made to appear to the prejudice of their honour, only ſome flying reports, which gave occaſion to this order of council on the 25th of October: "Whereas a report has been raiſed and ſpread by Henry Killegrew, ſir Ralph Delaval, and ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, admirals of their majeſties fleet, that the right honourable the lord viſcount Falkland, one of the lords of their majeſties moſt honourable privy-council, did, upon reading a paper at the board, ſtifle ſomething, that was material to their juſtification, the lords of the council having conſidered of and examined into the matter, are ſatisfied, and do declare, that the ſaid report is falſe and ſcandalous; although, upon the ſaid examination it did alſo appear, that ſomething happened, which might miſlead the admirals into that error. And it is ordered in council, that this be printed and publiſhed in the gazette." [a]

A bill 'for the more frequent elections of parliaments' having, after the third reading, been rejected by the commons on the 28th of November, another bill to the ſame purpoſe was ſent down to them by the lords, which being read the third time, was likewiſe rejected.

The commons, having unanimouſly voted a ſupply for the vigorous proſecution of the war, agreed, on the 25th of November, "that the ſum of 500,000l. be raiſed towards the diſcharging the wages due to the ſeamen; and that a farther ſum of two millions be granted to their majeſties, in full, for the maintenance of the fleet, including the ordnance, by reaſon of the revenue now falling ſhort." As for the army, the commons, having examined the offenſive treaties and alliances, which the king was now under with the confederates, and the proportions of forces that the confederates were obliged to make for the carrying on this preſent war, unanimouſly reſolved, on the 20th of December, That the number of the land forces in their majeſties pay be increaſed, by the raiſing ſix new regiments of Engliſh horſe, four new regiments of Engliſh dragoons, and fifteen new regiments of Engliſh foot, to be commanded by officers, who were their majeſties natural born ſubjects: That eighty-three thouſand one hundred and twenty-one men, including commiſſion and non-commiſſion officers, were neceſſary for the ſervice of the year 1694, to be employed in England, and beyond the ſeas: And that the ſum of two millions, five hundred and thirty-five thouſand, five hundred and ninety pounds be granted for the maintenance of the land-forces [b]. They alſo gave 118,000l. to make good the annuity deficiency, and 293,692l. to make good the deficiency of the poll-bill. Thus the ſupplies, given for the ſervice of the year 1694, amounted to near five millions and a half, which were raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, by two more lives in the annuities, by a further exciſe on beer, and a duty upon ſalt [c].

[y] It was as follows:

1. Whereas by an order of the admiralty, bearing date the 19th of May laſt, the admirals were to direct ſir George Rooke, that, after their parting with him, he ſhould ſteer ſuch a courſe for his paſſage to Cadiz, as ſhould be thought moſt ſafe by a council of war, with relation as well to the Breſt fleet, if gone out to ſea, as the Thoulon ſquadron; it does not appear to us, that there has been any council of war from the 22d of May to the 4th of June, which was the day the ſignals were given for their parting from the Streights fleet; which laſt council of war was not called till after the ſignals for parting were given, and occaſioned by the accident of the Turkey fleet's being becalmed.

2. That though it does appear by the reſult of the council of war the 4th of June, that they had no intelligence where the enemy was; yet notwithſtanding we do not find in that council, it was ſo much as propoſed, how to get intelligence where the Breſt fleet was, purſuant to the order of the admiralty of the 19th.

3 We conceive it to be the duty of an admiral or general to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to diſcover the motions of an enemy, without an order from his ſuperiors, and much more when he has one.

4. Their not ſending one or more good ſailors to find out if the French fleet were ſailed from Breſt, as alſo what courſe they ſteered, ſo as to give intelligence to our main fleet, at a ſtation appointed, before they parted with ſir George Rooke, was, as we conceive, the chief cauſe of the misfortune, that happened to the Turkey fleet.

5. It appears by the admiral's own letters to the Admiralty of the 14th of July and 18th of September laſt, that, at a council of war held on the 22d of May, they were of opinion, that that part of the Admiralty's orders of the 19th, which related to the courſe ſir George Rooke was to ſteer, was unreaſonable and impracticable; yet they did not ſend up to have it explained, though the fleet did not ſail till the 30th. This looks as if they rather deſigned an artificial excuſe for doing nothing, than the diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in them.

6. That ſir George Rooke's narrative, which might have given a farther light to the inquiry into the admirals conduct laſt ſummer, was not allowed to be read.

7. This vote ſeems to approve of the behaviour of the admirals in the laſt ſummer expedition, which differs as we conceive, from the opinion the the greateſt part of Europe has of it, and may be of ill conſequence, by giving our allies no very fair proſpect of better ſucceſs.

8. Becauſe by this vote is prevented any further inquiry into the laſt year's miſcarriage relating to the admirals, if any new matter ſhould ariſe from new evidence; and it may ſtop any proſecution of the king's in caſe he ſhould proceed further in this affair.

Pr. H. L. I. 422.

[z] On the 16th of January a conference having been deſired by the lords, colonel Granville reported from the committee appointed to attend it, that the duke of Bolton managed for the lords, and acquainted them, that the lords having had laid before them by the earl of Nottingham an extract of a letter dated from Paris June 1ſt N. S. received May the 30th O. S. 1693, as follows:

"There are ſixty-eight ſhips, in which there are thirty thouſand one hundred and eighteen men, and four thouſand eight hundred and ſeventy-ſix guns.

"We have news ſince, that this fleet was ſailed, and was out of ſight."

And whereas upon an addreſs to the king, that ſuch lords, as are of the privy-council, may have permiſſion from his majeſty to acquaint the houſe; when the intelligence of the French fleet's ſailing from Breſt was communicated to the admirals of the fleet:

Thereupon ſeveral of thoſe lords informed the houſe, that the ſaid letter was laid before the committee of the council; and, that it was taken for granted, that the intelligence therein was ſent to the admirals of the fleet; but it not appearing clearly, whether it was ſo communicated or not, their lordſhips deſired of the houſe of commons to inquire, by the moſt proper methods, of the members of that houſe, who were of the privy-council, whether this intelligence, of the French fleet's being ſailed out of Breſt, was communicated to the ſaid admirals, and when it was ſo communicated. Accordingly an humble addreſs was voted, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to command, that a copy of the ſaid letter might be laid before the houſe; and likewiſe that his majeſty would permit ſuch members of the houſe, as were of his privy-council, to acquaint the houſe what intelligence was received of the French fleet's ſailing from Breſt, and whether, and when the ſaid intelligence was communicated to the ſaid admirals.

On the 10th of February, Mr. ſecretary Trenchard, according to order, preſented to the houſe of commons an account in writing of the ſaid letter and intelligence; viz. That he believed, the earl of Nottingham did, on May 31, bring to a committee of council a letter from Paris, dated June 1, N. S. and received May 30, O. S. an extract of which the lords had communicated to the houſe; but he did not remember, that this letter was publickly read at the committee: though ſeveral lords might read it ſingly; but that, it remained in the hands of the earl of Nottingham, there being no reſolution taken at the ſaid council, that the ſaid letter ſhould be communicated to the admirals of the fleet. That, to the beſt of his remembrance, a liſt of the French fleet, being part of the ſaid letter, was the ſame day ſent to him by the earl of Nottingham; a copy of which liſt he ſent to the admirals as appeared by comparing it with the papers delivered by them into the houſe. That the ſame day there came a letter from Scilly, dated May 7th, with advice, that the French fleet was ſeen off that iſland; which letter being publickly read at the committee, a copy thereof, together with the above-mentioned liſt, was immediately by two expreſſes ſent to the admirals of the fleet, and were received by them. It was reſolved therefore by the houſe of commons, that the ſame be communicated to the lords at a conference; which was done accordingly. But it does not appear that it was attended with any extraordinary conſequences.

[a] Biſhop Burnet ſays, the inquiry into the conduct at ſea, particularly, with relation to the Smyrna fleet, took up much time, and held long: Great exceptions were taken to the many delays, by which it ſeemed a train was laid, that they ſhould not get out of our ports, till the French were ready to lie in their way, and intercept them; our want of intelligence was much complained of: The inſtructions that the admirals, who commanded the fleet, had received from the cabinet council, were thought ill given, and yet worſe executed; their orders ſeemed weakly drawn, ambiguous, and defective: Nor had they ſhewed any zeal in doing more, than ſtrictly to obey ſuch orders: They had very cautiouſly kept within them, and had been very careful never to exceed them in a tittle: They had uſed no diligence to get certain information concerning the French fleet, whether it was ſtill in Breſt, or had ſailed out: but, in that important matter, they had truſted general and uncertain reports too eaſily: Nor had they ſailed with Rooke, till he was paſt danger. To all this their anſwer was, that they had obſerved their orders; they had reaſon to think the French were ſtill in Breſt; that therefore it was not ſafe to ſail too far from the coaſt of England, when they had (as they underſtood) ground to believe, that they had left behind them a great naval force, which might make an impreſſion on our coaſt, when they were at too great a diſtance from it; the getting certain intelligence from Breſt, was repreſented as impracticable. They had many ſpecious things to ſay in their own defence, and many friends to ſupport them; for it was now the buſineſs of one party to accuſe, and of another to juſtify that conduct. In concluſion, there was not ground ſufficient to condemn the admirals; as they had followed their inſtructions: So a vote paſſed in their favour. II. 125.

[b] Namely, 210,773l. for the office of ordnance, 31,808l. for the pay of the general officers; 11,060l. for levy-money; 40,808l. for the tranſports; 147,000l. for hoſpitals and contingencies; and 1,990,781l. for the pay of the horſe, dragoons, and foot.

[c] For every gallon of foreign ſalt imported, above the former duties 3d. and of Engliſh ſalt 1d. The rates upon beer, ale, and other liquors, were one moiety more than had been granted by the laſt additional duties before. This duty upon liquors was now given for ſixteen years; that upon ſalt for three years. The advances of theſe duties were to be repaid in the ſixteen years by way of annuities for that time. A poll-tax was alſo paſſed; and an act for granting ſeveral rates and duties upon tonnage and poundage of ſhips and veſſels, and upon beer, ale, and other liquors. This exciſe to

The bill for rendering all members of the houſe of commons incapable of places of truſt and profit, which had been brought in the laſt ſeſſion, under the title of a bill 'touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament,' and after paſſing the commons had been rejected by the lords, was now again ſet on foot, and went through the lords as well as the commons; ſo that when the king came to the houſe of peers to paſs the land-tax, it lay ready for the royal aſſent, but the king thought fit to refuſe it. Upon this, the commons, the next day entering into a grand committee on the ſtate of the nation, agreed to the following reſolution, "That whoever adviſed the king not to give the royal aſſent to the act, which was to redreſs a grievance, and take off a ſcandal upon the proceedings of the commons in parliament, is an enemy to their majeſties and the kingdom; and that a repreſentation be made to the king to lay before him, how few inſtances have been in former reigns of denying the royal aſſent to bills for redreſs of grievances; and the grief of the commons for his not having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral public bills, and in particular to this bill which tends ſo much to the clearing the reputation of this houſe, after their having ſo freely voted to ſupply the public occaſions." And a committee being appointed to draw up the repreſentation, it was the day following reported to the houſe, when the two firſt paragraphs being exactly conformable to the vote, were agreed to, but the third rejected, which was as follows:

"We beg, ſir, you will be pleaſed to conſider us as anſwerable to thoſe we repreſent; and it is from your goodneſs we muſt expect arguments to ſoften to them, in ſome meaſure, the neceſſary hardſhips they are forced to undergo in this preſent conjuncture; and therefore humbly beſeech your majeſty, for the removing all jealouſies from your people, (without which the parliament will be unable to ſerve your majeſty, or to ſupport the government) to be pleaſed to follow the courſe of the beſt of your predeceſſors, and direct ſome expedient, whereby your majeſty, your parliament, and people, may reap the fruit deſigned by that bill, to which your majeſty, by ill advice, was pleaſed ſo lately to deny the royal aſſent."

Inſtead of which the following paragraph was agreed to:

"Upon theſe conſiderations we humble beſeech your majeſty to believe, that none can have ſo great a concern and intereſt in the proſperity and happineſs of your majeſty and your government, as your two houſes of parliament; and do therefore humbly pray, that, for the future, you would be graciouſly pleaſed to hearken to the advice of your parliament, and not to the ſecret advices of particular perſons, who may have private intereſts of their own, ſeparate from the true intereſt of your majeſty and your people."

To this addreſs, preſented by the whole houſe, the king was pleaſed to reply:

"Gentlemen, I am very ſenſible of the good offices you have expreſſed to me upon many occaſions, and the zeal you have ſhewn for our common intereſt; I ſhall make uſe of this opportunity to tell you, that no prince ever had a higher eſteem for the conſtitution of the Engliſh government than myſelf, and that I ſhall ever have a great regard for the advice of parliament.

"I am perſuaded, that nothing can ſo much conduce to the happineſs and welfare of this kingdom, as an entire confidence between the king and people, which I ſhall by all means endeavour to preſerve. And, I aſſure you, I ſhall look upon ſuch perſons, as my enemies, who ſhall adviſe any thing, that may leſſen it."

However kind this anſwer appeared, yet, as it was not thought to be direct, the commons proceeded to take it into conſideration, and the queſtion was put, 'That application be made to his majeſty for a farther anſwer,' but it paſſed in the negative by two hundred and twenty-nine againſt twenty-eight.

The Eaſt-India company having, on the 11th of November, 1693, obtained a new charter, whereby they were empowered to raiſe the ſum of ſeven hundred forty-four thouſand pounds, to be added to their general joint-ſtock, the ſubſcription of each perſon not exceeding ten thouſand pounds; ſeveral merchants and others, on the 7th of December, petitioned the commons for erecting a new Eaſt-India company. Upon which the houſe examined the charters of the old company, the books of the new ſubſcriptions, the ſtate of their preſent ſtock, and the petition abovementioned, and after mature deliberation reſolved, on the 19th of January, "That all the ſubjects of England have equal right to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, unleſs prohibited by act of parliament." And this gave occaſion to the creating of a new Eaſt-India company, more to the diviſion of the merchants, than to the benefit of trade.

On the 16th of December the earl of Bellamont having preſented to the commons articles of impeachment againſt Thomas lord Coningſby and ſir Charles Porter, two of the late lords juſtices of Ireland, but the commons after ſeveral debates agreed, "That, conſidering the ſtate of affairs in Ireland at that time, the houſe did not think fit to ground an impeachment againſt the lord Coningſby and ſir Charles Porter for the matters charged upon them," Accordingly, the lord Coningſby and ſir Charles Porter were reſtored to their places in the houſe.

The humour of the nation running at this time upon lotteries, ſome members of the houſe of commons contrived to raiſe that way a million for the government. This deſign having been propoſed to and approved by the houſe, it was reſolved, 1. "That a fund of 140,000l. per annum be raiſed and veſted in their majeſties for the term of ſixteen years, for recompenſing ſuch perſons, as ſhould advance the ſum of one million. 2. That the impoſitions, lately reſolved by the houſe to be laid upon ſalt, be part of the ſaid fund. 3. That, towards the further anſwering of the ſaid 140,000l. per annum, one moiety of the duties of exciſe, granted to their majeſties, by an act made in the ſecond year of their reign, be granted and continued to their majeſties after the monies charged upon the ſaid duties ſhould be ſatisfied. And, 4. That a bill be brought in upon the ſaid reſolutions." Which was accordingly done, and the bill received the royal aſſent.

While the commons were debating of the ſupplies, the commiſſioners, whom they had appointed 'for taking the public accounts,' having laid before the houſe an account of what money had been paid for ſecret ſervice, and to members of parliament, out of the public revenue, it was reſolved, "That the lord viſcount Falkland, a member of that houſe, by begging and receiving two thouſand pounds from his majeſty, contrary to the ordinary method of iſſuing and beſtowing the king's money, was guilty of a high miſdemeanor and breach of truſt; and that he be committed to the Tower of London, during the pleaſure of the houſe." He was two days after diſcharged upon petition.

The king, being impatient for the diſpatch of what buſineſs lay before the parliament, came to the houſe of peers on the 8th of February, and, paſſing ſome bills, made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, earneſtly recommending to them the finiſhing of thoſe affairs which they had under their deliberation, and particularly the diſcharging of the debt for tranſport-ſhips, which were uſed in the reduction of Ireland. All the money-bills being paſſed, and the king deſirous of beginning an early campaign, he came again to the houſe of peers on the 25th of April, and cloſed the ſeſſion with this ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"THE proof you have given of your affection to me, and the zeal you have expreſſed for the government, oblige me to return you thanks before I put an end to this ſeſſion; and, in particular, to thank you gentlemen of the houſe of commons, for the large ſupplies you have provided to carry on the war.

"I will endeavour to do my part; and it is from the bleſſing of God, that we muſt all expect ſuch ſucceſs as may anſwer our deſires.

My lords and gentlemen,

"The poſture of affairs making it neceſſary for me to be abſent for ſome time out of this kingdom, I recommend it to

to be one moiety of the additional exciſe before granted, and expiring in the year 1697. There was alſo an act for duties upon vellum, parchment, and paper for four years. The ſeveral ſtamps were, 40s. 5s. 2s. and 6d. 1s. 6d. and 1d. every ſheet or ſkin uſed, to be ſo ſtamped, and to pay. Another act was for licenſing and regulating hackney and ſtage coaches. By it ſeven hundred hackney coaches to be licenſed, and 50l. to be paid for a licence to be good twenty-one years, beſides 4l. a year each coach; ſtage-coaches to be licenſed but for one year, and to pay 8l. for a licence.

you, that in your ſeveral ſtations you be careful to preſerve the public peace."

Then the lord-keeper, by his majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the 18th of September following.

The moſt material acts paſſed this ſeſſion were:

1. An act for repealing a clauſe in the ſtatute of 34 and 35 of Henry VIII, by which juſtices of the peace in Wales were limited to eight in each county. By this act as many juſtices may be appointed as the king pleaſes.

2. An act to prevent diſputes and controverſies concerning royal mines. By this act, all proprietors of copper, tin, iron, or lead mines, ſhall hold the ſame, notwithſtanding ſuch mines ſhall be claimed to be royal mines. Only the ore of ſuch mines (except tin-ore in Cornwal and Devonſhire) may be demanded by the king, and all claiming royal mines under him, at the following rates: copper-ore waſhed, 16l. the tun. Tin-ore waſhed, 40s. the tun. Iron-ore the ſame. Lead-ore waſhed, 9l. the tun. In default of payment, the proprietors may diſpoſe of the ore.

3. An act for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London. The city, it ſeems, by reaſon of ſundry accidents and public calamities, being now become indebted to the orphans and other creditors for principal money and intereſt thereof, in a much greater ſum than they were able to pay, the parliament, on the petition of the lord-mayor, &c. enabled them, by this act, to ſettle a fund for raiſing money, to pay the yearly intereſt at four per cent. for the whole debt. The fund conſiſts of ſeveral branches, particularly, a rent charge of 8000l. a year, upon all the revenues of the city: 2000l. a year upon perſonal eſtates, within the city: 600l. a year, out of the profits of the convex-lights; 4d. a chaldron upon coals: 4s. a tun upon wines, &c.[d] This bill had miſcarried in ſeveral ſeſſions, but now found a very quick paſſage, through the commons, the reaſon of which will but too plainly appear in the next ſeſſion of the parliament.

During the ſeſſion, the town was entertained with the trial of a cauſe in Weſtminſter-Hall. The duke of Norfolk, bearing with impatience the ſuſpected commerce, which Mr. Jermaine had maintained with his ducheſs, had the laſt winter lodged a bill of divorce in the houſe of peers; but their lordſhips, being unwilling to proceed in that affair before there were ſome proofs of the facts made in the courſe of the common law, his grace thereupon brought an action of adultery againſt Mr. Jermaine before the court of King's-Bench. The cauſe was tried on the 24th of November, and, upon a full hearing of many obſcene evidences, the jury found for the plaintiff, and allowed his grace one hundred marks damages, with coſts of court; where the ſlightneſs of the ſatisfaction was almoſt as great a reproach as the crime itſelf.

Towards the middle of November, captain Bembow bombarded St. Malo four days ſucceſſively, though without any great ſucceſs, having only deſtroyed ſome few houſes, and thrown down part of the town-wall. But in the end of February arrived the melancholy news, that a fleet of merchant-ſhips under a convoy of men of war, commanded by ſir Francis Wheeler (who had been ſent the laſt year on a fruitleſs expedition to the Weſt-Indies) having ſailed on the 17th of that month from Gibraltar, up the Streights, met the next day with a moſt violent ſtorm, which continued all that day, and the following night, ſo that on the 19th, about five in the morning, ſir Francis's own ſhip, the Suſſex, was foundered, and himſelf, with all his men, except two Moors, drowned; the Cambridge and Lumley-Caſtle men of war, the Serpent bomb-ſketch, and the Mary ketch, together with the Italian Merchant, the Aleppo Factor, the Great George, and the Berkſhire bound for Turkey, the William for Venice, and the Golden Merchant for Leghorn, all Engliſh, were driven aſhore on the eaſt-ſide of Gibraltar, and moſt of the men loſt. The ſame fate attended three Dutch ſhips richly laden; but rear-admiral Nevill, with two Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to be blown out of the Streights, and put ſafe into Cadiz; as did the reſt of the fleet on the 19th into Gibraltar. This loſs, how great ſoever, was ſoon after repaired, the king having cauſed the men of war on the ſtocks to be finiſhed with extraordinary diligence.

On Sunday, December the 31ſt, prince Lewis of Baden arrived at Graveſend, and on Tueſday he came up the river in the king's barge, and was conducted to the apartment prepared for him at Whitehall. His highneſs continued in England till the 14th of February, during which time he concerted meaſures with the king, and was treated with very ſingular reſpects, and at a great expence, not only by the king, but alſo by ſeveral peers, particularly the duke of Ormond.

On the 22d of November 1693, the king granted to the earl of Abingdon the office of chief juſtice in Eyre on this ſide of Trent, vacant by the death of the lord Lovelace; and appointed the lord viſcount Sidney, maſter of the ordnance, to be colonel of the firſt regiment of foot-guards, in the place of the late duke Schomberg, in whoſe room the duke of St. Albans was ſworn captain of the band of penſioners; and, about the middle of January, the lord Charles Butler, brother to the duke of Ormond, was created lord Butler, baron of Weſton in the county of Huntingdon, and earl of Arran in Ireland. Peregrine Bertie was ſworn vice-chamberlain to his majeſty, upon the reſignation of ſir John Lowther; Ruvigny, who had been ſo inſtrumental in the reduction of Ireland, and for his ſervices created earl of Galway, was at this time, appointed to command the king's forces in Piedmont in quality of lieutenant-general, and to be envoy extraordinary to the duke of Savoy. When old Ruvigny his father died, he offered his ſervice to the king, who unwillingly accepted of it; becauſe he knew that an eſtate, which his father had in France, and of which he ſtill had the income, would be immediately confiſcated: But he had no regard to that, and heartily engaged in the king's ſervice, and was afterwards employed in many eminent poſts, in all which he acquitted himſelf with great reputation, and was alſo deemed a man of eminent virtues, great piety and zeal for religion.

When the king returned to England from the laſt campaign, he plainly ſaw the neceſſity of changing both his meaſures and miniſtry. He expreſſed his diſlike of the whole conduct at ſea, and named Ruſſel for the command of the fleet the next year. He diſmiſſed the earl of Nottingham, and would immediately have brought the earl of Shrewſbury into the miniſtry. But, when that lord came to him, he thought the king's inclinations were ſtill the ſame, that they had been for ſome years, and that the turn, which he was now making, was not from choice, but from force; for which reaſon his lordſhip went into the country. However, the king ſoon after ſent for him, and gave him ſuch aſſurances, that he was again made ſecretary of ſtate, to the general ſatisfaction of the whigs. But the perſon, who had the king's confidence to the higheſt degree, was the earl of Sunderland, who, by his long experience and his knowledge of men and things, had gained an aſcendant over him, and had more credit with him, than any Engliſhman ever had. He had brought the king to this change of counſels, by the proſpect he gave him of the ill condition his affairs would be in, if he did not entirely both truſt and ſatisfy thoſe who, in the preſent conjuncture, were the only party, that both could and would ſupport him. It was ſaid, that, the true ſecret of this change of meaſures was, that the tories ſignified to the king plainly, that they could carry on the war no longer; and that therefore he muſt accept of ſuch a peace, as could be had. This was the moſt pernicious thing, that could be thought on, and the moſt contrary to the king's notions and deſigns; but, they being poſitive, he was forced to change hands, and to turn to the other party. So the whigs were now in favour again, and every thing was done, that was like to put them in good humour. The commiſſion of the lieutenancy for the city of London, on which they had ſet their hearts, much more perhaps than it deſerved, was ſo altered, that the whigs were the ſuperior number; and all other commiſſions over England were much changed. They were alſo brought into many places of truſt and profit; ſo that the king put his affairs chiefly into their hands, yet ſo, that no tory who had expreſſed zeal or affection for the government, was turned out.

The ſame day the parliament was prorogued, the king beſtowed the title of duke on the earl of Shrewſbury; and created the earl of Mulgrave, marquis of Normandy, with the grant of a penſion of three thouſand a year. He was alſo with the lord Durſley ſworn, on the 3d of May, of the privy-council. About the ſame time Henry Herbit was

[d] Beſides theſe bills, ſeveral others were left unfiniſhed, viz. A bill "to regulate trials in caſes of high-treaſon," which the commons had ſent to the lords for their concurrence; a bill 'for the naturalizing of all ſuch proteſtants, as ſhould take the oaths to their majeſties, and the Teſt againſt popery;' a bill 'concerning the forfeitures both in England and Ireland;' a bill 'for regiſtering of wills, &c.' another 'againſt ſtock-jobbers;' and another 'for the encouragement of privateers.'

Biſhop

made baron Herbert of Cherbury, in the county of Salop; Edward Ruſſel, ſir George Rooke, and ſir John Houblon, were appointed three of the commiſſioners of the admiralty. On the 30th of April, the marquis of Caermarthen was created duke of Leeds; William earl of Bedford marquis of Taviſtock, and duke of Bedford; William earl of Devonſhire marquis of Hartington, and duke of Devonſhire; John earl of Clare marquis of Clare, and duke of Newcaſtle; Francis lord Newport, treaſurer of their majeſties houſhold, earl of Bradford in the county of Salop; and lord viſcount Sydney, lord warden of the Cinque Ports, earl of Romney in the county of Kent. On the 2d of May, Sidney lord Godolphin, ſir Stephen Fox, Charles Montague, ſir William Trumball, and John Smith, were appointed commiſſioners of the treaſury.

Mr. Montague, a branch of the earl of Manchеſter's family, had begun, though a young man, to make a great figure in the houſe of commons. He was not only made commiſſioner of the treaſury, but ſoon after chancellor and under-treaſurer of the exchequer. He had great vivacity and clearneſs, both of thought and expreſſion: His ſpirit was at firſt turned to wit and poetry, which he continued ſtill to encourage in others, when he applied himſelf to more important buſineſs. He came to have great notions, with relation to all the concerns of the treaſury, and of the public funds, and brought thoſe matters into new and better methods: He ſhewed the error of giving money upon remote funds, at a vaſt diſcount, and with great premiums to raiſe loans upon them; which occaſioned a great outcry, at the ſums that were given, at the ſame time that they were much ſhrunk, before they produced the money, that was expected from them. So he preſſed the king to inſiſt on this as a maxim, to have all the money for the ſervice of a year, to be raiſed within that year.

Affairs being thus ſettled at home, on Thurſday in the evening, May the 3d, the king and queen went down to Graveſend, where his majeſty embarked about five the next morning, the wind being then fair; but changing ſoon after, the king came on ſhore again at Graveſend about ten; and, for better expedition, went the ſame day with the queen to Canterbury; and on the 6th of May went early thence to Margate, where he embarked on the Fubbs yatch, and ſet ſail about eleven with a fair wind for Holland, being attended by eight Dutch men of war, which came from the Downs. He landed the next day at the Hoek of Holland, over-againſt the Brille, at ſix in the evening, and came about midnight to the Hague, and next morning went firſt into the aſſembly of the States of Holland, and afterwards that of the States-General, and made a ſhort ſpeech in each of them, and received their compliments on his ſafe arrival; and after a few days went to Loo to take the diverſions of that place, till matters were ripe for his going to the army.

About this time a draught of a commiſſion for taking ſubſcriptions for the bank of England, together with a ſchedule containing the draught of a charter for the corporation of the bank, were firſt approved and ſigned by her majeſty on the 8th of June; and the charter, which was to paſs under the great ſeal of England, after the firſt day of Auguſt, if the ſum of 1,200,000l. or one moiety, or more thereof, ſhould be ſubſcribed by that time, or ſooner, if the whole 1,200,000l. ſhould be ſooner ſubſcribed, was accordingly granted towards the middle of July, the commiſſioners having taken ſubſcriptions amounting to that ſum by the 5th of that month. The conſtituting of the bank occaſioned great debates. Some thought a bank would grow to be a monopoly. All the money of England would come into their hands, and they would in a few years become the maſters of the ſtock and wealth of the nation. Others argued for it: That the credit it would have, muſt increaſe trade and the circulation of money, at leaſt in bank-notes. It was viſible that all the enemies of the government ſet themſelves againſt it, with ſuch a vehemence of zeal, that this alone convinced all people, that they ſaw the ſtrength that our affairs would receive from it.

The Dutch often reckon up the great advantages they had from their banks; and they concluded that, as long as England continued jealous of the government, a bank could never be ſettled among us, nor gain credit enough to ſupport itſelf: And upon that they judged that the ſuperiority in trade muſt ſtill lie on their ſide. This, with all the other remote funds that were created, had another good effect: It engaged all thoſe who were concerned in them, to be, upon the account of their own intereſt, zealous for maintaining the government, ſince it was not to be doubted, but that a revolution would have ſwept all theſe away. The advantages that the king, and all concerned in tallies, had from the bank, were ſoon ſo ſenſibly felt, that all people ſaw into the ſecret reaſons, that made the enemies of the conſtitution ſet themſelves with ſo much earneſtneſs againſt it.

The confederate fleet was out early this year; but yet they were neither able to block up that of France in Breſt, nor to fight them at ſea; than which the Engliſh deſired nothing more. The French, on the contrary, induſtriouſly avoided an engagement, and were no ſooner out of the harbour, but they made all the ſail they could towards the Mediterranean, having formed great deſigns againſt Spain, both by ſea and land, this campaign. In order to break their meaſures, and prevent the entire loſs of Catalonia, the king thought fit to ſend his fleet into thoſe ſeas; but before admiral Ruſſel left the coaſt of France, being informed that there was a fleet of French merchant-men in Bertram bay, bound to the eaſtward, he detached captain Pickard and the Roebuck fire-ſhip, either to take or deſtroy them. Theſe orders captain Pickard executed with ſo good ſucceſs, that, of fifty-five ſail, he burnt or ſunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war, that was their convoy, among the rocks, where ſhe ſoon after blew up, with her two ſloops of between ten and fifteen guns.

The ſame good fortune did not attend the deſign, which the Engliſh and Dutch had been long concerting, to deſtroy the harbour of Breſt; the execution of which deſperate attempt was committed to lieutenant-general Talmaſh. On the 5th of June the lord Berkeley, admiral of the blue ſquadron, parted from admiral Ruſſel with twenty-nine men of war of the line of battle, Engliſh and Dutch, beſides ſmall frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tranſport ſhips; the 7th he came to an anchor between Bertram bay and Camaret (a ſmall neck of land in the mouth of the river of Breſt) notwithſtanding the enemies bombs from Camaret weſtern point, from a caſtle on a high rock in Bertram bay, and from two forts on each ſide of the iſthmus, going into Breſt road.

The ſame day the lord Cutts, and the marquis of Caermarthen, in his own galley, ſtood in a conſiderable way into the bay, and, having taken a view of it amidſt the enemies fire, they returned, and gave the lord Berkeley an account of the poſture of the bay, and the ſituation of the caſtle, which they found very advantageous to defend the landing places.[e] Upon this, it was thought adviſeable that the Monk, a ſhip of ſixty guns, and the Diameten, a Dutch ſhip of equal force, ſhould go in; but the marquis of Caermarthen not believing, that thoſe two men of war would be ſufficient to cover the boats at their landing, nor to aſſiſt their land-forces by playing upon the enemy, who were better prepared and more numerous than was expected, and ready to be ſeconded on all occaſions, by fourteen ſquadrons of horſe. Therefore on the 8th, after a conſultation of the Engliſh and Dutch flags, and the general officers of the land-forces, it was reſolved, that ſix other men of war ſhould be added to the two former,[f] which the marquis undertook to paſs ſo near, as to bear upon the caſtle to the beſt advantage, and to perform thoſe other ſervices, for which they were deſigned.

This was a work of great difficulty and danger; for, no ſooner was the Monk come within reach of the enemies mortars, but they began to play at her from the point des Filettes, and the weſtern point of Camaret. As ſoon as the reſt of the ſhips were got into the bay, they were ſurprized with three batteries more, which they never perceived till they [e] Biſhop Burnet ſays, that when our fleet came ſo near, as to ſee what preparations were made for the defence of the place, the council of officers were all againſt making the attempt; but that general Talmaſh had ſet his heart ſo much upon it, that he could not be diverted from it. He fancied, that the men they ſaw were only a rabble brought together to make a ſhew, though it appeared very evidently, that there were regular bodies among them, and that their numbers were double to his. Burnet, II. 130.

The famous engineer Vauban, whom the king of France had employed to put Breſt and the places in the harbour, which were likely to be attacked, in a poſture of defence, wrote to that king, before the Engliſh fleet arrived, 'That his majeſty needed to be under no apprehenſions; that he had made all the ſubterraneous paſſages under the caſtle bomb-proof: that he had placed ninety mortars, and three hundred pieces of cannon, in proper places: that all the ſhips were out of the reach of the enemy's bombs, and all the troops in good order: that there were three hundred bombardeers in the place, three hundred gentlemen, four thouſand men, regular troops, and a regiment of dragoons juſt arrived.'

[f] Namely, the Greenwich of fifty-four, the Charles galley of thirty-two, the Shoreham of thirty-two, the Darkenſteyn of forty-four, the Weſep of thirty, and the Wolf of thirty guns.

He

felt their ſhot. But notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the marquis poſted the ſhips in ſuch a manner, as gave great aſſiſtance to the land-forces, and did the enemy conſiderable miſchief. For theſe ſhips, as ſoon as they had dropped their anchors in the bay, fired continually upon the French, and forced them to run twice out of Camaret fort.

On the other hand, Talmaſh, with a ſmall number of well-boats, and about nine hundred men, went aſhore in a confuſed manner, under a little rock, on the ſouth ſide of a ſmall bay. Whereupon a detachment of the French marines charged the Engliſh ſo vigorouſly, that they were forced to retire to their boats in great diſorder. It happening, at the ſame time, to be the tide of ebb, moſt of thoſe boats ſtuck faſt, ſo that the men were either miſerably ſlaughtered, or obliged to beg for quarter. The reſt of the boats retreated under the protection of the men of war, which, with incredible labour and hazard, the marquis of Caermarthen brought off, except the Weſep, a ſmall Dutch man of war. Of the land-forces about four hundred were taken priſoners, and as many killed or deſperately wounded. And, as for the loſs ſuſtained at ſea, four hundred men were loſt in the three Engliſh and four Dutch ſhips under the marquis's command. This expedition, which coſt the brave Talmaſh his life,[g] could not but prove unſucceſsful, the French having had time to provide themſelves againſt it, the deſign having been the town talk in London ſome months before it was put in execution.[h]

To revenge this affront, lord Berkeley ſailed towards Dieppe, and on the 12th of July threw one thouſand one hundred bombs and carcaſſes into the town, which ſet it on fire in ſeveral places. The townſmen, deſpairing to quench the flames, began to run away in great conſternation; whereupon two regiments of the militia of Bretagne were ſent to encourage them, but the diſorder was ſo great, and the fire ſo dreadful, that the ſoldiers themſelves fled with the reſt.. If the Engliſh had known what had paſſed, they might in all probability have poſſeſſed themſelves of the place. However, they ſo ruined it, that the greateſt part of the houſes were reduced to aſhes, and ſcarce any left unſhattered.

From Dieppe the fleet, alarming all the coaſt of France, ſailed towards Havre de Grace; and on the 16th of July began to bombard the town, under the direction of captain Bembow, which they continued to do till the next morning, when, the wind blowing hard, they gave over. The 18th towards the evening, the weather being calm, the following night was ſpent in throwing in two hundred and fifty bombs more into the town; but, the wind growing high, the bomb-ketches ſtood off again; and on the 24th the lord Berkeley ſailed from Havre de Grace, leaving it conſiderably damaged. Dunkirk was the place of the greateſt importance, for which reaſon that attempt was purſued in ſeveral ways, but none of them ſucceeded. Theſe bombardings of the French towns ſoon ſpread a terror among all, that lived near the coaſt; batteries were every where raiſed, and the people were brought out to defend their country; but they could do the Engliſh no hurt, while their bombs at a mile's diſtance did great execution. The action ſeemed inhuman; but the French, who had bombarded Genoa, without a previous declaration of war, and who had ſo often put whole countries under military execution, even after they had paid the contributions, which had been laid on them (for which they had protection given them) had no reaſon to complain of this way of carrying on the war, which they themſelves had firſt begun.

The death of the biſhop and prince of Liege, towards the beginning of this year, gave the French a fair proſpect of embroiling the affairs of the confederates on that ſide. For as the death of the elector of Cologne in 1688 had divided the empire of France on account of the two candidates, prince Clement of Bavaria on the one ſide, and cardinal Furſtemberg on the other, and kindled the war, which ſoon after ſpread itſelf over the face of almoſt all Europe; ſo, if the French could have got the cardinal of Bouillon to have been advanced to the principality of Liege, they had great hopes, at leaſt to humble the allies ſo far, as to make them accept the conditions of peace, which the French king had already offered them. But, notwithſtanding the private endeavours of the French faction, and the cardinal of Bouillon's open proteſtations, the major part of the chapter of Liege made choice of the elector of Cologne, and the reſt of the grand maſters of the Teutonic order, to be their prince and biſhop; both which ſent to the emperor and court of Rome to have their reſpective election confirmed. This double return was like to be attended with fatal conſequences; for as the grand maſter of the Teutonic order was no leſs than brother-in-law to the emperor, who in all probability would have eſpouſed his cauſe; ſo his competitor was brother to the elector of Bavaria, whoſe intereſt was ſupported by that of his Britannic majeſty and of the ſtates of Holland. Whilſt both parties impatiently waited the deciſion of the ſee of Rome, the conteſt was determined by the death of the grand maſter, who was carried off by a contagious diſtemper, then reigning in the city of Liege; ſo that the elector of Cologne, in ſome time after, obtained the peaceful poſſeſſion of that biſhopric and principality; which, together with the great power of the allies in Flanders this campaign, made things look with an ill aſpect on the affairs of France.

The confederate army, under the king's command, was encamped at Mont St. André, conſiſting of thirty-one thouſand horſe and dragoons, and fifty-one thouſand foot, all as good troops as ever had been in the field; beſides a body of about ſeven thouſand men, under count Thiant near Ghent. The French were not much inferior in number; but the Dauphin who commanded in perſon, declared, that he had received orders from his father not to ſtir from his camp near Hay, as long as the confederates continued in their's at St. André. However, not being able to ſubſiſt there any longer, he reſolved at laſt to decamp, and though he thought to have concealed his deſign, by ſending out ſeveral detachments of horſe, under pretence of foraging, to reinforce the marquis of Harcourt's body (on the other ſide of the Maeſe) who was to ſeize the advantageous poſt of Pieton: yet the king, who was apprehenſive of it, decamped before him and ſoon gained the poſt of Pieton, where there was not forage for above four days; and being informed of the enemy's march, he moved towards Nivelle, thence to Leſſines; having before ſent orders for baking bread at Ghent and Aeth.

When the army came to Chieire, the elector of Bavaria was detached with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, and ſome pieces of cannon, to poſſeſs himſelf of a poſt upon the Scheld; and the army followed with an intention to have paſſed the river at Pont Eſperies. But, though the confederates made great expedition to get thither, yet the French made more to prevent them; for, the elector having advanced towards Pont d'Eſcahuſſe, in order to force the paſſage of the river, he found the French, to the number of thirty thouſand, ſo well entrenched on the other ſide, that he did not think it prudent to purſue his enterpriſe. By this haſty march the French cavalry ſuffered much; but that loſs was inconſiderable in compariſon of the advantage, which they gained by hindering the allies from penetrating into French Flanders, where, conſidering their ſtrengtn, they would, in all probability, have made ſome important conqueſt, or at leaſt, ſecured winter quarters.

[g] He was ſhot in the thigh, of which wound he died a few days after, and was much lamented, for he was a brave and generous man, and a good officer, and very fit to animate and encourage inferior officers and ſoldiers. 'But he was much too apt to be diſcontented, and to turn mutinous; ſo that, upon the whole, he was one of thoſe dangerous men that are capable of doing as much miſchief as good ſervice.' A little before his death, he is reported to have ſaid, that as he loſt his life in the performance of his duty to ſo good a prince, he was perfectly eaſy as to that point; but that it was a great trouble to him, that the government had been ſo baſely betrayed. It is ſaid, he knew who were the traitors, and named to a perſon, who ſtood at his bedſide, that he might diſcover them to queen Mary, in the king's abſence, that ſhe might be on her guard againſt thoſe pernicious counſellors, who had retarded the deſcent and given the French time to be prepared for it.—— Oldm. p. 92.

[h] Father Daniel ſays, that the lord Berkeley, came into the bay of Camaret with a ſquadron of ſix and fifty men of war, bombs and other veſſels. General Talmaſh made a deſcent at the head of a battalion of grenadiers, and between eight and nine hundred men, which were landed by a great number of ſhallops. A brisk fire enſued, as well from the Engliſh on one ſide, as from the French batteries and intrenchments on land, on the other. The ſieur de Beroiſe, captain of a French company of marines, obſerving that there was ſome confuſion among the Engliſh troops, ſallied out ſword in hand, at the head of ſixty men, being immediately followed by another company. He defeated the enemy, killed a great number of their men, and purſued them to their ſhallops; into which they threw themſelves in ſuch numbers, that they could by no means get them off.

Upon this the count de Servon, marſhal de Camp, the ſieurs de Vaiſe, brigadier of foot, and du Pleſſis, brigadier of horſe, marched a ſquadron of the regiment of du Pleſſis up to the ſhore, which ſoon obliged the Engliſh in the boats which were ſtranded, to demand quarter. The others, which had not yet made their defence, retreated under favour of the cannon of their ſhips. A Dutch veſſel, which ventured too near the ſhore, ran a-ground, and was obliged to ſurrender. The Engliſh loſt four hundred men in the deſcent, among whom was their general Talmaſh, and forty officers, with five ſoldiers, made priſoners. Many more were drowned; and, a bomb happening to fall into a bomb-veſſel full of ſoldiers, it blew up with all that were in it. This enterpriſe coſt the Engliſh and Dutch two thouſand men. They burnt one of their veſſels in the night, and another of ſixty pieces of cannon was run a-ground. The French, on the contrary, had no more than five and forty ſlain. Monſieur Vauban, who commanded at Breſt, had taken all his precautions with an admirable ſkill, as well with regard to the batteries as the entrenchments, in which was placed a battalion of marines, with ſome other ſoldiers, under the command of the marquis de Langeron.

The king of France was ſo ſenſible of it, that he wrote a letter, which he ordered to be read at the head of the army, wherein he returned thanks, in the firſt place, to the princes of the blood; next to the marſhal Luxemburg, as having a principal ſhare in the conduct; then to the reſt of the marſhals of France, and all the general officers; and laſtly, to all the French and Swiſs infantry, regiment by regiment, acknowledging how much he was obliged to their zeal and incredible diligence.

Whilſt the French were deeply intrenched near Courtray from whence they had ſent ſtrong detachments to cover Ypres, Menin, Berg St. Winox, Furnes, and Dunkirk, the king, finding it impoſſible to attempt any thing on that ſide, reſolved to lay hold on this occaſion, to diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the town and caſtle of Huy. In purſuance of this deſign, the prince Tſerclaes de Tilley paſſed the Maeſe, and inveſted the place with all the horſe and dragoons of the biſhopric of Liege, a party of Brandenburg horſe, and ſome battalions of foot.

The next day arrived ſixteen regiments of foot with the duke of Holſtein Ploen, whom the king appointed to command the ſiege, and at whoſe approach the town immediately ſurrendered. By the 19th of September, the batteries were raiſed againſt the caſtle; and all things being ready for an aſſault by the 27th, the French governor beat a parly, and ſurrendered that fortreſs the next day. By this conqueſt the French were totally expelled out of the biſhopric of Liege, Dinant at that time being a part of France. Thus ended the campaign in Flanders. But the confederates, eſpecially the Engliſh and Dutch, grew weary of keeping vaſt armies, which did nothing elſe than lay for ſome months advantageouſly poſted, in view of the enemy, without any action.

The French, under the command of marſhal Noailles, made a better figure in Catalonia; for, being near thirty thouſand ſtrong, and much ſuperior to the Spaniards, they arrived on the 26th of May on the banks of the river Ter; which they reſolved to paſs, notwithſtanding they found the Spaniards entrenched on the other ſide. Accordingly, having ſounded all the fords that ſame evening they forced their way through; and, after an hour's diſpute, conſtrained the Spaniſh foot to abandon their retrenchments. The Spaniſh cavalry ſhewed a more than ordinary valour and conduct in covering the foot, and at laſt made their own retreat without any great loſs, except that of their baggage, the French not thinking it ſafe to purſue them, becauſe of the narrowneſs of the ways. However, the marſhal de Noailles improved this advantage by laying ſiege to Palamos, a town by the ſea-ſide, about twenty-two leagues from Barcelona, to the ſouth eaſt.

On the 30th of May, the place was inveſted; and, on the 7th of June all things were in readineſs to ſtorm the covered way. This the French grenadiers performed with great reſolution, entered the town at two narrow breaches, plundered it, and put all they met to the ſword. Of thoſe, who were ſaved, all were made priſoners of war; only ſome of the officers, who were moſt wounded, were ſent to Gironne upon their parole; 'not only,' ſaid the French general in his letter to the king his maſter, 'becauſe they ſeemed to deſire, but becauſe he conſidered the terror, that it would ſtrike among the ſoldiers and people.' Marſhal Noailles judged rightly of the matter; for the Spaniards immediately withdrew their garriſon out of St. Felix Quinola, and the caſtle of St. Elome; and, though they pretended to make a ſtout reſiſtance at Gironne, a well fortified town, which the French had beſieged by the 19th of June, yet they ſurrendered it in ten days upon very ignominious terms. From Gironne the French advanced to Oſtalric, a little town upon the road to Barcelona, which they quickly carried without any great reſiſtance, and thereby enlarged their territories twenty miles in extent. But the army, becauſe of the exceſſive heats, beginning now to be ſickly, Noailles put them into quarters of refreſhment, upon the fertile banks of the river Terdera, where they lived as undiſturbed from the Spaniards as if they had been in the middle of France. After they had ſufficiently refreſhed themſelves, they formed a deſign upon Caſtle Folet, a town a little to the weſt of Gironne, which they took having routed a body of country militia, that came to relieve it, and make the garriſon priſoners of war.

Whilſt the French were buſy on this ſide, the Spaniards thought to improve this opportunity by retaking Oſtalric, which they actually beſieged, and carried their point ſo far, that the governor was upon articles of ſurrender, and hoſtages were already exchanged; but, the Spaniards inſiſting, that the Miquelets ſhould be made priſoners of war, the governor in the mean time had notice, that Noailles was marching to his relief; whereupon he redemanded his hoſtages, and refuſed to ſtand to the articles, ſo that the ſiege was immediately raiſed.

Fluſhed with theſe ſucceſſes, the French threatened no leſs than the beſieging of Barcelona, the capital of Catalonia, and the only fortified town of that province in the hands of the Spaniards. The court of Madrid felt their weakneſs, and ſaw their danger ſo viſibly, that they were forced to implore the protection of the Engliſh fleet. The French had carried the beſt part of their naval force into the Mediterranean, and had reſolved to attack Barcelona both by ſea and land, at the ſame time; and, upon their ſucceſs there, to have gone round Spain, deſtroying the coaſt every where. All this was intended to force the Spaniards to accept the offers, which the French were willing to give them. But, to prevent this, admiral Ruſſel was ordered to ſail into the Mediterranean with a fleet of threeſcore great ſhips. He was ſo long ſtopped in his voyage by contrary winds, that the French, if they had purſued their advantages, might have finiſhed the conqueſt of Catalonia. But, as they were reſolved not to hazard their fleet, it was brought back to Toulon, long before admiral Ruſſel could get into the Mediterranean, which was now entirely left to him. However, it was thought, that the French intended to make a ſecond attempt in the end of the year, as ſoon as he ſhould ſail back to England; for which reaſon it was propoſed, that he might lie at Cadiz all the winter, This was an affair of ſuch importance, that it was long and much debated, before it was reſolved on. It was thought a dangerous thing to expoſe the beſt part of our fleet, ſo much as it muſt be, while it lay at ſo great a diſtance from us, that convoys of ſtores and proviſions might eaſily be intercepted. And indeed the ſhips were ſo low in their proviſions, when they came back to Cadiz (the veſſels that were ordered to carry them, having been ſtopped four months in the channel, by contrary winds) that our fleet had not then above a fortnight's victuals on board. Yet, when the whole matter was thoroughly canvaſſed, it was agreed, that our ſhips might both lie ſafe, and be well careened at Cadiz. Nor was the difference in the expence, between their lying there and in our ports, conſiderable. By their lying there, the French were ſhut up in the Mediterranean; ſo that the ocean and their coaſts were left open to us. They were in effect ſhut up within Thoulon; for they, having no other port in thoſe ſeas but that, reſolved not to venture abroad; ſo that now we were maſters of the ſeas every where.

Theſe conſiderations determined the king to ſend orders to admiral Ruſſel, to lie all the winter at Cadiz; which produced very good effects. The Venetians and the grand duke of Tuſcany had not thought fit to own the king 'till then. A great fleet of ſtores and ammunition, with all other proviſions for the next campaign, came ſafe to Cadiz; and ſome clean men of war were ſent out in exchange for others, which were ordered home [1].

Little was done in Piedmont this ſummer: For though the duke of Savoy openly rejected the propoſals made to him from France, after his defeat at Marſaglia, yet a ſecret negotiation was carried on, which rendered him very unactive, and the French careleſs on that ſide. And when it was expected that the confederate army would form the ſiege of Caſale (the ſucceſs of which enterprize was as little doubted of) they contented themſelves with the taking the fort of St. George, whereby that place was more cloſely blocked up. Neither is it worth the while to mention either the ſmall ſucceſſes of the Vaudois in the valley of Pragelas; their routing of ſome Iriſh detachments ſent againſt them in the valley of St. Martin; or their faint irruption into Dauphiné as far as Briançon.

[1] While the fleet lay at Cadiz, captain Killigrew was ſent out with ſix men of war to execute certain orders, and meeting by the way with two ſtout French men of war called the Trident and the Content, they were both taken, but Killigrew loſt his life in the engagement. Burchet, 816.

In

The Imperialiſts, headed by prince Lewis of Baden, lying encamped near Hailbron, marſhal de Lorge, with the French army under his command, adventured to paſs the Rhine, and to march towards them in order of battle. The prince, believing the enemy had a mind to fight, went on to meet them. But, the French finding him ſo reſolute, retreated towards Wiſelock, paſſed the Neckar, burnt the town of Laudenburg, and ruined the flat country.

This ſo incenſed the prince of Baden, that, though he was not yet reinforced by the Saxons, he advanced to Wiſelock, an advantageous poſt, of which he poſſeſſed himſelf, after a ſharp rencounter with the enemy, wherein the French loſt three hundred men, and the Germans about half that number. Upon this de Lorge repaſſed the Rhine, and for ſome time the two armies only obſerved one another. At length, the prince of Baden, impatient for action, croſſed the Rhine in his turn; of which the French general was no ſooner informed, but he marched towards Landau.

On the other hand, the prince advanced and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall places, and of all the paſſes as far as Croon Weſſemburg; and it was confidently expected that now the Germans would either force the French to a battle, or ſecure winter-quarters on that ſide the Rhine. But neither of theſe happened; for in a few days the Imperialiſts repaſſed the Rhine, bringing away with them fourteen thouſand head of cattle; and having deſtroyed a great quantity of forage in the country, and ſome magazines of the French; which put an end to the campaign in Germany.

The campaign ended every where to the advantage of the confederates, though no ſignal ſucceſſes had happened to their arms. At the concluſion of it, the court of France flattered their people with hopes of a ſpeedy end of the war. And ſome men of great conſideration were ſent to try, what terms they could bring the empire or the ſtates-general to. But the French were yet far from offering conditions, upon which a juſt or a ſafe peace could be treated of [k]. The ſtates ſent ſome perſons as far as Maeſtricht, to ſee what powers thoſe ſent from France had brought with them, before they would grant the paſſports, that they deſired. And when they ſaw how limited theſe were, the negotiation was ſoon at an end; or rather, it never began. When the French ſaw this, they diſowned their having ſent any on ſuch an errand, and pretended, that this was only an artifice of the confederates to keep one another and their people in heart, by making them believe, that they had now only a ſmall remnant of the war before them, ſince the French had inſtruments every where at work, to ſollicit peace.

During the king's abſence there was little remarkable in England, but the eminent prudence of the queen in preſerving the peace of the nation; though the jacobites were induſtrious and implacable in their plots againſt the government. Colonel Parker had been committed to the Tower for high-treaſon, and a bill of indictment was found againſt him in Trinity Term; but on Saturday, Auguſt 11th, by a ſtratagem he made his eſcape in the night, and fled from juſtice; and though there was a proclamation for the diſcovering and apprehending of him, with a reward of four hundred pounds for ſo doing, yet he ſafely got to [k] In this year, 1694, was publiſhed a piece intitled, 'Reflections upon the conditions of peace offered by France; and the means to be employed for procuring of better.' The author begins with obſerving, that 'ſince perſons, who are poſſeſſed with two great opinion of the power of France, and are ignorant of the reaſons that oblige that crown to wiſh to ſee an end of the war, might be apt to imagine, that the conditions of peace, which were propoſed in Sweden by the count d'Avaux, ought not to have been ſo diſdainfully rejected, it might not be amiſs to ſhew, how captious and unjuſt thoſe conditions were, and how neceſſary it was to look upon them as a ſnare, which we ought to be very cautious of falling into; ſince it was certain, that they would have left France in a condition to break the treaty, which it would make with the allies, upon the firſt favourable occaſion, that ſhould preſent itſelf; and it could not be doubted, but our enemies would be ready to renew the war, after the term of ſome few years, and to puſh on their arms with ſo much the more fury, as they ſhould then find fewer obſtacles to their deſigns; if they were not reduced to ſuch reſtitution, as ſhould give us ſecurity, that they would not dare again to violate their words.' He then demonſtrates from a ſeries of facts the unmeaſurable ambition of France; and ſhews the neceſſity of humbling that kingdom. He remarks, that no ſecurity had been offered by it to the allies; and that it was the intereſt of England and Holland to re-eſtabliſh a good barrier in Flanders and Brabant. 'It is a truth,' ſays he, 'of which none can doubt, that the conqueſt of the Low-Countries would put France into a condition of giving laws to all Europe; and it is another truth, that is no leſs evident, that nothing can hinder the French from making this conqueſt upon the firſt occaſion, if we accept of the conditions of peace, which they now offer us. The greateſt of our intereſts then is here concerned, leſt, France being in poſſeſſion of the ports of the Spaniſh Netherlands, and keeping the Hollanders in ſlavery, or at leaſt in an indiſpenſable neceſſity of remaining in a good union with that crown, the French would become abſolute maſters of our commerce; leſt they ſhould oppreſs Germany, Spain, and Italy; whilſt we being ſhut up in our iſland, and out of all communication with the continent, ſhould be ſpectators of that revolution, without being able to hinder it. It is viſible therefore, that the ſafety of England depends upon the preſervation of the Low-Countries. But what ſhall we ſay of the glory of the nation? It is certain, that, if we procure an advantageous peace for the allies, by continuing the war with the ſame vigour, that we have ſhewn hitherto, England will have the honour of having ſaved Europe from chains, and will remain the arbiter of its deſtiny.

'It is the general intereſt of all Chriſtendom to reſettle the houſe of Auſtria in a ſort of equality with France. This equilibrium is neceſſary for the ſecurity of the people, and even for that of the ſovereigns too. But it is the particular intereſt of England to re-eſtabliſh this equality, that ſhe may have the balance in her hand, and turn it to which ſide ſhe pleaſes. This is the only means we can make uſe of, not only to maintain the empire of the ſea, which we have regained the poſſeſſion of in ſo glorious a manner, but even to enable us to decide the ſucceſs of wars, and the conditions of treaties for the future. The nation begins already to recover in Europe the rank which ſhe ought to hold. Our fleets are miſtreſſes of the two ſeas; the ſecurity of our commerce is perfectly re-eſtabliſhed; we have ſeen the French reduced to a neceſſity of letting their maritime towns in the ocean be burnt, while their fleet is ſhut up, and as it were impriſoned in part of the Mediterranea, to avoid the being attacked by ours. We have begun to ſtop the progreſs of their arms in the Low-Countries; and the taking of Huy is not of ſo little importance, but that it opens a way to greater conqueſts, in giving us an opportunity to draw off a great part of our garriſons from Liege and Maeſtricht. Beſides, we may without flattery ſay, that we have a numerous army upon the Rhine, and may expect great things from that prince that commands it. The duke of Savoy will be able to make a more conſiderable diverſion on that ſide, than he hath hitherto done, becauſe he will act in concert with our fleet. And it is to be hoped, that the Turks, diſcouraged by their loſſes, and being convinced that France will ſacrifice them, will at length, by making an accommodation with the emperor, prevent the danger they would be in, if they ſhould be the laſt in making a peace. Add to all this, the extremity to which France finds herſelf now reduced: They are forced to abandon to us the two ſeas; they are under an impoſſibility of augmenting their forces by land; their commerce is abſolutely ruined; their ſubjects diſcontented, and their troops ill paid. In a word, if the allies will but make the beſt of this conjuncture, it ſeems the moſt certain, that they muſt quickly obtain reaſonable conditions of peace, and that Europe may thereby enjoy a ſolid and durable repoſe.'

About the ſame time was publiſhed likewiſe another piece intitled, 'The Engliſhman's choice and true intereſt in a vigorous proſecution of the war againſt France, and ſerving king William and queen Mary, and acknowledging their right.' The author begins with animadverting upon thoſe, who murmured againſt the taxes and the war; and complains, that the king had been too good to his enemies, whoſe falſe pretences in oppoſing his majeſty he expoſes. He then conſiders the ſtate of the war, and obſerves, that there were ſome, who repreſented, that 'our navy might guard our coaſts againſt invaſions; or our militia, and other forces at home might be enough to preſerve us, if the enemies land.' But theſe men, ſays he, cannot but own, that it is much better for England to be at charges in keeping the enemy at a diſtance, than to be the ſeat of war; and that if any one of thoſe allies, whom they undervalue, joined with France, it were ſuch an acceſſion to its power, as the French party here would be very glad of; nor is there any one of them, who would not in ſuch a caſe be as much magnified by that party, as now they are leſſened. But it is evident, that if the French ſhould ſwallow Flanders, (which they had certainly done before now, if it had not been for the confederacy) Holland, which has lately ſet us ſo good an example ſince the battle of Landen, muſt neceſſarily truckle, and their navy be at the command of France. And how could we expect a fleet able to ſecure us againſt both, when hitherto we and Holland in conjunction have done ſo little againſt the naval force of France, excepting that memorable time, when admiral Ruſſel (whoſe victory was by ſome men held a crime) to his eternal honour and glory, ſo well maintained the reputation of the Engliſh nation. If France had no enemy but England, and were at liberty to employ againſt it all their armies in Flanders, upon the Rhine, in Piedmont, in Catalonia, and in their garriſons, (which together amount to near four hundred thouſand men) while ſo many here ſhew themſelves ready to declare for them; what could England hope for, but to be a field of blood? And how could we think, that the French ſwords would be ſheathed, while there were one proteſtant remaining? Nay, when we conſider, how barbarouſly they uſe the people, whom they ſubdue, though of their own religion, without regard to religious houſes or churches, or the ſepulchres of princes, we may believe that the Engliſh papiſts would find little better quarter than others. They, who have had ſuch fatal proofs of the Engliſh valour and enmity to them, would take care never more to be in fear of their antient enemies; nor is it to be thought, that any thing leſs than our total extirpation would ſatisfy them.' The author then juſtifies the preſent ſettlement, expoſes the abſurd conduct of thoſe proteſtants, who were enemies to the government; ſhews, that the jacobites were more inexcuſable than the papiſts, and obſerves, that the former 'magnified the power of France, and the advantage of its way of government to make war, or command peace, and mightily leſſened and reproached the confederates; and that chiefly under a popular maſk of zeal againſt leagues with popiſh princes; which they, good men! are ſo far from, that they are for ſubmitting to the worſt of them without terms. They inſinuate, 'continues he,' as if England bears the charge of a needleſs war, to maintain the dominion of a foreign prince; not conſidering, that the Dutch alone have in their pay one hundred and ſix thouſand, five hundred, and forty men, beſides their allowing twenty-five thouſand gilders a month towards carrying on the war in Piedmont; and are ſo far from being diſcouraged by the late misfortunes from a vigorous proſecution of the war, that they have added fifteen thouſand to their former land-forces, beſides increaſing their navy. And it is a known maxim that the preſervation of Flanders is more for the intereſt of England than of Spain. If Flanders be an acceſſion to France, Holland muſt ſoon follow, and England next. The importance of Flanders is ſufficiently confeſſed by theſe gentlemen, when they would have others believe there is a neceſſity of our truckling to France, upon the taking of a town or two. And yet they are for giving it all up. But any man, who has ſeen the noble towns and large country yet remaining, would think it very well worth the preſerving. Antwerp itſelf, if it were in the French hands, would command the trade of Chriſtendom.' He next refutes the inſinuations of the jacobites againſt the French proteſtants in England, and and againſt the Dutch; and takes notice of their inſolence towards the king; whom they repreſented as no friend to the Engliſh nation.

He

France, where his treaſonable deſigns were firſt laid and undertaken [l].

His majeſty having ſpent ſome months in his uſual diverſions at Loo, and then ſettled the public foreign affairs at the Hague, embarked the 8th of November on the William and Mary yatch in the Maeſe, being attended by a ſquadron of men of war under the command of the lord marquis of Caermarthen; and the next day landed at Margate. He lay that night at Canterbury, and was met by the queen at Rocheſter. The day following he came to Kenſington; and on Monday the 12th, the parliament being met at Weſtminſter, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am glad to meet you here, when I can ſay our affairs are in a better poſture both by ſea and land, than when we parted laſt.

"The enemy has not been in a condition to oppoſe our fleet in theſe ſeas; and our ſending ſo great a force into the Mediterranean has diſappointed their deſigns, and leaves us a proſpect of further ſucceſs.

"With reſpect to the war by land, I think I may ſay, that this year a ſtop has been put to the progreſs of the French arms.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have had ſo much experience of your good affection to me, and of your zeal for the public, that I cannot doubt of your aſſiſtance at this time. I do therefore earneſtly recommend to you, to provide ſuch ſupplies, as may enable me to proſecute the war with vigour; which is the only means to procure peace to Chriſtendom, with the ſafety and honour of England.

"I muſt likewiſe put you in mind, that the act of tonnage and poundage expires at Chriſtmas; and I hope you will think fit to continue that revenue to the crown; which is the more neceſſary at this time, in regard the ſeveral branches of the revenue are under great anticipations for extraordinary expences of the war, and ſubject to many demands upon other accounts.

"I cannot but mention to you again the debt for the tranſport-ſhips employed in the reducing of Ireland, which is a caſe of compaſſion, and deſerves relief.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I ſhould be glad you would take into conſideration the preparing ſome good bill for the encouragement of our ſeamen. You cannot but be ſenſible, how much a law of this nature would tend to the advancement of trade, and of the naval ſtrength of the kingdom; which is our great intereſt, and ought to be our principal care."

The parliament was opened with a calmer face than had appeared in any ſeſſion during this reign. The ſupplies that were demanded, amounting to almoſt five millions, were all readily granted [m]. An ill humour indeed appeared in ſome, who oppoſed the funds, that would moſt certainly raiſe the money that was given, upon this pretence, that ſuch taxes would grow to be a general exciſe; and that the more eaſily money was raiſed, it would be more eaſy to continue ſuch duties to a long period, if not for ever; the truth was, the ſecret enemies of the government propoſed ſuch funds, as would be the heavieſt to the people, and would not fully anſwer what they were eſtimated at; that ſo the nation might be uneaſy under that load, and that a conſtant deficiency might bring on ſuch a debt, that the government could not diſcharge but muſt ſink under it.

With the ſupply-bills, as the price or bargain for them, the bill for the frequent meeting and calling of parliaments went on. It was prepared by order of the commons, and brought in by Mr. Harley on the 22d of November, and, in a few days paſſing the houſe, was ſent up to the lords, who gave it their concurrence without any amendment. Four days after, on the 22d of December, the king gave it the royal aſſent. It enacted, that a new parliament ſhould be called every third year, and that the preſent parliament ſhould be diſſolved before the 1ſt of January 1695-6. This act was received with great joy, many fancying that all the other laws and liberties were now the more ſecure, ſince this was paſſed into a law. Men, that intended to ſell their own votes without doors, ſpared no coſt to buy the votes of others in elections. But now it was hoped that men's characters and reputations would be the prevailing conſiderations in the choice of members of parliament, and that our conſtitution, particularly that part of it relating to the houſe of commons, would recover its ſtrength and reputation; which was now much ſunk; for corruption was ſo generally ſpread, that it was believed every thing was carried by that method. But time, and the many additional acts made upon this head, have plainly ſhewn how vain were theſe hopes, and how difficult it is to put an end to the corrupt practices which obſtruct the freedom of elections.

The very day this bill was brought in, died Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He was taken with a fit of the dead palſy, while he was in the chapel at Whitehall on a Sunday. He felt it coming on him, but, not thinking it decent to interrupt the divine ſervice, he neglected it ſo long, that all remedies were ineffectual; and he died the fifth day after he was ſeized, on the 22d of November. His diſtemper did ſo oppreſs him, and ſpeaking was ſo uneaſy to him, that though it appeared, by ſigns and other indications, that his underſtanding remained long clear, yet he was not able to expreſs himſelf to others. He ſeemed ſtill ſerene and calm, and in broken words ſaid, He thanked God he was quiet within, and had nothing then to do, but to wait for the will of heaven. His body was buried, at his own deſire, in the church of St. Laurence-Jury in London, where he had been the Tueſday lecturer many years [n]. He was a man of excellent judgment and temper. He had a clear head, with a moſt tender and compaſſionate heart. He was a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and ſoon conquered enemy. He was truly and ſeriouſly religious, but without affectation, bigotry or ſuperſtition. His notions of morality were fine and ſublime. His thread of reaſoning was eaſy, clear, and ſolid. He was not only the beſt preacher of the age, but ſeemed to have brought preaching to perfection. His ſermons were ſo well heard and liked, and ſo much read, that all the nation propoſed him as a pattern, and ſtudied to copy after him. His parts remained with him clear and unclouded; but the perpetual ſlanders, and other ill uſage he had been followed with, for many years, moſt particularly ſince his advancement to that great poſt, gave him too much trouble and too deep a concern: It could neither provoke him, nor fright him from his duty; but it affected his mind ſo much that this was thought to have ſhortened his days.

Both king and queen were much affected with Tillotſon's death. The queen for many days ſpoke of him in the tendereſt manner, and not without tears. He died ſo poor, that, if the king had not forgiven his firſt-fruits, his debts could not have been paid: So generous and charitable was he in a poſt, out of which Sancroft had raiſed an eſtate, which he left to his family [o]. Among the prelates that were talked of to ſucceed him, Stillingfleet biſhop of Worceſter, was one. The queen was inclined to him, and ſpoke more than once to the duke of Shrewſbury on that ſubject, and alſo preſſed the king earneſtly for him. But the whigs did generally apprehend, that both his notions and temper were [l] He had been ſeized on account of the Lancaſhire plot, and knew ſo much of the deſigns of the conſpirators, that they were very buſy to get him out of priſon, being looked upon as the moſt daring and deſperate, as well as the moſt active and bloody of all their agents. While he was in the Tower, a perſon came to him and told him, 'he had brought him liberty, but he muſt have two hundred pounds.' Parker replied, 'You ſhall have three hundred pounds.' And accordingly he had it, as he told Goodman; and by this man's means he got out of the Tower in the night, and from thence to France. Oldm. p. 94.

[m] For the navy, 2,382,712l.
For the army, 2,382,000l.
For the raiſing theſe ſums:
1. The ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, that was granted to king Charles II. for life, was now continued for five years.
2. A land-tax of 4s. in the pound.
3. Certain rates and duties upon marriages, births, and burials, and upon bachelors and widows, for five years.
The burial of every perſon 4s. and over and above for a duke or ducheſs 50l. marquis 40l. and ſo deſcending gradually through all degrees,
Every child 2s. and over and above for a duke's child 30l. and ſo on through all degrees, as in the burials.
Every marriage 2s. 6d. but every duke over and above 50l. &c.
Every bachelor above twenty-five years of age, and widow, 1s. a year, but every duke over and above 12l. 10s. &c.
4 An act for additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate, towards paying the debts due for tranſport-ſervice, for the reduction of Ireland.
5 An act for certain duties upon glaſs-wares, ſtone and earthen bottles, coal and culm.

[n] Biſhop Burnet preached his funeral ſermon to a crowded audience, in which (as he ſays himſelf) he gave him a character which was ſo ſeverely true, that perhaps he kept too much within bounds, and ſaid leſs than he deſerved.

[o] The queen ſettled 300l. a year upon his widow, who had ſo little proviſion made for her, that the money which was raiſed by the ſale of the copy of Tillotſon's ſermons, publiſhed by Dr. Barker, amounting to 2500l. (the largeſt ſum that had 'till then been given for any copy) was the greateſt part of what was left her.

too high; ſo the perſon moſt approved of by the miniſtry, as well as univerſally well liked by the people, was Dr. Tenniſon, biſhop of Lincoln, who for ſerving the cure of St. Martin's in the worſt time, with ſo much courage and diſcretion, had now many friends, and no enemies. Accordingly he was tranſlated to the ſee of Canterbury on January 10, 1694-5, and had the privilege of recommending Dr. James Gardner to the ſee of Lincoln, which he had reſigned.

About a month after Tillotſon's death, the queen was taken ill, but the next day her illneſs ſeemed to go off. The day following ſhe went abroad; but her illneſs returned ſo heavily on her, that ſhe could diſguiſe it no longer. She ſhut herſelf up in her cloſet that night ſome hours, and, burning many papers, put the reſt in order. After that, ſhe uſed ſome ſl ght remedies, thinking it was only a tranſient indiſpoſition; but it increaſed upon her, and within two days after the ſmall-pox (which then raged about London) appeared with very bad ſymptoms. It is ſaid, the phyſician's part was univerſally condemned, and that her death was imputed to the negligence or unſkilfulneſs of Dr. Ratcliffe. He was called for; and it appeared, but too evidently, that his opinion was chiefly conſidered, and moſt depended on. Other phyſicians were afterwards called, but not till it was too late. The king was ſtruck with this beyond expreſſion. On the ſecond day of her illneſs he paſſed the bill for frequent parliaments, which if he had not done that day, it is very probable he would never have paſſed it.

Never was ſuch a face of univerſal ſorrow ſeen in a court, or in a town, as at this time: All people, men and women, young and old, could ſcarce refrain from tears: On Chriſtmas day, the ſmall-pox ſunk ſo entirely, and the queen felt herſelf ſo well upon it, that it was for a while concluded ſhe had the meaſles, and that the danger was over. This hope was ill grounded, and of a ſhort continuance: for, before night, all was ſadly changed. It appeared, that the ſmall-pox were now ſo ſunk, that there was no hope of raiſing them. The new archbiſhop attended on her; he performed all devotions, and had much private diſcourſe with her: When the deſperate condition ſhe was in was evident beyond doubt, he told the king, he could not do his duty faithfully, unleſs he acquainted her with the danger ſhe was in: The king approved of it, and ſaid, whatever effect it might have, he would not have her deceived in ſo important a matter. And, as the archbiſhop was preparing the queen, with ſome addreſs, not to ſurprize her too much with ſuch tidings, ſhe preſently apprehended his drift, but ſhewed no fear nor diſorder upon it. She ſaid, ſhe thanked God ſhe had always carried this in her mind, that nothing was to be left to the laſt hour; ſhe had nothing then to do, but to look up to God, and ſubmit to his will; it went further indeed than ſubmiſſion; for ſhe ſeemed to deſire death, rather than life; and ſhe continued to the laſt minute of her life in that calm and reſigned ſtate. She had formerly wrote her mind, in many particulars, to the king: And ſhe gave order, to look carefully for a ſmall ſcrutoir that ſhe made uſe of, and to deliver it to the king: And, having diſpatched that, ſhe avoided the giving herſelf or him the tenderneſs, which a final parting might have raiſed in them both.

The day before ſhe died ſhe received the ſacrament, all the biſhops who were attending being admitted to receive it with her. When this was over, ſhe compoſed herſelf ſolemnly to die; ſhe ſlumbered ſometimes, but ſaid, ſhe was not refreſhed by it; ſhe tried once or twice to have ſaid ſomewhat to the king, but was not able to go through with it. Several cordials were given, but all was ineffectual; ſhe lay ſilent for ſome hours: And ſome words, that came from her, ſhewed her thoughts began to break. In concluſion, ſhe died the 28th of December, about one in the morning, in the thirty-third year of her age, and ſixth of her reign.

She was the moſt univerſally lamented princeſs, and deſerved the beſt to be ſo, of any in our age or in our hiſtory. Biſhop Burnet has written an eſſay on her character, in which he affirms nothing is ſaid but what he knew to be ſtrictly true, without the enlargement of figure or rhetoric.[P]

Her perſon was tall and well proportioned; her ſhape, while princeſs of Orange, eaſy and genteel; her complexion light brown, her viſage oval, her eyes quick and lively, and the reſt of her features regular. Her ſtately port and native air of greatneſs commanded reſpect from the moſt confident; but her ſweet and graceful countenance tempered the awefulneſs of majeſty, and her affable temper encouraged the moſt timorous to approach her.

Her apprehenſion was clear and ready, her memory exact, and her judgment ſteady and ſolid: Her ſoul free from all the weakneſſes of her own ſex, and endowed with the courage and ſtrength, that ſeem peculiar to ours. She was neither elated with proſperity, nor dejected by adverſity; and it remains undecided, whether ſhe bore with more temper the ſmiles or the frowns of fortune!

When the neceſſity of affairs called the king out of his dominions, ſhe alone was ſenſible of his abſence, which ſhe fully ſupplied to theſe three kingdoms by her wiſe and prudent adminiſtration. While he went abroad as the arbiter of Europe, to wage a juſt war, ſhe ſtaid at home to maintain peace and adminiſter juſtice. He was to oppoſe and conquer enemies: ſhe to maintain and gain friends. In all this there was an union of their thoughts, and a concurrence in the ſame ends, the ſafety of Europe, the ſupport of the proteſtant religion, and the honour and proſperity of England. An eagerneſs of command was ſo far below her, that never was ſo great a capacity for government joined with ſo little appetite to it; or an authority ſo unwillingly aſſumed, ſo modeſtly managed, and ſo chearfully laid down. It was eaſy for her to reward, for all ſorts of bounty flowed readily from her; but it was much harder for her to puniſh, except when the nature of the crime made mercy become a cruelty, for then ſhe was inexorable.

She had the moſt active zeal for the public, and the moſt conſtant deſire of doing good, joined with ſuch unaffected humility, that the ſecret flatteries of vanity, or ſelf-love, had no power over her. For, when due acknowledgments were made, or decent things ſaid upon occaſions, that well deſerved them, theſe ſeemed ſcarce to be heard, and ſhe preſently turned off the diſcourſe to other ſubjects.

Her piety and virtue were real and unaffected; and the vivacity and ſweetneſs of her temper and converſation ſoftened all thoſe diſagreeable ideas, which the world is too willing to entertain of the ſeverities of virtue, and of the ſtrictneſs of true religion.

She was not content with being devout herſelf, but ſhe infuſed piety into all who came near her; eſpecially thoſe, whom ſhe took into her more immediate care, and whom ſhe ſtudied to form with the tenderneſs and watchfulneſs of a mother. She charmed them with her inſtructions, as ſhe overcame them with her kindneſs. Never was miſtreſs both feared and loved ſo entirely as ſhe was. She ſcattered books of inſtruction round about her, that ſuch as waited might not be condemned to idleneſs, but might entertain themſelves uſefully, while they were in their turns of attendance.

She had a ſublime idea of the Chriſtian religion in general, and a particular affection to the church of England; but an affection, that was neither blind nor partial. She had a true regard to piety wherever ſhe ſaw it, in what form or party ſoever. Her education and judgment led her to the national communion; but her charity was extended to all. She longed to ſee all proteſtants, both at home and abroad, in a cloſe and brotherly conjunction; and few things ever grieved her more, than that the proſpect of ſo deſired an union vaniſhed out of ſight.

Acceſs to her was never obſtructed by ſelf-intereſted ſupercilious domeſtics. She made thoſe her favourites, who made the diſtreſſed theirs. She wondered that the true pleaſure, which accompanied doing good, did not engage princes to purſue it more effectually. Without this ſhe thought, that a private life was the happier as well as the ſafer ſtate. When reflections were once made before her of the ſharpneſs of ſome hiſtorians, who had left heavy imputations on the memory of ſome princes, ſhe anſwered, 'That, if thoſe princes were ſuch, as the hiſtorians repreſented them, they had well deſerved that treatment; and others, who tread their ſteps, might look for the ſame, for truth would be told at laſt.'

Her charity was not confined to her own ſubjects, but extended in a moſt particular manner to multitudes of French exiles, whom the perſecution ſent hither. The ſcattered Vaudois had a ſhare in her bounty; and, when by the king's interceſſion reſtored to their vallies, they were enabled by the queen to tranſmit their faith to their poſterity. She likewiſe took care of preſerving the poor remnants of the Bohemian churches, and formed nurſeries of religion in ſome parts of Germany, which were exhauſted by war. And the laſt great project that her thoughts were working on, with relation to a noble and royal proviſion for diſabled ſeamen at Greenwich, was particularly deſigned to be ſo conſtituted, as to put them in a probable way of ending their days in the fear of God.

She was a perfect example of conjugal love, chaſtity, and obedience. She ſet her huſband's will before her as the rule of her life. Her admiration of him made her ſubmiſſion not only eaſy, but delightful. And it is remarkable, that when Dr. Tenniſon, named to be archbiſhop of Canterbury, went to comfort the king, his majeſty anſwered, 'That he could not but grieve, ſince he had loſt a wife, who in ſeventeen years had never been guilty of an indiſcretion.'

The openneſs of her behaviour was ſubject to univerſal obſervation, but it was under that regularity of conduct, that thoſe, who knew her beſt, and ſaw her ofteneſt, could never diſcover her thoughts further, than as ſhe herſelf had a mind to reveal them; and this ſhe managed ſo, that no diſtruſt was ſhewn in it, nor diſtaſte given by it.

She maintained ſincerity ſo entirely, that ſhe never once needed explanations to juſtify either her words or actions. As ſhe would not deceive others, ſo ſhe avoided the ſaying of any thing, that might give them occaſion to deceive themſelves. And, when ſhe did not intend to promiſe, ſhe took care to explain her meaning ſo critically, that no fruitleſs hopes might be conceived from general words of favour.

Her age and her rank had denied her opportunities for much ſtudy; yet ſhe had read the beſt books in Engliſh, French, and Dutch, the three languages, that were almoſt equally familiar to her. She gave the moſt of her retired hours to the reading of the ſcriptures, and of books relating to them. Next to the beſt ſubjects, ſhe beſtowed moſt of her time on books of hiſtory, eſpecially of the latter ages, and particularly of her own kingdoms, as being the moſt proper to give her uſeful inſtructions. She had a great reliſh, as well as a great love, for poetry, but loved it beſt, when it was converſant about divine and moral ſubjects; and ſhe would often expreſs her concern for the defilement of the Engliſh ſtage.

She had no reliſh for thoſe indolent diverſions, which are too common conſumers of moſt people's time, and which make as great waſtes on their minds, as they do on their fortunes. If ſhe uſed them ſometimes, it was only in compliance with forms, becauſe ſhe was unwilling to ſeem to cenſure others with too harſh a ſeverity.

She gave her minutes of leiſure with the greateſt delight to architecture and gardening. She had no other inclination, beſides this, to any diverſion,

The king's affliction for her death was as great as it was juſt; it was greater than thoſe, who knew him beſt, thought his temper capable of. When ſhe died, his ſpirits ſunk ſo low, that there was reaſon to apprehend that he was following her; for ſome weeks after he was ſo little maſter of himſelf, that he was not capable of minding buſineſs, or of ſeeing company.

There are two things that ſeem to caſt ſome reflection on the memory of queen Mary; her behaviour, when ſhe firſt came to Whitehall, after her father's abdication; and her laſting quarrel with her ſiſter, the princeſs of Denmark. The queen arrived in England the very night before the throne was filled, and appeared ſo very chearful and gay, as if ſhe had not the leaſt concern for what had happened to her father. When ſhe came to her own apartment at Whitehall (ſays the ducheſs of Marlborough, who was then waiting on her) ſhe ran about it, looking into every cloſet and conveniency, and turning up the quilts upon the bed, as people do when come into an inn, and with no other ſort of concern in her appearance but ſuch as they expreſs; a behaviour, which, though at that time the ducheſs was extremely careſſed by her, ſhe thought very ſtrange and unbecoming. For whatever neceſſity there was of depoſing king James, he was ſtill her father, who had been ſo lately driven from that chamber and that bed; and therefore, if ſhe felt no tenderneſs, ſhe ſhould (as the ducheſs obſerves) at leaſt have looked grave, or even penſively ſad, at ſo melancholy a reverſe of his fortune. But biſhop Burnet's account of this incident, entirely clears the queen from the charge of indecency, and want of tenderneſs on ſo moving an occaſion. It had, it ſeems, been given out, that ſhe was not well pleaſed with the late tranſactions, both with relation to her father and the preſent ſettlement. Upon which the prince wrote to her, that it was neceſſary ſhe ſhould appear, at firſt, ſo chearful, that nobody might be diſcouraged by her looks, or be led to apprehend that ſhe was uneaſy by reaſon of what had been done.

This made her put on a great air of gaiety, when ſhe came to Whitehall, and, as may be imagined, had great crowds of all ſorts coming to wait upon her. The biſhop owns, he was one of thoſe who cenſured her in his thoughts. He was of opinion, that a little more ſerioufneſs had done as well, when ſhe came into her father's palace, and was to be ſet on her father's throne the next day. He had never ſeen the leaſt indecency in any part of her deportment before, which made this appear ſo extraordinary, that ſome days after he took the liberty to aſk her, how it came, that what ſhe ſaw ſo ſad a revolution, as to her father's perſon, made not a greater impreſſion upon her? She took this freedom with her uſual goodneſs, and aſſured him, that ſhe felt the ſenſe of it very lively upon her thoughts. But ſhe told him, that the letters which had been ſent her, had obliged her to put on a chearfulneſs, in which ſhe might, perhaps, go too far, becauſe ſhe was 'obeying directions,' and 'acting a part,' which was not very 'natural' to her.

As to the breach between the queen and her ſiſter, the biſhop ſays, it cannot be mentioned without ſome reflections on her memory, and he owns himſelf much troubled to ſee her carry it ſo far. Doubtleſs the queen imagined, the princeſs was in the wrong to ſeek after a parliamentary proviſion, without any previous application to her or the king, and afterwards to refuſe to diſmiſs from her ſervice the lady Marlborough (when the earl her huſband was in diſgrace) though earneſtly deſired, nay, ordered by their majeſties ſo to do; and therefore ſhe might think the princeſs had injured her in not ſubmitting to her will.

However this be, the queen ſaw her not in her laſt illneſs. For though the princeſs, upon news of the queen's indiſpoſition, ſent a lady of her bed-chamber, to deſire that ſhe might be allowed to wait on her majeſty; ſhe received for anſwer the next day, in a letter to the lady that brought the meſſage, that the king and queen had thanked her for ſending and deſiring to come: but it being thought ſo neceſſary to keep the queen as quiet as poſſible, hoped ſhe would defer it.

This deferring the princeſs's coming, (ſays the ducheſs of Marlborough) was only to leave room for continuing the quarrel, in caſe the queen ſhould chance to recover, or for reconciliation with the king (if that ſhould be thought convenient) in caſe of the queen's death. By this delay, the two ſiſters never met; though, (as biſhop Burnet ſays) the queen, when dying, ſent a reconciling meſſage to the princeſs. Be that as it will, upon the death of the queen, the princeſs, by advice of the lord Sunderland and others, wrote the following letter to the king:

SIR,

'I beg your majeſty's favourable acceptance of my ſincere and hearty ſorrow for your great affliction in the loſs of the queen. And I do aſſure your majeſty, I am as ſenſibly touched with this ſad misfortune, as if I had never been ſo unhappy, as to have fallen into her diſpleaſure.

'It is my earneſt deſire, your majeſty would give me leave to wait upon you, as ſoon as it can be without inconveniency to you, and without danger of increaſing your affliction, that I may have an opportunity myſelf, not only of repeating this, but of aſſuring your majeſty of my real intentions to omit no occaſion of giving you conſtant proofs of my ſincere reſpect and concern for your perſon and intereſt, as becomes,

SIR,
Your Majeſty's,
moſt affectionate ſiſter,
and ſervant,
ANNE.'

The king, thinking a reconciliation expedient, now that the princeſs was become the next heir to the crown by the act of ſettlement, conſented that ſhe ſhould wait upon him at Kenſington at a time he appointed, where ſhe was received with extraordinary civility. The perſon, who managed entirely the affair between the king and the princeſs, was the lord Sunderland. He had, before there was any thought of the queen's dying, deſigned to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to make up the breach. He alſo perſuaded his majeſty to give the princeſs St. James's houſe, to which the king added, by way of preſent, moſt of the queen's jewels.

But, notwithſtanding theſe and ſome other favours, the good correſpondence, that appeared between the king and princeſs, was little more than an appearance. They lived indeed in terms of civility, and in formal viſits; but the king did not bring her into any ſhare of buſineſs; nor did he order his miniſters to wait on her, and give her any account of affairs.

ons, that were expenſive; and, ſince this employed many hands, ſhe was pleaſed to ſay, "That ſhe hoped it would be forgiven her." When her eyes were endangered by reading too much, and in all thoſe hours, that were not given to better employments, ſhe wrought with her own hands, and that ſometimes with ſo conſtant a diligence, as if ſhe had been to get her livelihood by it. It was a new ſight (and ſuch a one as was made by ſome the ſubject of raillery) to ſee a queen work ſo many hours a day. But ſhe uſed to ſay, 'That ſhe looked on idleneſs as the great corrupter of human nature: That, if the mind had no employment given it, it would create ſome of the worſt ſort to itſelf.' Her example ſoon wrought on, not only thoſe, who belonged to her, but the whole kingdom to follow it: ſo that it was become as much the faſhion among the ladies of quality to work, as it had been formerly to be idle.

She thought it a barbarous diverſion, which reſulted from the misfortunes, imperfections, or follies of others; and ſhe ſcarce ever expreſſed a more entire ſatisfaction in a ſermon, than in that of archbiſhop Tillotſon againſt evil-ſpeaking. When ſhe thought ſome were guilty of it, ſhe would aſk them, if they had read that ſermon? Which was underſtood to be a reprimand, though in the ſofteſt manner. She had indeed one of the bleſſings of virtue, that does not always accompany it; for ſhe was as free from cenſures, as ſhe was from deſerving them.

In thoſe ſteps of her later years, which, at firſt appearance, ſeemed capable of hard conſtruction, ſhe weighed the reaſons, which ſhe went upon, with great caution and exactneſs. Her inclinations lay ſtrong to a duty, that nature had put her under; but ſhe was determined to accept the crown, becauſe ſhe was perſuaded, that there was no other viſible means left to preſerve the proteſtant religion, not only here, but every where elſe. And, when the famous battle of the Boyne was fought, her concern was equally divided between a father and an huſband.

She received the intimations of approaching death with an entire reſignation to the will of God; and, when in the cloſeſt ſtruggle with that King of terrors, ſhe preſerved a perfect tranquillity. The melancholy ſighs of all, who came near her, could not diſcompoſe her. She then declared, 'That ſhe felt the joys of a good conſcience, and the power of religion, giving her ſupports, which even the laſt agonies could not ſhake.' She received the ſacrament with a devotion, that inflamed as well as melted all, who ſaw it; and then quietly concluded a life, that had been led through a great variety of accidents with a conſtant equality of temper. To ſum up all, ſhe was a tender wife, a kind friend, a gentle miſtreſs, a gracious queen, a good Chriſtian, and one of the beſt of women.

BOOK XXV. SECT. II.

From the Death of Queen MARY, to the End of the Reign of King WILLIAM, in 1701-2.

28 WILLIAM III. Alone.

UPON the queen's death, the two houſes ſet an example, that was followed by the whole nation, of making conſolatory and dutiful addreſſes to the king. The lords led the way, and on the 31ſt of December, went in a body to Kenſington, and preſented the following addreſs:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, do with inexpreſſible grief humbly aſſure your majeſty of the deep ſenſe we have of the loſs your majeſty and the whole kingdom doth ſuſtain by the death of that excellent princeſs, our ſovereign lady, the queen; moſt humbly beſeeching your majeſty, that you would not indulge your grief upon this ſad occaſion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal perſon, in whoſe preſervation, not only the welfare of your own ſubjects, but of all Chriſtendom is ſo much concerned. We further beg leave, upon this ſad occaſion, humbly to renew to your majeſty, the hearty and ſincere aſſurances of our utmoſt aſſiſtance againſt all your enemies, both at home and abroad, and of all other demonſtrations of the greateſt duty and affection, that can poſſibly be paid by the moſt faithful ſubjects."

To this addreſs his majeſty anſwered: 'I heartily thank you for your kindneſs to me, but much more for the ſenſe you ſhew of our great loſs, which is above what I can expreſs.'

On the ſame day, the king was attended by the houſe of commons, with the like addreſs, which was ſoon followed by addreſſes, from the city and clergy of London; and from moſt of the conſiderable corporations throughout England. He was alſo addreſſed by the diſſenting miniſters, who had loſt in the queen a true friend; in reſpect of her hearty deſire of uniting to the church as many of the proteſtant diſſenters, as could be brought into the ſcheme of a comprehenſion. For few things ever grieved her more, than that the proſpect of ſo deſired an union entirely vaniſhed by the proceedings of the convocation, in 1689.

[1694-5] The queen having lain ſome time in ſtate in her bedchamber at Whitehall, her funeral was performed on the 5th day of March, with ſuch magnificence, as expreſſed the great affection, the nation had for her. Not only her majeſty's houſhold ſervants, but all the judges, ſerjeants at law, lord-mayor and aldermen of the city of London, and, which raiſed that mournful pomp to the higheſt pitch of ſplendor, both houſes of parliament attended the royal corps from Whitehall to Weſtminſter-Abbey, where Dr. Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, preached her funeral ſermon [q]. This circumſtance of the two houſes attending could never happen before, ſince death had always diſſolved our parliaments. It is true, the earl of Rocheſter tried, if he could have raiſed a doubt of the legality of this parliament's continuance, ſince it was ſummoned by king William and queen Mary; alledging, that, upon her death, the writ, that ran in her name, ſeemed to die with her. This would have had fatal conſequences, if, in that ſeaſon of the year, all things muſt have ſtood ſtill, till a new parliament could have been brought together. But the act, which put the adminiſtration entirely in the king, though the queen had a ſhare in the dignity of ſovereign, made this cavil appear to be ſo ill-grounded, that no body ſeconded ſo dangerous a ſuggeſtion.

The paſſing the bill 'for the frequent meeting of parliaments,' before queen Mary's death, and even before her being taken ill, was a very ſeaſonable ſtep in the king, ſince he thereby diſpelled the jealouſies, which not only his enemies, but alſo many of his friends began to entertain of the preſent parliament; whereas, had he not given his aſſent to that act, till after the queen's death, people had not failed to ſay, that it had been extorted from him by the neceſſity of his affairs.

Towards the beginning of this ſeſſion of parliament, the popiſh Lancaſhire gentlemen, inſtead of acknowledging the lenity of the preſent government, endeavoured to repreſent the legal proſecution of ſome of their party as a ſtate-trick, and the contrivance of ſome courtiers to enrich themſelves by the ruin of others; and ſubmitted the whole matter to the examination of the houſe of commons. It will be proper therefore to premiſe a brief account of their deſign to ſubvert the government, and of the proceedings againſt them, in order that a right notion may be formed of the grounds of the clamour againſt thoſe proceedings.

On the 15th of June 1694, Lunt, an Iriſhman, (who has already been mentioned) made his diſcovery, and depoſed before ſir John Trenchard, ſecretary of ſtate: 'That he had

[q] This ſermon gave great offence to the diſaffected, who were extremely incenſed at the queen for her conduct towards her father, and Dr. Thomas Kenn, the deprived biſhop of Bath and Wells, wrote a letter to Dr. Tenniſon, dated March the 29th, 1695, upon the occaſion of his ſermon, reproaching him particularly, for not calling upon her majeſty on her death-bed to repent of the ſhare ſhe had in the revolution. And this was a topic inſiſted upon in another pamphlet, printed at that time; to both which an anſwer was publiſhed in 1696, under the title of 'A defence of the archbiſhop's ſermon on the death of her late majeſty of bleſſed memory, and of the ſermons of the late archbiſhop, biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, biſhop of Ely, biſhop of Saliſbury, Dr. Sherlock, Dr. Wake, Mr. Fleetwood, &c. preached upon that and ſeveral other ſolemn occaſions: Being a vindication of the late queen, his preſent majeſty, and the government, from the malicious aſperſions caſt upon them in two late pamphlets, one intitled,' Remarks on ſome late ſermons, &c. 'the other,' A letter to the author of a ſermon preached at the funeral of her late majeſty queen Mary. The author of the remarks on ſome late ſermons makes the following obſervations: 'That the queen was taken ſick and died, in the ſame month when her father laboured under an 'unnatural rebellion,' and about the ſame hour, that he went from Feverſham; and was cut off in the middle of her days, according to the puniſhment threatened, to the breakers of the fifth commandment.' St. Tr. II. 534. So inveterate were the jacobite clergy againſt the queen, for uſurping (as they called it) her father's throne, that one of them inſulted her memory, with this text, 'Go now ſee this curſed woman and bury her, for ſhe is a king's daughter.'

followed the late king James into France, and thence into Ireland: that from Ireland he was ſent into England, with commiſſions from that king to certain gentlemen in Lancaſhire, Cheſhire, &c. to raiſe war againſt king William and queen Mary; that he and George Wilſon, his guide, delivered thoſe commiſſions to whom they were directed; whoſe names he mentioned in his narrative. That, at the inſtance and proper coſts of thoſe gentlemen, to whom he had delivered commiſſions, he bought arms, and liſted and ſubſiſted many for the ſervice of the late king James, in order to an invaſion and inſurrection in that county. That he was twice ſent by thoſe gentlemen into France to the late king, to ſignify their readineſs, and receive his further commands; and, that when he was at London, beſides his employment of buying arms, and liſting ſoldiers, he helped ſome jacobites over into France, and ſecured others, who came from thence, who all of them told him, that generally ſir John Freind furniſhed money for thoſe expeditions, and paid ſubſiſtence-money to them as ſoldiers.' This evidence was confirmed by the teſtimony of George Wilſon, who guided and aſſiſted Lunt in the delivery of king James's commiſſions, and by the depoſitions and affidavits of ſeveral perſons, (ſome at a great diſtance from, and utter ſtrangers to one another) all agreeing in the moſt material circumſtances of the Lancaſhire conſpiracy.

The government being fully informed of the plot, warrants were iſſued out to ſeize the conſpirators; and though, for the greater ſecrecy, the names of the offenders were not put into the warrant at the ſecretary's office by thoſe who drew the warrants, but were afterwards put in by the ſecretaries themſelves, yet, by ſome treacherous correſpondence, the Lancaſhire gentlemen had notice given them of all proceedings at London. Upon this they burnt their commiſſions, buried their arms and other warlike equipage, underground, and moſt of them fled from their habitations. However, through the extraordinary care and diligence of captain Baker, and others employed in the ſervice, ſome of the plotters were apprehended, and arms enough found to convince the world, that there was a treaſonable deſign on foot againſt the government. There was likewiſe found in Mr. Standiſh's cloſet, at the ſearch made at Standiſh-hall, on the 16th of July 1694, the draught of a remonſtrance or declaration, to be printed and publiſhed at king James's landing; which, according to Mr. Croſby's papers, and Mr. Robinſon's depoſitions, was to be attempted very ſpeedily.

As many of the perſons accuſed, as could be apprehended, being brought up to London, and examined, were, ſome of them committed to the Tower, and others to Newgate, where they continued about a month. During this time, their friends and ſollicitors exerted all their ſkill and diligence to take off the king's evidence, both by offering them large ſums of money, as was atteſted by Mr. Baker, Mrs. Hearſt, Mr. Clayton, Mr. Brown, and Mrs. Elliot; and that failing, by finding out perſons, who would repreſent the king's witneſſes under heinous characters, that the jury might give no credit to their depoſitions. Many perſons were practiſed upon, ſome of whom refuſed ſo baſe an action; but others, through great importunities and promiſes of large rewards, were prevailed with to defame the king's evidences, both at Mancheſter, and in the parliament-houſe. But that, which raiſed the great clamour againſt the diſcovery of the plot, was the gaining one Taffe, alias Thomas O'Mullen, an Iriſhman, to the other ſide; which happened in this manner.

In December 1693, Lunt came from France, and being, as he afterwards pretended, troubled in conſcience, for having engaged in the barbarous deſign of aſſaſſinating the king, reſolved to atone for that crime, by diſcovering all he knew, that had been acted, or was then plotting againſt his majeſty. His coming over was made known to Mr. Taffe, a familiar acquaintance of Lunt's wife, and who was repreſented to Lunt as a perſon, that had done ſome conſiderable ſervice to the public [r]. To him Lunt's wife had told, that her huſband was lately come out of France; which made Taffe, who pretended to be zealous for the government, enquire how matters ſtood at St. Germains? adding, that, if Lunt could diſcover any thing, that might be ſerviceable to their majeſties, he would introduce him to a perſon, that would receive his information. Lunt gives credit to Taffe, ſhews his willingneſs to make a diſcovery, and thereupon Taffe brings him to the earl of Bellamont, and vouches for his honeſty. After his lordſhip had heard Lunt's relation, he commanded him to wait on him again in two or three days; which Lunt obeying, and his lordſhip being ſomewhat indiſpoſed, he ſent Lunt with a letter to ſir John Trenchard. Taffe accompanied him thither, and the ſecretary, hearing what Lunt had to diſcover, firſt ſent him into Kent, and afterwards commanded him to put his depoſitions into writing, and bring them to him. Lunt performed it; Taffe heard all the information read, aggravated the crimes, and appeared the moſt forward of any to have the perſons accuſed brought to juſtice; and, pretending to be ſerviceable in knowing the country and people there, he went down into Lancaſhire with Mr. Aaron Smith and Mr. Baker, and aſſiſted the king's meſſengers in ſearching at Standiſh-hall, and other places.

Taffe ſhewed an extraordinary zeal in his majeſty's ſervice, but might have been much more uſeful than he was in finding concealed arms and perſons, if he had made more uſe of his head and leſs of his fingers. The managers of that affair, and the king's meſſengers, quickly perceiving his pilfering practices to be very injurious to the inhabitants, and no leſs ſcandalous to themſelves, were forced to have as watchful an eye upon him, as upon the buſineſs they were employed in; though, notwithſtanding all their care, he committed ſome groſs felonies. Soon after he came to London, he waited on the lord Bellamont, gave his lordſhip an account of what perſons and arms had been ſeized, that ſeveral gentlemen had made their eſcapes, and that others abſconded to ſecure themſelves: Whereupon the lord Bellamont aſked Taffe, If this was the buſineſs, which Lunt had diſcovered? Taffe anſwered, it was, and that Lunt was the main evidence of the conſpiracy; was very well known at the reſpective places, which he had mentioned in his depoſitions; and had done greater ſervice at his being there, if the Lancaſhire gentlemen had not received notice from London of their coming ten days before they came to Standiſh-Hall. This account being given to the lord Bellamont, Taffe addreſſed himſelf to Mr. Aaron Smith and captain Baker, for the reward of his ſervice; but, finding himſelf ſlighted and reprimanded for his ſcandalous behaviour, he grew angry, and reſolved to revenge himſelf upon the government, even to the ſpoiling of the plot. The friends, relations, and ſollicitors of the priſoners were no ſooner acquainted with his deſign, but the bargain was ſtruck, and his terms agreed to: Twenty pounds were paid him in hand, with aſſurance (as was afterwards ſworn in the houſe of lords) of a good annuity for life, to be ſettled in Lancaſhire; and, leſt he ſhould cool, he was immediately ſent into the country to be their counter-evidence, when the trials ſhould commence at Mancheſter.

Having thus gained Taffe, and got from unwary Lunt the names of the king's witneſſes, and the whole matter of the evidence, the next attempt for defeating the whole plan was engaging Ferguſon to write in defence of the Lancaſhire gentlemen, and to aſperſe their accuſers, and this ſtratagem had ſuch a notable effect, that the popiſh mob at Mancheſter animated by reading Ferguſon's paper (which was almoſt in every hand in that county) had reſolved to prevent the trials of the priſoners, by ſtoning the king's evidences to death. But thoſe, who knew they would be acquitted, prevailed with the mob to forbear the execution of that inhuman reſolution till the trials were ended. And indeed, no ſooner were the trials over, and the witneſſes leaving the town, but the mob endeavoured to ſtone them to death, and in ſuch a violent and tumultuous manner, that not only the witneſſes, but a gentleman of the council for the king, the king's proſecutor, and the king's clerk in the crown-office, very narrowly eſcaped with their lives.

The trials began at Mancheſter the 16th of October 1694, where the king's evidence proved, 'That the priſoners at the bar had received commiſſions from the late king James, to raiſe war againſt the preſent government; and to that end had bought arms, liſted and ſubſiſted ſoldiers at their own charge, &c.' It is affirmed, that ſir William Williams, though then one of the council for the king, endeavoured to baffle and confound the king's witneſſes, by aſking them ſeveral frivolous queſtions; but, failing in that, he required Lunt to point at the ſeveral priſoners by name. In doing this, Lunt happened to point at a wrong man, which miſ-

[r] Taffe was an Iriſh prieſt, who had not only changed his religion, but had married in king James's time. He came into the ſervice of the preſent government, and had a ſmall penſion. He was long in purſuit of a diſcovery of the impoſture in the birth of the prince of Wales, and was engaged with more ſucceſs in diſcovering the concealed eſtates of the prieſts and the religious orders, in which ſome progreſs was made. This ſeemed to be ſure evidences of the man's ſincerity, at leaſt in his oppoſition to thoſe, whom he had forſaken, and whom he was provoking in ſo ſenſible a manner. This is mentioned chiefly to ſhew, how little that ſort of men are to be depended on. He poſſeſſed thoſe, to whom his other diſcoveries gave him acceſs, of the importance of this Lunt, and was very zealous in ſupporting Lunt's credit, and in aſſiſting him in his diſcoveries. Burnet, II. 142.

take might be occaſioned by the crowd. However, this gratified the popiſh mob, and raiſed a loud laugh. But their mirth continued not long; for, another of the judges commanding Lunt to touch and name all the accuſed gentlemen with the cryer's ſtaff, he named them all right.

Witneſſes were afterwards produced for the priſoners, but nothing was alledged by them, that could invalidate the king's evidence, except Taffe's teſtimony, who boldly declared, 'That there was no truth in the pretended plot, the whole being a villainous contrivance between himſelf and Lunt;' which ſingle declaration, without any oath, outweighed the teſtimonies of the ten poſitive witneſſes for the king; and thereupon ſir William Williams, the chief manager of the trial, ſat down in the court, and would examine no more witneſſes againſt the priſoners. And ſo, without calling for the reſt of the evidence, the matter was let fall, and, when the judges gave the charge to the jury, it was in favour of the priſoners; ſo that they were acquitted, and thoſe, that were ordered to be tried after them, were all diſcharged without trial.

The whole party triumphed upon this as a victory, and complained both of the miniſters of ſtate and of the judges; and ſir William Williams, being returned to London, repreſented the plot as a wicked and horrible contrivance; upon which the government, in abhorrence of ſuch a deſign, immediately ordered the witneſſes to be proſecuted for a conſpiracy againſt the lives and eſtates of the Lancaſhire and Cheſhire gentlemen. This ſtrange turn being given to the affair, many of the wiſer ſort of thoſe, who were friends to the accuſed gentlemen, and dreaded the conſequence of a further inquiry, adviſed them to ſit down quietly, and leave it to the government to puniſh their accuſers, if they ſaw fit; but ſome lawyers over-ruled this advice, and ſo the Lancaſhire and Cheſhire gentlemen, on the 24th of November, 1694, brought the affair into the houſe of commons.

While this affair was depending, ſeveral witneſſes were procured againſt the king's evidences in parliament, by downright bribery, and by telling them, that they were not to be put to their oaths; and therefore, not being in danger of perjury, might ſafely and confidently tell all the ſtories, that were dictated to them [s]. Indirect means were alſo uſed to aſperſe the earl of Macclesfield, at that time lord lieutenant of the county of Lancaſter, who, being a profeſſed friend to the government, was, of conſequence, thought by the Jacobites their mortal enemy.

The houſe of commons, after ſeveral hearings, ſtrict examinations, and long debates, which continued at the ſeveral appointed times, the ſpace of eleven weeks, on the 6th of February, 'proceeded farther in reading the information and papers delivered into the houſe by Mr. Aaron Smith, touching the late proceedings and trials in Lancaſhire and Cheſhire. Mr. Lunt's information was read; as alſo Mr. Wilſon's and Mr. Womball's; and other papers delivered into the houſe by Mr. Aaron Smith were likewiſe read; among which were ſeveral printed papers. Whereupon the houſe came to the following reſolutions; firſt, That there did appear to the houſe, 'That there was ſufficient grounds for the proſecution and trials of the gentlemen at Mancheſter.' And, ſecondly, That upon the informations and examinations before this houſe, it doth appear, 'That there was a dangerous plot carried on againſt the king and government.' At the ſame time the commons ordered an act of the pretended parliament of Ireland, held in the year 1689, recognizing the late king James, and two proclamations of that abdicated prince, to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Beſides this, the houſe, after having given an order for the taking Mr. Standiſh, of Standiſh-hall, in Lancaſhire, into cuſtody, and their meſſenger reporting, that he was not to be found, addreſſed the king to iſſue out a proclamation to apprehend him.

This diſappointment in the houſe of commons was no ſmall mortification to the Jacobites; yet, in hopes of better ſucceſs they laid their complaints alſo before the houſe of peers, where, after examining ſome witneſſes, and many debates, the queſtion being put, 'Whether the government had ſufficient cauſe to proſecute the Lancaſhire and Cheſhire gentlemen?' It was carrried in the affirmative; though the earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham appeared with great zeal on the other ſide, and in concluſion proteſted againſt the vote, by which the lords juſtified the proceedings againſt thoſe gentlemen.

The accuſed gentlemen, notwithſtanding theſe diſappointments, at the next Lancaſter aſſizes in Auguſt 1695, brought on trials upon an information of perjury againſt Lunt, Womball, and Wilſon, three of the king's witneſſes, who were all found guilty; and afterwards indicted for a conſpiracy againſt the lives and eſtates of thoſe gentlemen. But, the gentlemen refuſing to furniſh the king's attorney and ſolicitor-general with witneſſes to prove the pretended perjuries, the proſecution was let fall, and Lunt, Womball, and Wilſon diſcharged.

This deſign of throwing an imputation upon the government failing, another was ſet up againſt the bank, which began to have a flouriſhing credit, and had ſupplied the king ſo regularly with money, and that upon ſuch reaſonable terms, that thoſe, who intended to make matters go heavily, tried what could be done to ſhake the credit of the bank. But this attempt was rejected in both houſes with indignation; it being very evident, that public credit would ſignify little, if what was eſtabliſhed, in one ſeſſion of parliament, might be fallen upon and ſhaken in another.

The moſt remarkable buſineſs of this ſeſſion of parliament was the inquiry into bribery, and the timely check given to the moſt ſcandalous and dangerous corruption, which had lately tainted, not only the agents of the army, and ſeveral members of the houſe of commons, but alſo the ſpeaker himſelf, and crept into his majeſty's privy council. The inquiry into theſe corrupt practices was as accidental as neceſſary. In the account of it, mention is made of the monſtrous ſums of thouſands, and tens of thouſands; yet, at the firſt, the payment of a petty ſum of ten pounds, or leſs, had certainly prevented the diſcovery, the riſe of which was from the juſt complaint of ſome inhabitants of Royſton in Hertfordſhire againſt the abuſes of officers and ſoldiers in exacting ſubſiſtence-money. This coming by petition, before the houſe of commons, and the petitioners, and alſo Mr. Tracey Pauncefort, agent of colonel Haſtings's regiment, and the officers complained of, being heard and examined, it was unanimouſly reſolved, 'That the officers and ſoldiers of the army, demanding and exacting ſubſiſtence-money in their quarters, or upon their march, is arbitrary and illegal, and a great violation of the rights and liberties of the ſubject:' and thereupon ordered, 'That the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts do lay before the houſe their obſervations of the abuſes and ill practices committed by the agents of the regiments of the army; and that agent Pauncefort ſhould forthwith lay before the houſe a particular account of all the monies received by him from the earl of Ranelagh, and the times of ſuch receipts ſince the 28th of May laſt; and how he had paid the ſums, and when, and to whom, and what remained in his hands.'

Purſuant to this order, Mr. Harley, from the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts, preſented to the houſe their obſervations on the ill practices committed by the agents; which being taken into conſideration, and Pauncefort, upon bringing in his account, being examined, as alſo colonel Haſtings, major Monteal, and ſome other officers and agents, it was reſolved by the houſe, 'That agent Tracey Pauncefort, for neglecting to pay the ſubſiſtence-money to the officers and ſoldiers, that quartered at Royſton, having monies in his hands to do the ſame, be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe.' About a fortnight after Pauncefort was again examined, and refuſing to anſwer to ſeveral queſtions, though required upon pain of being proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity, it was unanimouſly reſolved, 'That, by his abſolute refuſal to anſwer to a matter of fact, demanded of him by the houſe, he had violated the privilege, and contemned the authority of the houſe, and the fundamental conſtitution thereof;' for which offence he was immediately committed priſoner to the Tower.

His brother, Mr. Edward Pauncefort, was next brought upon the ſtage, who being ſummoned, and examined by the houſe, it was reſolved, 'That he, for contriving to cheat colonel Haſtings's regiment of five hundred guineas, and for giving a bribe to obtain the king's bounty, be taken into cuſtody.' Then immediately followed Mr. Henry Guy, a member of the houſe, and ſecretary of the treaſury, who, for having taken a bribe of two hundred guineas for procuring the arrears due to a regiment, to be paid, was ſent to the tower, and turned out of his place. Many were the more ſharpened againſt him, becauſe it was believed, that he,

[s] By the late trial, it had manifeſtly appeared, how little the crown gained by one thing, which yet was thought an advantage; that the witneſſes for the priſoners were not upon oath: Many things were upon this occaſion witneſſed in favour of the priſoners, which were afterwards found to be notoriouſly falſe; and it is certain, that the terror of an oath is a great reſtraint, and many, whom an oath might over-awe, would more freely allow themſelves the liberty of lying, in behalf of a priſoner, to ſave his life.

The

as well as Trevor the ſpeaker, were deeply concerned in corrupting the members of the houſe of commons. He had held his place both in king Charles's and king James's time: And the ſhare he had in the ſecret diſtribution of money, had made him a neceſſary man for thoſe methods.

For the redreſs of theſe things, the commons agreed upon a repreſentation to be made to the king, ſetting forth the notorious abuſes, ill practices, and intolerable exactions, of the colonels and their agents, upon the inferior officers and common ſoldiers, which the king promiſed to take all poſſible care to have redreſſed.[t] Accordingly colonel Haſtings was immediately caſhiered, and his regiment given to ſir John Jacob, his lieutenant-colonel.

Some time before, the king in council was pleaſed to order the chief officers of the army to meet twice a week, at the great chamber at the horſe-guards at Whitehall, to receive and examine all informations and complaints, that ſhould be brought before them, of any wrong or injury done by an officer or ſoldier of his majeſty's land forces, in order to redreſs the ſame. And on the 13th of March was publiſhed his majeſty's declaration, for the ſtrict diſcipline of the army, whereby in particular all officers and ſoldiers were forbid to exact or demand ſubſiſtence-money in their quarters, or on their march.

To get a further inſight into the ill practices of the colonels and their agents, Mr. James Craggs, one of the contractors, for the clothing of the army, was ſummoned to attend the houſe of commons; but upon his refuſal to produce his books, and to be examined before the commiſſioners for taking and ſtating the public accounts, thereby obſtructing the inquiry of the houſe into the diſpoſal of the public monies, it was reſolved, 'that he be committed priſoner to the Tower of London.'

Mr. Richard Harnage, another contractor, refuſing alſo to be examined upon oath before the commiſſioners, a bill was ordered to be brought in to oblige Mr. Edw. and Mr. Tracy Pauncefort, Mr. Craggs, and Mr. Harnage, to diſcover how they diſpoſed of the money paid into their hands, relating to the army. A few days after Harnage was likewiſe ordered to be taken into cuſtody.

About the ſame time a loud clamour of bribery was raiſed againſt the commiſſioners for licenſing hackney-coaches; and the houſe of commons having appointed a committee to examine the matter, they made their report to the houſe, 'That ſeveral of the commiſſioners had, by receiving bribes, and by other undue means, acted corruptly and arbitrarily, contrary to the authority and truſt repoſed in them by act of parliament.' Upon which the houſe ordered the committee to diſtinguiſh the commiſſioners, which they accordingly did; and by their report of the 20th of March, Henry Aſhurſt and Walter Overbury, two of the commiſſioners, were honourably cleared; and the others, Henry Killegrew, Henry Villers, and Richard Gee, declared guilty; upon which the houſe reſolved, 'That an addreſs be made to his majeſty, to remove them from the commiſſion for licenſing hackney-coaches;' which was accordingly done, and they were removed.

From theſe ſmall beginnings, a common murmur aroſe, that an univerſal corruption had overſpread the nation; that court, camp, and city, were tainted; nay, the very parliament itſelf infected. The houſe of commons, being awakened by the alarm, reſolved to ſearch into the bottom of the reigning corruption. They began with appointing a committee, to inſpect the books of the chamberlain of London, and of the Eaſt-India company, and impowered them to ſend for perſons and papers.[u]

The inſpection of the chamberlain's books related chiefly to the orphans affair. The city of London had ſeveral years ſolicited in vain, to have a bill paſſed for payment of the debt due to the orphans. This debt grew into a great burden on the city, during the magiſtracy of Moor, Pritchard, North, Rich, and ſome others. Many hundred orphans ſtarved, for want of their portions, which had been put into the chamberlain's hands, on the ſecurity of the city; but, as the exchequer was ſhut up in king Charles's time, ſo the chamber of London was alſo ſhut up, and bankruptcy pleaded to the demand of the diſtreſſed orphans.

When the management of the city affairs fell into better hands, a committee was appointed to inquire into this matter, who, finding that nothing had been done after three years troubleſome ſolicitation, and that ſeveral bills had been brought into the houſe of commons, for the relief of the orphans, but they were always loſt or ſo clogged, that a bill could not paſs through the houſe in a ſeſſion, thought the moſt effectual way, to prevent the ſtarving of theſe orphans, would be to give ſome men of intereſt what they ſhould require; and engage them to do for profit, what they would not do for juſtice. Accordingly, by a proper application and diſpoſal of ſeveral ſums of money, a bill (as hath been related) paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, creating a fund for the repayment of the debt owing to the orphans, by the chamber of London. Among the ſums diſtributed on this occaſion, it was found that the chamber had made ſir John Trevor, the ſpeaker, a preſent of a thouſand guineas, for the ſervice he did them in this affair. This was entered in their books, ſo that full proof was made of it. It was indeed believed, that a much greater preſent had been made him, in behalf of the orphans: But no proof of that appeared, whereas what had been taken, in ſo public a manner, could not be hid. This was objected to Trevor, as corruption and a breach of truſt, and upon it he was expelled the houſe; and Mr. Paul Foley was choſen ſpeaker in his room, who had got credit by his integrity and conſtant complaining of the adminiſtration. Mr. John Hungerford, a member of the houſe of commons, was alſo found to have received twenty guineas upon the ſame account, for which he was likewiſe expelled the houſe.[w]

[t] The repreſentation was as follows:

'I. That ſome of the agents had detained the money due to the ſoldiers in their hands, and made uſe of it for their own advantage, inſtead of immediately applying it to the ſubſiſtence of the officers and ſoldiers, for whom they were intruſted.

'II. That by their intolerable exactions, and great extortions, upon the officers and ſoldiers, for paying by way of advance, and by their charging more for the diſcount of tallies, than they actually paid, it appeared, that thoſe who ſerved in his majeſty's armies, notwithſtanding they had a greater pay than is given in any other part of the world, they were yet reduced to inconveniencies and extremities, which ought not to be put upon thoſe, who venture their lives for the honour and ſafety of the nation.

'III. That in particular colonel Haſtings had compelled ſome officers of his regiment to take their clothes from him at extravagant rates, by confining and threatening thoſe that would not comply therewith; by which the authority, that might be neceſſary to be lodged in the colonel over the inferior officers, in ſome caſes was miſapplied, and extended ſo as to promote a private advantage of his own, without any regard to his majeſty's ſervice, or to the diſcipline of the army.

'IV. That colonel Haſtings's agent had preſumed fraudulently to detain five hundred guineas out of a bounty given by his majeſty to the officers of the regiment, under pretence of giving them as a bribe to obtain the ſame, to the diſhonour of his majeſty, and injury to the officers; and had taken two-pence per pound out of the money due to the officers and ſoldiers, for which deduction there being no warrant, the colonel, whoſe ſervant the agent is, was anſwerable.

'V. That colonel Haſtings's agent had refuſed or neglected to give an account of the pay due to the captains of his regiment, and their companies, which tended apparently to the defrauding the officers and ſoldiers.

'VI. That ſome of the agents aſſumed to themſelves the liberty of making great deductions, which ſince they knew not how to juſtify, they endeavoured to cover, by putting them under the ſhelter of the uncertain head of 'contingencies,' which gave them the better opportunity of hiding the frauds and abuſes, that would otherwiſe be more liable to be detected.

'VII. That colonel Haſtings had diſcharged an enſign, by putting another into his room, contrary to the true diſcipline of an army; from which the colonels have no right to exempt themſelves, to enlarge their own authority, to the prejudice of his majeſty's ſervice, and of the officers that ſerve under them.

'VIII. That colonel Haſtings had taken money for the recommending to commands in his regiment, to the great diſcouragement of the officers, who were to ſerve in his majeſty's armies, who ought to be ſuch as deſerved their commands, and not ſuch as paid for them.'

[u] The commiſſioners were, Mr. Paul Foley, ſir Richard Onſlow, Mr. John Pollexfen, ſir John Thompſon, Mr. Foot Onſlow, Mr. Thomas Pelham, ſir Samuel Barnardiſton, the honourable Mr. Thomas Wharton, and Mr. Francis Gwin.

[w] The reader may ſee a large account of this matter in the collection of the proceedings in parliament in 1694 and 1695, publiſhed in the ſecond volume of State Tracts, p. 481. The ſubſtance of which is as follows:

The committee reported, That, having inſpected the chamberlain of London's books, they found an order made by a committee of the common-council for the city of London (appointed to conſider of ways and means for ſatisfying the debts due to the orphans of the ſaid city) and dated the 12th of February 1693-4, by which the chamberlain was directed to pay to ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, the ſum of one thouſand guineas, ſo ſoon as a bill were paſſed into an act of parliament for ſatisfying the debts of the orphans, and other creditors of the ſaid city; which ſum was paid and delivered to ſir John Trevor, on the 22d of June 1694, in the preſence of ſir Robert Clayton and ſir James Houblon. That they obſerved, that the order of the committee of the common-council, which now ſtood dated the 12th of February, was at firſt dated the 13th of February; and that the perſon named therein was put in a different hand. That examining who firſt writ the warrant, Mr. Barrett, the city ſolicitor, owned it was his hand-writing; and at firſt ſaid, that he believed the blank at firſt left therein was filled up with the ſpeaker's name, before the committee ſigned it, becauſe he believed they would not ſet their hands to a blank. But all the committee who ſigned it, and who appeared upon ſummons, declared moſt of them poſitively, that there was a blank for the perſon's name, when they ſigned it; and the reſt being doubtful, Mr. Barrett then ſaid, that the blank might be filled up afterwards, though he could not tell the time: However, he owned he filled it up with another pen. That they found another order of the ſaid committee, dated the 26th of April 1693, directing the chamberlain

One diſcovery making way for another, the committee for inſpecting the Eaſt-India company's books found that there were entries made of great ſums given, for ſecret ſervice done the company, that amounted to 170,000l. and it was generally believed, that the greateſt part of it had gone among the members of the houſe of commons; for the two preceding winters there had been attempts eagerly purſued by ſome for breaking the company, and either opening a free trade to the Indies, or, at leaſt, erecting a new company: But it was obſerved, that ſome of the hotteſt ſticklers againſt the company did, inſenſibly, not only fall off from that heat, but turned to ſerve the company, as much as they had at firſt endeavoured to deſtroy it. Seymour was among the chief of theſe; and it was ſaid, that he had 12,000l. of their money, under the colour of a bargain for their ſaltpetre. Great pains and art was uſed to ſtifle this inquiry; but curioſity, envy, and ill-nature, as well as virtue, will on ſuch occaſions always prevail, to ſet on inquiries. Thoſe, who have had nothing, deſire to know who have had ſomething, while the guilty perſons dare not ſhew too great a concern in oppoſing diſcoveries. Sir Thomas Cooke, a rich merchant, who was governor of the company, was examined concerning that great ſum given for ſecret ſervice; but he refuſed to anſwer. So a ſevere bill was brought in againſt him, in caſe he ſhould not, by a prefixed day, confeſs how all that money had been diſpoſed of.

When the bill was ſent up to the lords, and was like to paſs, he came in, and offered to make a full diſcovery, if he might be indemnified, for all that he had done, or that he might ſay in that matter. The enemies of the court hoped for great diſcoveries, that ſhould diſgrace both the miniſters and the favourites; but it appeared, that, whereas both king Charles and king James had obliged the company, to make them a yearly preſent of 10,000l. that the king had received this but once; and that, though the company offered a preſent of 50,000l. if the king would grant them a new charter, and conſent to an act of parliament confirming it, the king had refuſed to hearken to it. There were indeed preſumptions, that the marquis of Caermarthen had taken a preſent of 5000 guineas, which were ſent back to ſir Thomas Cooke, the morning before he was to make his diſcovery. The lords appointed twelve of their body to meet with twenty-four of the houſe of commons, to examine into this matter; but they were ſo ill ſatisfied with the account, that was given them, by the four perſons who had been intruſted with this ſecret, that by a particular act, that paſſed both houſes, they were committed to the Tower of London, till the end of the next ſeſſion of parliament, and reſtrained from diſpoſing of their eſtates, real or perſonal.

Theſe were proceedings of an extraordinary nature, which could not be juſtified, but from the extraordinary occaſion that was given for them. Some ſaid this looked like the ſetting up a court of inquiſition, when new laws were made on purpoſe to diſcover ſecret tranſactions; and that no bounds could be ſet to ſuch a method of proceeding. Others ſaid, that, when entries were made of ſuch ſums, ſecretly diſpoſed of, it was as juſt for a parliament to force a confeſſion, as it was common in the courſe of the law to ſubpœna a man, to declare all his knowledge of any matter, how ſecretly ſoever it might have been managed, and what perſon ſoever might have been concerned in it. The lord preſident felt, that he was deeply wounded with this diſcovery; for while the act againſt Cooke was paſſing in the houſe of lords, he took occaſion to affirm, with ſolemn proteſtations, that he himſelf was not at all concerned in that matter; but now all had broke out: One Firebraſs, a merchant, employed by the Eaſt-India company, had treated with Bates, a friend of the marquis of Caermarthen's: and for the favour that lord was to do them, in procuring them a new charter, Bates was to have for his uſe five thouſand guineas. But now a new turn was to be given to all this: Bates ſwore, that he indeed received the money, and that he offered it to that lord, who poſitively refuſed to take it: But, ſince it was already paid in, he adviſed Bates to keep it to himſelf: though by the examination, it appeared, that Bates was to have five hundred pounds for his own negotiating the affair: It did alſo appear, that the money was paid to one of that lord's ſervants; but he could not be come at: Upon this diſcovery, the houſe of commons voted an impeachment for a miſdemeanour againſt the lord preſident; he, to prevent that, deſired to be heard to ſpeak to that houſe in his own juſtification; when he was before them, he ſet out the ſervices that he had done the nation, in terms that were not thought very decent; he aſſumed the greateſt ſhare of the honour of the revolution to himſelf; he expreſſed a great uneaſineſs to be brought under ſo black an imputation, from which he cleared himſelf as much as words could do; in the end, he deſired a preſent trial. Articles were upon that brought againſt him; he, in anſwer to theſe, denied his having received the money. But his ſervant, whoſe teſtimony only could have cleared that point, diſappearing, the ſuſpicion ſtuck ſtill on him. It was intended to hang up the matter to another ſeſſion; but an act of grace came in the end of this, with an exception indeed as to corruption; yet this whole diſcovery was let fall, and it was believed too many of all ſides were concerned in it: For, by a common conſent, it was never revived [x].

Whilſt the lords were debating on the duke of Leeds's aflain to pay to Paul Jodrell, eſq; the ſum of a hundred guineas, for his pains and ſervice in aſſiſting the orphans bill to paſs in parliament; which ſum was paid him the 22d of June 1694. That in the chamberlain's books were entered ſeveral ſums paid to Mr. Barrett, to defray the charge of drawing the bill, making copies thereof, and of the petitions and orders relating to the ſame; amongſt which payments they found five guineas paid to Mr. Solicitor-general for his advice therein, five guineas to Mr. Harcourt, twenty guineas to Mr. Hungerford, chairman of the grand committee, for his pains and ſervice, and 60l. 9s. to Mr. Jodrell. That they underſtood, that the orphans, for the procuring of this bill, had given bond to Mr. Smith and Mr. Charles Nois, to allow them 12d. in the pound, when the bill was paſſed, for their pains and charges in that matter; which contract being made void in that bill, the court of aldermen were impowered to ſatisfy them for their real expences. That upon this Smith and Nois applied themſelves to the court of aldermen, and got a petition to be ſigned by many of the orphans, that they were willing, notwithſtanding the act of parliament, they ſhould be allowed 12d. in the pound. That the ſaid Nois and Smith brought in a bill to the committee of the common-council of their charges, amounting to 3457l. 16s. but, as was alledged, they pretended to be more than 10,000l. out of purſe; by which argument they got ſubſcriptions to the ſaid petition; in which bill there was charged 1650l. paid to Mr. George Finch, for carrying on the ſaid act. That Mr. Nois and Mr. Smith being examined, they utterly denied that they had given any money to any member of parliament on the account of the ſaid bill, or knew of any to be given; but they were willing to get what they could, having taken a great deal of pains in long ſoliciting the ſame; and that they did ſay, that, notwithſtanding they charged 1650l. to be paid Mr. George Finch, yet they had not paid him any money; but, having delivered up his bond for the 12d. in the pound, they valued his ſhare of the orphans debt to amount to that ſum. That Mr. George Finch, being examined, denied to have received any thing from Mr. Nois and Mr. Smith, or his paying any money to any member of parliament; but wavering in his diſcourſe, and being again aſked if he ever did diſtribute, or knew of any money diſtributed on account of the orphans bill, he ſaid, It was a hard thing to be aſked ſuch queſtions: That however he owned, that upon ſuggeſtion, that there were obſtructions to the bill, which muſt be removed by money, he applied himſelf to ſeveral of the orphans, and received 100l. from Mr. John Chadwick, 200l. from Mr. Harvey, 100l. from Mr. Scott, and 50l. from Mr. Herne, and had a promiſe of 100l. from ſir John Smith, which was not yet paid. And laſtly, they reported, that Mr. Chadwick and Mr. Herne proved the payment of the money to Mr. George Finch, but could give no account what he had done with it.

The commons, having debated and weighed theſe reports, came to this reſolution, "that ſir John Trevor, ſpeaker of the houſe, receiving a gratuity of 1000 guineas from the city of London, after paſſing of the orphans bill, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor.'

Sir John Trevor, abſenting himſelf from the houſe, the commons, on the 14th of March, reſolved to proceed to the election of a new ſpeaker; and ſir Thomas Littleton and Mr. Paul Foley were propoſed. The majority inclined to chooſe Littleton; but Mr. Wharton, comptroller of the king's houſhold, having ſpoken in his behalf, the commons from thence preſumed, that he was altogether in the court intereſt, and thereupon elected Mr. Foley.

On the 16th of March the commons proceeded upon the abovementioned reports, and reſolved, 'That ſir John Trevor, their late ſpeaker, being guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor, &c. be expelled the houſe.'

Two days after they paſſed another vote, 'That whoſoever ſhould diſcover any money or other gratuity given to any member of the houſe, for matters tranſacted in the houſe, relating to the orphans bill, or the Eaſt-India company, ſhould have the indemnity of the houſe for ſuch gift;' and ordered, that Mr. Charles Nois and ſeveral others ſhould attend the houſe the next day. Mr. Nois attended accordingly, and being examined, it was reſolved, 'That he, having to ſeveral perſons pretended he was out of purſe, or engaged to give great ſums of money to ſeveral members of the houſe, in order to paſs the orphans bill, which, on his examination, he denied to have given or promiſed, had been an occaſion of ſcandal to the houſe and the members thereof.' And thereupon it was ordered, that the ſaid Mr. Nois be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending the houſe.

On the 26th of March 1695, it was reſolved by the commons, 'That Mr. Hungerford, one of their members, having received twenty guineas for his pains and ſervice as chairman of the committee of the houſe, to whom the orphans bill was committed, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor; and that he be expelled the houſe.'

[x] In the collection of the proceedings in parliament mentioned in the foregoing note, the reader may likewiſe find an account of the Eaſt-India company's affair, from whence the following extract is taken.

On the 12th of March Mr. Foley reported from the ſaid committee, that, as ſoon as they came to the Eaſt-India houſe, they called for an account of all monies paid for the ſpecial ſervice of the company: upon peruſal of which obſerving, that the greateſt payment was in the year 1693, they ſearched for the orders for the iſſuing of that money, the chief of which were, one dated the 13th of April 1693, and another dated the 24th of November 1693, and another the 22d of January 1693-4: in purſuance of which the ſums of 22,275l. 24,983l. and 30,000l. were ſeverally paid out of the caſh, amounting in all to 77,258l. beſides ſeveral ſmaller ſums, amounting in the whole to 10,144l. which, with the former ſum, made 87,402l. all iſſued out in the year 1693, while ſir Thomas Cooke was governor, and Francis Tyſſen, eſq. deputy governor, for the ſpecial ſervice of the houſe, and obtaining a new charter. That they found by examination of moſt of the perſons preſent:

fair, and the commons proceeding to impeach other perſons concerned in this corruption, the king came to the houſe of peers, and, ſending for the commons, put an end to the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am come to give you thanks for the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war, in which we are engaged, and at the ſame time to conclude this ſeſſion, which cannot be continued longer without manifeſt prejudice to the ends, for which theſe ſupplies are given; the ſeaſon of the year making it ſo neceſſary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wiſhed our buſineſs at home would have allowed me to have been there ſooner.

"I will take care to place the adminiſtration of affairs, during my abſence, in ſuch perſons, on whoſe care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, but every one of you, in your ſeveral ſtations, will be aſſiſting to them. This is what I require of you, and that you be more than ordinarily vigilant in preſerving the public peace.'

Then the lord-keeper, by his majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the 18th of June.

During this ſeſſion, a bill was paſſed for preventing the clipping and counterfeiting the current coin of the kingdom. The ſtate of the ſilver coin was now extremely bad. There were two ſorts of it; the one was milled, and could not be practiſed on: But the other was not ſo, and was ſubject to clipping; and, in a courſe of ſome years, the old money was every year ſo much diminiſhed, that it at laſt grew to be leſs than the half of the intrinſic value; thoſe, who drove this trade, were as much inriched, as the nation ſuffered by it. When it came to be generally obſerved, the king was preſent at the committees of the Eaſt-India company, where the ſaid orders were made. That the governor in the ſaid committees did only in general, inform what ſums he had diſburſed, without naming the particulars, to whom, or to what ſervice; which ſeveral of them ſaid was a new courſe, ſince ſir Thomas Cooke came to be deputy-governor or governor. That in a ſtate of the company's caſh, dated at the Eaſt-India houſe the 7th of March 1694-5, and drawn up by ſeveral members of the company impowered for that purpoſe, near all the aforeſaid ſums were obſerved to be paid and placed to the company's account of charges general, paid out of cash, viz. in 1688 and 1689, ſir Benjamin Bathurſt governor, and ſir Joſiah Child deputy-governor, 2230l. 14s. In 1690 and 1691, ſir Joſeph Herne governor, and ſir Thomas Cooke deputy governor, 13,532l. 9s. In 1692 and 1693, ſir Thomas Cooke governor, and Mr. Tyſſen deputy-governor, 87,402l. 12s. in the whole 103,165l. 15s. That upon examination of the company's caſh-book, having found that the balance, the 31ſt of October 1694, was 124,249l. they demanded of Mr. Portman the caſhier, if he had the ſame in caſh. That he replied, he had not, but inſtead thereof laid before them in writing, that 90,000l. was lent upon ſir Thomas Cooke's notes (which he produced) with other particulars, which made up the abovementioned balance. That in this note ſir Thomas Cooke owned the receipt of 90,000l. which he had diſburſed and paid for 99,197l. ſtock in the Eaſt-India company for their account; though they did not find any warrant for the ſaid ſum, or any of the ſtock transferred in the company's books for their account, exceeding 18,300l. ſtock the 16th of January 1694-5. The committee of the houſe of commons further reported, that they found a contract, dated the 26th of February 1693, for 200 tons of ſalt-petre, to be brought home in the ſhip Seymour from India, to pay 12,000l. for the ſame, and 25l. freight per tun, beſides all charges here. That 2000l. which was the ſum ſent out to purchaſe the ſalt-petre, was actually paid out of the company's caſh; and that a bond for the remaining 10,000l was given under the ſeal of the company, payable the 31ſt of March 1695, whether the ſaid ſhip arrived in ſafety or not, with this limitation only, that, if 200 ton of ſalt-petre be not laden upon the ſaid ſhip, then to repay in proportion to the want thereof; ſo that the reſult of this contract was, that the company ran the adventure of 12,000l. for that which coſt only 2,000l. and muſt conſequently loſe 12,000l. if the ſhip miſcarried. And, on the other hand, the ſeller got 10,000l. clear, without diſburſing or running the hazard of one penny; and, what is yet more, a certain loſs of 9 or 10,000l. would attend it, if the ſhip arrived in ſafety. That the committee, having examined the members of the company concerning this contract, they owned it to be true. That the 2000l. was paid, and 10,000l. bond given to Mr. Thomas Colſton. That, about the ſame time this contract was made, ſo many of the interlopers, as would ſell their ſhares in the interlopers to the Eaſt-India Company, were allowed their firſt coſt, and 25l. per cent. advance: which was done by giving them credit for ſo much in the Eaſt-India books. That the committee found ſir Samuel Daſhwood, ſir John Fleet, Mr. John Perry, ſir Joſeph Herne, and ſir Thomas Cooke, were preſent at the court of committees, when the orders abovementioned were made; but, they being all members of the houſe of commons, the committee did not think fit to examine them. That the reſt of the committees, who were preſent at making thoſe orders, and moſt of whom had been examined, could give no account of the diſpoſal of the money iſſued out during the time of ſir Joſeph Herne's and ſir Thomas Cooke's government, but only that the ſame was paid for ſpecial ſervice; and that a great part thereof was put into the hands of ſir Baſil Firebraſs: That one of them, viz. ſir Benjamin Bathurſt, ſaid, that ſir Joſeph Herne had the greateſt part of 13932l. 9s. to diſpoſe of; and ſir Benjamin Bathurſt would have called for an account thereof, but ſir Thomas Cooke deſired he would not: That the company's committee of nine had often called upon ſir Thomas Cooke to give an account to whom he had diſtributed the money he received, which he had ſome time promiſed, and afterwards declined to do; ſo that the ſecret of that ſervice, and the placing of that money, lay principally with ſir Thomas Cooke and ſir Joſeph Herne. That, ſir Benjamin Bathurſt finding ſo great a ſum as 30000l. charged for ſecret ſervices, he had ſome warm diſcourſe with ſir Thomas Cooke about it, to know how it was diſburſed; but ſir Thomas refuſed to give him any particulars, and told him, he ſhould remember he was bound by his oath to the company to keep their ſecrets; to which ſir Benjamin replied, 'He was under the ſame obligation to be true to the intereſt of the company.' Sir Benjamin Bathurſt further ſaid, that, about April 1694, underſtanding, that they were in want of money, he looked into the caſh-book; which caſting up, he found a conſiderable ſum in caſh, and, taking ſome perſons with him, diſcourſed ſir Thomas Cooke about it, who ſaid, 'The 90000l. he had received was to gratify ſome perſons, in caſe the bill ſhould paſs.' As for the contract about ſalt-petre, ſir Benjamin Bathurſt ſaid, that it was made by ſir Thomas Cooke and ſir Baſil Firebraſs; but he knew nothing of it till it came into court.

The committee likewiſe reported, that ſir Baſil Firebraſs, being examined, owned he had received upwards of 16,000l. which was for buying ſhares of ſtocks, and which the company had allowed; but ſaid, he knew no ground the committee of nine had to ſay, that a great part of the other ſums were put into his hands. He confeſſed, that he invited ſeveral perſons to come into the company, and offered to lay down money for ſeveral; and that, if they liked it not at the year's end, he would then take it off their hands, which offer he made to 'members of the houſe of commons' among others; and gave an account to the company of his doing ſo, who promiſed to indemnify him. That, concerning the accommodation with 'the interlopers,' the company had a letter from the earl of Nottingham, 'That it was the king's pleaſure, that they ſhould come to an agreement with the interlopers.' That the propoſal to them was 25 per cent, for bringing in their ſtock to the company, and one half of the profit beſides, which one half of the interlopers accepted; but, Mr. Godfrey, and ſome others, ſtanding upon 30 per cent. Mr. Colſton went off with them, and did not come into the company. That Mr. Ward ſaid it was agreed by the interlopers, that only 2000l. ſhould be employed in buying of ſalt-petre: That Mr. Colſton was to have the advantage of it, which he believed was not for Mr. Colſton himſelf, but 'for ſome other gentlemen:' And laſtly, that the original inducement to the leave of the interlopers going out was that agreement with Mr. Colſton.

On the 26th of March, the commons ordered, 'That ſir Thomas Cooke, a member of the houſe, do give an account, how the 87402l. mentioned in the report, was diſtributed; which he refuſing to do, he was thereupon committed priſoner to the Tower of London, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, to oblige him to make the ſaid diſcovery. On the 28th of March, the bill was preſented, received, and read the firſt time; the caſhier of the Eaſt-India Company ordered to produce the warrants for the ſums mentioned, in the report to be paid for ſpecial ſervice or charges general; and the contract for ſalt-petre, offered to the houſe by Mr. Colſton, read and examined. The next day the bill was read a ſecond time, and committed to a committee of the whole houſe, and the caſhier of the Eaſt-India Company produced the warrants, according to order. On the 30th of March, ſir Baſil Firebraſs delivered in an account of the Eaſt-India Company, which was examined, and ſir Thomas Cooke petitioned the houſe, that he might be heard by counſel, before the bill againſt him ſhould paſs; which was granted.

Upon the 2d of April, the commons, in a grand committee, went through the bill, to oblige ſir Thomas Cooke to account, made ſeveral amendments to it, and ordered it to be reported the next day. Accordingly on the 3d of April, Mr. Bridges reported the amendments made to that bill, which were agreed unto, and the bill, ſo amended, ordered to be engroſſed. Upon the 6th of the ſame month, ſir Thomas Cooke's counſel having been heard, the bill againſt him was read the third time, and paſſed, and ſent up to the lords for their concurrence.

At the firſt reading of this bill in the houſe of lords, the duke of Leeds, lord preſident of his majeſty's privy-council, ſpoke vehemently againſt it, having introduced his diſcourſe by a ſolemn proteſtation of his own innocence and diſintereſtedneſs in this matter; which anticipated apology for himſelf, together with the abhorrence of ſo neceſſary a law, began to raiſe great ſuſpicions againſt his grace. On the 13th of April the lords ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, to deſire them, that ſir Thomas Cooke, a member of their houſe, and now a priſoner in the Tower, might be permitted and ordered to appear at the bar of the lords, whereupon the commons ordered, that he ſhould attend their lordſhips, as was deſired. Sir Thomas Cooke being brought, upon his petition, to the bar of the lords, declared himſelf ready and very willing to made a full diſcovery, and ſaid, he would have done it before in the houſe of commons, if he could have obtained there an indemnifying vote. Thereupon it being demanded of him, What he would be indemnified from? He anſwered, all actions and ſuits, except from the Eaſt-India Company, whom, if he had injured, he would be bound to ſuffer the ſevereſt puniſhment. He deſired alſo to be indemnified from ſcandalums; and it being aſked him, Whether he meant ſcandalum magnatum? he ſaid, Yes.

He being withdrawn, the duke of Leeds ſtood up, and declared, 'That he was very glad, that gentleman was come to ſuch a temper, as to be willing to diſcover; whereby that bill was prevented, which his grace eſteemed of ſo pernicious a nature.' His grace obſerved to their lordſhips, 'how the commons took care of the reputation of their houſe, in aſking ſir Thomas Cooke, 'Whether he had diſtributed any money among any of their members? Who purged them by a ſolemn proteſtation, that he had not.' His grace therefore thought it reaſonable, that the lords ſhould have ſome regard to themſelves; and moved, That ſir Thomas Cooke might be called in, and aſked, 'Whether he was willing, upon oath, to purge all that ſat there?' This motion being rejected, the lords reſolved, that the bill ſent up from the commons againſt ſir Thomas Cooke ſhould not be proceeded upon, but appointed a committee to draw a bill to indemnify him.

That committee being withdrawn, and having made ſome progreſs, notice came from ſir Thomas Cooke, that he was afraid he might be miſapprehended as to what he had ſaid concerning a diſcovery, in that he ſaid he was willing and ready; for by ready he only meant willing; and that he ſhould need at leaſt four months to make the diſcovery he promiſed. This was highly reſented by ſome of the lords of the committee, who immediately moved, that the committee might riſe and report to the houſe this freſh matter, and the trifling of ſir Thomas Cooke; ſo that the bill deſigned to oblige him to give an account might now proceed. But ſome lords ſoftened this, and ſir Thomas Cooke begging a favourable treatment, and engaging to diſcover within ſeven days, the committee went on with the bill, 'to indemnify him from actions, which he might be liable to, by reaſon of his diſcovery, to whom he had diſtributed ſeveral ſums of money therein mentioned, to be received out of the treaſure of the Eaſt-India company, or for any proſecution for ſuch diſtribution.'

This bill having paſſed both houſes by the 19th of April, his majeſty on the 22d, came to the houſe of lords, and gave his aſſent to it.

As ſoon as the act to indemnify ſir Thomas Cooke was paſſed, the lords, adviſed to iſſue out a proclamation, that no money ſhould paſs for the future, by the tale, but by the weight, which would put a preſent end to clipping. But Seymour, being then in the treaſury, oppoſed this; he adviſed the king to look on, and let that matter have its courſe: The parliament would in due time take care of it; but, in the mean while, the badneſs of money quickened the circulation, while every one ſtudied to put out of his hands all the bad money; and this would make all people the readier to bring their caſh into the exchequer; and ſo a loan was more eaſily made. The badneſs of the money began now to grow very viſible; it was plain, that no remedy could be provided for it, but by recoining all the ſpecie of England; and that could not be ſet about, in the end of a ſeſſion. The earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham repreſented this very tragically in the houſe of lords, where it was not poſſible to give the proper remedy; it produced only an act, with ſtricter clauſes and ſeverer penalties againſt clippers; this had no other effect, but that it alarmed the nation, and ſunk the value of our money in the exchange; guineas, which were equal in value to twenty-one ſhillings and ſixpence in ſilver, roſe to thirty ſhillings, that is to ſay, thirty ſhillings ſunk to twenty-one ſhillings and ſixpence. This public diſgrace put on our coin, when the evil was not cured, was in effect a great point carried, by which there was an opportunity given to ſink the credit of the government, and of the public funds; and it brought a diſcount of above 40l. per cent. upon tallies.

[1695] After the ſeſſion was over, the affair of the coin was conſidered by the council; and as the late act againſt clipping was far from affording a redreſs of that grievance, it was conſulted what methods ſhould be taken for remedying ſo great an abuſe. Some propoſed the recoining the money, with ſuch a raiſing the value of the ſpecie, as ſhould balance the loſs upon the old money, that was to be called in. This pleaſed ſo many, that it was not eaſy to correct an error, which muſt have had very bad effects in the concluſion, for the only fixed ſtandard muſt be the intrinſic value of an ounce of ſilver; and it was a public robbery, that would very much prejudice our trade, not to keep the value by a meſſage, acquainted the commons, that they had reſolved to nominate twelve of their houſe to be of the committee of lords and commons appointed by the ſaid act and accordingly nominated,

The Earl of Pembroke,
Lord privy ſeal.
Duke of Shrewſbury,
Earl of Mancheſter,
Earl of Bridgewater,
Earl of Thanet,
Earl of Rocheſter,
Earl of Monmouth,
Earl of Marlborough,
Earl of Torrington,
Lord Viſcount Weymouth, Lord Cornwallis,
Lord Godolphin.

Whereupon the commons reſolved, that twenty-four of their houſe ſhould be nominated to be of that committee, who were as follow:

Sir John Thompſon,
Sir Richard Onſlow,
Mr. Bridges,
Mr. Charles Montagu,
Mr. Henry Boyle,
Sir Henry Hobart,
Sir Thomas Littleton,
Mr. Hutchinſon,
Mr. Boſcawen,
Sir Thomas Pope Blount,
Mr. Clarke,
Mr. Pelham,
The Hon. Thomas Warton, eſq.
Mr. Harley,
Sir Walter Young,
Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave,
Sir Edward Abney,
Mr. Chadwick,
Sir Herbert Crofts,
Sir Rowland Gwyn,
Mr. Papillon,
Sir William Cooper,
Mr. Brockman,
Mr. Gwyn.

On the 23d of April, ſir Thomas Cooke appeared before the committee, and, being ſworn, delivered to them in writing his diſcovery of the diſpoſal and application of the ſums of 67,000l. and 90,000l. In the account of the 67,000l. the ſum of 10,000l. was mentioned to be delivered to Francis Tyſſen, eſq. 12,000l. to Mr. Richard Acton, 338l. to Mr. Nathaniel Molyneux, 220l. to ſir John Chardin, 350l. to Paul Docminique, eſq. 382l. to captain John Germain, 1,000 guineas to colonel Fitz Patrick, 545l. to Charles Bates, eſq. and 40,000l. to ſir Baſil Firebraſs; all which forementioned ſums were ſaid to be paid for ſpecial ſervice of the Eaſt-India company, to defray the charges, and acknowledge the pains and ſervices of the aforementioned perſons and their friends, on ſoliciting to prevent a new ſettlement of the Eaſt-India company, and to endeavour the eſtabliſhment of the old; or in conſideration of loſſes they had by the the Eaſt-India ſtock. Beſides 500 guineas paid to the attorney-general, 200 to the ſolicitor-general, and 200 more to Mr. Sambrook, for the great trouble and charges in paſſing the charter, and other affairs relating to the company. As for the ſum of 90,000l. mentioned in the bill, the ſame was ſaid to be laid out in buying Eaſt-India ſtock of ſeveral perſons, for account of the Eaſt-India company.

The original being read by ſir Thomas Cooke, and the committee conceiving it to be imperfect, and not ſuch as the act required, they acquainted him that they expected a more particular account of thoſe matters. Whereupon ſir Thomas Cooke ſaid, 'That as to the firſt ſum of 10,000l. the ſame was paid to Mr. Tyſſen in tallies in November 1692: That he gave him no directions how it ſhould be diſpoſed, but it was in expectation to have the charter of the Eaſt-India company confirmed, and new regulations thereto made. That it was intended for the ſervice of the king. That he could not ſay the king had it; but believed Mr. Tyſſen told him, that he delivered it to ſir Joſiah Child, who delivered it to his majeſty; adding, that it was a 'cuſtomary preſent,' and that in king Charles's and other former reigns, the like had been done for ſeveral years, which by the books of the company might appear. That, as to the 12,000l. next mentioned in the account, that ſum was paid to Mr. Richard Acton about the ſame time, who declared, 'he had ſeveral friends capable of doing great ſervice to the company's affairs, and ſeveral of them would ſpeak with parliament-men.' That he could not particularize who they were, but the end aimed at was to get an act of parliament. That he knew no man beſides Mr. Acton who could give an account, who had that money: That he intruſted it wholly with Mr. Acton, with the privity of ſir Joſiah Child, who recommended Acton as an honeſt and able man, and a perſon capable of doing the company ſervice; the court having given him power as he conceived to diſpoſe of the money by another hand as well as by his own. That the inducements for giving this money were fears of the interlopers going out, and ſubſcriptions for a new company going on; by which they apprehended the company would be ruined. That there was a bill at that time for another Eaſt-India company: and that the king had ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons to ſettle the Eaſt-India trade. That 10,000l. was advanced by Acton himſelf, and not repaid him in ſome months after; which money he believed Acton paid away the ſame ſeſſion; and that the other 2000l. to Acton was for intereſt, and his pains and expences, which were great. That Acton did ſay, 'He could tell ſome perſons employed in that affair: that he did underſtand, that this money was to be laid out for promoting their affairs in parliament: that he could not ſay to whom it was given, but underſtood it went no further than the houſe of commons; and that he found no good fruit by ſuch diſtribution.' As to the 338l. paid to Mr. Molyneux, ſir Thomas Cooke ſaid, that Mr. Molyneux told him, this money was to be diſpoſed of to the lord Rivers; but ſince his confinement, Molyneux had told him, that my lord never had it, and he had made uſe of it himſelf. As to the thouſand guineas paid to Mr. Fitz-Patrick, deceaſed, that Fitz-Patrick told him he had a great intereſt with the lord Nottingham: that he would try what he could do; and he did not doubt but he might accompliſh great ſervices, provided he might have ſuch a ſum of money: that he believed Fitz-Patrick kept the money himſelf; and that there was a promiſe of a farther ſum, if the intended act of parliament did not paſs. That the 545l. was to be paid to Mr. Charles Bates, when the charter was ſettled, and was paid accordingly in October 1693. That he himſelf had no acquaintance with him; but ſir Baſil Firebraſs told him, that Bates 'had acquaintance with ſeveral lords, and named the marquis of Caermarthen now duke of Leeds.' That, as to the firſt 10000l. paid to ſir Baſil Firebraſs, it was paid to him about November 1693. That it was always his apprehenſion, that ſir Baſil Firebraſs kept it for himſelf, to recompenſe his loſſes in the interloping trade. And as to the ſeveral other ſums, which compleat the further ſum of 30,000l. paid to ſir Baſil, that they were paid at one time, though depending upon ſeveral contracts; and that the reaſon, why the 30,000l. was in ten ſeveral contracts, might be becauſe ſir Baſil might have occaſion to diſtribute it to ſeveral perſons: that as to the ſums paid to ſir John Chardin and Mr. Docminique, he believed they were expended in the company's ſervice; and as to the 382l. to captain Germain, that it was paid him to bring him off from the interlopers, and engage him in the Eaſt-India company's intereſt. Laſtly, as to the 90,000l. ſir Thomas Cooke declared, that it was 99,197l. ſtock bought for 90,000l. of ſeveral perſons for the uſe of the company, to make good the contracts with ſir Baſil, if he ſhould chuſe to accept ſtock: that the ſtock was transferred to ſeveral perſons to the company's uſe; that he was accountable for it; that they had his own obligation for the ſame; that part of the ſtock was transferred to the company; and that the other part was ſold to their uſes, and they had the money.'

Mr. Comptroller Wharton having, on the 24th of April, reported this examination to the houſe of commons, ſome debates aroſe about the ſame, and one of the members informed the houſe, that the earl Rivers proteſted he never received a penny; and though he was now of another houſe, he had the ſame eſteem for the commons as heretofore; and that, according to his lordſhip's motion, the lords had ſent for Mr. Molyneux to be examined. Another member obſerved that, as to all the little ſums, ſir Thomas Cooke knew well to whom they were given; but he could never learn to whom ſir Baſil Firebraſs diſtributed the monies he had received; for ſir Baſil would not give him an account of that matter, though often aſked by him to do it: that, on the other hand, Acton would have told ſir Thomas, but he would not hear him. A third member ſaid, that ſir Thomas Cooke's account contained nothing but generals; not one date, not one time, &c.: that as to the ten thouſand pounds to Mr. Acton, he offered to tell him the particulars, and he was unwilling to hear him, but did not doubt but Acton would give a particular and ſatisfactory account of all diſtributed by him. And yet, in the ſame moment being aſked where and in what condition this Acton was, he declared, 'he was a diſtracted man, and not able to give the houſe any account at all.' A fourth member ſaid, 'No man is innocent, if every man be guilty. We cannot be innocent, if we do not lay our hands on theſe men, that have betrayed us and the company; and, I hope, themſelves. Let us go as far as we can, and then we ſhall not be in fault.' And he moved, that Firebraſs and Acton be ordered to attend the houſe the next day. Another member ſeconded the motion; and likewiſe moved, that they forget not a member of their own, who was accuſed for receiving a conſiderable ſum.

In the midſt of theſe debates, there came a meſſage from the lords, deſiring a conference, which was immediately held; and therein their lordſhips acquainted the commons, that they had ſent for Mr. Acton and ſeveral others, in order to have them examined; that they had intimation, that ſir Baſil Firebraſs was near at hand, and would appear; and that their lordſhips were of opinion, that all future examinations of any of the perſons mentioned in the report of ſir Thomas Cooke's account be had before the committee of both houſes, appointed to receive ſir Thomas Cooke's examination; to which the commons agreed. Accordingly, the committee met the ſame day in the exchequer chamber, and ſir Baſil Firebraſs being interrogated touching his receipt of 40,000l. charged on him by ſir Thomas Cooke, and touching the diſtribution thereof, he depoſed, 'that the firſt 10,000l. was given to him as a gratuity for his loſſes, ſome time before the charter of the Eaſt-India company paſſed: that the ſum of 10,000l. was received by him, by virtue of a contract with ſir Thomas Cooke, for favours and ſervices done: that the ſtock, at the time of the contract valued at 150l. per cent. falling afterwards to 100 per cent. the difference was 30,000l. which they made up to him: that the reaſon of the fall of the ſtock was the ſhips not coming in; and that, if that had not happened, he had gained as much as the 30,000l. paid him: that he was poſitive, that the 10,000l. and 30,000l. were for himſelf, and for the uſe of no other perſon whatſoever, except 500l. paid to Mr. Powell, of our ſpecie near an equality with its weight and fineneſs in ſilver; ſo that the difference between the old and new money could only be ſet right by the houſe of commons, in a ſupply to be given for that end.

The lord-keeper Sommers did indeed propoſe that, which would have put an effectual ſtop to clipping for the future; it was, that a proclamation ſhould be prepared with ſuch ſecrecy, as to be publiſhed over all England on the ſame day, ordering money to paſs only by weight; but that, at the ſame time, during three or four days after the proclamation, all perſons in every country, who had money, ſhould bring it in to be told and weighed; and the difference was to be regiſtered, and the money ſealed up, to the end of the time given, and then to be reſtored to the owners; and an aſſurance was to be given, that this deficiency in weight ſhould be laid before the parliament, to be ſupplied another way, and to be allowed them in the following taxes. But, though the king liked this propoſition, yet all the reſt of the council were againſt it. They ſaid, this would ſtop the circulation of money, and might occaſion tumults in the markets. Thoſe, whoſe money was thus to be weighed, would not believe, that the difference between the tale and the weight would be allowed them, and ſo might grow mutinous. Therefore they were for leaving the matter to the

Powell, becauſe he had good intereſt among the interlopers, and was inſtrumental in reconciling differences: that he paid no part of the ſaid ſums towards a charter or act of parliament, nor made any promiſe ſo to do, though he had ſeveral diſcourſes with ſir Thomas Cooke about uſing his endeavours to procure a new charter, it being his intereſt ſo to do, after the contracts were made: that he believed ſir Thomas Cooke might deſire him to acquaint him, how he diſpoſed of the money; but that the deponent told him, it was not fair, but contrary to agreement; and that ſir Thomas was not to aſk him what he did with his own.'

Afterwards the committee aſked ſir Baſil, 'What particular ſervice he did, or was to do, for procuring a new charter?' To which he anſwered, 'that he was unwilling to take too much upon himſelf; that he thought he did great ſervice to the company in ſolicitation; but wiſhed he might anſwer to that at ſome other time, being then much indiſpoſed as to his health.'

The next day ſir Baſil Firebraſs, being again examined, farther depoſed, 'that, having had a treaty with Mr. Bates, whom he thought able to do ſervice in paſſing the charter, and to have acquaintance with ſeveral perſons of honour, he gave two notes for 5500 guineas to Mr. Atwell, payable to Mr. Bates, or bearer: that one note was for 3000l. and the other for 2500 guineas: that he put the notes into Bates's hands, who told the deponent, that he would deal with him for himſelf; and if the buſineſs were done, he would keep the notes, elſe deliver them again: that the 2500 guineas were paid after the charter for reſtoring the Eaſt-India company paſſed: the other for 3000 guineas after the charter for regulation paſſed: that he had theſe notes from ſir Thomas Cooke, and was accountable to him for the ſame: that he believed ſir Thomas Cooke knew how theſe notes were to be diſpoſed of; and that he told ſir Thomas Cooke, that Mr. Bates had acquaintance with ſeveral lords, naming the lord preſident and others: that the deponent could not tell whom this money was deſigned for, or what Bates did with it, for that Bates would not deal on ſuch terms of telling names: that Bates introduced him ſeveral times to the lord preſident, who made ſome ſcruples in point of law, which were removed by the attorney-general: that one day laſt week the 5000 guineas were offered by Bates back again to him, Bates ſaying, that this might make a noiſe; that, if ſir Thomas Cooke thought it too much, he would give it him again; that on Tueſday laſt 4400 guineas was brought to this deponent, and that the other 500 guineas were ſtill in Bates's hands: that ſir Thomas Cooke refuſed to take back his money at firſt, but afterwards conſented to it the morning when he was brought up before this committee: that he believed ſir Thomas had a double account; the one made up with this ſum, the other without it: that Bates would have paid back the whole; but ſir Thomas Cooke ſaid, the account would not be even, if the 500 guineas were brought into that account: that this was no part of the 40,000l. before-mentioned to be paid to this deponent; which ſum, he ſaid, he always underſtood to be wholly for his own uſe and benefit: that they found great ſtops in the charters, which they apprehended proceeded ſometimes from my lord Nottingham, and ſometimes from others: that col. Fitz-Patrick received 1000 guineas on the ſame terms as was with others, if the charter paſſed: that he pretended great intereſt with the lord Nottingham, and that he could have information from my lady Derby, how the queen's pleaſure was: that col. Fitzpatrick ſaid, he would try to prevail with lord Nottingham for 5000 guineas upon paſſing the charter, and 5000l. on the act of parliament; but that the earl of Nottingham abſolutely refuſed to take it: that the deponent heard, that a note, ſigned by ſir Joſiah Child and ſir Thomas Cooke, for 50,000l. was lodged in Tyſſen's hands for about a year, to be paid in caſe the act paſſed; and that it was refuſed, as he underſtood, by the earl of Portland, to whom Tyſſen had offered it.'

Mr. Richard Acton being examined before the ſame committee, depoſed, 'that he received the ſums of 10,000l. and 2000l. of ſir Thomas Cooke: that he told ſir Thomas he had friends, who would take pains to do the company ſervice; but they would have 10,000l.: that he had 2000l. for his trouble in attending two ſeſſions; and that, if the bill for the new company had paſſed, he was to have had nothing: that he did not diſtribute the 10,000l. to members, but to thoſe who had intereſt with members: that ſome of them, to whom he gave money to be diſtributed, were Mr. Craggs, with whom this deponent was concerned in clothing the army, (and who had acquaintance with colonels in the houſe, and ſome notrhern members) Mr. Wallis, Mr. Ridley, Mr. Docminique, &c. and that colonel Goldwell and colonel Dean, who were ſince dead, were the only perſons whom he himſelf gave money to.'

The next day, April 26th, the committee of both houſes proceeded upon the examination of the reſt of the perſons mentioned in their report; and Mr. Bates being ſworn, depoſed, 'that ſir Baſil Firebraſs did apply himſelf to him, to uſe his intereſt for obtaining a charter for the Eaſt-India company, the old charter being forfeited; and told him they would be grateful: that the deponent did uſe his intereſt with the lord preſident, who ſaid he would do what ſervice he could: that the lord preſident, had delivered his opinion publicly, for confirming the charter, and thought the forfeiture an hardſhip: that, having received notes for five thouſand five hundred guineas, he told the lord preſident what ſum he had, and would have paſſed it to his lordſhip, but he refuſed it: that thereupon, in regard he could not very well tell money himſelf, he aſked leave of my lord, that his ſervant might tell the money; to which his lordſhip anſwered, he gave leave; and accordingly monſieur Robart received the money: that after monſieur Robart had received it, he brought the ſame to the deponent, in whoſe poſſeſſion it remained till he paid four thouſand four hundred guineas thereof back again to ſir Baſil Firebraſs, which, as he takes it, was upon Monday or Tueſday laſt.' And, being examined again as to the ſame matter, he ſaid, 'that theſe four thouſand four hundred guineas paid back to ſir Baſil were in four bags, with one thouſand one hundred guineas in each, brought to him by monſieur Robart, within a month laſt paſt. As to the 600 guineas remaining of the 5000, he at firſt ſaid he had ſpent the ſame, and being afterwards examined as to the ſame matter, ſaid, they were at home in his ſtudy, but he may have ſpent ſome: that the reaſon why he paid back the four thouſand four hundred guineas was the noiſe, that it made, and that people might think he had not deſerved them: that the whole five thouſand five hundred guineas were for his own private uſe, and that he might have given them to his footman."

Sir Baſil Firebraſs, being once more examined, depoſed, 'That ſir Thomas Cooke and others obſerving him active, and to have intereſt enough amongſt noblemen, applied themſelves to him to endeavour the procuring a new charter. That ſir Thomas Cooke was apprehenſive, that it ſtuck with the duke of Leeds, and told the deponent, that ſome way muſt be found out to the duke. That he thereupon applied himſelf to Mr. Bates, who would not pretend to talk with the duke, but ſaid, the deponent muſt tell him what the company would do. That he told Mr. Bates, he thought a preſent might be made of 2 or 3000l. That Mr. Bates told him, he went to St. James's, and ſaid he had ſpoke with his friend, and that more had been offered by the other ſide; and that at another time Bates ſaid, that 5000l. had been offered him by another hand on the ſame ſide. Upon which the deponent did not come up to the market: that he acquainted ſir Thomas Cooke with this propoſal, who ſaid, if it was inſiſted on, it muſt be done; and ſo it was agreed to offer 5000 guineas; that Bates then ſaid this was nothing to him; he ought not to be employed for nothing: that therefore the deponent was forced to go back to ſir Thomas Cooke for new orders; and ſo 500 guineas were given to him beſide: that at firſt Bates ſaid, that he would undertake no farther than that the duke ſhould not oppoſe, but be ſilent, becauſe he did not know but the duke had engaged himſelf, by having ſpoke on the other ſide: that the deponent did except againſt this, becauſe he would not let the company's money go for nothing; and it would reflect upon him, if nothing appeared to be done for it; that it was then agreed, that, if the duke did act in favour of the company, he ſhould have 2 or 3000 guineas, and Bates 500 guineas to himſelf; that the deponent would have put off Bates's 500 guineas to the laſt, to engage him to take the more pains; but Bates ſaid, his friend would have him have the 500 guineas to himſelf firſt. Sir Baſil produced a copy of Mr. Bates's receipt of a note for 3000 guineas, which he thereby promiſed not to call for till the charter ſhould paſs: the original Mr. Bates had back, when the money was paid, and the deponent had not taken a copy of the counter-note for 2500 guineas. He further ſaid, that, after the charter was paſſed in October, he ſent to Mr. Bates, that he might call for the money; and he called for it in two or three days: that the other note was paid in a week after the paſſing the ſecond charter: that from the time the notes were given they had free acceſs to the lord preſident, and found him eaſy and willing to give the company his aſſiſtance: that Mr. Bates was ſhy, and called it his friend at St James's: that the condition of one draft of a counter-note, which Mr. Bates brought, was worded, in caſe the lord preſident did not aſſiſt the company in paſſing the charter; to which this deponent made an alteration, by putting out his lordſhip's name, and making it not payable, in caſe the charter ſhould not paſs, or to that effect: that, about a week before the money was brought back again, the deponent went to Bates's about it, who then told him, it was all for himſelf: that on ſunday night laſt, or monday, Bates being at his own houſe ſaid, he had not the money by him, but he would fetch it; and that the money he thought was in ſilver; but afterwards told the deponent it was only a miſtake, and he had brought it in gold, which by computation came to the ſame ſum: that when this deponent told him, that ſir Thomas Cooke would not take the whole back, Bates ſaid, he could give no anſwer to it till he had ſpoke with his friend: that on monday laſt five hundred guineas were left at his houſe by Mr. Clive, a friend of ſir John Trevor's, who ſaid he brought it from ſir John Trevor, to whom ſir Thomas Cooke had before paid it with his own hands, under colour of an arrear for four or five years, as he had been commiſſioner of the great ſeal, and that the deponent was preſent, when ſir Thomas Cooke gave it; and there was at another time two hundred guineas ordered to be given to the ſaid ſir John Trevor, as a new year's gift, by ſir Joſeph Hearne: that as to 200000l. of the 300000l. before mentioned, the ſame ſums were not actually paid till ſince Lady-day. And as to the other 100000l. he hath it now in ſtock in the Eaſt-India company: that, as to 5000l. part of the ſaid 30000l. he did deſign one third thereof to Mr. Edward Seymour, one third to ſir John Trevor, and one third to Mr. Guy: that he offered the ſame to Mr. Guy, but the latter told him, they did not deſire to meddle with the ſtock, but would do any ſervice they could to promote the getting of the charter. And ſir Edward Seymour, afterwards meeting with the deponent, chid him for making that propoſal, and told him, if he made any more ſuch proffers, he would never have any thing more to do with him: that the depenent told Mr. Guy, that the advantage to them in paſſing the charter and act of parliament would be worth 100000l. amongſt them: that he intended a diſtribution of the 300000l. in the manner following, viz. to ſir Edward Seymour, ſir John Trevor, and Mr. Guy, 100000l. in caſe the charter and act of parliament paſſed; to the merchants interlopers 100000l. and to himſelf 100000l. That he thought himſelf obliged in honour to pay two thirds of the 5000l. when received, to ſir John Trevor and Mr. Guy; and the other third which he intended for ſir Edward Seymour, he kept for himſelf: that ſir John Trevor did ſome time afterwards give the deponent ſome hints of his expectation."

Sir Joſiah Child, being examined, ſaid, 'He never diſpoſed of 40l. of the company's money to his remembrance, always affecting ignorance in that matter: That he did recommend Mr. Acton, as being an honeſt man, and thought he might do ſervice to the company in parliament, becauſe of his acquaintance. That he did recommend it, that a preſent of 50000l. ſhould be made to the king, if his majeſty would ſo far wave his prerogative, that an conſideration of the next parliament. So this propoſition was laid aſide, which would have ſaved the nation above a million of money. For now, as all people believed, that the parliament would receive clipped money by tale, clipping went on and became more viſibly ſcandalous, than ever it had been. For which reaſon an effectual ſtop was put to an act of parliament might be paſſed for ſettling the company; but Mr. Tyſſen told him, the king would not meddle in that matter. That he knew nothing of the 400001. paid to ſir Baſil Firebraſs. That there was a kind of committee of twenty-five perſons, who ſat de die in diem, to deſtroy the company; and that he told ſir Thomas Cooke, that he thought ſir Baſil the fitteſt perſon to divide them.'

Mr. Atwell produced his caſh books, by which it appeared, that on the 9th of October 1693, Mr. Bates had received 5451. 6s. 3d.; on the 10th of that month 2181 l. 5s. and on the 16th of November 3275l. and he ſaid, that the money was paid by order of ſir Thomas Cooke.

Mr. Bates, being again examined, ſaid, he believed the money might be paid as the books expreſſed; and further owned, that he had not 4400 guineas in his houſe on ſunday night laſt, but that the 4400 guineas, which he paid back to ſir Baſil Firebraſs, were brought to him by Monſieur Robart on tueſday morning laſt at eight o'clock.

Mr. Tyſſen being again examined, ſaid, that ſir Thomas Cooke and ſir Joſiah Child gave him a note under their hands for 500001. which was intended to be preſented to the king, if his majeſty would paſs an act of parliament as they ſhould deſire. That he acquainted the lord Portland with the company's intention to make ſuch a preſent, who told this deponent, that the king would not meddle with it. And being aſked, whether he had offered the ſame to the lord Portland, he denied he had ſo done, ſaying, if he had, he muſt never have ſeen his face more. That, when he was examined before the houſe of commons, he did not take it, that the 100001. given to his majeſty was included in the ſum charged upon ſir Thomas Cooke, being before the date of any order for that money.

Mr. Craggs, being examined, gave in an account how he had diſpoſed of and applied 4540l. with which he was charged by Mr. Acton; and denied that he had ever paid any money to any members of parliament.

Mr. comptroller Wharton, on Saturday the 27th of April, made a report to the houſe of commons from the committee of both houſes, of the examinations taken by them; which being read, one of the members ſtood up, and urged the neceſſity of ſearching this matter to the bottom, and to provide laws for the future, to prevent the members of the houſe taking money. That all imaginable endeavours had been uſed to ſuppreſs all diſcoveries. That 100001. had been pretended to be given to the king, and 500001. offered to buy an act of parliament, or gain their charter. That the facts proved themſelves; and that Mr. Bates appeared an unfortunate perſon, whom the care of his friend (the duke of Leeds) and the ſenſe of his oath, had cauſed to make ſuch contradictions. He moved the houſe therefore, that they would put the matter into ſuch a method, as became their juſtice, and as the ſhortneſs of their time would allow. Another member ſaid, that there were never greater and more general inſtances of corruption; he inſiſted on the neceſſity of a ſpeedy remedy, and that it was very fit that the houſe ſhould let the world ſee, that they were in earneſt. He put them in mind of the practices and arts, that had been uſed to ſtop their diſcovery, ſo that what they had was got, as it were by the utmoſt force and conſtraint; at which they could not wonder, when they now found ſo great a man at the bottom. "But there is, added he, no perſon in a poſt ſo high, that this houſe cannot reach; no man's practice or art ſo deep, that this houſe cannot diſcover. Here have been all imaginable endeavours uſed to obſtruct the enquiry. Firſt his majeſty's name was made uſe of at the committees, with hopes, perhaps, that might ſtop any further ſearch; and, if it were made uſe of there, you may reaſonably expect it was made uſe of elſewhere. But that appeared to be ſo far from being a matter of reflection on the king, that ſir Joſiah Child often complained of it, as a rudeneſs to his majeſty, that what other kings had yearly as a preſent, they had not offered to his majeſty in three years. It was indeed, if not a matter of a right, a matter of cuſtom. As for the earl of Portland, who may be named for his honour on this occaſion, when the great ſum of 50,0001. was preſſed upon him, he abſolutely refuſed it, and told them, 'he would for ever be their enemy and oppoſer, if they offered any ſuch thing to him.' Having thus mentioned the innocent, I muſt, continued he, ſay ſomewhat of the guilty. A ſtop having been put, the duke of Leeds muſt be applied to. Certainly there never was a more notorious bribery, and that in a perſon, whom we might have expected to have been free from ſuch a crime, if you reſpect either the greatneſs of his place, or of his former obligation. It is fit to ſpeak plainly on ſuch occaſions: the houſe ought to endeavour to remove ſuch a perſon from the king's council and preſence. What ſecurity can the nation have, when we are bought by and ſold to one another? We have ſeen our deſigns defeated, our attempts betrayed; and what wonder is it? Can any man think it more ſtrange, that our counſels ſhould be ſold abroad, than that charters ſhould be ſold at home? Certainly, a man may reaſonably believe, that he, who will ſell the ſubjects, will ſell the kingdom, if he can have a ſufficient bribe. What prince can be ſafe in ſuch counſels, which are given for private advantage? Several propoſals, ſaid he in the concluſion, may here be offered for remedy. One, that this houſe ſhould addreſs his majeſty, to remove the duke of Leeds; but, with ſubmiſſion, an addreſs is too mean, too low a thing for the houſe to do at this time, and upon ſuch an occaſion. I therefore move, that we may lodge an impeachment, viz. that Thomas duke of Leeds, lord preſident of his majeſty's council, be impeached by this houſe: Or thus, that Thomas duke of Leeds be impeached by this houſe of high crimes and miſdemeanors, and particularly of corruption in taking a bribe of five thouſand guineas, to obtain a charter and regulation for the Eaſt-India company.'

Though this ſpeech was approved of in the main, yet ſome expreſſions in it were thought too reflecting; and another member ſtood up, and ſaid, "He wondered the gentleman who ſpoke laſt, ſhould ſay that, which he hoped he did not believe: that that lord ſhould have ſold our counſels to France." Upon this the other roſe again and ſaid, "It was with ſome uneaſineſs he ſtood up, for he did not take pleaſure to rake into a dunghill: that he was far from ſaying the duke had betrayed our counſels, but argued only from the poſſibility: that it was as reaſonable to believe one as the other; and that, when honour and juſtice were not the rule of men's actions, there was nothing incredible, that might be for their advantage."

Several members ſeconded the motion for an impeachment, adding, "That ſuch actions as theſe were a blemiſh, if not a ſcandal to the revolution itſelf." And it being demanded, By what law it was a crime to take money at court? It was anſwered, "that if there was not a law, it was time there ſhould be a law to prevent it: that the law of God was againſt the duke, and broke by him: that he had taken the oath as a privy-councilior; that juſtice is not to be ſold by the common law: that there were pa liaments to puniſh ſuch crimes:" It was again ſuggeſted, that it ſeemed doubtful, whether there was matter in this report for an impeachment; and therefore, before the houſe went to an impeachment, they ought to put the queſtion upon the report, and ſee whether it be a crime? thereupon ſome of the duke's friends objected, that here was no law, and ſo no tranſgreſſion; and moved for excuſing him. But the queſtion being put, "that there did not appear that there was in the report made from the committee of both houſes ſufficient matter to impeach Thomas duke of Leeds, lord preſident of his majeſty's council, of high crimes and miſdemeanors," it was reſolved in the affirmative; and Mr. Comptroller Wharton was ordered to go up to the lords, and at their bar, in the name of the houſe, and of all the commons of England, to lodge the ſaid impeachment, which in due time they would make good.

About the ſame time, that Mr. Comptroller made the report to the commons from the committee of both houſes, the lord privy-ſeal made the report to the lords; after hearing of which the duke of Leeds ſaid, "that as he had formerly proteſted himſelf to be clear in this matter, ſo he ſtill denied upon his faith and honour, that he was guilty of any ſuch corruptions, as were ſuggeſted againſt him; and that, if the whole truth were laid open, it would tend to his honour and advantage: that he would be very free in telling their lordſhips, now beforehand, all that paſſed, in which he was any way concerned: that Mr. Bates introduced ſir Baſil Firebraſs to him, and that he had conferences with ſir Baſil Firebraſs upon the ſubject of the Eaſt-India company, which he was concerned for: that ſometime after Mr. Bates informed him, that he was to have a ſum of money of ſir Baſil Firebraſs, and deſired his lordſhip to lend him one of his ſervants (Mr. Bates keeping but a footman) to receive the money, and ſo he lent him monſieur Robart: that he knew nothing of the ſum, but afterwards Mr. Bates came to him, and told him, he had received five thouſand guineas; and that in acknowledgment of the many favours he had received from his lordſhip's hands, he humbly deſired him to accept the ſame; which he refuſing, Mr. Bates preſſed him earneſtly to take one half or a quarter; which he ſtill refuſed, declaring he would not touch a penny of them: that however he told him, ſince he had taken them, he thought there was no need of returning them, that they were his own, and wiſhed him good luck with them. And thus, concluded his grace, I was but a ſhadow to Mr. Bates.'

The duke had ſcarce ended his ſpeech, when private notice came to the houſe of lords, that the commons were proceeding to an impeachment againſt him. Whereupon he left the houſe in great haſte, and, going to the door of the houſe of commons, deſired to be admitted to be heard. This being granted, and a chair placed for him within the bar, his grace ſat down, put on his hat, then roſe, uncovered himſelf, and made a ſpeech to the houſe, wherein in the firſt place, 'he thanked them heartily for this favour of hearing him; and then proceeded, declaring his innocence, and that he had attended ſooner, if he had had the leaſt intimation what the houſe was upon: that the occaſion of his coming was from the two votes upon the report from the committee of both houſes: that he had done all he could to be informed of the particulars, but could not: that, hearing of a report, a monſtrous long report, and finding himſelf concerned, he was earneſt to be heard, to the end he might not lie under the diſpleaſure of either or both houſes. He ſaid, it is a bold word, but it is a truth, 'This houſe had not now been ſitting but for me.' That he had been formerly purſued by the houſe in two points, for being for the French intereſt and for popery: that he had, then, if he might have been heard, juſtified himſelf, and hoped he had ſince, and would by all the actions of his life: that one Firebraſs, by the means of Mr. Bates, was introduced to him: that he had long known Mr. Bates; and, if he was not much deceived in him, he could not believe that gentleman would have tranſacted ſuch a matter, if put upon it: that the evidence was but an hearſay, and he hoped they would not condemn on hearſay: that he would not take up their time by entering into particulars: that there was a money part as well as a treaty part: that, as to the money part, much of it was falſe, and what was true he made no ſecret: that he could, and did ſay upon his faith and honour, that neither directly nor indirectly, he never touched one penny of the money: that he obſerved a great deal of pains had been taken to hook him in this matter by a ſide-wind: that this Firebraſs thought his merit would deſerve 10,0001. and 30,0001.: that theſe five thouſand five hundred guineas were no part of the 40,0001.: that the witneſſes were called in by the committee; but that Firebraſs, after his firſt hearing, deſired to be called in again himſelf, contrary to all rules, which ſhewed him at leaſt a very willing witneſs: that he had a thread, which he hoped to ſpin finer, and make it appear, that this was a deſign laid againſt him long before the naming this committee: that warning had been given him ſome time ſince, that this matter would be improved againſt him; and that Firebraſs had been told, he ſhould be excuſed, if he ſhould charge the duke.'

His grace, in the concluſion, ſaid, 'he aſked no favour, but their favourable juſtice; and that no ſevere ſenſe might be put on what would bear a candid one: that, if it might be, the houſe would conſider what was done, or at leaſt preſerve him from cruelty, and not let him lie on the rack, and be blaſted, until a parliament ſhould ſit again; and that, if they would proceed, it might be ſpeedily, for he had rather want counſel, want time, want any thing, than lie under their or the nation's diſpleaſure; and that, if they would not conſider, the matter might be brought to a determination, and that he might at leaſt have their ſpeedy juſtice.'

This ſpeech being ended, and the duke withdrawn, Mr. Comptroller, attended by many members, went up to the lords with the impeachment; and at the ſame time it was propoſed in the houſe of commons, that the articles ſhould be forthwith drawn up; and thereupon the committee, which were joined with the lords, were ordered to withdraw to prepare the ſame.

Afterwards the houſe of commons took the duke's ſpeech into conſideration, and one of the members ſtood up, and ſaid, 'that by this noble duke's ſpeech the point was now, whether the houſe would arraign the committee of both houſes, or go on with the impeachment? That the duke, when he came to the matter, would not enter into particulars, but paſſed it over with excuſe of wanting time: that he made no excuſe as to the facts: that his argument of a contrivance was, that the five thouſand guineas charged on him was no part of the 40,0001. which Firebraſs was to account for: that this was rather an aggravation of the crime; for ſir Thomas Cooke had a double account, one with, and another without the 5000 guineas; which was an indication, that, if there was a contrivance, it was not by the committee, but with ſir Thomas Cooke, to ſtifle the enquiry, and conceal the corruption: that the ſpeedy juſtice of the houſe was to be wiſhed and deſired; and that, if there was ſuch a contrivance, ſuch a thread, as was mentioned by the noble lord, it was not to be doubted but that houſe, where he was impeached, would clear him.'

Another

this miſchief in the next parliament, by recoining all the current caſh of the kingdom.[y]

The ſame day that the parliament was prorogued, the king declared in council that he had appointed,

The archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Sir John Sommers, lord-keeper of the great ſeal,
Thomas earl of Pembroke, lord privy-ſeal,
William duke of Devonſhire, lord ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold,
Charles duke of Shrewſbury, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate,
Charles earl of Dorſet, lord chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold, Sidney lord Godolphin, firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, to be lords juſtices of England, for the adminiſtration of the government, during his abſence.

In this a great error was committed, which had ſome ill effects, and was like to have worſe. Though the breach was, in appearance at leaſt, made up between the king and the princeſs of Denmark, ſhe was not now, when the king

Another member moved, 'that a committee might be appointed to withdraw, and conſider what was to be done in order to gratify the noble duke by ſpeedy juſtice; and obſerved, that his friend Mr. Bates's contradicting himſelf, was more than the evidence of Firebraſs: that monſieur Robart was a ſervant of my lord preſident's, and was fled: that Mr. Bates ſaid he kept the money in his houſe: that ſometimes he had ſpent it, ſometimes it was in his cloſet: that he did own the money was not in his houſe on Sunday, but on Tueſday morning monſieur Robart brought it to him, but he would never declare from whom he brought it.'

In the midſt of theſe debates, a meſſage was ſent from the lords, to acquaint the houſe of commons, that it was the opinion of their lordſhips, that the diſcovery made by ſir Thomas Cooke was not ſatisfactory, nor ſo full as to entitle him to the benefit of the act to indemnify him; and that their lordſhips deſired the concurrence of the commons: they thereupon paſſed a vote, as the lords had done, and ſent it up by the lord Coningſby.

On Monday the 29th of April, the lords acquainted the commons, that they had paſſed a bill, intitled, 'An act for impriſoning ſir Thomas Cooke, ſir Baſil Firebraſs, Charles Bates, eſq; and James Craggs, and reſtraining them from alienating their eſtates;' to which they deſired the concurrence of the commons. After the reading of this bill, Mr. Comptroller reported, the articles of impeachment againſt the duke of Leeds, 'for contracting and agreeing with the merchants trading to the Eaſt-Indies, or their agents, for five thouſand five hundred guineas, to procure them a charter of confirmation, and a charter of regulations; which ſum was actually received by the ſaid duke of Leeds, or by his agents and ſervants, with his privity and conſent.' Theſe articles being agreed to by the commons, and by their order ſent to the upper houſe, and read, the duke of Leeds repeated ſeveral things to the ſame purpoſe as formerly, adding, 'that this ſtorm, which was now fallen upon him, was ſome time in gathering, and promoted by a faction and a party, who had only a pique againſt him, and that the king's buſineſs had been delayed on purpoſe: that he had an original letter, which gave him an account of this ſome time before it broke out, and it appeared only levelled againſt him, becauſe none elſe were proſecuted: that there appeared a joy, that they could catch at this, for then they ſtopped; and that ſir Baſil Firebraſs was treated with to diſcover only this part, and ſo he ſhould be excuſed from any farther diſcovery.' His grace concluded, with praying for a copy of the articles of impeachment, and of the report of the committee of both houſes; which was readily granted.

The next day, April 30, the commons were acquainted by a meſſage from the lords, that the duke of Leeds had put in his anſwer, to the articles exhibited againſt him, of which their lordſhips ſent a copy to them. Whereupon the houſe of commons ordered, that the committee, who were appointed to prepare the articles againſt the duke, ſhould conſider of and prepare a replication to his anſwer.

Upon the 1ſt of May, the commons read a third time, and paſſed the ingroſſed bill from the lords, for impriſoning ſir Thomas Cooke, &c. and ſent it up to the lords by ſir Herbert Croſts, who was ordered to acquaint their lordſhips, that they had agreed thereto with ſome amendments. On the other hand, the lords acquainted the commons, that they themſelves were obliged, in juſtice, to put the houſe in mind of the impeachment againſt the duke of Leeds; to which the duke's anſwer having been tranſmitted to them, the lords deſired to know when the commons could be ready with their articles, to the end a certain day might be appointed by the lords for that purpoſe: thereupon the commons ordered, that the duke's anſwer might be referred to the conſideration of the committee, and that they likewiſe conſider what was to be done in that matter, according to the courſe of parliaments.

The duke, upon the 2d of May, complained to the lords of the delay of the houſe of commons, in not replying to his anſwer, alledging, 'that the impeachment was only to load him with diſgrace, and that they never intended to try him. And added, that the party uſed great partiality towards him, and did not intend to inquire after others; and that they ſhewed their partiality and ſpleen in their amendment to the bill for impriſoning ſir Thomas Cooke, ſir Baſil Firebraſs, and others, wherein ſir Baſil Firebraſs was to be bailed, becauſe he was the witneſs againſt his grace.' The ſame day the commons reſolved, 'that the offer of any money, or other advantage, to any member of parliament, for the promoting of any matter whatſoever, depending, or to be tranſacted in parliament, was a high crime and miſdemeanor, and tended to the ſubverſion of the Engliſh conſtitution.' Afterwards Mr. Comptroller reported from the committee of the houſe of commons, 'that it was their opinion, that the proper method to compel witneſſes to come in, and give their evidence upon impeachments, is, in the firſt place, to iſſue out ſummons from the houſe to ſuch witneſſes for their attendance; and that it appeared to them, that monſieur Robart, who is a material witneſs for making good the articles againſt the duke of Leeds, had been ſummoned to attend the committee, but could not be found; and, it not being yet known where he is, they are of opinion, not to make any farther progreſs in the matter referred to them, until they have the farther direction of the houſe.' This reſolution was agreed to by the houſe, and an order made, that monſieur Robart ſhould attend the houſe forthwith, and that he be ſummoned by the ſerjeant at arms.

Upon Friday the 3d of May, a motion being made in the houſe of lords, to read the bill for granting to the king a duty upon glaſs, &c. the duke of Leeds roſe up, and told the lords, 'that it grieved him, that he, who was as much as any man for the diſpatch of the money bills, and never oppoſed any, ſhould now do it. But he hoped the lords would conſider his caſe, not only as his, but as the caſe of any of their lordſhips; for it was in the power of a tinker to accuſe at the end of a ſeſſion, and one might lie under it without any remedy. And ſince the commons, by miſmanagement, had delayed this money-bill for ſix weeks, it would not be of mighty ill conſequence, if it ſhould lie a day or two longer. His grace likewiſe preſſed very earneſtly, that, if the houſe of commons did not reply, the impeachment might be diſcharged; for, if it were not, he might lie under the reproach thereof all his life; adding, that he believed the commons would do nothing in it; for, though they had appointed a committee to meet, yet they met but once, and that for form.'

The ſame day the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons acquainted them, that the ſerjeant at arms had informed him, that his meſſenger had been at the duke of Leeds's, and inquired for monſieur Robart, who was not to be found, and had not been ſeen in his grace's houſe for three days paſt. Whereupon the commons deſired a conference with the lords; which being agreed to, their managers delivered a paper to the lords, importing, 'that the commons would make good the charge againſt the duke of Leeds, and were deſirous, that juſtice be done without any manner of delay; but that, in the preparation of the evidence againſt the duke, their committee met with an obſtruction. That monſieur Robart, who appeared, by the depoſitions before the committee of both houſes, to be a material witneſs, was withdrawn ſince the impeachment was carried up; which had been the reaſon the commons had not yet acquainted their lordſhips, when they could be ready to make good the ſaid impeachment.'

This paper being read in the houſe of lords, it was moved and agreed to without any debate, or any oppoſition made by the duke of Leeds, that an addreſs ſhould be made to the king to iſſue out a proclamation for ſtopping the ports, and ſeizing monſieur Robart; which was accordingly done though the proclamation was not publiſhed till about nine days afterwards.

The duke then roſe up, and blamed the commons for doing an unheard of and unprecedented thing, to charge a man with crimes, before they had all the evidence to make it good. That it was ſtrange they ſhould ſay they wanted a material witneſs, and lay it upon him to produce this witneſs; as if a perſon were obliged more to produce evidence to accuſe himſelf, than to anſwer ſuch queſtions, by which he accuſes himſelf. He then acquainted their lordſhips, that in truth he had ſent monſieur Robart to ſee his daughter Leinſter, who went into the country big with child; and ordered him to call at Minns to ſee his daughter Plymouth, it being in his way to his daughter Leinſter's, whither the meſſenger of the houſe might have known he was gone, if he had aſked. That he had ſent a meſſenger on purpoſe for Robart; that his footman waked him about two of the clock on Sunday morning, to let him know, that Robart was come, and was in the houſe, which was as ſoon as he could poſſibly return. That his lordſhip told the footman he would go to ſleep, and would ſpeak with Robart in the morning, when he uſually called him. But, when he aſked for him in the morning, the footman ſaid he was gone; and upon inquiry he found Robart did not lie or pull off his boots in his chamber. That the footman ſaid, he aſked whether the news was true, that his lord was impeached, and Mr. Bates in priſon; which the footman owned to be true; and that his grace believes, that had frightened Robart. That his chaplain had ſhewn him a letter from Robart, with a deſire to acquaint his grace, that he deſigned for his own country, Switzerland, through Holland; from whence he would write to his grace a true account of all the matter of the five thouſand five hundred guineas to Mr. Bates. That he knew by the manner of his writing, by the temper of the man, and by a particular knowledge he had of him and of the thing, that he would not be ſeen here again in haſte. So that, my lords, ſaid his grace, if this man be inſiſted upon as a material evidence, and that my trial is to be delayed till this perſon is forth coming, when am I likely to be tried? I humbly move your lordſhips, that you will come to ſome reſolution, if this matter be not immediately proceeded upon, ſo that I may be tried before the ending of this ſeſſion, that this impeachment ſhall fall.' To which ſome few lords cried, 'Well moved.'

[The collector of theſe proceedings inquires here, whether monſieur Robart might not have been delivered from the fright he was put into, by hearing the duke was impeached, and Mr. Bates impriſoned, and been wrought upon to come in, and, for his grace's honour and advantage, lay open the whole truth. If the duke had been pleaſed, to put an advertiſement into the Gazette, that he would interpoſe with his majeſty, to obtain a pardon for him (if he was criminal) and give him five thouſand guineas to befriend him, (or ſomething to that effect) and whether ſuch a courſe would not have been of more avail, for ſecuring Robart's forthcoming, and the manifeſtation of the truth and his lordſhip's vindication, than the proclamation for apprehending him, has hitherto been.]

However the lords read and paſſed the bill upon glaſs, &c. and the king came to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, and amongſt the reſt to the bill for impriſoning Cooke, Firebraſs, Bates, and Craggs, and alſo to an act for the king's moſt gracious free and general pardon, but with the exception of all perſons, who have been or ſhall be impeached in parliament, during this ſeſſion. On the ſame day, the commons, having read the report from the committee of both houſes, were proceeding to impeach other perſons therein mentioned, particularly ſir John Trevor, when they were interrupted by the Black rod, and commanded to attend the king, in the lords houſe, where after a ſhort ſpeech, the king put an end to theſe affairs, by a prorogation to the 18th of June.

[y] There were few remarkable acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides what have been mentioned, an act to exempt apothecaries from ſerving offices, or upon juries. Several bills were ſet on foot, but not finiſhed; namely, 'A bill touching free and impartial proceedings in parliament;' which was begun in the houſe of commons, and there rejected after the third reading: 'A bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon;' which, having paſt the lower-houſe, was amended by the lords, and occaſioned ſeveral further conferences and debates between both houſes: Another bill 'for regiſtering memorials of deeds, conveyances, and wills,' which was obſtructed by the lawyers in the houſe of commons: A fourth, 'for the encouragement of privateers:' A fifth, 'for the encouragement of ſeamen:' A ſixth, 'to diſable perſons from voting in elections of members to ſerve in parliament, who ſhould refuſe to take the oaths to the was going beyond ſea, ſet at the head of the councils, nor was there any care taken to oblige thoſe who were about her. This looked either like jealouſy and diſtruſt, or a coldneſs towards her, which gave all the ſecret enemies of the government a colour of complaint. They pretended zeal for the princeſs, though they came little to her; and they made it very viſible on many occaſions, that this was only a diſguiſe for worſe deſigns.

At the ſame time that the lords juſtices were appointed, ſir William Trumbal was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of ſir John Trenchard, deceaſed. Trumbal was a very eminent civilian, and had been by much the beſt pleader in thoſe courts, and was a learned, diligent, and virtuous man. He was ſent envoy to Paris upon the lord Preſton's being recalled. He was there when the edict of Nantz was repealed in 1685, and ſaw the violence of the perſecution, and acted a great and worthy part in harbouring many, in covering their effects, and in conveying over their jewels and plate to England; which diſguſted the court of France, though it was not then thought fit to diſown or recall him for it. He had orders to put in memorials, complaining of the invaſion of the principality of Orange, which he did in ſo high a ſtrain, that the laſt of them was like a denunciation of war. From Paris he was ſent to Turkey, where the French ambaſſador informed him of the ſecret alliance between king James and Lewis XIV. He returned to England in 1692, and was now made ſecretary of ſtate. A few days after William de Naſſau, ſeigneur de Zuleſtein, ſon to the king's natural uncle, was created baron of Enfield, viſcount Tunbridge, the earl of Rochford; and Ford, lord Grey of Werke, was created viſcount Glendale, and earl of Tankerville. The next day, May the 9th, duke Schomberg, the earl of Tankerville, and Peregrine Bertie, vice-chamberlain to his majeſty, were ſworn and admitted of the privy-council.

The marquis of Hallifax died in April this year; he had gone into all the meaſures of the tories, only he took care to preſerve himſelf from criminal engagements; he ſtudied to oppoſe every thing, and to embroil matters all he could; his ſpirit was reſtleſs, and he could not bear to be out of buſineſs; his vivacity and judgment ſunk much in his laſt years, as well as his reputation; he died of a gangrene, occaſioned by a rupture that he had long neglected: When he ſaw death ſo near him, and was warned, that there was no hope, he ſhewed a great firmneſs of mind, and a calm that had much of true philoſophy at leaſt; he profeſſed himſelf a ſincere chriſtian, and lamented the former parts of his life, with ſolemn reſolutions of becoming in all reſpects another man, if God ſhould raiſe him up.

On the 12th of May the king went in the morning from Kenſington to Graveſend, and went aboard the William and Mary yatch about ſix in the evening, attended by the duke of Ormond, the earls of Eſſex and Portland, and other perſons of quality; but, there being little wind, the yatch got no further that night than the buoy in the Nore. The next morning they joined their convoy under the command of ſir George Rooke, and on the 14th the king ſafely landed at Orange Polder, and arrived in the evening at the Hague, where he was received with great acclamations of joy.

The ſeven lords juſtices had no character nor rank, except when four of them were together; and they avoided aſſembling to that number, except at the council-board, where it was neceſſary; and, when they were together, they had the royal authority veſted in them. They were choſen by the poſts, which they were in, ſo that no perſon could think he was neglected by the preference. They were not envied for this titular greatneſs, ſince it was indeed only titular, for they had no real authority truſted with them. They took care to keep within bounds, and to do nothing but in matters of courſe, till they had the king's orders, to which they adhered exactly, ſo that no complaints could be made of them, becauſe they took nothing on them, and did only keep the peace of the kingdom, and tranſmit and execute the king's orders. The ſummer went over quietly at home, for though the jacobites ſhewed their diſpoſition on ſome occaſions, but moſt ſignally on the prince of Wales's birth-day, yet they were wiſer than to break out into any diſorder, when they had no hopes of aſſiſtance from France.

The king having thought fit to call a parliament in Scotland, they met according to their ſummons on the 9th of May. The marquis of Tweedale was his majeſty's commiſſioner, for not only duke Hamilton, but his brother-in-law, the duke of Queenſbury, died the laſt winter. They had been long great friends, but they became irreconcileable enemies. Duke Hamilton had more application, but the other had the greater genius. They were incompatible with each other, and indeed with all other perſons, for both loved to be abſolute, and to direct every thing.

The marquis of Tweedale was early engaged in buſineſs, and continued in it to a great age. He underſtood well all the intereſts and concerns of Scotland; had a great ſtock of knowledge, with an obliging temper, and was of a blameleſs, or rather exemplary life. He had looſe thoughts both of civil and eccleſiaſtical government, and ſeemed to think, that what form ſoever was uppermoſt was to be complied with. He had been in Cromwell's parliament, and had abjured the royal family, which lay heavy upon him. He was, in all other reſpects, the ableſt and worthieſt of the nobility, only he was too cautious and fearful. He was made a privy-councillor in England in 1667, and in 1692, chancellor and marquis of Scotland, and now the king's high-commiſſioner. He came to the parliament attended in the uſual manner; and, his commiſſion being read, the king's letter to the lords temporal and commiſſioners of the ſhires and burghs was read alſo, ſetting forth, 'That the continuation of the war ſtill hindered him from purſuing his reſolution of being amongſt them in perſon, and ſo obliged him to call them together once more in his abſence. That therefore he had appointed the marquis of Tweedale to be his commiſſioner, and to repreſent his perſon and authority among them. That the marquis had given proofs of his capacity and experience in buſineſs, as well as of his fidelity and zeal, by his many and long ſervices to the crown and nation, particularly ſince his being lord chancellor, which would render him very acceptable to them. That his majeſty had fully entruſted him with his mind, and given him powers to paſs all ſuch laws for the good of that his majeſty's antient kingdom, as had been propoſed to his majeſty at this time. That the marquis was to aſk nothing of them in his majeſty's name, but that which the intereſt of the country made neceſſary to be done. That therefore his majeſty need not to mention to them, that the ſubſidies for paying the forces were now expired, and that their peace and ſafety required the renewing of them during the war. That his majeſty was glad of any appearances of a diſpoſition to moderation and union about church matters, and hoped they would encourage and promote it, by removing the ſubjects of differences as much as they could. That he was not unmindful of the letter to him, in the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion. That the known interruptions which he had had in buſineſs this winter, had been a great hinderance to him; but he was reſolved to do whatever he might for the ſecurity of the government, and the ſatisfaction of his good ſubjects. In the concluſion, his majeſty recommended to them calmneſs and unanimity in their proceedings, not doubting but they would act ſuitably to the confidence he had put in them, in calling them again in his abſence.'

This letter was ſeconded by the high commiſſioner's ſpeech, who told them, 'That his majeſty's tender care and concern for their ſafety and welfare did evidently appear, in minding every thing that might contribute thereto; particularly as to the church, that all differences might be compoſed, it being his majeſty's purpoſe to maintain the preſbyterian government in the church of Scotland, and that the peace and ſecurity of the kingdom againſt foreign invaſion and inteſtine commotion be provided for. That if they found it would tend to the advancement of trade, that an act ſhould be paſſed for the encouragement of ſuch, as ſhould acquire and eſtabliſh a plantation in Africa or America, or any other part of the world, where plantations might be lawfully acquired, his majeſty was willing to declare, that he would grant to the ſubjects of this kingdom, in favour of theſe plantations, ſuch rights and privileges as he granted in like caſes to the ſubjects of his other dominions. And that the judicatories, higher and ſubaltern, be ſo regulated in their proceedings, as that juſtice might be adminiſtered with the greateſt diſpatch and leaſt charge to the people.—That theſe things had taken up ſome part of his majeſty's government,' which never came to the ſecond reading: A ſeventh, 'for the better diſcovery of bankrupts eſtates,' which was only read twice: An eighth, 'to veſt the forfeited eſtates in Ireland in his majeſty,' wherein as little progreſs was made: A ninth, 'to regulate printing preſſes:' A tenth, 'requiring certain perſons to take the oaths to his majeſty,' which, having paſſed the upper houſe, and been ſent down to the commons, was by them rejected after the ſecond reading: An eleventh, ſent down alſo by the lords, 'for naturalizing foreign ſeamen,' which the commons refuſed to paſs: A twelfth, 'to aſcertain the aſſize of bread:' A thirteenth, 'to oblige James Craggs and Richard Harnage to diſcover how ſome of the monies for clothing the army had been diſpoſed of:' And, laſtly, a bill 'for puniſhing Tracy Pauncefort and his brother Edward Pauncefort, for corrupt practices, which, having been read three times by the commons, was ordered to lie upon the table.

time and thoughts theſe months paſt, and had been frequently diſcourſed by him, and then put in the method of inſtructions and directions for his grace's behaviour. That therefore it only remained for them to take theſe weighty affairs into conſideration, and to conſult of the beſt ways and means to enable his majeſty to perfect ſo good deſigns, by granting him ſupplies for maintaining the preſent land forces, and for providing and entertaining a competent naval force, for the defence of the coaſt, and ſecuring of trade. In order to which his majeſty had granted a commiſſion of admiralty for managing the affairs thereof, not omitting to take care for the other unavoidable contingencies of the government, wherein the civil liſt came ſhort. Concluding, that the diſpatch of theſe great affairs with cheerfulneſs and alacrity would perfect a good underſtanding, and perpetuate a confidence between the king and them.'

The earl of Annandale, lord preſident of the parliament, made likewiſe a ſpeech to them on this occaſion. He acknowledged his majeſty's gracious letter, wherein he aſked nothing for himſelf, but only prevented their neceſſary cares for the peace, welfare, and advantage of this kingdom. He took notice of the freſh aſſurances they had of his majeſty's firm reſolution, 'to maintain the preſbyterian government of this church; and ſaid, he hoped the moderation and calmneſs, that ſhould at this time appear in all their proceedings in church-matters would ſatisfy the world, that this is the government moſt agreeable to the temper and inclination of this people, and moſt ſuitable for the intereſt and ſupport of their king, the civil government, and peace of this kingdom.' And in the concluſion he enforced all that had been ſaid, 'by one thing, which did juſtly challenge a more than ordinary zeal and vigour in their duty at this time, which was the ſad and irreparable loſs they had ſuſtained of the beſt of queens; wiſhing they might all of them make this uſe of it, that as now the whole ſovereignty was lodged in his majeſty, it might appear by their actings, that they had doubled their forwardneſs and endeavours to ſerve him; which was the only way now left them to ſhew their juſt ſenſe of their inexpreſſible loſs, and to make it, in ſome meaſure, more ſupportable to his majeſty.'

Theſe ſpeeches had the deſired effect. The parliament ordered an anſwer to his majeſty's letter, and an addreſs of condolence for the death of the queen, to be drawn up, and ſent to his majeſty; and they appointed a committee for the ſecurity of the kingdom, and another for trade. The firſt of theſe committees having made their report concerning the ſupplies to be given to the king, it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the ſum of 1,440,000 pounds Scots be granted for the maintenance of the land forces, and for providing and maintaining cruiſers and convoys for defence of the coaſts and trade; towards the raiſing of which ſum, they made an act for a general poll, another for a ſupply of ſix months ceſs out of the land rents, a third for an additional exciſe, and a fourth for three months ceſs more.

The committee of trade, after ſeveral ſittings, prepared an act, which produced the Weſt-India and African companies, and the Darien enterprize. This act was paſſed, but proved (as will hereafter be ſeen) very fatal to Scotland. It was occaſioned in this manner: The interlopers in the Eaſt-India trade, finding that the company was like to be favoured by the parliament, as well as by the court, were reſolved to try other methods to break in upon that trade: They entered into a treaty with ſome merchants in Scotland, and they had, in the former ſeſſion, procured an act, that promiſed letters patent to all ſuch, as ſhould offer to ſet up new manufactures, or drive any new trade, not yet practiſed by that kingdom, with an exemption for twenty-one years from all taxes and cuſtoms, and with all ſuch other privileges, as ſhould be found neceſſary for eſtabliſhing or encouraging ſuch projects. But here was a neceſſity of procuring letters patent, which they knew the credit that the Eaſt-India company had at court, would certainly render ineffectual. So they were now in treaty for a new act, which ſhould free them from that difficulty. There was one Patterſon, a man of no education, but of great notions, which, as was generally ſaid, he had learned from the Buccaneers, with whom he had conſorted for ſome time. He had conſidered a place in Darien, where he thought a good ſettlement might be made, with another over-againſt it, in the South Sea; and, by two ſettlements there, he fancied a great trade might be opened for the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, and that the Spaniards in the neighbourhood might be kept in great ſubjection to them; ſo he made the merchants believe that he had a great ſecret, which he did not think fit yet to diſcover, and reſerved to a fitter opportunity; only he deſired, that the Weſt-Indies might be named in any new act, that ſhould be offered to the parliament: He made them in general underſtand, that he knew of a country, not poſſeſſed by Spaniards, where there were rich mines, and gold in abundance. While theſe matters were in treaty, the time of the king's giving the inſtructions to his commiſſioner for the parliament came on; and it had been a thing of courſe to give a general inſtruction to paſs all bills for the encouragement of trade. Johnſtoun told the king, that he heard there was a ſecret management among the merchants for an act in Scotland, under which the Eaſt-India trade might be ſet up; ſo he propoſed, and drew an inſtruction, impowering the commiſſioner to paſs any bill, promiſing letters patents for encouraging of trade, yet limited, ſo that it ſhould not interfere with the trade of England: When they went down to Scotland, the king's commiſſioner either did not conſider this, or had no regard to it, for he gave the royal aſſent to an act, that gave the undertakers, either of the Eaſt-India or Weſt-India trade, all poſſible privileges, with exemption of twenty-one years from all impoſitions: And the act directed letters patents to be paſſed under the great ſeal, without any further warrant for them: When this was printed, it gave a great alarm in England, more particularly to the Eaſt-India company; for many of the merchants of London reſolved to join ſtock with the Scotch company; and the exemption from all duties gave a great proſpect of gain.

But this ſeſſion of the Scots parliament was chiefly remarkable for its ſtrict enquiry into a paſſage, that made a great noiſe in the world. The earl of Broadalbin formed a ſcheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the king would give twelve or fifteen thouſand pounds for doing it, which ſum was remitted down from England, and this was to be divided among the heads of the tribes or clans of the Highlanders. He employed his emiſſaries among them, and told them that the beſt ſervice they could do to king James was to lie quiet, and reſerve themſelves to a better time; and, if they would take the oaths, the king would be contented with that, and they were to have a ſhare of this ſum, that was ſent down to buy their quiet. But this came to nothing; their demands roſe high; they knew, that the earl had money to diſtribute among them; they believed that he intended to keep the beſt part of it to himſelf. They aſked therefore more than he could give. Amongſt the moſt clamorous and obſtinate of theſe were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, who were believed guilty of much robbery and many murders, and ſo had gained too much by their pilfering war, to be eaſily induced to give it over. The head of that valley had ſo particularly provoked the earl of Broadalbin, (whoſe cows were ſaid to have been ſtolen by Macdonald's men) that, as his ſcheme was quite defeated by the oppoſition, that Macdonald raiſed, ſo he deſigned a ſevere revenge. The King had by a proclamation offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders, who had been in arms againſt him, upon their coming in, by a prefixed day, to take the oaths. The day had been twice or thrice prolonged, and it was, at laſt, carried to the end of the year 1691, with a poſitive threatening of proceeding to military execution againſt ſuch as ſhould not ſubmit by the laſt day of December. All of them were ſo terrified, that they came in; and even Macdonald himſelf went to colonel Hill, governor of fort William at Inverlochie, on the laſt day of December, and offered to take the oaths. But the colonel, being only a military man, could not or would not tender them; and Macdonald was forced to ſeek for ſome of the legal magiſtrates to tender them to him. The ſnows were then fallen, ſo that five or ſix days paſſed, before he could come to a magiſtrate; but on the 6th of January 1691-2, he took the oaths before ſir Colin Campbell of Ardkinlar, ſheriff-deputy of Argyle, at which time, in the ſtrictneſs of law, he could claim no benefit by it. The matter was ſignified to the council at Edinburgh, and ſir Colin had a reprimand for giving him the oaths, when the day was paſſed. This was concealed from the king, and the earl of Broadalbin came to court, to give an account of his diligence, and to bring back his money, ſince he could not do the ſervice for which it was received. He informed againſt Macdonald, as the chief perſon who had defeated that good deſign; and, that he might gratify his own revenge, and render the king odious to all the Highlanders, he propoſed, that orders ſhould be ſent for a military execution on the men of Glencoe. An inſtruction was drawn by ſecretary Stair (dated the 11th of January 1692, and directed to ſir Thomas Levingſton) to be both ſigned and counterſigned by the king, that ſuch as had not taken the oaths by the time limited, ſhould be excluded the benefit of the indemnity, and be deſtroyed by fire and ſword; but but with this expreſs mitigation, in the fourth article, 'That the rebels may not think themſelves deſperate, we allow you to give terms and quarter, but in this manner only, that chieftains and heritors, or loaders, be priſoners of war, their lives only ſafe, and all other things in mercy, they taking the oath of allegiance; and the community, taking the oath of allegiance, and rendering their arms, and ſubmitting to the government, are to have quarter and indemnity for their lives and fortunes, and to be protected from the ſoldiers.'

After theſe inſtructions there were additional ones given by the king to ſir Thomas Levingſton upon the 18th of the ſame month, ſuperſigned and counterſigned by his majeſty, and the date marked by ſecretary Stair's hand, which bear orders for giving paſſes, for the ſubmiſſion of certain of the rebels; wherein his majeſty judged it much better, that thoſe, who took not the benefit of the indemnity in due time, ſhould be obliged to render upon mercy, they ſtill taking the oath of allegiance; and then added, 'if Maclean of Glencoe and that tribe can be well ſeparated from the reſt, it will be a proper vindication of the public juſtice to extirpate that ſect of thieves.' The king ſigned this without any enquiry about it; for he was apt to ſign papers in a hurry, without examining the importance of them. This was one effect of his ſlowneſs in diſpatching buſineſs; for, as he was apt to ſuffer things to run on till there was a great heap of papers laid before him, ſo then he ſigned them a little too precipitately. But all this while he knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the oaths within the time, nor of his having taken them ſoon after it was paſſed, when he came to a proper magiſtrate. As theſe orders were ſent down, ſecretary Stair, wrote many private letters to Levingſton, giving him a ſtrict charge and particular directions for the execution of them. In a previous letter of the date 7th of January, he wrote thus: 'You know in general, that theſe troops poſted at Inverneſs and Inverlochie will be ordered to take in the houſe of Innergairie, and to deſtroy entirely the county of Lochaber, Locheal's lands, Kippoch, Glengarie's, and Glencoe;' and then added, 'I aſſure you, your power ſhall be full enough, and I hope the ſoldiers will not trouble the government with priſoners.' And, by another letter of the 9th of that month, which was written before the inſtructions, he had this expreſſion, 'That thoſe, who remain of the rebels, are not able to oppoſe; and, their chieftains being all papiſts, it is well the vengeance falls there. For my part I could have wiſhed the Macdonalds had not divided; and I am ſorry, that Kippo and Maclean of Glencoe are ſafe.' In another letter of the 11th of January ſent with the firſt inſtructions to ſir Thomas Levingſton, he hath this expreſſion: 'I have no great kindneſs to Kippoch nor Glencoe; and it is well that the people are in mercy. Juſt now my lord Argyle tells me, that Glencoe hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable ſect, the worſt of the Highlanders.' In his letter of the 16th of January of the ſame date with the additional inſtructions, though he writes in the firſt part of it, that the king does not at all incline to receive any after the day but on mercy, yet he afterwards adds, 'But, for a juſt example of vengeance, I intreat the thieving tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpoſe.' And to confirm this, by his letter of the ſame date, ſent with the duplicate of the firſt, and additional inſtructions to colonel Hill, after having written, 'that ſuch as render on mercy might be ſaved;' he adds, 'I ſhall intreat you that for a juſt vengeance, and public example, the tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpoſe. The earls of Argyle and Broadalbin have promiſed, that they ſhall have no retreat in their bounds; the paper to Ronoch would be ſecured, and the hazard certified to the laird of Weems to reſet them. In that caſe Argyle's detachment, with a party, that may be poſted in iſland Stalker, muſt cut them off; and the people of Appin are none of the beſt.' But as the execution of the Glencoe men did not immediately take effect, ſecretary Stair, on the 30th of January, wrote two more letters; one to Levingſton wherein he ſaid, 'I am glad, that Glencoe did not come in within the time prefixed. I hope what is done there may be in earneſt, ſince the reſt are not in a condition to draw together to help. I think to hurry (that is to drive) their cattle, and burn their houſes, is but to render them deſperate lawleſs men to rob their neighbours; but I believe you will be ſatisfied it were a great advantage to the nation, that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off. It muſt be quietly done, otherwiſe they will make ſhift for both their men and cattle. Argyle's detachment lies in Lotrickneel to aſſiſt the garriſon to do all of a ſudden.' The other letter was to colonel Hill, in which he wrote: 'Pray when the thing concerning Glencoe is reſolved, let it be ſecret and ſudden; otherwiſe the men will ſhift you, and better not meddle with them than not to purpoſe, to cut off that neſt of robbers, who have fallen in the mercy of the law, now when there is force and opportunity, whereby the king's juſtice will be as conſpicuous and uſeful as his clemency to others. I apprehend the ſtorm is ſo great that for ſome time you can do but little; but ſo ſoon as poſſible I know you will be at work; for theſe falſe people will do nothing, but as they ſee you in a condition to do with them.'

In February 1691-2, a company was ſent to Glencoe, who were kindly received there, and quartered over the valley, the inhabitants thinking themſelves ſafe, and looking for no hoſtilities. After they had ſtaid a week amongſt them, they took their time in the night, and killed about ſix and thirty of them, the reſt taking the alarm, and eſcaping. This raiſed a great clamour, and was publiſhed by the French in their Gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels, to caſt a reproach on the king's government as cruel and barbarous, tho' in all other inſtances it had appeared, that his own inclinations were gentle and mild, rather to an exceſs. The king ſent orders to enquire into the matter; but when the letters, writ upon this buſineſs, were all examined, it appeared, that ſo many perſons were involved in the matter, that his gentleneſs prevailed on him to a fault, and he contented himſelf with diſmiſſing only Secretary Stair from his ſervice. The Highlanders were ſo inflamed with this, that they were put in as forward a diſpoſition as the Jacobites wiſhed for, to have rebelled upon the firſt favourable opportunity. And indeed the not puniſhing this with a due rigour was the greateſt blot in this whole reign, and had a very ill effect in alienating that nation from the king and his government.

As this affair ſtill made a great noiſe, and it was repreſented to the king, that a ſeſſion of parliament could not be managed without high motions and complaints, in ſo crying a matter; and that his miniſters could not oppoſe theſe, without ſeeming to bring the guilt of the blood, that was ſo perfidiouſly ſhed, both on the king and on themſelves: To prevent which, the king ordered a commiſſion to be paſſed under the great ſeal, for a precognition in that matter, which is a practice in Scotland of examining crimes, before the perſons are brought upon their trial. This was looked upon as an artifice to cover that tranſaction, by a private enquiry. However, when it was complained of in parliament, not without reflections, on the ſlackneſs in examining into it, and the committee for the ſecurity of the kingdom made a motion about it, the king's commiſſioner aſſured them, that by the king's order, the matter was then under examination, and that it ſhould be reported to the parliament. Accordingly, the king's commiſſion for that purpoſe being produced, read, and agreed to, it was unanimouſly voted, that the high commiſſioner, ſhould be deſired to tranſmit their humble thanks to his majeſty for his care to vindicate the honour of the government, and the juſtice of the nation, by granting ſuch a commiſſion.

The commiſſioners appointed by the king to enquire into the ſlaughter of the Glencoe men, having ſpent ſome weeks in that affair, on the tenth of June preſented to the parliament private articles agreed in July 1691, between the earl of Broadalbin and major-general Buchan with ſeveral of the Highland clans; as alſo the depoſitions of the laird of Glengairie and colonel Hill, containing informations of high treaſon againſt the earl of Broadalbin; which being read, after ſome debate, an order was made for his proſecution before the parliament, and for his commitment to the caſtle of Edinburgh. In the progreſs of the enquiry, it ſeems, a new practice of the earl of Broadalbin's was diſcovered; for the Highlanders depoſed that, while he was treating with them, in order to their ſubmitting to the king, he had aſſured them, that he ſtill adhered to king James's intereſt, and that he preſſed them to come into that pacification, only to preſerve them for his ſervice, till a more favourable opportunity. This, with ſeveral other treaſonable diſcourſes of his, being reported to the Parliament, he covered himſelf with his pardon; but theſe diſcourſes happened to be ſubſequent to it; ſo he was ſent a priſoner to the caſtle of Edinburgh: he pretended, he had ſecret orders from the king, to ſay any thing that would give him credit with them; which the king owned ſo far, that he ordered a new pardon to be paſſed for him.

On the 24th of June, the commiſſioners gave into the houſe their report of the caſe of the Glencoe men, with their opinion upon it, which was as follows:

"Firſt, that it was a great wrong, that Glencoe's caſe and and diligence, as to his taking the oath of allegiance on the 6th of January 1692, and colonel Hill's letter to Ardkinlas, and Ardkinlas's letter to Colin Campbell, Sheriff Clerk, for clearing Glencoe's diligence and innocence, were not presented to the Lords of his majesty's privy-council, when they were sent into Edinburgh in the said month of January; and that those, who advised the not presenting thereof were in the wrong, and seemed to have had a malicious design against Glencoe. And that it was a further wrong, that the certificate, as to Glencoe's taking the oath of allegiance, was delate and obliterate after it came to Edinburgh; and that, being so obliterate, it should neither have been presented to, or taken in by the clerk of the council without an express warrant from the council. Secondly, That it appears to have been known at London, and particularly to the master of Stair, in the month of January 1692, that Glencoe had taken the oath of allegiance, though after the day prefixed; for he saith in his letter of the 30th of January to sir Thomas Levingston, I am glad that Glencoe came not within the time prescribed. Thirdly, that there was nothing in the king's instructions to warrant the committing of the aforesaid slaughter, even as to the thing itself, and far less as to the manner of it, seeing all his instructions do plainly import, that the most obstinate of the rebels might be received into mercy upon taking the oath of allegiance, though the day was long before elapsed, and that he ordered nothing concerning Glencoe and his tribe, but that, if they could be well separated from the rest, it would be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves; which plainly intimates, that it was his Majesty's mind, that they could not be separated from the rest of these rebels, unless they still refused his mercy by still continuing in arms, and refusing the allegiance; and that even in that case they were only to be proceeded against in the way of public justice, and no other way. Fourthly, that secretary Stair's letters, especially, that of the 11th of January, 1692, in which he rejoices to hear, that Glencoe had not taken the oath, and that of the 16th of January of the same date with the king's additional instructions, and that of the 30th of the same month, were no ways warranted by, but quite exceeded the king's instructions, since the said latters, without any insinuation of any method to be taken, that might well separate the Glencoe men from the rest, did, in place of prescribing a vindication of public justice, order them to be cut off and rooted out in earnest and to purpose, and that suddenly and secretly, and quietly, and all on a sudden; which are the express terms of the said letters, and, comparing them and other letters with what ensued, appear to have been the only warrant and cause of their slaughter, which in effect was a barbarous murder perpetrated by the persons deposed against. And this is yet farther confirmed by two more of his letters, written to colonel Hill after the slaughter committed, viz. on the 5th of March 1692, wherein, after having said, that there was much talk at London, that the Glencoe men were murdered in their beds after they had taken the oath of allegiance, he continues, 'For the last, I know nothing of it; I am sure neither you, nor any body impowered to treat or give indemnity, did give Glencoe the oath; and to take it from any body else, after the day was past, did import nothing at all. All that I regret is, that any of the sort got away, and there is a necessity to prosecute them to the utmost.' And another from the Hague, the last of April 1692, wherein he says, 'For the people of Glencoe, when you do your duty in a thing so necessary to rid the country of thieving, you need not trouble yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself by shewing all your orders, which are now put in the Paris gazette. When you do right, you need fear no body. All that can be said, is, that, in the execution, it was neither so full nor so fair, as might have been.'

This report being read, on the 24th of June, together with the depositions of the witnesses, the king's instructions, and the master of Stair's letters, it was voted, 'nemine contradicente, that his majesty's instructions to sir Thomas Levingston and colonel Hill contained no warrant for the execution of the Glencoe men: That the said execution was a murder: That the master of Stair's letter did exceed the king's instructions; and that sir Thomas Levingston had reason to give the orders he had given. On the 2d of July they proceeded upon the same affair, and colonel Hill and lieutenant-colonel Hamilton were called. The former appeared, was examined, and cleared; but the latter not appearing was ordered to be apprehended, and on the 8th of that month voted 'guilty of the murder of the Glencoe men.' Then the house proceeded against the other persons, who were actors therein; and agreed upon an address to his majesty, that he would send them home to be prosecuted, or not, as his majesty should think fit; and that he would take into his princely consideration the case of the Glencoe men. This address was, on the 10th of July, recommended to the king's commissioner, to be transmitted to his majesty, with duplicates of his majesty's instructions, and the master of Stair's letters. At the same time the king's commissioners received the unanimous thanks of the parliament, for laying the discovery of the matter of Glencoe before them, and for their careful procedure in their commission of inquiry; and a new protection was granted to the Glencoe men.

On the 1st of July, the earl of Broadalbin, being brought to the bar of the parliament, in order to his trial, delivered in a petition, praying, that he might be allowed some competent time for bringing of witnesses from remote places, and for recovery of such documents, as he was to make use of for his vindication, both from the secretary's office at London, and his house in the country. The advocates on both sides having been heard upon this petition, it was put to the vote, whether the day for his lordship to give in his defence should be the 8th or 15th of the current month, and it was carried for the 15th; and that in the mean time he might raise letters of exculpation. Then the indictment against him was read, and he remanded to prison. The same day the process of treason, at the instance of the king's advocate, against the earl of Melfort, and others in France, being called, the king's advocate, produced his warrant from the privy-council for raising this process against them, and desired, that it might be recorded. Afterwards the indictment was read, and the king's advocate declared he insisted at that time only against the earls of Middleton and Melfort, and sir Adam Blair, and on that part of the indictment, which recited, that, by the act of parliament in 1693, it was declared treason to be in France after the 1st of August 1693, and therefore craved the indictment might be found to be good in law; which being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative. The next day the house passed sentence against the earls of Middleton and Melfort and sir Adam Blair, to forfeit life and fortune, and ordered the rest, who adhered to his majesty's enemies, and were then in France, to be prosecuted before the lords of the justiciary. On the 15th of July, the earl of Broadalbin, being again brought to the bar, begged more time to make his defence, which was granted him till the 25th of the same month; but all the public affairs being happily concluded by the 17th, it was moved and agreed to, that the process of treason against him should be continued till the next session of parliament. After which his majesty's commissioner gave the parliament thanks for their real and hearty compliance with his majesty's demands, recommended to them the preservation of the public peace in their several countries, and adjourned them till the 7th of November following.

It was observable, that a great party came to be formed in this session of a very odd mixture. The high presbyterians and the jacobites joined together to oppose every thing; however, it was not so strong as to carry the majority; but great heats arose among them.

In this session, an act passed, in favour of such of the episcopal clergy, as should enter into those engagements to the king, that were by law required; that they should continue in their benefices under the king's protection, without being subject to the power of presbytery. This was carried with some address, before the presbyterians were aware of the consequences of it; for it was plainly that which they call Erastianism. A day was limited to the clergy for taking the oaths; and, by a very zealous and dextrous management, about seventy of the best of them were brought to take the oaths to the king; and so they came within the protection promised by the act.

In Ireland the three lords justices did not agree long together. The lord Capel studied to render himself popular, and espoused the interests of the English against the Irish, without any nice regard to justice or equity. He was too easily set on by those, who had their own end in it, to do every thing that gained him applause. The other two were men of severe tempers, and studied to protect the Irish, when they were oppressed; nor did they try to make themselves otherwise popular, than by a wise and just administration. For which reason lord Capel was highly magnified, and they were as much complained of by all the English in Ireland. Lord Capel undertook to manage a parliament so, as to carry all things, if he was made lord deputy, and had power given him to place and displace such as he should name. This being agreed to, a parliament was held there, after he had made several removes. It was opened at Dublin on the 27th of August, when his lordship made a speech to both houses, wherein he told them, 'That many and great were the obligations they owed to his majeſty. That his majeſty had appeared himſelf in their cauſe, fought their battles, and, at his own perſonal hazard, had reſtored them to their religion and eſtates. And, that every thing might concur to make them happy, his majeſty had now called them together in parliament, that by reaſonable and neceſſary laws they might prevent the like dangers for the time to come, and ſecure themſelves and their poſterity upon the beſt and ſureſt foundations. That he doubted not, but they would make ſuitable returns of loyalty and affection to his majeſty, by ſhewing a perfect and forward zeal in ſuch things as tended to his honour and their own advantage.' His excellency then acquainted them, 'That his majeſty's revenue had fallen ſhort of the eſtabliſhment, which had occaſioned great debts to the civil and military liſts. That it was with difficulty, and ſtopping of all manner of payments, but what were abſolutely neceſſary, that the army had hitherto been ſubſiſted. That there were alſo ſeveral other debts due from the crown, a ſtate whereof he had ordered to be laid before the commons, by which they would ſee, what ſupplies were neceſſary for diſcharge of thoſe debts, and for the ſupport of the government. That, for raiſing ſome part of this money, his majeſty had ſent them a bill for an 'additional duty of exciſe,' and he expected from the gentlemen of the houſe of commons, that they would conſider of ways and means for raiſing ſuch other ſums, as were requiſite for his ſervice; aſſuring them, that what money they gave, ſhould be applied to the uſes for which it was given.

'He recommended to them, that they would take ſome care for the rebuilding and repairing of churches in ſeveral parts of their country, that the people, having decent public places of worſhip, might be better inſtructed in their duty to their God, and obedience to their king; urging, that it was a tribute due to Almighty God, for their late preſervation and deliverance; and that it would be one of the beſt means they could think of to preſerve the true eſtabliſhed religion, and to provide againſt future rebellions.' He likewiſe informed them, 'That the lords juſtices of England had, with great application and diſpatch, conſidered and re-tranſmitted all the bills ſent to them. That ſome of theſe bills had more effectually provided for their future ſecurity, than had ever heretofore been done. That in his excellency's opinion the want of ſuch laws had been one of the great cauſes of their paſt miſeries; and it would be their fault as well as misfortune, if they neglected to lay hold on the opportunity now put into their hands by their great and gracious king, of making ſuch a laſting ſettlement, that it might never more be in the power of their enemies to bring the like calamities again upon them, or to put England to that vaſt expence of blood and treaſure, which it had ſo often been at, for ſecuring this kingdom to the crown of England. Concluding with the uſual acknowledgement of his unfitneſs for his great ſtation, and of the great difficulties, which attend it; and aſſurance that he would diſcharge his truſt with ſtedfaſt loyalty to his majeſty's intereſt and ſervice, and with a perfect ſincerity to theirs.'

The lords and commons returned their thanks in their addreſſes to his excellency for his ſpeech, and paſſed this vote, 'That they would, to the utmoſt of their power, ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty and his government againſt all his enemies foreign and domeſtic.' After this both houſes proceeded with great unanimity and diſpatch to the conſideration of the matters before them: ſo that the ſupply of 163,325l. that was aſked for the ſupport of the government was granted; all the proceedings and attainders in king James's parliament were annulled; and the great act of ſettlement was confirmed and explained as they deſired [z]. But, though things went on thus ſmoothly in the beginning of the ſeſſion, this good temper in the parliament was quickly loſt by the heat of ſome, who had great credit with the lord deputy. Complaints were made of ſir Charles Porter, the lord chancellor, who was beginning to ſet on foot a tory humour in Ireland; whereas it was certainly the intereſt of that government to have no other diviſion among them but that of Engliſh and Iriſh, and of proteſtant and papiſt. The lord deputy's party moved in the houſe of commons, that the lord chancellor ſhould be impeached; but the grounds upon which this motion was made, appeared to be ſo frivolous, after the chancellor was heard by the houſe of commons in his own juſtification, that he was voted clear from all imputation by a majority of two to one. This ſet the lord deputy and the lord chancellor, with all the friends of both, at ſo great a diſtance from each other, that it put a full ſtop for ſome time, to all buſineſs.

Thus factions were formed in all the king's dominions; and he, being for ſo much of the year at a great diſtance from the ſcene, there was no pains taken to quiet theſe, and to check the animoſities which aroſe out of them. The king ſtudied only to balance them, and to keep up among the parties, a jealouſy of one another, that ſo he might oblige them all to depend more entirely on himſelf.

Such was the ſtate of affairs in the Britiſh dominions. It is time now to turn to the military proceedings abroad, and to conſider how matters ſtood on both ſides before the campaign was opened. When the king of France ſaw in 1691 king William diſengaged from the war in Ireland, and the following year the elector of Bavaria poſſeſſed of the government of the Spaniſh Netherlands, he turned the ſtreſs of his arms that way, in order to break their meaſures, and in two ſucceſſive campaigns made himſelf maſter of the important places of Mons and Namur, before thoſe two princes could collect a ſufficient force to prevent it, But the two next campaigns the French met with more difficulties and a ſtronger oppoſition than they expected from the allies. King William, early poſſeſſing himſelf of the camp of Park in 1693, diſſipated the ſanguine hopes of their court, defeated their deſigns upon Brabant, and forced their king to a ſpeedy return to Verſailles; and the victory they obtained the ſame year at Landen coſt them ſo dear, that by it they loſt in 1694 the ſuperiority, which they had the preceding years over the allies. And, though this laſt campaign was wholly ſpent in obſerving one another, like enemies, whoſe forces, being almoſt equal, endeavour to overmatch the oppoſite party by the advantage of the ground, yet it was concluded to the honour of the confederates by the retaking of Huy, a place, which in time proved of more importance than was at firſt apprehended.

King William being ſenſible, that the power of France was in its decline, and that the allies on the other hand increaſed daily in ſtrength, reſolved to form ſome conſiderable enterprize the following year, either in Flanders, or on the Maeſe, according as the enemy would give him opportunity to put it in execution on either ſide. In order to this, before his majeſty left Holland, he gave directions for the ſetting up and ſtoring of great magazines in ſeveral places, and for making all other neceſſary preparations; and ordered two armies to be early in the field, to keep the French in awe on both ſides, and draw their whole ſtrength on that, for which their jealouſy ſhould be greateſt, and afterwards fall on the other with more probability of ſucceſs. A ſiege in Flanders ſeemed to be attended with leſs difficulty than on the Maeſe, where the only place, that could be attempted was Namur, the ſtrongeſt of all the Low-Countries; and therefore, as moſt people looked upon ſuch an undertaking as altogether impoſſible, ſo the French themſelves turned their greateſt precautions towards Flanders, where they drew a new line from the Lys to the Schelde, before the allies could form a body of troops to oppoſe them. By theſe motions of the enemy, and their not increaſing their forces, it was eaſy to judge, that they would content themſelves to act defenſively this ſummer; not to mention the loſs of their beſt general, the duke of Luxemburg, who died towards the beginning of this year, and whoſe place was but ill ſupplied by the marſhal de Villeroy.

While the French were perfecting their lines, the confederates, who were ſuperior to them by near twenty-thouſand men, formed two great armies in Flanders and Brabant. The firſt, which conſiſted of ſeventy battalions of foot, and eighty-two ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, moſt Engliſh and Scots, and the reſt Dutch, encamped at Aerſeele, Comeghem, and Wouterghem, between Thieldt and Deynſe, and was to be commanded by the king in perſon, and under him by the old prince of Vaudemont, to whom the king had given laſt winter the command in chief of his infantry, he being the beſt general he had, after the death of prince Waldeck. The lieutenant generals of the foot were the count of Naſſau, ſir Henry Bellaſyſe, and count de Noyelles; and the major generals were colonel Churchill, Ramſay, La Meloniere, and the marquis de Miremont; monſieur Overkirk was general of the horſe, having the marquis de la Foreſt lieutenant-general, and major-general Eppinger under him. Colonel Gore commanded the Engliſh artillery; quarter-maſter general Dopff was to attend the king's perſon; and the general officers, who had accompanied his majeſty from England, were likewiſe to ſerve in this army; which, upon occaſion, was to be reinforced by twenty battalions and ten ſquadrons, that lay near Dixmyde, under the command of major-general Ellemberg. The other army conſiſting of ſixteen battalions of foot, and a hundred and thirty ſquadrons of horſe, incamped at Zellich and Ham, on the road from Bruſſels to Dendermond, and was to be headed by the elector of Bavaria, and under him by the duke of Holſtein-Ploen, the Spaniſh and Bavarian generals, the earl of Athlone general of the Dutch horſe, and monſieur Tetteau, general of the ordnance. There was alſo another little army, which was called 'The body of the Maeſe,' which lay incamped towards Bref and Talais on the Mehaigne. This body conſiſted of eighteen battalions of Brandenburgers, and ſeven Dutch; and of ſeventeen ſquadrons of Brandenburg, and fifteen of Liege; the whole commanded by the baron de Heyden, lieutenant-general of Brandenburg, and count de Berlo general of the Liege cavalry, who were to be joined by the reſt of the Brandenburg horſe, wnich came down along the Rhine. On the other hand, the marſhal de Villeroy, who, after Luxemburg's death, commanded the French forces in chief, had drawn his army together at Leuze between Condé Tournay, and Aeth; Marſhal de Boufflers and count Guiſcard, with a body of about twelve thouſand horſe and foot lay incamped about the Sambre; and monſieur Montal, with another ſmall body, lay between Ypres and the fort La Knoque, to obſerve major-general Ellemberg.

This was the poſture of both parties, when the king left Loo, and came to Breda in his way to Ghent; where he was received both by the governor and burghers with the like reſpects, that are uſually paid to a king of Spain. The elector of Bavaria and the duke of Holſtein-Ploen waited upon him at his arrival, being come to Ghent ſome hours before from their army, which by this time had marched to Ninove; and the ſame evening the king went to his army at Aerſeele. Two days after, upon intelligence that Boufflers had paſſed the Sambre, and that Villeroy was come to Eſcanaffe on the Schelde, to deſtroy the forage on this ſide; the king ſent orders to the earl of Athlone to march with forty ſquadrons from the duke of Bavaria's camp at Ninove, to obſerve Boufflers, who was now advanced to Flerus; and having beſtowed the three following days upon the review of his forces, which he found in very good condition, he datached three brigades of horſe commanded by the marquis de la Foreſt to reinforce the elector of Bavaria; and the next day marched his army from Aerſeele, and having ſent all the heavy baggage to Bruges, came and incamped at Becelaer, from whence a party was ſent out, that routed two of the enemies parties, and purſued them to the very walls of Ypres. Villeroy marched at the ſame time from Eſcanaffe, and retired behind the lines between Menin and Ypres, having detatched ten thouſand men to reinforce Boufflers, who was advanced to Pont Eſpierre. The ſame day in the evening the king went to view the enemies lines, and found the main body of their army incamped within them, ſtanding to their arms, as expecting to be attacked. But, though there was little probability of ſucceſs in attempting to force the lines, yet it was highly convenient for the king's project to give the French ſuch umbrage as to oblige them to bring all their forces to defend them. Therefore the body of the Maeſe advanced towards Namur, and the elector of Bavaria marched from Ninove, paſſed the Schelde, poſted himſelf at Kerkhoven near Hauterive facing the new lines, and forced Boufflers to retreat within them.

The king, being informed of the elector of Bavaria's arrival at Kerkhoven, detached General Churchill with eight battalions to join general Ellemberg; and the duke of Wirtemberg marched in the night with colonel Gore, colonel Brown, ten pontoons and eight hundred pioneers, to take upon him the command of that army, and to make an attempt upon fort Knoque, to increaſe the enemies jealouſy for Flanders, and draw their forces more on that ſide. The ſame day the elector of Bavaria made a feint of attacking the new line, and the king went to an eminence to view the enemy; and it being confirmed on all hands, that all their forces were within their lines, he ſent orders to the Baron de Heyden, to advance towards Flanders, with the troops under his command. Upon theſe motions Villeroy detached two brigades from his army, one towards Courtray, the other towards fort Knoque, in attacking which prince Wirtemberg met with great difficulties; and at the ſame time the king ſent freſh orders to the earl of Athlone and the baron de Heyden to confer together, and concert meaſures towards the ſiege, which he had in this thoughts; which ſtopped the march of the latter towards Flanders.

Hitherto the king had not declared his deſign, but had artfully purſued his ſtratagem of drawing all the enemies forces on one ſide, that he might attack the other with leſs oppoſition. This having ſucceeded according to his wiſhes, he directed the earl of Athlone and the baron de Heyden to inveſt Namur; and by an expreſs communicated the whole ſcheme of the ſiege to the duke of Bavaria, who highly applauded the ſame. According to the king's orders, the earl of Athlone, being joined by the Brandenburg troops, left a good body of horſe at Faliſe, and marched with the reſt towards Charleroy. At the ſame time the king, having marched back his army to Rouſelaer, left them there under the command of prince Vaudemont, and attended by a ſtrong guard advanced himſelf towards the Maeſe. Theſe motions, together with the great preparations, which were making at Maeſtricht, Liege, and Huy, put the French in ſuſpence, whether the confederates deſigned to attack Namur or Charleroy; and the marquis d'Harcourt, who had paſſed the Maeſe near Dinant, and who feared moſt for Charleroy, marched again down that river towards Namur; ſo that the earl, being by this time reinforced by a body of horſe and dragoons from the elector of Bavaria's army, commanded by count Tilly, took all the poſts from the Sambre to the Maeſe; whilſt the baron de Heyden with the Brandenburg and Dutch forces inveſted the place between the Maeſe and the Sambre. Another detachment was ordered to ſurround Namur on the Condroz ſide; but their not coming in time, by reaſon of the difficulty of the ground, and the vaſt extent of the circumvallation, gave marſhal Boufflers an opportunity to throw himſelf into the place with ſeveral regiments of dragoons, inſomuch that with this reinforcement the garriſon conſiſted of near fifteen-thouſand men, and moſt of them the beſt troops of France. The king came to the caſtle of Faliſe on the 2d of July, and the next day the elector of Bavaria having brought up the reſt of his army with prodigious expedition, the town and caſtle of Namur were entirely inveſted, and the king diſpoſed the troops into their reſpective quarters, and aſſigned each general his poſt. The Sambre and the Maeſe did naturally divide the army into three general quarters, which were ſubdivided into ſeveral others. The king's quarters reached from the Sambre to the Maeſe towards Brabant; and here incamped twenty-three battalions and a hundred and twenty ſquadrons, under the command of the duke of Holſtein-Ploen, the earl of Athlone, baron Opdam, monſieur Tetteau, count de Tilly, the marquis de la Foreſt, and meſſieurs Warfuzey, Hubert, Itterſum, Saliſch, and Fagel. The duke of Bavaria was poſted between the Sambre and the Maeſe, with twenty-four battalions, twenty ſquadrons, the Spaniſh and Bavarian generals, general Coehorn, and a major-general of Brandenburg. And in the Condroz along the Maeſe, both above and below the town, were incamped the baron de Heyden, with the other Brandenburg generals, and count de Berlo, general of the cavalry of Liege, having ten battalions and ſixty ſquadrons under them. For the communication of theſe quarters three bridges were immediately laid, one on the Sambre, and two on the Maeſe; and of theſe one was above, the other below Namur. The ſame day the king received intelligence, that Villeroy had ſent ſome detachments towards the Maeſe. That prince Wirtemberg, having amuſed the French for ſome time, and finding at length it was impoſſible to hinder the communication of fort Knoque, with the body under monſieur Montal, was retired from before that fort with eleven battalions of foot, and one regiment of horſe, and had joined prince Vaudemont: That the latter, being thus reinforced, had detached major-general Ramſey with fourteen battalions to attend his majeſty: That count de Naſſau was gone the ſame way with eight battalions more; and that he would be followed by the lord Cutts with ten others. The next day the king viewed the avenues to the town, and ordered trees to be cut down in the foreſt of Marlagne, to ſtop the paſſages on that ſide, and cover the retrenchment made on the road. The 5th and 6th of July, both horſe and foot being encamped, the beſiegers worked on the circumvallation under the direction of general Coehorn; and the earl of Athlone, having repaſſed the Maeſe with a hundred ſquadrons of horſe marched towards Pieton, in order to conſume the forage there, and obſerve the motions of the enemy. The count de Berlo followed him with the horſe of Liege, ſo that there remained but little cavalry before the place.

On the other hand the French prepared themſelves for a vigorous reſiſtance, and having lately been ſo conſiderably reinforced, expected no leſs than to defeat all the attempts of the beſiegers. And indeed it muſt be confeſſed, that their preſumption was not altogether groundleſs, if it be obſerved, that Namur had ever been accounted one of the ſtrongeſt towns in the Low-Countries, both by the advantage of it's ſituation, and the addition of it's fortifications, which give it the the command over two great rivers, and make it the beſt bulwark of Brabant. Beſides this, the place had very much changed it's condition, ſince it fell into the hands of the French king, who never ſpared expence to put his frontiers and conquered cities into the beſt defence they were capable of receiving from art and nature. The town then was quite overlooked by a ſteep hill from the Porte de Fer or Iron Gate, to that of St Nicholas; ſo that, the French having the liberty to bring down their batteries at firſt, to the deſcent of that hill, and to open their trenches at the foot of it near the Maeſe, they made themſelves maſters of it in five or ſix days. But now, to add a very conſiderable ſtrength to this weak part of the town, the French had made a detached baſtion on the aſcent of the hill before St. Nicholas's Gate, all of ſtone-work, with a caſemot upon it bomb-proof; the conterſcarp of free-ſtone, as alſo the covered way, which pointed juſt upon the top of the hill, ſo that no cannon from the plain could bear upon this work; and the allies were neceſſitated to batter it in reverſe from the other ſide of the Maeſe. This was not all; for, upon the right towards the Iron Gate, the beſieged had made three detached baſtions of the ſame work, juſt upon the brow of the hill, and at the foot of the ſame, before the gate; and between the hill and the brook of Werderen they had a fourth, which hindered the avenues between the hills to this gate; The plain upon theſe hills was fortified with a double covered way, both paliſſadoed to defend theſe detached baſtions towards the village of Bouge. And, when the Allies began to inveſt the place, the French were working at a third nearer to the brow of the hill, juſt before theſe works; ſo that the town, which before was but weak, was now by the new fortifications rendered ſo ſtrong, that it held out longer than the caſtle.

This caſtle, the principal ſtrength of Namur, was built upon an hill, in an angle formed by the confluence of the Sambre and the Maeſe, and conſiſted of an irregular fortification, ſuch as the ground could admit of, divided into the old and new caſtle of Terra Nova, and Coehorn, or William's Fort; and this likewiſe received ſuch additions from the French, as to leave it almoſt impoſſible to be attacked the ſame way they took it before. Coehorn Fort fell into their hands, by carrying their trenches round it along the bottom, between it and Terra Nova; which work, being thus embraced, and all manner of communication cut off, was ſoon forced to ſurrender. To prevent the like for the future, the French built a ſtrong ſtone redoubt, juſt upon the top of the hill, between the Coehorn and Terra Nova, with a caſemot upon it bomb-proof; and, as this redoubt commanded all the bottom to the Sambre, ſo it had likewiſe a good covered way, paliſſadoed from the angle of the gorge of the Coehorn, to the brink of the hill upon the Maeſe. Add to this, that they had raiſed a very good half-moon before the curtain of the horn-work of the Terra Nova; beſides their fortifying the Devil's Houſe, that flanked the ſides of the Coehorn towards the Maeſe, with a ſtrong ſtone redoubt; which place, when the Spaniards had it, had but a ſimple retrenchment about it; and yet it held out four or five days. From the upper part of the Coehorn on the ſide of the Maeſe they had made a good covered way, which embraced the abovementioned redoubt, to the edge of the hill upon the Maeſe; and had undertaken a prodigious line cut into the rock all along the top of the hill, near an Engliſh mile in length, terminating upon the edge of the hill towards the Sambre, with two redoubts at each end. The line was finiſhed, and the redoubt towards the Maeſe very forward; but, that towards the Sambre being but juſt begun, they made it up with faſcines, upon the arrival of the Allies before the place. In ſhort, the caſtle was ſo well fortified on the top of the hill, that it would have been a very tedious piece of work to attack it that way; but the weak ſide of the caſtle and Coehorn fort was towards the Sambre and the town, which the French had not ſo much regarded; being ſo confident that the place was impregnable, that they had ſet up this inſcription on one of the gates, 'Reddi quidem, ſed vinci non poteſt,' intimating, that this town might indeed be 'reſtored, but not retaken.'

Namur being thus fortified, and provided beſides with all neceſſaries for many months, with good ſtore of ammunition, one hundred pieces of cannon, twelve mortars, ten thouſand muſkets to ſpare, and a garriſon of twelve thouſand men, commanded by a governor, equally eſteemed by his king and beloved by his ſoldiers, ſeemed to defy the attempts of the beſt appointed and moſt numerous army. But, when Boufflers had thrown himſelf into it with ſeven choſen regiments of dragoons, a great number of volunteers, major-general Megrigny another Vauban, followed by the moſt ſkilful engineers, gunners, miners, and bombardiers of France, and had compoſed an army to defend theſe ramparts, which were thought impenetrable, it was then, that the French and their favourers looked upon the king's enterpriſe as an unparalleled temerity, and doubted not but Namur would be the rock, on which the grand confederacy ſhould ſplit. But all theſe great, and, in appearance, invincible obſtacles were not able to ſhake the king's reſolution; they ſerved only to make him concert effectual meaſures to ſurmount all difficulties, which he did to his immortal glory, the aſtoniſhment of his enemies, and the admiration of all Europe.

The lines of circumvallation being finiſhed, the king, attended by the elector of Bavaria, went, on the 10th of July, early in the morning to the baron de Hoyden's quarters. Here he was met by all the general officers, with whom having viewed the place, all were of the king's opinion, that the attack upon the town ought to be made againſt St Nicholas's gate; and therefore it was reſolved, that the trenches ſhould be opened on the hill de Bouge, and below along the Hermitage, as alſo that in the Condroz ſide between the hill St. Barbe and the river; and that, to favour the opening of the trenches, the baron de Heyden ſhould raiſe a battery of ten pieces of cannon, to batter in reverſe the covered way and detached baſtion before St Nicholas's gate, which faced the attack. Accordingly, the heavy cannon being come up, the trenches were opened the next day without any great diſturbance from the enemy; and the ſame day the lord Cutts arrived in the camp with ſix battalions of foot. The 12th the batteries began to play, and the trenches were ſucceſsfully carried on. On the 13th, prince Vaudemont informed the king, that the French ſeemed to have ſome deſign in Flanders, and that Aeth was moſt in danger. The next day, upon advice, that the marquis d'Harcourt and lieutenant-general Ximenes were in motion, and might eaſily fall upon our convoys on the ſide of the Condroz and Liege, which was unguarded, his majeſty detached twenty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons towards the plain of St. Severin between Huy and Liege, to obſerve the enemy; and in the afternoon a battery of four pieces of cannon was raiſed from the eminence of Bouge againſt the old tower of Coquelet, which very much incommoded the beſiegers.

The ſame day the king received two letters from prince Vaudemont. By the firſt he was informed that Villeroy had paſſed the Lys at Courtray and Harlebeck; and that, according to common report, he marched againſt the prince; and by the ſecond, that the French general was advanced as far as the river Mandel, and that, the head of his army having been diſcovered towards the mill of Dentreghem, Vaudemont had drawn his forces in battalia, poſted his left near Grammen, the right towards Aerſeele and Caneghem, and began to fortify his camp. The imminent danger, that the prince found himſelf in on this occaſion, and the admirable conduct, with which he extricated himſelf out of it, are paſſages too remarkable to be paſſed over in ſilence, and will therefore juſtify the following digreſſion.

Vaudemont was informed on the 12th of July at night, by a ſignal from the governor of Oudenard, that the head of the enemies army bent their march towards Cordes; which was confirmed to him by an expreſs from the governor of Aeth; and almoſt at the ſame time he received advice from Courtray, that the day before the French had laid bridges over the Lys both above and below that town. On the 13th early in the morning, he had poſitive intelligence, that they were actually paſſing that river; and on the other hand the commanders of the caſtles, which he had garriſoned on the river Mandel, gave him notice, that the enemy was marching directly againſt him. Theſe advices, though different, were yet both true; for twelve thouſand of the enemies horſe made towards Cordes, while the reſt of their army paſſed the Lys, and advanced towards Mandel.

Upon theſe informations Vaudemont gave orders to his army to be in readineſs, by a ſignal of two guns. But, before he made any motion, he reſolved to have a confirmation of the deſigns of the enemy. For as their marching towards Cordes with the greateſt part of the forces might be in order to relieve Namur, whilſt another body advanced towards the river Mandel, only to amuſe him; ſo, if their whole army marched in one body, there were two inconveniences to be feared; either they ſhould fall on the Maritime towns of Flanders, in caſe he marched to the left to prevent the relief of Namur; or that they ſhould gain two days march before him in their way to Namur, if he had made too quick a motion to the right to cover the places of Flanders. Theſe reflections obliged him to ſpend the whole day, being the 13th of July, in obſerving the enemy. He ſuffered them to attack the caſtles of Ingelmunſter and Mulenbeck, which were, each of them, them, defended by an hundred and forty men, who obliged the enemy to bring down cannon, before they would ſurrender; which made them loſe time, and gave the prince reaſon to judge, that their whole army was marching to attack him. Their vanguard, appearing in the evening at Dentreghem, where his right was poſted, confirmed him in that opinion. He thought fit immediately to change the diſpoſition of his camp, placing his right at Aerſeele, and his left at Grammen next the Lys; and at the ſame time ordered the retrenchments to be made on both ſides. The count de Noyelles, who had the command of theſe works for the center, and the whole left wing, cauſed the general's orders to be executed with ſuch extraordinary diligence, that on the 14th by break of day he had made a very defenſible line. The riſing grounds upon the right of Aerſeele were alſo fortified by ten of the clock in the morning; which done, the artillery was placed in the right flank and in the whole front of the line.

In this poſture, with fifty battalions of foot, and fifty-one ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, Vaudemont reſolved to expect Villeroy, though the marſhal had double the number, with which he was marching on the 14th of July towards him, and came up early enough to have attacked him. But, whether it was that he found the prince's camp ſo ſtrongly fortified, or that he would not hazard a battle, till Montal had taken his poſt in the rear of the prince's right, to fall upon him there, at the ſame time that the French army ſhould break up againſt the front, he remained in ſight of the Allies that evening, expecting to have attacked them early in the morning, and in a manner to have caught them in a net, by invironing them on all ſides. Vaudemont, being informed of Montal's motion, and finding he had already paſſed the Thielt, wiſely changed his reſolution of fighting, and thought it high time to provide for a retreat. Thereupon with great preſence of judgment he ordered the intrenchments to be perfected every where; ſome advanced houſes to be ſet on fire, leſt the French ſhould poſſeſs themſelves of them in their march againſt him; and the cannon of the left continually to play upon the enemy, to give them occaſion to think, that his deſign was rather to fight than retreat. At the ſame time he ordered the cannon of the right and the front to be drawn off, and to march towards Deynſe, which was done with that ſecrecy, that the enemy did not perceive it; for he had artfully ordered the artillery to be moving from the batteries all the afternoon, ſo that, when it went clear off, the enemy thought it had been but the ordinary motion. Then marched the two lines of foot upon the left along the retrenchments, to cover which the prince ordered a body of horſe to go and poſt themſelves in the retrenchments, as they were quitted by the foot; the latter marching out at the ſame time with their pikes, and colours trailing, to conceal their going off. Neither did the enemy perceive this motion, till the cavalry mounted again and abandoned the retrenchments; by which time the infantry was got into the bottom between Aerſeele and Wourterghem, marching towards Deynſe. While the foot was thus filing off from the retrenchments, the prince ordered monſieur Overkirk, with the right wing of the horſe, interlined with Collier's brigade of foot, to make a line falling towards Caneghem, and extend himſelf from the windmill of Aerſeele, towards Wink, in order to make Montal believe, that this line was deſigned to oppoſe his attempt upon the rear of the prince's right; but his ſecret orders were to march off by Wink to Nivelle, and ſo to Ghent. At the ſame time the foot marched by Wourterghem to Deynſe; the earl of Rochford, who was poſted with the left wing of horſe and two battalions of foot towards the Lys, made the rear-guard towards the line, with a line of foot on the one ſide, and three ſquadrons of Eppinger's horſe upon the other. All this was ſo contrived by the prince from the right to the left, that his army diſappeared all at once; and, ſtill to impoſe the better upon the French, Vaudemont, himſelf, and the duke of Wirtemberg, with ſome other generals, kept in the camp, forming with their own domeſtics and attendants a ſmall body of horſe, with which they followed the army, as ſoon as it was all got off. The French, finding themſelves thus ſtrangely baffled, did what they could to fall upon the rear of the Allies, and particularly Montal endeavoured to attack that body, which was commanded by monſieur Overkirk, whom he overtook with ſome ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons. But, the defiles being advantageous, and brigadier Collier having ordered all the grenadiers of his brigade to the rear of all, to face the enemy from time to time, as they approached, the grenadiers with their fire kept the French at a diſtance, and made good the retreat. Nor had the enemy a much better ſucceſs in their attempt upon the rear of the body of foot, commanded by the count de Noyelles. However, two ſquadrons of their dragoons, putting green boughs in their hats, which was the confederates diſtinguiſhing mark in a day of battle, and ſpeaking ſome French, ſome Engliſh, as if they had been ſome of their own rear-guard, did by that ſtratagem, towards the evening, come up cloſe to their rear, and marched along with them a little way, till they came to a convenient place, when they fired upon them firſt, and then fell in amongſt them with their ſwords, which put the firſt battalion, that was ſet upon, in ſome diſorder; but the other facing about immediately conſtrained them to retire, after they had killed a few men: A loſs, altogether inconſiderable for a retreat, which is ſcarce to be parallelled in hiſtory, and for which king William, in his letter to prince Vaudemont, 'owned himſelf obliged to him: adding, that he had given greater marks of a general conſummate in the art of war, than if he had won a battle [a].'

Vaudemont, having reached Deynſe towards the cloſe of the evening, left in it a gartiſon under brigadier O'Farrel, and then marched as far as the plain of Oyendonck in his way to Ghent, reſolving at firſt to have reſted his army there all night; but having halted a while, and then, as he himſelf afterwards ſaid, calling to mind a maxim of that great general Charles IV. duke of Lorrain, his father, 'That, when an army is upon the retreat, it muſt be ſure to retreat out of the enemies reach,' he decamped again, and by nine of the clock the next morning, the whole army was advanced to Mary-Kirk, under the walls of Ghent, from whence lieutenant-general Bellaſyſe and the marquis of Miremont were detached with twelve battalions, and twelve pieces of cannon, to ſecure Neuport, and the canal of Paſquendal. Their diligence, and the prince of Wirtemberg's coming up to ſuſtain them, with twelve other battalions, and thirty-eight ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, quite broke the meaſures of Villeroy and Conti, who had already taken quarters in ſight of that place, in order to inveſt it. Villeroy, finding the attack of Neuport too difficult, bent his march towards Dixmuyde, which was garriſoned by eight battalions of foot, and a regiment of dragoons under major-general Ellemberg.

Thus was performed a retreat ſcarce to be parallelled in hiſtory. The military men that ſerved under Vaudemont magnified his conduct very highly, and compared it to any thing that Turenne, or the greateſt generals of the age, had done. In the courſe of the retreat it was once thought he could not get off, and Villeroy's conduct was blamed for not improving the advantage, but it was without cauſe; for Villeroy had not overſeen this advantage, but had ordered the duke of Mayne, the French king's beloved ſon, to make a motion with the horſe which he commanded: and probably, if that had been ſpeedily executed, it might have had ill effects on prince Vaudemont. But the duke of Mayne deſpiſed Villeroy, and made no haſte to obey his orders; ſo the advantage was loſt, and the king of France put him under a ſlight diſgrace for it.

In the mean time, the attacks againſt the town of Namur were carried on with great application; and two or three ſmall ſallies of the beſieged having had no ſucceſs, they reſolved to make another on the 18th of July, about three in the afternoon, with twelve hundred horſe, and four ſquadrons of dragoons. After they had croſſed the Maeſe, they attempted the trenches on the right-hand of the bridge, belonging to that river, took a redoubt, that was unfiniſhed, and only ſtuffed with ſacks of wool, fell upon the beſiegers both in front and flank, and forced them at firſt to give way; but the latter taking freſh courage, and being timely ſupported by ſome Brandenburg horſe, the French were beaten back with the loſs of two hundred of their men; nor was this encounter leſs bloody to the beſiegers. However, the king finding that very day, that the trenches were advanced within fuzee-ſhot of the counterſcarp, he reſolved to ſtorm the advanced works and traverſes that evening an hour before

[a] The king's letter was as follows:

- Couſin,

'You cannot believe how much your letter of yeſterday noon, which I received this morning by break of day, diſturbed me: On the other ſide, how joyful I was upon receipt of the other letter, dated from Mary-Kirk near Ghent, this day at three in the morning. I am much obliged to you, for in this retreat you have given greater marks of a general, conſummate in the art of war, than if you had gained a victory; I abſolutely approve of your conduct upon this occaſion, and I hope it will hinder the enemy from undertaking any more of the ſame nature. Nevertheleſs I ſhall be impatient 'till I know which way they bend their march, ſince this blow has failed them.

'I remain always, &c.'

ſun-ſet, to hinder the enemy from fortifying themſelves any more; and for that purpoſe he ordered, that the battalions that relieved the trenches ſhould ſupport them. Accordingly, major-general Ramſey and the lord Cutts, at the head of five battalions of the foot guards, Engliſh, Scots, and Dutch, began the onſet on the right, being ſuſtained by ſix Engliſh battalions, commanded by brigadier-general Fitz-Patrick; and at the ſame time major-general Saliſch, with eight Dutch and other regiments, and nine thouſand pioneers, inſulted the enemy on the left from the redoubt to the ruined tower of Coquelet; and was to be ſeconded by major-general Heukelom, with ſome Dutch battalions. The horſe-guard was doubled, and all the troops on that ſide had orders to be in readineſs to ſupport the whole attack in caſe of neceſſity; which precaution proved altogether needleſs, by reaſon of the extraordinary valour and intrepidity, which the aſſailants ſhewed on this occaſion. However, the beſieged having brought out eight battalions, a great detachment of dragoons, and all the grenadiers, to defend their retrenchments, the diſpute was obſtinate for two hours, but at laſt the French were beaten back, and purſued to the very gates of the town. The king, who, according to his cuſtom, remained upon the place, during the whole action, was ſo well pleaſed with the bravery and excellent order of his men, that, laying his hand over the duke of Bavaria's ſhoulder, he ſaid to him ſeveral times with tranſport, 'See my brave Engliſh! See my brave Engliſh! And indeed, it muſt be remembered to their immortal honour, that without any ſhelter they advanced boldly and undiſturbed, amidſt ſhowers of great and ſmall ſhot, bombs and hand-granadoes, which by the effect of mines and fougades opened graves for them in ſeveral places, towards an enemy ſecured by retrenchments well paliſſadoed. The confederates loſs in this action mounted to twelve hundred men, either killed or wounded, and that of the French to about as many.
